Alexandrian Jew, acquainted with the works of Philo, or at least with his familiar conceptions, and (assuming him to have written the Epistle to the Hebrews) fond of stately words and sentences, yet so modest as to suppress his own name. (6.) Clemens of Rome is familiar both with the Book of Wisdom and the Epistle to the Hebrews, and quotes them in near juxtaposition. (7.) They are united in the same sentence by Irenaeus (Euseb. 'H. E.' v. 26). Ably as the theory is elaborated, it falls to the ground when we remember (i.) that there is absolutely no resemblance between the general style of the Epistle to the Hebrews and the Book of Wisdom; (ii.) that the method of referring to the facts and words of the Old Testament is very different in the two books; and (iii.) that in the Epistle to the Hebrews we scarcely find a trace of the familiarity with Greek learning and philosophy which is so remarkable a feature of the Book of Wisdom.

We must therefore give up all attempts to discover the actual name of the author of the Book of Wisdom. We must also reject three other vague conjectures respecting him.

α. There is not a tittle of evidence for the notion that he was one of the traditional seventy translators of the Hebrew Bible into Greek.

β. Nor can we infer that he belonged to the sect of the Therapeutae.[1] No such inference can be drawn from iii. 13–15, where preference is given to virtuous childlessness over wickedness abounding in offspring; nor from the declared superiority of brief and virtuous life to dishonoured age (iv. 8, 9); nor from the assumed direction to pray towards the sun (xvi. 28); nor in any other passage of the book.

γ. Nor can it be held that he was a Christian.[2] There is no trace in the book of any knowledge of Christ; nor of the Incarnation; nor of the Atonement; nor of the Resurrection; nor indeed of any doctrine distinctly Christian. How different is the writer's tone towards idolatry from that which breathes through the courteous and noble speech of St. Paul at Athens! Luther said of the book quite truly that it "stark jüdele."[1] Here and there (as in i. 13; ii. 23; vii. 6; viii. 21; xiv. 3, &c.) the writer seems to have a theoretic glimpse of the truth so nobly stated by St. Peter and St. Paul, that "in every nation they who fear God and work righteousness are accepted of him" (Acts xi. 35), and that "God hath made of one blood all nations of men, that they should seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after him and find him," since we are all "the offspring of God" (Acts xvii. 26–29). But he has not sufficient grasp of this theoretic truth to save him from the narrowest and most repellent form of Jewish particularism (vi. 4–7; x. 15; xi. 1–15; xii. 19–22; xv. 2, 14; xviii. 1, and passim), to an extent which even leads him to misunderstand the plainest lessons and misinterpret the plainest facts of Jewish history (iii. 16–18; iv. 3–5; x.–xix. passim). In point of fact the Jehovah of the Book of Wisdom is essentially that which the New Testament teaches us that He is not—namely, "a respecter of persons" (xi. 10).[2] If the writer's eschatology shews some development in its apparent recognition of future retribution (iv. 19) and future blessedness (v. 1), and of a day of future reckoning (iii. 18; iv. 20), yet on the other hand he not only falls behind the writers of the New, but even below the prophets of the Old Testament, in the fact that he seems (as we have seen) wholly to have lost sight of that hope of a personal Messiah which is the very heart of the truest Judaism. In this he resembles Philo in one of the weakest of his religious characteristics. Salvation with the author of the Book of Wisdom consists in the attainment of wisdom. It is an arbitrary fancy which sees in the allusion to the Ark in xiv. 7, "blessed is

[1] See Gfrörer, 'Philo,' ii. 265. Dähne, 'Alex. Religionsphil.' ii. 170. Jost, 'Gesch. d. Judenth.' i. 378.

[2] Kirschbaum, Weisse, &c.

[1] See Ewald, 'Gesch.' iii. 553. It is clear that the passages chiefly referred to (iii. 5; iv. 2, 10; v. 17; vii. 26; ix. 8, 15 ff.; xi. 10, 24; xiv. 7) are quite insufficient to prove that the writer was a Christian.

[2] This is all the more remarkable because the Wisdom-literature of the O. T. (Proverbs, Job, Ecclesiastes) is absolutely free from the taint of particularism.

the wood whereby righteousness cometh," any real prevision of the Cross of Christ; nor is there anything which can be interpreted into a Christian reference in ii. 17–20 or v. 1–5. Though some passages may perhaps be reckoned as "unconscious prophecies," one fact should be decisive: the book does not contain the faintest trace of the Incarnation, and therefore no Christian could have written it.

Unity of the Book.

As to the unity and completeness of the book there can be little doubt. Houbigant, in the middle of the 18th century,[1] was the earliest to suggest that the first nine chapters were by Solomon, and the remainder by a translator. The attempt to disintegrate the book was carried still further by Eichhorn and Bertholdt. Bretschneider divided it between four different authors, and finally Nachtigal (1799) tried to prove that it was an anthology of the praises of Wisdom to be chanted in antiphons, and composed by seventy-nine different authors! It is not worth while to dwell further upon perverse hypotheses and fantastic arguments which have long been exploded and abandoned. The difference of treatment and method in the first and second sections arises from the difference of subject-matter, but the style of thought and language is identical throughout. There is in every section the same monotony of causal connexions (especially by means of γὰρ and ὅτι), and the treatise is marked by a clear unity of purpose from beginning to end.

Grotius, followed by Grätz, thought that the book had been manipulated by a Christian interpolator. The latter points to such passages as ii. 24; iii. 13; iv. 1; xiv. 7, in proof of his hypothesis.[2] A reference to these passages will convince most readers that iii. 13, iv. 1, belong rather to moral philosophy than to any distinct Christian teaching; ii. 24 alludes to a notion which is equally found in Josephus and in the Rabbis; xiv. 7 is nothing but an allusion to the Ark, which has been applied to the Cross by Christian readers.

[1] 'Prolegomena in Script.' ii. 160.
[2] Gratz, 'Gesch. d. Jud.' iii. 443.

Ideal of Wisdom.

There were among the ancient Hebrews three great classes of religious teachers—Priests, Prophets, and those who for want of a better name may be called Moralists, Humanists, or the Wise (Jer. xviii. 18).[1] The Priests were mainly concerned with the minutiae of the Levitic law, and were occupied in securing that accurate observance (ἀκρίβεια) of all the Mosaic institutions which constituted the ideal of "righteousness" (צְדָקָה, δικαιοσύνη). The Prophets, conscious of the slothful formalism which resulted from exclusive attention to external regulations, spoke with almost scornful depreciation of rites and ceremonies, and with all the passion of genius enforced the supreme importance of eternal laws. The Sages taught in a less exalted tone the lessons of prudential experience. They began indeed (Prov. i. 7), and ended (Eccles. xii. 13), with the fundamental truth that "the fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge," and that "to fear God, and keep His commandments, is the whole duty of man." But they did not trouble themselves with all the sacerdotal prescriptions which were afterwards known as the Halakha, and, instead of adopting the method of lofty theoretic teaching, they contented themselves for the most part with broad practical instruction delivered in the form of gnomes or proverbs. To this kind of teaching was given the name of 'Wisdom' (חָכְמָה), and the literature to which it gave rise is hence known as 'the Chokmah' or Sapiential literature. It cannot be called a Hebrew Philosophy.[2] The Jews had no philosophy, and the books which dealt more or less directly with 'Wisdom' are too popular, too undeveloped, too loosely

[1] These Humanists or Gnomologists were found among other Eastern nations: 1 Kings iv. 30; Jer. xlix. 7; Obad. 8.

[2] Michaelis inaccurately speaks of Solomon as "a philosopher." So too Oetinger and De Wette. But Ritter rightly refuses this title to Jewish modes of thought. Dr. A. B. Davidson points out that the Hebrew Wisdom differs from all secular philosophy: (1) in its starting-point; (2) in its method. It aims at the recognition, not the discovery of God. It professes to verify, not to infer. It takes secure refuge from speculative difficulties in moral facts.

unsystematic to be dignified with any such title. A nation which was absorbed in the contemplation of a uniquely revealed religion had little or no need for a speculative philosophy.

The Sapiential books of the Old Testament are the Books of Proverbs, Job, and Ecclesiastes; and they shew a gradual and remarkable development in the views of the Jewish writers.

1. At the earliest stage, in the Book of Proverbs, we see an absolute and unclouded belief in the truth that happiness and holiness, sin and sorrow, are severally united; that even in their earthly circumstances the wicked are miserable and the godly are blessed (Prov. xi. 31; x. 27; xvi. 19, 20, &c.). It is the era of principles, theoretically accepted as though they were true without exception.

2. It was impossible that this era should last long. Its fundamental hypothesis was out of harmony with universal experience. In some of the Psalms (xxxvi., xxxix., xlix., lxxiii.), we already find that the facts of life have come into hard collision with this beautiful theory, and that "the equation between occurrence and principle" is not found to be so perfect. The wicked sometimes prosper; the good are sometimes plunged into misery and misfortune. The Psalmists strain every nerve to explain these facts in accordance with the accepted orthodoxy. It is the era of difficulties. The mode of meeting them was of necessity partial and arbitrary, for it often rested on the assumption that the prosperity of the ungodly before they died was always overthrown by visible retributions.[1] The writer of the magnificent Book of Job endeavoured to grapple with the problem still more closely. He sets before us the picture of the great and holy Sheykh of Uz suddenly, by no fault of his own, but through the envy of the Evil One, ruined, pauperised, hopelessly bereaved, smitten with incurable leprosy, and reduced to sit upon his dunghill, a very scorn of men, amid the taunts of orthodox friends, who with ever-increasing bitterness urge him to confess the secret crimes which, in accordance with the current religionism, can alone explain the crushing incidence of such misfortunes. Though all appearances are against him, though his own previous conceptions seem to be shaken to their foundations, the sufferer still proclaims his unshaken trust in God. The youthful Elihu, discontented alike with the complaints of Job and the dogmas of his friends, attempts to found his vague Theodicaea on the infinite greatness and power of God and the ignorance of man. Then God, as with a thunderclap, closes the controversy, not condescending to argue or to justify His ways to man, but pointing him to the proofs of transcendent mercy and omnipotence in the works of nature; bidding him listen to the hawk's cry and gaze on the plumes of the ostrich; pointing him to Behemoth crashing through the forests and Leviathan tempesting the seas; turning his gaze on the clouds, and the lightning, and the constellations, and the dawn. And then in the end, when the problem has been faced, when Job confesses and is content, he is again crowned with sevenfold prosperity.

3. Then followed the era of quiescence. The disharmony between theory and experience was admitted, and as far as possible utilised as an additional reason for moral steadfastness. The Book of Ecclesiastes presents the problem of life in this later aspect. It sets before us the despair and scepticism of a sated worldling, not the anguish of an afflicted saint. The Jewish thinker of that epoch had begun to see that the appeal to God's omnipotence was not a solution of the difficulty, but only the expression of a trust that it would some day be solved. Yet even through despair and satiety the Preacher learnt by means of evil that good is best; and he too, while he does not even profess to offer any explanation of the insoluble, discovers and proclaims that the only thing which can make life tolerable is trustful obedience to the law of God.[1]

After the close of the Old Testament canon, Sapiential literature still survives,

[1] See Ps. xxxvii. 25, 35 ff.

[1] See some suggestive papers on the Wisdom of the Hebrews, by Dr. A. B. Davidson, in 'The Expositor,' xi. 321; xii. 381, 436.

Digitized by Microsoft®

though under different conditions and in altered forms. In the Apocrypha, the Books of Wisdom, of Ecclesiasticus, and of Baruch belong to this class of literature. Outside the Apocryphal canon we have the Fourth Book of Maccabees; the writings of Philo, in which we have a sort of eclectic philosophy of religion; and books like the Book of Enoch, in which the Sapiential element melts away into that apocalyptic literature in which the literary activity of the Jews expended itself during the last epoch of their national existence.

The service rendered to the main object of the Wisdom-literature by these later books is due to the ever-deepening conviction of a sentient and individual life beyond the grave. This, indeed, must ever remain the most important factor in our attempts to solve the mysteries of life,—the undeserved prosperity of the wicked, and the sufferings of the innocent. The Psalmists had pushed back the solution to the end of mortal life, and had to be content with the belief that in the long run, and as the general rule, the godly are not ultimately forsaken, nor the wicked finally prosperous. But gradually men came to recognise that it is by no means always that in this life the intolerable wrong is atoned for. Job was restored to health and wealth, but after all Job might have died on his dunghill or in misery as thousands of good men have done before and since. But the later 'Humanists' push the solution beyond the limits of this life altogether, and build their justification of God to man on the doctrines of their eschatology.

The Book of Wisdom belongs to a period during which the Jews had been profoundly affected by Hellenic influences. Already during the Babylonish captivity they had been providentially taught the lesson that > "All wisdom is not hid in Moses' law,

> The Pentateuch, and what the Prophets wrote.
> The Gentiles also know, and write and teach
> To admiration, led by Nature's light."

When they came into close contact with the infinite charm of Greek thought and Greek life in its better and purer phases, all but the most obstinately narrow among them learnt yet more clearly that they were neither the sole children of God's love nor the exclusive recipients of His blessings. In Alexandria especially—where they had equal civil and political privileges with the other citizens; where they forgot their own language and knew no language but the common Greek; where their own sacred books were no longer a sealed and mystic volume, but had been placed in the Alexandrian library at the request of the Egyptian princes, and were open to the study of every intelligent heathen; where they themselves became familiar with the profound philosophical writings of Plato, of the Stoics, and of other Greek schools of thought,—in Alexandria more than in any other city of the Roman Empire, it was impossible for an educated Jew to be unaffected by Hellenic influences.

The adoption of Hellenising customs as distinguished from Hellenic modes of thought never made much progress among the Jews. It was viewed with profound disfavour. Jason and Menelas, the priests who tried to introduce Greek practices among the Jews, are called "ungodly wretches" by the author of the First Book of Maccabees. Some Jews carried their admiration of heathendom to the extent of apostasy, and even voluntarily obliterated the marks of circumcision which every Jew regarded as the seal of God's covenant with his race.[1] It is against such apostates—who openly adopted the Epicurean motto, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die," and were faithless to the guide of their youth—that the religious polemic of this book, and its historical arguments, are chiefly directed.

On the other hand, the moral and religious thoughts of the Alexandrian Jews became deeply imbued with principles which they had learnt from Greek philosophy. Hellenic customs were evil; Hellenic culture was admirable. Whatever might be the opinion of the Rabbis of Jerusalem, the Theosophists of Alexandria firmly believed that Greek studies were in no respect injurious to their national faithfulness. Philo, however much he platonises, never for a moment forgets that he is a righteous and orthodox, though illuminated and intellectually emancipated, Jew. He adopts a syncretism by which he is able to reconcile the Timaeus with the First Book of Genesis, and the Old Testament in general with the Platonic dialogues and the writings of the Stoics. In those writings he found that the philosophers, by applying the method of allegory to the Homeric writings, were able to reconcile Homer with Thales, and Anaxagoras, and Aristotle. Philo applies the same method to the Old Testament until he and other Jewish literati persuaded themselves that the Greek philosophy was profoundly religious, and the Jewish religion profoundly philosophical. Indeed Aristobulus (B.C. 160)[1] and other Jewish writers believed and endeavoured to prove that all Greek poets and philosophers, from Orpheus and Pythagoras downwards, had come into contact with Hebrew teachers, and were ultimately, however unconsciously, the pupils of Moses.[2]

[1] ἐπισπασμός, 1 Cor. vii. 18; Jos. 'Ant.' xii. 5, § 1. The attempts to introduce Hellenising innovations for the overthrow of Judaism are described in 1 Macc. i. 11–15, 41–61; 2 Macc. iv. 10–15. Those who thus tried to obliterate their circumcision were called מְשׁוּכִים. See Ewald, 'Hist. of Isr.' v. 268–271 (E. Tr.).

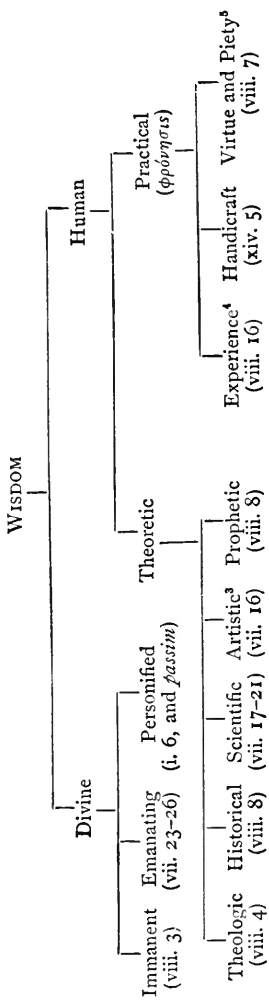
We have already seen that the author of Wisdom was familiar with the thoughts of Greek philosophers, and that to a certain extent—but not to any extent inconsistent with orthodoxy—he had adopted them. Upon him and his contemporaries the old problem of the Book of Job was pressing in a different form. He was no longer in the blooming period of Aristobulus, when the Jews stood in high favour with the government, and when the bitter envy and hostility of other races in the city had not yet been excited. After the days of Ptolemy Physkon, race hatreds raged in Alexandria until they culminated in the brutal persecutions which the Jews had to endure at the hands of their fellow-citizens in the days of Caligula and under the government of Flaccus. The author of the Book of Wisdom has to face the question how such a state of things is compatible with the faithfulness of the chosen people. His solution of the old problem is involved in the eulogies of Wisdom. It is practically a Stoic view of life and providence. Wisdom is the preserver, the deliverer, the sole source of immortality, the unique bestower of every blessing. She gives joy and peace (viii. 16–18), and consolation in sorrow (viii. 9), and power (viii. 15), and fame, and honour, and immortal memory (viii. 10–16), and is better than all riches, and health, and beauty (vii. 7–10). He who possesses her needs nothing besides. He who is without her is on the path of destruction. Wisdom more than atones for every earthly calamity. Childlessness and a short life might be regarded as misfortunes; but when they befell the possessor of wisdom, they were blessings far more consummate than the many children of long-lived sinners (iv. 1–8). Ideally the faithful Israelite was the wise man, and therefore, like the Stoic 'wise man,' he was a king of men and a favourite of heaven. The punishments of the heathen were long-continued, overwhelming, and retributive. Israel too might suffer, but his sufferings were only such as were due to mild and fatherly correction. The afflictions of the godly are compensated beyond the grave; "righteousness is immortal." This is the basis of the writer's ethical system, and it has well been said that it conducts us to the threshold of Christianity.[1]

What then is the writer's conception of Wisdom? Like Jesus the son of Sirach, he uses the word in all sorts of intermingled senses, because his conception of wisdom is complex and many-sided. Sometimes he uses the word objectively for the Wisdom of God;[2] sometimes subjectively

[1] On Aristobulus see Valckenaer, 'Diatribe de Aristobulo,' 1806; Siegfried, 'Philo,' 24; Dähne, 'Alex. Relig. Philos.' ii. 73; Gfrörer, 'Philo,' ii. 71; Ewald, 'Gesch.' iv. 335. Fragments of his book on the Pentateuch (Syngramma or Prospephonema) are preserved by Eusebius, 'Præp. Ev.' vii. 13, 14; viii. 6, 9, 10; ix. 6; xiii. 12. Clemens of Alexandria, 'Strom.' v. p. 595, says that he tried to reconcile the Old Testament with Aristotelianism.

[2] Philo finds in Moses an anticipation of all that was most valuable in Greek philosophy. 'Vit. Mos.' ii. 4; 'De conf. ling.' 20; 'Quod omnis prob.' 8.

[1] Wisd. i. 15; iii. 1–10; viii. 17.



[2] Wisd. vii. viii. ix. Comp. Job xii. 13, xxviii. 23; Prov. viii. 22–31; Ecclus. i. 1, 4, 9, for the wisdom of man: sometimes he applies the word to theoretic wisdom, sometimes to practical.[1] Wisdom is at once the sum total of the Divine perfections (vii., viii., ix.) and the synthesis of all the highest moral and intellectual qualities of man (vii. 17–21; viii. 7, &c.). The reader will perhaps best understand the latitude in which the word is used to imply at once the providence of God and the culture and virtue of man, if I draw out the senses attached to it in different passages in the annexed rough table.

Digitized by Microsoft®

We may therefore sum up by saying that, on the Divine side, Wisdom is the Spirit of God, regarded by man under the form of Providence (i. 4, 7; vii. 7, 22; ix. 17): and, on the human side, Wisdom is "trustworthy knowledge of the things that are" (vii. 17); "a knowledge of Divine and human things, and of their causes"[2] (4 Macc. i. 16), regarded by God as manifested in moral life. But "one set of terms does service to express both the intellectual and the moral wisdom. The 'wise' man means the righteous man; the 'fool' is one who is godless. Intellectual terms that describe knowledge are also moral terms describing life."

Wisdom is throughout the book repeatedly personified, but never in reality hypostatised. When the writer speaks of Wisdom as a living being, he is as conscious as the writer of the Book of Proverbs that he is only adopting a poetic figure of speech. But gradually the language reacted on the conception, and Wisdom came to be regarded, not only, like our word 'Providence,' as a reverential synonym for the manifestations of God, but also as possessing an idealised and separable existence. In this way the Wisdom-literature, though it was in no respect directly Messianic, yet contributed to the Christology of the Old Testament. The suffering and xxiv. 3–6; Baruch iii. 29. There is not in this book any clear identification of Wisdom with the Logos, nor indeed is the Logos as a Person, or at any rate as an all-but-personal entity, otherwise recognised than as a figure of speech (xviii. 15). If Wisdom is spoken of as a Person, in language which Christians might apply to the Son, or the Holy Spirit (i. 4–7; vii. 22; ix. 1, 2, 17; xii. 1; xviii. 15, &c.), this is also true of Prov. viii. 22–31, and other passages of the Old Testament.

[1] See Job xxvii. 3; xxxii. 8. Mr. Deane quotes the remark of Prof. Huxley (which would have been heartily endorsed by the writers of Sapiential books), "The only medicine for suffering, crime, and all the other woes of mankind is Wisdom" (see xvi. 12, 13).

[2] "Sapientia est rerum humanarum divinarumque scientia." (Cic. 'De Off.' i. 43; ii. 2.) Pseudo-Solomon's conception of Wisdom is more Hellenic than that of Prov. viii., and that in Ecclesiasticus (i. 6 fg.; iv. 11 fg.; vi. 18 fg., &c.).

[3] Comp. Ex. xxxi. 3; xxxv. 31.

[4] Prov. iii. 13–19, viii. 14; Ecclus. i. 4.

[5] Comp. Job xxviii. 12–14; Ps. cxi. 10; Prov. ix. 10, xv. 33; Ecclus. xix. 25, &c.

Digitized by Microsoft®

holy saint, who is made immortal by righteousness, becomes in this book, no less than in the Psalms, an ideal which had in it a prophetic element, and which helped the early Jewish-Christian Church to get over the stumbling-block of the Cross, and to recognise in Jesus the fulfilment of the long anticipations of a yearning world.

III. Object of the Book. ('Cur?')

The object of the book seems to have been threefold, with reference to the condition of three classes of readers.

1. It was hortatory. "The righteous man"—i.e. the Jewish people, and the religious Jew of the writer's day—seems to have been in a condition of depression and persecution. He is here encouraged by the thought that Wisdom is the source of all blessings, and better than all the best earthly blessings. Wisdom is an attribute of God, and is a gift to man. Nay, more, Wisdom is a divine and living spirit, which permeates the universe and is filled with love to the human race. Life without her is full of deadly peril, and inevitable misery; with her the hopes of man, even when he is afflicted, are full of immortality. These consoling thoughts are mainly developed in x.–xi. 4.

2. The book was apologetic. Various objections were urged against the faith of the fathers. Old problems were revived, and the answers to them were declared to be insufficient. The inequalities of earthly justice, and the delays of retribution, and the trials of the good were used as arguments in favour of sceptical conclusions. In this book such difficulties are met both directly and indirectly. The writer's Theodicaea is involved in his praise of Wisdom; in his description of the blessings which she confers; in the declaration and demonstration of her loving character and easy attainment; in the promise that she will bestow on them who seek her an immortality which shall more than atone for earth's most intolerable wrongs.

3. The book was a twofold polemic.

α. Its earlier section was aimed at Hellenising Jews, who had proved faithless to their national religion. We see from the first two Books of Maccabees, 3 Macc. ii. 31, and from the writings of Philo ('De poenit.' § 2; 'De conf. ling.' § 2; 'Vit. Mos.' i. 6), and we know from the story of renegades like Tiberius Alexander, the nephew of Philo, that there were at this epoch some Jews who openly embraced heathen customs and became the votaries of purely heathen systems of philosophy. Not content with this (ii. 12; iii. 10), these men treated faithful Jews with scorn (ii. 12), and even with actual persecution (ii. 10–20). The first five chapters are specially devoted to the refutation and warning of such faithless sensualists, in order that other Jews might be saved from their tendency to succumb to the seductions of a philosophy which was subversive both of morals and of religion.

β. The last sections of the book, especially chapters xiii.–xv., are a polemic against idolatry, but specially against the image-worship and animal-worship of the Egyptians; and this polemic is historically continued in the poetically idealised sketch of the contrasted fortunes of Egypt and Israel at the epoch of the Exodus. At the same time this series of pictures was meant not only to influence the mind of any heathen enquirer who was inclined to become a Jewish proselyte, but also to deter Jewish waverers from the criminal folly of sacrificing their connexion with the chosen people, its religion, promises, and hopes. If Wisdom was the chief good, it could be attained only among those who knew and worshipped the one true God.[1]

IV. Date. ('Quando?')

The exact date at which the book was written can unhappily be as little determined as the name of the author. We have a terminus a quo and a terminus ad quem, but they leave between them a space of some 250 years.

The terminus a quo is the date of the Septuagint version. The writer could not have known Hebrew, or if he did he at any rate prefers to make use of the LXX. If this could not be decisively

[1] We find the same stormy zeal against idolatry, mixed with the deepest scorn, in 'Bel and the Dragon,' and 'The Epistle of Jeremy.'

Digitized by Microsoft®

inferred from vi. 7; xi. 4; xii. 8; xvi. 22; xix. 21, it is proved by xv. 10, where the writer alludes to the LXX. version of Is. xliv. 20, where "his heart is ashes" varies from the Hebrew, "he followeth after ashes." Again, in ii. 12 the phrase ἐνεδρεύσωμεν τὸν δίκαιον, ὅτι δύσχρηστος ἡμῖν ἐστι is borrowed from the LXX. version of Is. iii. 10, δήσωμεν τὸν δίκαιον ὅτι δυσχρ. ἡμῖν ἐστι, where the context and the Hebrew text of the original are wholly different ("say ye to the righteous, that it shall be well with him").

Since then we know with reasonable certainty that the date of the LXX. version falls within the years 284–246 (the epoch of Ptolemy Philadelphus), the book must have been written after that time.

The terminus ad quem is the date of the apostolic writings, since the author shews no acquaintance with a single doctrine which can be called distinctively Christian.

A vague chronological datum is found in the impression left by the book that the faithful Jews were at the time suffering from open persecution (iii. 1; v. 1; vi. 5–9; xii. 22, 23). Now the Jews were highly favoured by the early Ptolemies. They suffered persecution in the days of Ptolemy Philopator (B.C. 221–204) and of Ptolemy Physcon (B.C. 145–117; Jos. c. Ap. ii. 5), and of Cleopatra (id., ib.); and they suffered yet severer persecutions in the days of Caligula (A.D. 38–40) and Nero (A.D. 66). No one has supposed that the Book of Wisdom was written so late as the days of Nero, but Noack and Grätz assign it to the days of Caligula, because they think that xiv. 16–20 is a reference to the insane attempt of Caligula to place a colossal statue of himself in the Temple. It is obvious that there is nothing sufficiently definite in this passage to make the allusion certain. The whole passage is indeed suitable to the epoch in which every dead Caesar received his apotheosis, just as the condemnation of eclectic tolerance in xv. 15 suits the politic facility with which the Romans sanctioned every local cult of the nations which they conquered. On the other hand, apotheosis was a common practice among the Ptolemies, of whom Ptolemy Lagi and his wife Berenice were called θεοὶ σωτῆρες even in their lifetime, and were honoured with altars and temples. Zeller ('Philos. d. Griechen,' iii. 583) sees in the appeal to δικασταὶ περάτων γῆς an allusion to the Triumvirate, but obviously this is a most precarious inference. Hence, in the absence of precise data, conjecture has fixed on widely separated periods. The dates as proposed by different enquirers are as follows:—

Welte, B.C. 217.
Bruch, between B.C. 221–204 (under Ptolemy Philopator).
Heydenreich, &c., B.C. 160, during the Maccabean war.
Gutmann, not before B.C. 150.
Lutterbeck, about B.C. 130.
Gfrörer, about B.C. 100.
Grätz, Noack, Plumptre, between A.D. 38–40.

Others content themselves with more general indications. Bauermeister, De Wette, Ewald, all fix on the period between the first acquaintance by the Jews with Greek philosophy and the birth of Christ.

The impression left on the mind of the present writer is that the book was composed in the Roman epoch, and by an author who was familiar with the speculations of Philo, but regarded them from a completely independent point of view. The impression that he was to some extent influenced by the views of Philo, and that Philo was not influenced by him, is very strong. If he had preceded Philo, some traces of the powerful style and individuality and phraseology of the Pseudo-Solomon must surely have been observable in the voluminous pages of the Jewish Theosophist.

Any one who will read the Book of Wisdom side by side with Philo's 'Life of Moses' and 'Legatio ad Gaium,' will see that the indications of the book correspond with the political conditions of the reign of Caligula, and with the literary tendencies of the Jews at that time. If the author was later than Philo, the date of the book cannot be earlier than A.D. 40.[1] I cannot believe that it was written by the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, whether he were Apollos or some other early Christian; but it is certainly possible, and in my opinion probable, that it was written in the decade after the death of Christ.

[1] See xiv. 16, 17. Since writing the above, I find that Kuenen adopts the same view ('Rel. of Israel,' iii. 180). He thinks, however, that the book has not reality enough about it—is too calm and artificial—to have been written during the actual spasm of persecution.

V. History of the Book.

If we pass over as indecisive the passages in the New Testament which have been compared with the Book of Wisdom, the earliest quotation from it is found in the first Epistle of Clemens Romanus to the Corinthians (1 Cor. 27), who clearly refers to Wisd. xi. 22; xii. 12. In the ninth chapter of the Ep. of Barnabas there is the same quotation as in Wisd. ii. 12, but this may have been derived independently from the LXX. version of Is. iii. 10. Eusebius ('H. E.' v. 21) says that Irenaeus, in a book διαλέξεων διαφόρων, quoted from the Ep. to the Hebrews and "the so-called (τῆς λεγομένης) Wisdom of Solomon." And in an extant book of Irenaeus ('Adv. Haer.' iv. 38) he undoubtedly refers to Wisd. vi. 19. In the Canon of Melito (Euseb. 'H. E.' ii. 24) he mentions "the Proverbs and Wisdom," but it is not improbable that the true reading may be Παροιμίαι ἡ (or ἡ) καὶ Σοφία, since alike Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Wisdom are quoted by the Fathers as Σοφία or πανάρετος Σοφία. The Muratorian Canon, after mentioning the Epistle of Jude, and the third and fourth Epistles of John, adds the perplexing clause, "Et Sapientia Salomonis ab amicis Salomonis in honorem ipsius scripta." The mention of the Book of Wisdom among early Christian writings is so strange that Credner, Wieseler, Grimm, and others suggest that the true reading was not et but ut, and that the writer's meaning was that the Epistles referred to were pseudepigraphical, "just as the Book of Wisdom was composed in honour of Solomon by his friends," i.e. by those who admired the Book of Proverbs (comp. Prov. xxv. 1). Many of the later Fathers quote the Book of Wisdom, call its writer "a prophet," and assign to it the authority of an inspired writing; but in the more critical Fathers we generally find some caution as to its title, such as τὴν ἐπιγεγραμμένην Σαλωμῶντος σοφίαν (Orig. c. Cels. v. 29). Among Roman Catholics and in the Greek Church it is still regarded as canonical, in accordance with the decree of the Council of Trent and the Synod of Jerusalem (1672). Protestant writers, while for the most part they attribute to it a high value, refuse (with Luther) to accept it as either canonical or inspired,[1] but only read it with the other Apocryphal books, "for example of life and instruction of manners," without applying them to establish any doctrine (Art. vi.).

VI. The Text.

The chief Uncial manuscripts of the book are the Sinaitic (ℵ); the Vatican (B); the Alexandrine (A); the fragments of the Codex Ephraemi (C), and the Codex Venetus (Ven.). The translators of the A. V. chiefly follow the Complutensian edition of 1517.[2]

VII. Versions.

The chief versions are the Itala, which St. Jerome admitted into the Vulgate without any important alterations, with the remark, "in eo libro qui a plerisque Sapientia Salomonis inscribitur . . . calamo temperavi; tantummodo canonicas Scripturas vobis emendare desiderans;" the Syriac, which is sometimes little more than a paraphrase; the Arabic; and the Armenian.

VIII. Commentaries.

The Homilies of Ambrose and Augustine on this book are lost. The first extant commentary is that by Rabanus Maurus. Other mediæval commentaries are those of Walafrid Strabo, Anselm, Nicolas of Lyra, Hugo of St. Cher, Bonaventura, and Holkot. In the period suc-

[1] In the Homilies, however, it is cited as "the word of God," and even "the infallible and undeceivable word of God."

[2] Many valuable suggestions respecting the text may be found in Reusch, 'Observationes Crit. in Lib. Sap.' 1861. Other books on the subject are Thilo, 'Specimen exercitt. crit. in Sap. Sol.' 1825, and the collation of various readings in Holmes and Parsons' ed. of the LXX.

Digitized by Microsoft ®

ceeding the Reformation, some of the best (both Romanist and Protestant) are those of Nannius (1552); Lorinus (1607); Corn. à Lapide (1638); Grotius in 'Critici Sacri;' Strigel (1575); Calmet (1724); Houbigant (1777); Kleuker (1785); Hasse (1785); Nachtigal (1799); Bauermeister (1828); J. A. Schmid (1858); and Gutberlet (1874). By far the best and most useful commentary is that of C. L. Wilibald Grimm in the 'Kurzgefasstes exegetisches Handbuch' of Fritzsche and Grimm (6th ed. 1860). To this excellent commentary, which may be regarded as superseding the comment published by the author in 1837, I have been more largely indebted than to those of any other writers.

In English we have the edition of R. Arnald (1744–1752), often printed with the commentary of Patrick, Lowth, and Whitby; the second volume of the Annotated Bible of the Rev. J. H. Blunt; the commentary of the Rev. W. R. Churton in the 'Commentary on the Old Testament' published by the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, and his notes in the volume edited by him under the title of 'The Uncanonical and Apocryphal Scriptures;' the American edition of the Apocrypha, with notes by Dr. E. C. Bissell (published uniformly with Lange's Commentary by Messrs. Clark, Edinburgh, 1880); and the Book of Wisdom, with Introduction, &c. by the Rev. W. J. Deane, published at the Clarendon Press, Oxford, 1881, which will be found very useful, and abounds in valuable quotations.

Digitized by Microsoft®

THE WISDOM OF SOLOMON.[1]

CHAPTER I.

2 To whom God sheweth himself, 4 and wisdom herself. 6 An evil speaker cannot lie hid. 12 We procure our own destruction: 13 for God created not death.

[a] LOVE righteousness, ye that be judges of the earth: think of the Lord with a good (heart,) and in simplicity of heart seek him. [a] Deut. 1 16. 1 Kings 3. 3. Ps. 45. 7. Isai. 56. 1.

[1] This title is found in ℵ [Σοφία Σαλομῶντος]; in B [Σοφία Σαλωμών]; in A [Σοφία Σολομῶντος]. In the Syriac version it is called 'The Book of the Great Wisdom of Solomon;' in the Arabic, 'The Book of the Wisdom of Solomon, the son of David;' in the Vulgate, 'Liber Sapientiae.' Epiphanius and Athanasius call it πανάρετος Σοφία, a name which it shared with Proverbs and Ecclesiasticus. Clement of Alexandria and Origen quote from it under the title of ἡ θεία Σοφία. Jerome's distinct assertion that the book is pseudepigraphical led to the omission of Solomon's name. Augustine inaccurately calls it 'Liber Christianae Sapientiae.'

I.–V. Wisdom the Means of attaining to a blessed Immortality.

CHAPTER I.

Wisdom only attainable by moral purity, whereas sin leads to punishment and death.

1–5. Wisdom is to be sought in the knowledge of God, and is only attainable through sincerity.

1. Love . . . think of . . . seek.] The three verbs are in the aorist in the Greek. The present tense would have implied the necessity for continuous effort; the aorist expresses the emphatic, unconditional nature of the duty as requiring immediate and concentrated effort. It is interesting to observe that, in the Sixth Heaven of the 'Paradiso,' Dante sees the blessed spirits arranging themselves in letters which form this verse, "Diligite justitiam vos qui judicatis terram." righteousness.] The word does not mean ordinary justice; nor that accurate ceremonial conformity (ἀκρίβεια, Acts xxii. 3) which our Lord described as "the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees" (Matt. v. 20); nor of course does it connote any of the Pauline and theological senses of "justification." It means moral integrity, sincere allegiance to the will of God shewn by obedience to His laws. Comp. 2 Sam. xxiii. 4: "He that ruleth over men must be just, ruling in the fear of the Lord." This kind of "justice" (צְדָקָה) and "uprightness" (יֹשֶׁר) was the special ideal of the Jew under the Old Testament dispensation: Gen. vi. 9, xviii. 19; Eccles. vii. 20; Is. xxvi. 7; Ezek. xviii. 5; Hos. xiv. 9; Mic. vi. 8; Matt. i. 19, &c.

ye that be judges of the earth.] Another division of the book begins similarly, at the 6th chapter, with an appeal to kings. The word "judges" is used as a synonym for "rulers" (comp. Ecclus. x. 1, 2), because to "sit in the gate" and decide the disputes of his people was the chief function of an Oriental governor (vi. 4, ix. 7; Ps. cxxvii. 5; Prov. xxii. 2; Dan. ii. 49; Am. v. 15, &c.). We must not suppose with Luther that the writer had kings and rulers especially — still less that he had them exclusively—in view. It is clear from chapter ii., and from chapters x., xi., as well as throughout the book, that the precepts are intended to be general, while they had immediate reference to apostatising Jews. The address to kings and rulers is intended to give weight to the truths enunciated. It is a part of the artistic stateliness (σεμνότης) of the style.

think of the Lord with a good (heart).] Rather, "think concerning the Lord with integrity." Gr. ἐν ἀγαθότητι; Vulg., in bonitate. The meaning is not "think noble thoughts of God,"—the opposite to that, "thinking not well of God," to which the writer alludes in xiv. 30 (comp. Ps. l. 21); for that would have been expressed by some such adverb as ὀρθῶς. The context shews that the meaning is, "Let your thoughts of God be accompanied by an upright life." The word ἀγαθότης does not occur in the N. T., nor in the LXX., but is found again in vii. 26, xii. 22; Ecclus. xlv. 23. Like ἀγαθωσύνη, it means "goodness" (Rom. xv. 14), without which no man can see or know God (xv. 3; Heb. xii. 14).

in simplicity of heart.] That is, with no reservations; with no attempt to face both

Digitized by Microsoft®

2 For he will be found of them that tempt him not; and sheweth himself unto such as do not [b] distrust him.

3 For froward thoughts separate from God: and his power, when it is tried, ‖ reproveth the unwise.

4 For into a malicious soul wisdom

Deut. 4. 9. Chron. 5. 4.

‖ Or, maketh manifest.

ways, or to serve two masters (1 Chron. xxix. 17; Eph. vi. 5; 1 Macc. ii. 37). The opposite of this simplicity is "the double heart" (Ps. xii. 2; Jas. i. 8, iv. 8). For the necessity of this simplicity of heart, see Acts ii. 46 (ἀφελότης); 2 Cor. xi. 3.

seek him.] In Scripture we are constantly bidden to "seek" God; that is, to know His will, and to lose ourselves in Him by living to His glory (Deut. iv. 29; Heb. xi. 6). "There is nothing better," says Philo, "than to seek the true God, even if the finding Him should escape human capacity" ('De Monarch.' 5). "Our nature, in order to seek and find Him," says Origen, "needs the aid of Him who is sought."

This first verse, as is often the case in ancient writings, strikes the key-note of the whole book. It will be observed that this book, in which Solomon is represented as speaking as a youth (viii. 10), begins with the exhortation with which Ecclesiastes ends (Eccl. xii. 13). See Ps. cxi. 10. "Dès le début l'auteur fait ressortir le grand principe de la philosophie juive: l'inséparabilité de la sagesse et de la vertu" (Reuss).

2. he will be found.] The same is said of Wisdom in vi. 12, 16; Prov. viii. 17.

of them that tempt him not.] God is tempted in many ways, but especially by doubting of His power and goodness (Deut. xxxiii. 8, &c.); or by the practical defiance of a godless life (Deut. vi. 16; Acts v. 9). The latter is here intended; for "those that tempt Him not" is the antithesis to "with a good heart," of the previous verse.

sheweth himself.] Compare Ex. xxxiii. 18–23, of which the spiritual counterpart in the N. T. may be seen in John xiv. 21.

unto such as do not distrust him.] Namely, unto "the simple-hearted," who take Him at His word. The verb ἀπιστεῖν only occurs seven times in the N. T., and not once in the LXX. In the Apocrypha it is only found in this book and in 2 Macc. viii. 13. The Alex. MS. reads μὴ πιστεύουσιν, "those who do not trust Him." If this be the right reading, the "sheweth Himself" must be understood to mean "as an enemy" (comp. Mk. xvi. 16).

These two verses in the original illustrate the highly-polished style of the writer. They are marked by an elaborate symmetry, full of rhythmical assonances artificially arranged:

Ἀγαπήσατε . . . φρονήσατε . . . ζητήσατε, ἀγαθότητι . . . ἁπλότητι.

In the second verse εὑρίσκεται, by the sort of introverted parallelism which the Greeks called Chiasmos, corresponds to the last verb ζητήσατε, and ἐμφανίζεται to φρονήσατε. The participles μὴ πειράζουσιν and μὴ ἀπιστοῦσιν are parallel respectively to ἐν ἀγαθότητι and ἐν ἁπλότητι. Rhythmical arrangements are found in some of our Lord's discourses, and occasionally in St. Paul, and frequently in St. John, St. James, and St. Jude; but in other respects the elaborate artificiality of the style finds no parallel in the N. T. except in the Epistle to the Hebrews.

3–5. The thoughts of vv. 1 and 2 are developed in these verses. Moral perversity separates men from God (3); wisdom and sin cannot dwell together (4) because their natures are mutually repellent (5).

3. froward thoughts.] Rather, "perverse reasonings." The word σκολιὸς means "crooked" (xvi. 5), and the nature of these "crooked thoughts" is illustrated in ii. 1–20. The expression "a crooked generation" occurs in Deut. xxxii. 5, Acts ii. 40, Phil. ii. 15; and "the crooked" are contrasted with "the good and reasonable" in 1 Pet. ii. 18. The word λογισμοὶ almost always has a bad sense, as in xi. 16; Prov. vi. 18; 2 Cor. x. 4.

his power, when it is tried.] When God's power is put to the test by those who "tempt" Him (comp. Heb. iii. 9), it convicts (or perhaps "punishes") the foolish. The word ἐλέγχει, rendered "reproveth," sometimes involves the idea of punishment: 2 Sam. vii. 14; Job xiii. 10. The punishment here implied is the penal blindness of impious folly.

the unwise.] The word (ἄφρων) occurs in the Septuagint version of the Proverbs to express blasphemy, scorn, and impurity (Prov. i. 22; vii. 7; xxiv. 30, &c.). For its use in the N. T., see Luke xi. 40, xii. 20; Eph. v. 17.

4. into a malicious soul.] The word rendered "malicious" (κακότεχνος) means "evil-devising." It does not occur in the N. T., nor in the LXX. It recurs in xv. 4 and 4 Macc. vi. 25. It was one of the many poetic words derived from Homer by the Alexandrian dialect. An "ill-devising" soul is one which is "an inventor of evil things" (Rom. i. 30).

wisdom.] In a quotation of this verse in a letter of Macarius "discipline" (παιδεία) is substituted for "wisdom"—probably by a slip of memory. For the full meaning of the word "wisdom," see the Introduction. As a condition to which man can attain it is a shall not enter; nor dwell in the body that is subject unto sin.

Digitized by Microsoft®

5 [c] For the holy spirit of discipline will flee deceit, and remove from thoughts that are without understanding, and [‖] will not abide when unrighteousness cometh in.

6 For wisdom is a [d] loving spirit;

[c] Jer. 4. 22.

[‖] Or, is rebuked, or, sheweth itself.

[d] Gal. 5. 22.

combination of the highest mental excellence (Arist. 'Eth. Nic.' c. vi. 7)—which leads to "a knowledge of things divine and human and of their causes" (Philo, 'Congr. erud. grat.' 14)—together with the issue of such knowledge in a holy life.

shall not enter.] The future is used in the "gnomic" sense, which is often attached to the aorist in Greek, and to the present in English. It expresses a normal fact.

that is subject unto sin.] The original is much more forcible, "that is sunk in sin;" literally, "impawned to sin" (καταχρέῳ. Vulg. subdito, for which a better rendering would have been oppignerato). The word does not occur either in the LXX. or the N. T., but the notion which it expresses is found in Rom. vii. 14, "sold under sin," and in Christ's parable of the unforgiving debtor. This phrase must be regarded as one of those "lightning glances of the author's mind" which, as Ewald says, frequently illuminate these earlier chapters.

It will be observed that in this verse "soul" and "body" make up the totality of our being, as in 2 Macc. vii. 37. The Platonic and Philonian trichotomy of human nature into body, soul, and spirit, which is (in a deeper and higher sense) sanctioned in the N. T. (1 Thess. v. 23), is not formally recognised in this book (ix. 15; xvi. 14), which makes no perceptible difference between "spirit" and "soul." The "holy spirit" is identical with some aspects of "wisdom," as in the next verse. Neither here nor elsewhere does the writer adopt the notion that the body is inherently vile and base (see viii. 19, 20). The general idea of the verse is that of Jer. iv. 14; 2 Cor. vi. 14, 15: "The dove cannot live in unclean places."

5. the holy spirit of discipline.] The article is not expressed in the original, because the phrase "holy spirit" is almost personal. It occurs first here and in ix. 17, though the LXX. have "spirit of holiness" (Ps. li. 13). "Discipline" here means the method whereby God trains souls by merciful correction; teaching them—sometimes even by suffering them to fall into evil—that good is best (Prov. iii. 11; Heb. xii. 5–11).

deceit.] Alike self-deceit and hypocrisy (1 Pet. ii. 1; Rev. xiv. 5). "Blessed is the man . . . in whose spirit there is no guile" (Ps. xxxii. 2).

from thoughts that are without understanding.] See the note on v. 3. In the Book of Enoch this view is still further developed, and Wisdom becomes a sort of Astraea. "Wisdom came to dwell among the children of men, and found no dwelling-place. Then returned Wisdom back to her place, and took her seat among the angels" (Enoch xlii. 2).

will not abide.] The verb used (ἐλεγχθήσεται, Vulg. corripietur) is the same as in v. 3, and literally means "will be convicted" or "shamed." The holy spirit of wisdom will blush or be grieved (Eph. iv. 30) at the presence of moral impurity, and will, as a consequence, depart (Gen. vi. 3, LXX.). Hence the A. V. makes the verb a synonym of the two previous verbs, a rendering which practically expresses the sense.

The moral lesson that impiety and impurity are fatal to the knowledge of God is common to all ages and nations. That which is spiritual can only be spiritually discerned, and the spiritual faculties, if they are left unexercised, perish of atrophy.

"Corpus onustum Hesternis vitiis animam quoque praegravat una,
Atque affigit humi divinae particulam aurae."
HOR. Sat. ii. 2, 77–79.

"The soul of man should be as a glittering mirror. When there is rust on the mirror, the face is not reflected by it. So when there is sin in the man, such a man cannot see God" (Theophylact, 'ad Autol.' i. 2). Comp. Ps. cxi. 10; Ecclus. xv. 1: and in the N. T. John vii. 17; Rom. i. 19–26.

6–11. Wisdom cannot tolerate the impious words which betray an evil heart.

6. For.] (The word introduces the reason why these results ensue.) Wisdom loves man, and therefore withdraws from him (v. 5) when he sells himself to iniquity. His words reveal his character, and Wisdom leaves him to be punished by his God.

wisdom is a loving spirit.] Another reading (A) adopted by the Vulgate is σοφίας (Benignus est enim spiritus sapientiae). "The fruit of the Spirit is Love" (Gal. v. 20). The word φιλάνθρωπον means "loving mankind," and here retains its true sense, though it sometimes merely means gentle. The adjective, "philanthropic," does not occur in the N. T., but the substantive and adverb are found in Acts xxvii. 3, xxviii. 2; Tit. iii. 4. The love of Wisdom for mankind (vii. 23) involves her hatred of sin. This "humanitarian" conception of "wisdom" among the Jews is beautifully illustrated in the Book of Proverbs.

and will not acquit a blasphemer of his ‖ words: for God is witness of his reins, and a true beholder of his heart, and a hearer of his tongue.

‖ Or, lips.

7 For the Spirit of the Lord filleth the world: and that which ‖ containeth all things hath knowledge of the voice.

‖ Or, upholdeth.

and.] The conjunction, here as often, has a cumulative and causative sense, "and therefore."

will not acquit.] The word ἀθῳώσῃ, from which the unclassical verb of the original (ἀθῳώσει) is derived, means properly "scatheless," but comes to mean "innocent," as in Matt. xxvii. 4, 24; Jer. xviii. 23, xlix. 11.

a blasphemer.] The word originally means "one who speaks injuriously or calumniously," but here, as in the N. T., is used for one who speaks against God.

of his words.] Literally, "for his lips." Compare 1 Cor. xiv. 21; Heb. xiii. 15, and the curious expression "the calves of our lips" (Hos. xiv. 2). The use of "lips" for "words" is due to the pictorial and concrete character of the Semitic idiom.

of his reins.] The insight of God begins with the deepest springs of the thoughts. He witnesses a man's inmost emotions, watches his heart, hears his tongue. See Heb. iv. 13. The "reins" are regarded as the ultimate sources of desire (ἐντεῦθεν κινοῦνται τῆς ἐπιθυμίας οἱ λογισμοί, Theodoret on Ps. vii. 9; ap. Suid. Rev. ii. 23). The Engl. word comes from the Lat. renes.

a true beholder.] The word ἐπίσκοπος is here used in its first sense of "inspector," "overseer" (Job xx. 29). The word "true" means "genuine," "undoubted" (comp. xii. 27).

7. For.] Rather, "because" (Vulg. quoniam). The omnipresence of God is given as the reason why sin cannot escape His cognizance.

the Spirit of the Lord.] The phrase is found even in Gen. i. 2, but of course it was not understood in all its true significance till after Pentecost.

filleth.] Rather, "hath filled;" the perfect implies that which has been and still is. So Philo ('Quis rer. div. haer.,' § 38) speaks of the Logos as "having utterly filled the totality of being," and says, "God hath filled all things, and hath penetrated all things, and hath left nothing empty or void of Himself" ('Leg. Allegg.' iii. 2). He frequently recurs to this thought. From vii. 24, viii. 1, it is clear that when the writer is speaking of wisdom in its highest sense, and as personified, he identifies it with the Spirit of God. But he must not be accused of Pantheism, for he is not describing any mere anima mundi, but "the fulness of Him who filled all things with all things," Eph. i. 23. The same thought occurs in Jer. xxiii. 24; Ps. xxxix. 7. Doubtless a Stoic might have used the same words, but their connotation would have been different. Compare the well-known lines of Philemon:

ὁ δὲ παρὼν ἁπανταχοῦ
πάντ' ἐξ ἀνάγκης οἶδε πανταχοῦ παρών:

and Pope's—

"All are but parts of one stupendous whole,
Whose body Nature is, and God the soul;
That changed through all, and yet in all the same,
Great in the earth as in the etherial flame;
* * * *
Lives through all life, extends through all extent, Spreads undivided, operates unspent."

the world.] Literally, "the inhabited world," but often used in a general sense, as in Heb. ii. 5. The word does not occur in the LXX.

that which containeth all things.] The word "containeth" (marg., upholdeth) is here used in the old sense of "holds together," and is derived from the Vulg. hoc quod continet. It means "that which holds the universe together" (τὸ συνέχον). The phrase is borrowed by the Alexandrians from the Greek philosophers. Aristotle ('de Mundo,' 6) spoke of ἡ τῶν ὅλων συνεκτικὴ αἰτία. The notion of the Divine power, like a band or chain (δεσμός), keeping the universe from falling to pieces, is repeated by Xenophon, Cicero, and Philo ('De Profug.,' 20; 'Quis rer. div. haer.,' 38). This phrase does not occur either in the Old or New Testament; but (see last note) we find the essential thought in Eph. i. 23, and in Col. i. 17, "In Him all things cohere (συνέστηκεν);" and in Heb. i. 3, where Christ "upbears (φέρων) all things by the utterance of His power." Comp. Ecclus. xliii. 26, "By His word all things consist" (σύγκειται). The same thought lies in the Latin "machina" or "fabrica mundi," adopted by our own poets:

"Thine this universal frame, Thus wondrous fair; thyself how wondrous then!" Par. Lost, v. 154.

"The spangled heavens, a shining frame, Their great Original proclaim."
ADDISON.

hath knowledge of the voice.] Just as every voice is a breath of articulated air which vibrates through space, so every voice causes, as it were, a moral vibration in the spirit which is circumfused through all things. It wakes an echo which "rolls from soul to soul, and lives for ever and for ever."

8 Therefore he that speaketh unrighteous things cannot be hid: neither shall vengeance, when it punisheth, pass by him.

9 For inquisition shall be made into the counsels of the ungodly: and the sound of his words shall come unto the Lord for the ‖ manifestation of his wicked deeds.

10 For the ear of jealousy heareth all things: and the noise of murmurings is not hid.

11 Therefore beware of murmuring, which is unprofitable; and refrain your tongue from backbiting: for there is no word so secret, that shall go for nought: and the mouth that ‖ belieth slayeth the soul.

12 Seek not death in the error of your life: and pull not upon your-

Or, reproving.

‖ Or, slandereth.

8. Therefore.] Because of God's omnipresent omniscience.

vengeance.] Lit., "Justice," personified, as in xi. 20, and Acts xxviii. 4.

when it punisheth.] The verb (ἐλέγχουσα) is the same as in vv. 3, 5. Comp. Heb. xii. 5.

pass by him.] The same verb (παροδεύσῃ) as in ii. 7, v. 14. It does not occur in the N. T., and in the LXX. only in Ezek. xxxvi. 34. Euripides has the same thought:

> οὔ τοι προσελθοῦσ' ἡ Δίκη σε πώποτε > παίσει πρὸς ἦπαρ, οὐδὲ τῶν ἄλλων βροτῶν > τιν' ἄδικον, ἀλλὰ σῖγα καὶ βαρεῖ ποδὶ > στείχουσα μάρψει τοὺς κακοὺς ἀεὶ βροτῶν.

9. inquisition shall be made.] Lit., "there shall be an enquiry." The word is used by Shakspeare in 'As you Like It,' ii. 2, and in Ps. ix. 12; Deut. xix. 18.

into the counsels.] In a bad sense, as in Ps. ix. 23. The word (διαβούλιον) is unclassical, and does not occur in the N. T.

the sound of his words.] Lit., "the hearing of his words" (Vulg., sermonum . . . auditio).

the manifestation.] The word ἔλεγχον might have this sense, but it is better to render it "reproving" (as in marg.) or "punishment" (Vulg., correptionem), as in v. 8.

10. the ear of jealousy.] This is the common Hebrew adjectival genitive, like "judge of injustice," "steward of injustice," "son of destruction," "hearer of forgetfulness," "prayer of faith," &c. God is called "jealous" in an anthropopathic sense, sometimes to describe His care and love for His people (Is. ix. 6), and sometimes to indicate that, because of this love, He will punish (Nah. i. 2), and that His Law is surrounded by awful sanctions (Ex. xx. 5, &c.). Comp. 2 Cor. xi. 2.

the noise of murmurings.] There is an intentional assonance between οὖς and θροῦς (Lauschen and Rauschen). On the sin of "murmuring," see Ex. xvi. 7; 1 Pet. iv. 9. It is evident that the Alexandrian Jews, surrounded by heathens who hated them and placed in sorely trying circumstances, were tempted to unbelief and murmuring just as their fathers had been. To them the oppression of God's chosen people, who were faithful to God's own law, seemed an almost insoluble problem, and the eschatological truths by which alone it was explicable were as yet but partially known.

11. which is unprofitable.] The writer was evidently familiar with Greek figures of speech. He clearly regarded murmuring as sinful, and not merely as useless. The word must therefore be regarded as a litotes, i.e. the use of a mild word in order to suggest to the reader the mental substitution of a much stronger word, as when Virgil calls Busiris, the cannibal King of Egypt, "unpraised"—"illaudati Busiridis aras." Compare the use of the same word (ἀνωφελής) in Tit. iii. 9; "inconvenient" (οὐκ ἀνήκοντα) in Eph. v. 4; and "useless" (ἄχρηστον) in Philem. 11.

backbiting.] Not, as in 2 Cor. xii. 20, 1 Pet. ii. 1, evil speaking of men behind their backs (detractio), but secret disparagement of God. The verb καταλαλεῖν is found in the LXX., Numb. xxi. 5, &c.

for there is no word so secret, that shall go for nought.] Rather, "because a secret utterance shall not go forth without result," i.e. without meeting with due punishment.

that belieth.] That utters lies against God.

slayeth the soul.] The allusion is not to annihilation, but to moral and spiritual death. The immortality of the wicked is only concentrated death. On the eschatology of this book, see the Introduction.

12–16. Souls only die by suicide. The death of souls is self-induced.

12. Seek not death in the error of your life.] Rather, "Strive not after death," "Be not eager for death." Vulg., Nolite zelare mortem. Do not so "zealously affect" death as to drag it upon yourselves (15). It is a very noble and profound exhortation, suggested by Prov. viii. 36; xxi. 6. A life that "wanders" into false directions finds that they all end in death of the spirit. In seeking them the soul really seeks death. For the phrase ζηλοῦν, comp. Acts xxi. 20, xxii. 3; 1 Cor. xiv. 12. The Rabbinic

Digitized by Microsoft®

Deut. 4. 24. selves [e] destruction with the works of your hands.

Ezek. 3. 32. & 3. 11. 13 For God made not death: [f] neither hath he pleasure in the destruction of the living.

14 For he created all things, that Gen. 1. 1. they might have their being: [g] and the generations of the world were healthful; and there is no poison of destruction in them, nor the kingdom of death upon the earth:

15 (For righteousness is immortal:)

16 But ungodly men with their works and words called it to them: for when they thought to have it their friend, they consumed to nought, and made a covenant with exegesis extracted mysteries from the repetition of words in Scripture; and from the common Hebrew phrase "to die the death," Philo ('Leg. Allegg.,' i. 33) infers that there is a death of the soul as well as of the body.

pull not upon yourselves destruction.] The metaphor is from pulling down a building on our heads. A man who drags down upon himself such destruction by moral perversity, has "to sit in the ruins of his life."

with the works of your hands.] Evil actions, even more surely than evil words, precipitate the ruin which follows the abandonment of a soul by Wisdom.

13. For God made not death.] See ii. 24. The conception of the writer in this paragraph is very vague, but he hazards the general assertion that man by his sin, and not God, is the cause and source of all physical, no less than of all moral evil. He had learnt from the O. T. (Ezek. xviii. 32; Hos. xiii. 9) that souls only perish by being self-destroyed; but he expands the thought in a manner not found in Scripture, and surrounded by difficulties.

neither hath he pleasure.] See xi. 24; Ezek. xxxiii. 11.

14. that they might have their being.] The writer seems to regard all the evil and dangerous elements in created things as due to a distortion of their true functions; as constituting, not their στάσις but their ἀπόστασις, not their true life but a phase of death. There seems to be a similar thought in Rom. viii. 20, 21, where St. Paul speaks of the creation as having been subjected to "the bondage of corruption, not willingly, but because of Him who subjected it in hope."

and the generations of the world were healthful.] Rather, "the creatures" (the created genera and species) "of the world are healthful." The word γενέσεις means "productions," as does also the Latin nationes, though the Vulgate translation here (sanabiles fecit nationes terrae) is often misunderstood. Hence God is called γενεσιάρχης, γενεσιουργός, xiii. 3, 5. It is only per accidens (according to the author) that created things are otherwise than salutary. His view was partly founded on Gen. i. 31; iii. 17, 18.

there is no poison of destruction in them.] The word φάρμακον in the original is not always used in a bad sense; hence the descriptive genitive is attached to it to define its meaning (Vulg. medicamentum exterminii). The poisonousness and destructiveness of creatures are here declared to be not inherent, but only relative to fallen man.

nor the kingdom of death upon the earth.] Rather, perhaps, "nor is there a palace of Hades upon earth," though the other version is also tenable. There is "a prince of the power of the air" (Eph. ii. 2), and there are "world-rulers of this darkness" (Eph. vi. 12), and Satan may even be called "the king of this world" (John xvi. 11); but death and Satan are only partial and temporary usurpers (ii. 24). Βασίλειον is used for "a palace" in Prov. xviii. 19; Luke vii. 25 (plur.).

15. (For righteousness is immortal.)] There is no parenthesis. "Righteousness" is here almost synonymous with "wisdom," and "wisdom" is called in Prov. iii. 18, "a tree of life." With this thought compare the saying of Antisthenes, βουλομένους ἀθανάτους εἶναι δεῖ ζῆν εὐσεβῶς. There is no sufficient authority for the addition of the clause "but injustice is an inheritance of death" (injustitia autem mortis acquisitio est), which is found in some MSS. of the Vulgate. It may, however, be genuine, since it completes the parallelism; agrees with the number of lines in the Stichometry of Nicephorus; and supplies a subject for the "it" (αὐτὸν) in the next verse.

16. with their works.] Lit. "with their hands," which some understand to mean that men beckoned to death; but, as Philo says, "hands are a symbol of actions."

called it to them.] If the added clause be spurious, "it" (αὐτὸν) must still refer to "death" (θάνατον), involved in the ἀθάνατος of the previous verse.

when they thought to have it their friend, they consumed to nought.] Rather, "regarding it as a friend, they melted away" (Vulg. defluxerunt). If ἐτάκησαν meant "they consumed to nought," the end of the verse would be somewhat of an anti-climax. Grimm points out that the verb might mean "they died it, because they are worthy to take part with it.

Digitized by Microsoft®

CHAPTER II.

1 The wicked think this life short, 5 and of no other after this: 6 therefore they will take their pleasure in this, 10 and conspire against the just. 21 What that is which doth blind them.

FOR the ungodly said, reasoning with themselves, but not aright, [a] Our life is short and tedious, [b] and in the death of a man there is no remedy: neither was there any man known to have returned from the grave.

2 For we are born at all adventure: and we shall be hereafter as though we had never been: for the breath in our nostrils is as smoke, and a little spark in the moving of our heart:

[a] Job 7. 1.
[b] Matt. 22. 23. 1 Cor. 15. 32.

with love for it"—a strong expression, which suits the bitter sarcasm of the passage. The aorists are gnomic, i.e. they represent a normal state of things.

and made a covenant with it.] This is borrowed from Psalm xxviii. 15. Comp. Ecclus. xiv. 12, "the covenant of the grave."

they are worthy to take part with it.] They deserve "to be of death's lot" (comp. ii. 24), and not "in the hands of the Lord," iii. 1.

CHAPTER II.

OPINIONS AND PRACTICES OF THE GODLESS.

1–5. They deplore the shortness of life.

1. For the ungodly.] The nominative is supplied from the last verse. The "for" gives the reason why they are "worthy to take part with death," since they look on death as the final conqueror.

reasoning with themselves, but not aright.] Rather, "they said among themselves, reasoning not rightly." "Themselves" is used for "one another." Both in the classics and in Hellenistic Greek reciprocity is often extended into identity. "Not aright," an instance of litotes (see note on i. 11) for "perversely" (σκολιῶς; comp. i. 3).

tedious.] Rather, "painful," "grievous." The word λυπηρὸς is not found in the N. T., but occurs in Prov. xiv. 10, &c. It is a commonplace that the days of man's life are, for the most part, "few and evil" (Gen. xlvii. 9), and there is probably no truth for which a greater consensus of opinion could be adduced from the testimony of all nations and all ages.

in the death of a man there is no remedy.] At the hour of death no healing (ἴασις, Vulg. refrigerium) will avail. The expression resembles that of Shirley: neither was there any man known to have returned from the grave.] 1 Cor. xv. 32. This rendering is adopted by the Vulg., Syr., Arabic, and by many commentators. Ἀναλύειν may mean "to return," as in 2 Macc. xiv. 44, Luke xii. 36 (πότε ἀναλύσει ἐκ τῶν γάμων), Judith xiii. 1 (ἐσπούδασαν ἀναλύειν), 2 Macc. ix. 1, &c. The article in the Greek is then generic, as our version rightly renders it ("any man"). The clause might, however, be translated, "nor was any deliverer from Hades known," for in xvi. 14 ἀναλύει means "recalls" or "brings back." The thought will then resemble that of Psalm xlix. 8, 9. These materialists and freethinkers might be supposed to deride all stories of raising the dead, whether in the O. T. or in mythology (Alcestes, &c.). On their lips—since they deny man's immortality—"Hades" can only mean "the state of death," "the grave" (Sheol).

"There is no armour against fate."

2. at all adventure.] αὐτοσχεδίως, not as in the Vulg. ex nihilo, but "anyhow," "by chance," temere et fortuito (comp. Cic. 'Tusc. Disp.' i. 49). There is a similar thought in Eccles. iii. 19.

as though we had never been.] The expression is borrowed from Obad. 16. Compare

"Quaeris quo jaceas post obitum loco?
Quo non nata jacent."—SENECA.

in our nostrils.] Gen. ii. 7; Job xxvii. 3.

and a little spark in the moving of our heart.] The A.V. here follows the very inferior reading of ὄλιγος (C) for ὁ λόγος. It is clear that ὄλιγος, though found in some quotations of the verse, is a clerical blunder. Render "and our reason (ὁ λόγος) is a spark (produced) in the beating of our heart." We have here a curious piece of ancient materialism, founded on the Heraclitean guess that all things originated from fire, and on Zeno's opinion that the soul was "a fiery particle." Just as modern materialists look on thought as a material consequence of certain changes in the molecules of the grey substance of the brain, so these ancient freethinkers supposed that the beating of the heart produced thought in the form of gleams or sparks from the fire-substance of the soul. "Breath" and "thought"

Digitized by Microsoft®

[c] Eccles. 3. 20.

[‖] Or, moist.

3 Which being extinguished, [c] our body shall be turned into ashes, and our spirit shall vanish as the [‖] soft air,

4 And our name shall be forgotten in time, and no man shall have our works in remembrance, and our life shall pass away as the trace of a cloud, and shall be dispersed as a mist, that is driven away with the beams of the sun, and [‖] overcome with the heat thereof.

[‖] Or, oppressed.

5 [d] For our time is a very shadow that passeth away; and after our end there is no returning: for [‖] it is fast sealed, so that no man cometh again.

[d] 1 Chron. 29. 15.

[‖] Or, he.

to them are merely the result of mechanism. So Xenophanes said, "It is the nature of limbs that thinketh in men," i.e. thought is merely a result of organism. Empedocles said:

Αἷμα γὰρ ἀνθρώποις περικάρδιον ἐστι νόημα.

3. shall be turned into ashes.] A similar metaphor is differently applied in Gray's line:

"E'en in our ashes live their wonted fires."

our spirit shall vanish.] Lit., "shall be diffused or dissipated" (Vulg., diffundetur). Here "the spirit" does but mean "the breath." So Homer compares the departing soul to smoke ('Il.' xxiii. 10). Compare Jas. iv. 14; Soph. 'Electr.,' 1158; Hor. 'Od.' iv. 7, 15.

"Tenuis enim quaedam moribundos deserit aura Mista vapore; vapos porro trahit aëra secum."
LUCR. iii. 233-4.

"Ergo dissolvi quoque convenit omnem animaï Naturam, ceu fumus in altas aëris auras."
Ibid. 456-7

as the soft air.] The word χαῦνος, Vulg. mollis, means rather "void," "thin," "empty," "yielding" (Milton's "buxom air;" Germ., biegsam).

4. our name shall be forgotten in time.] The fact that oblivion awaited them seems to have troubled the ancients, both Jews and Gentiles, more than it does ourselves. Hence arose the extreme desire, both of Jews and Gentiles, to leave behind them some monument or memorial of themselves (2 Sam. xviii. 18; Ps. cxii. 6; Prov. x. 7; Eccles. ix. 5; Ecclus. xxxvii. 26, &c.).

as the trace of a cloud.] Hos. xiii. 3; Job vii. 9. Ἴχνη properly means "footsteps."

as a mist.] This natural metaphor of evanescence is found also in Homer, ἠΰτ' ὀμίχλη. The phrase "chased away (διωχθεῖσα) by the beams of the sun" is used also by Latin poets:

"Nube solet pulsâ candidus ire dies."
Ov. Trist. ii. 142.

overcome.] Lit., "weighed down" (βαρυνθεῖσα). The metaphor is not very accurate; for no reasonable explanation can be offered of a mist "weighed down" by the sunbeams. The conjectural emendation μαρανθεῖσα is not happy. Gregory of Nazianzus, in an eloquent passage, unites the various scriptural and other metaphors for the shortness and instability of life. "We are a flitting dream, a phantom that cannot be grasped, the scud of a passing breeze, a ship that leaves no trace upon the sea, dust, a vapour, morning dew, a flower that now blossoms and now is done away" (comp. Jas. iv. 14; Job vii. 7; Ps. cii. 3, &c.).

5. a very shadow.] A frequent metaphor in Scripture (Job viii. 9; Ps. xxxix. 7; 1 Chron. xxix. 15; Eccles. viii. 13, &c.) and in the classics. "Man is the dream of a shadow," Pind. 'Pyth.,' viii. 133. Soph. 'Aj.,' 126:

ὁρῶ γὰρ ἡμᾶς οὐδὲν ὄντας ἄλλο πλὴν εἴδωλ' ὅσοιπερ ζῶμεν, ἢ κουφὴν σκίαν.

And in modern poets:

"We are such stuff
As dreams are made of."
SHAKSPEARE, Tempest, iv. 1.

"Man is a torch borne in the wind; a dream
But of a shadow summed."
CHAPMAN, Bussy d'Amboise, i. 1.

"And what art thou? a shadow less than shade,
A nothing less than nothing."
YOUNG, Night Thoughts, v.

after our end there is no returning.] Vulg., non est reversio finis nostri. The word rendered "returning" is the rare word ἀναποδισμός, which means rather "repetition" than returning. It occurs neither in the LXX. nor the N. T. The A. V. expresses the same thought as that which follows: "No man cometh again;" but the real meaning is that "there is no recurrence of death." "It is appointed unto all men once to die," Heb. ix. 27. "No man can die twice."

The Arabic seems to have read ἐμποδισμός, "hindrance." The clause will then mean that "death is inevitable."

it is fast sealed.] The metaphor implies that which is sealed up and cannot be got at; hence that which is irrevocable. The repetition of death, and therefore of life, is impossible.

no man cometh again.] This thought is very common. Job vii. 9, "He that goeth down to the grave, shall come up no more." Ecclus. xxxviii. 21, "There is no turning again." Aesch. 'Eum.,' 638, ἅπαξ θανόντος

Digitized by Microsoft®

6 Come on therefore, let us enjoy the good things [e] that are present: and let us [||] speedily use the creatures like as in youth.

7 Let us fill ourselves with costly wine and ointments: and let no flower of the spring pass by us:

8 Let us crown ourselves with rosebuds, before they be withered:

9 Let none of us go without his

[e] Isai. 22. 13. & 56. 12. 1 Cor. 15. 32.
[||] Or, earnestly.

οὔτις ἔστ' ἀνάστασις. Lucret. iii. 942, "Nec quisquam expergitus exstat." Catull. v. 4, "Nobis quum semel occidit brevis lux," &c. Compare, too, the well-known and exquisite lines of Moschus, ending εὕδομες εὖ μάλα μακρὸν ἀτέρμονα νήδυμον ὕπνον.

6–9. "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die." Sensuality is the natural result of unbelief in all average men.

6. let us enjoy.] In these verses the writer embodies the dregs of Epicurean theory. Epicurus himself taught a pure morality; but by making pleasure the summum bonum, he shifted the true centre of gravity of the moral system, even though he personally insisted that pleasure could only be found in the path of virtue. This paragraph represents the degraded sensualism of the followers of Antisthenes, the Hedonists, and Cyrenaic philosophers. It represents the natural result of false views:

"Unhallowed actions, planted like a crown
Upon the insolent aspiring brow
Of spurious notions."

Comp. Eccles. ii. 24, iii. 12, ix. 7, xi. 9; Is. xxii. 13; 1 Cor. xv. 32. So when the ivory skeleton is carried round at Trimalchio's feast in Petronius, the guests exclaim:

"Heu! heu! nos miseros! quam totus homo nihil est!
Sic erimus cuncti postquam nos auferet orcus.
Ergo vivamus dum licet esse bene."

We find the same thought in Luke xii. 19. The inscription, "Eat, drink, enjoy thyself: the rest is nothing," was carved on the pedestal of the statue of Sardanapalus, at Anchialus.

"Live while you live, the Epicure would say,
And seize the pleasures of the present day."

The thought is often expressed by Euripides ('Alc.' 788), Anacreon, the Greek Anthologists, Horace, &c.

the good things that are present.] Rather, perhaps, "the things that are really good," apart from the imaginary joys of virtue, which these freethinkers represent as mere hallucinations.

use the creatures.] Rather, "the creation" (κτίσει), everything around us. Another reading is κτήσει, "what we possess."

like as in youth.] When alone the keenest pleasure of life is possible. Eccles. xii. 1; Hor. 'Od.' ii. 3, 15.

7. with costly wine.] The joys of wine, with its intoxicating fumes, are invariably prominent in these Epicurean exhortations, from Omar Kayyam to Anacreon and Horace.

and ointments.] The verb πλησθῶμεν is here joined by syllepsis (a figure which most commentators confuse with zeugma) in different senses with οἴνου and with μύρων: "let us fill ourselves with costly wine, and sate ourselves with unguents." The custom of anointing the body with oil or with perfumes was common to the Jews (Amos vi. 6; Ps. xxiii. 5; Luke vii. 46), the Greeks (Anacr. xiii. 9), and the Romans (Hor. 'Od.' iv. 12, 18: "Nardi parvus onyx eliciet cadum," &c.).

flower of the spring.] Luther, Maienblumen. It is natural that the poets should dwell most on vernal flowers. The reading ἀέρος for ἔαρος, though ancient (Arab., "breath of flower;" Syr., "leaves of the air"?), yields no natural sense.

8. Let us crown ourselves with rosebuds, before they be withered.] This use of flower-garlands is Greek, not Jewish. We find in Judith xv. 13, "They put a garland of olive upon her." Compare

Ἐμὲ μᾶλλον ὡς ἔτι ζῶ μύρισον, ῥόδοις τε κρᾶτα πύκασον,

with the reason assigned, namely:

Τροχὸς ἅρματος γὰρ οἷα βίοτος τρέχει κυλισθείς.
ANACREON.

The same sentiment recurs frequently in the Epicurean Horace:

"Non desint epulis rosae Nec vivax apium, neu breve lilium."
Od. i. 36. 15.

"Huc vinum et unguenta et nimium breves Flores amoenae ferre jube rosae."
Od. ii. 3. 13.

"Gather ye rosebuds while ye may,
Old Time is still a-flying,
And this same flower which smiles to-day
To-morrow will be dying."—HERRICK.

"Our careless heads with roses crowned."
LOVELACE.

The Vulg. here adds, "let there be no meadow which our riot doth not traverse." Since λειμών, "meadow," is found in an old glossary as occurring in this book, the addition may represent a genuine clause of the Greek text, as described in the stichometry of Nicephorus. See p. 406.

Digitized by Microsoft®

Or. jollity.

part of our ‖ voluptuousness: let us leave tokens of our joyfulness in every place: for this is our portion, and our lot is this.

10 Let us oppress the poor righteous man, let us not spare the widow, nor reverence the ancient gray hairs of the aged.

11 Let our strength be the law of justice: for that which is feeble is found to be nothing worth.

12 Therefore let us lie in wait for the righteous; because he is not for our turn, and he is clean contrary to our doings: he upbraideth us with our offending the law, and objecteth to our infamy the transgressings of our education.

9. of our voluptuousness.] Neither this word, nor the marginal "jollity," exactly expresses the meaning of ἀγερωχίας. The word is not found in the LXX. or N.T., but in poetic and late Greek means "arrogance" (γεράοχος), and here implies "petulant dissoluteness," 2 Macc. ix. 6. The gloss gives as its equivalent ὑπερηφανίας.

this.] Namely, to make the best of mirth and sensual pleasure.

portion . . . lot.] The same words are joined in Acts viii. 21. They argue that man has nothing but the present; they are too much sunken in sensuality to realise the distant and the future. Compare the disgraceful epitaph of Sardanapalus:

τοσσ' ἔχω ὅσσ' ἔπιον καὶ ἐδήδοκα καὶ μετ' ἔρωτος τέρπν' ἐδάην τὰ δε πολλὰ καὶ ὄλβια κεῖνα λέλειπται.

10–20. Oppressive insolence, a second result of unbelief.

10. Let us oppress the poor righteous man.] Comp. Ezek. xviii. 12; James ii. 6. "The righteous man" is here hardly meant for irony. "Righteous" may indeed have been used as a term of opprobrium by these apostatising Jews, just as "saint" often has been among professing Christians. But it is clear from v. 12 that the writer is here thinking mainly of wealthy and heathenish Jews who oppress their countrymen, and not of heathen tyrants. The description of their conduct resembles that given of a similar class by St. James (ii. 6, 7), who uses this same verb καταδυναστεύω (xv. 14; xvii. 2). "Poor righteous man" (πένητα δίκαιον) therefore means the downtrodden Israelite (comp. v. 12) who refused to be a renegade.

the widow.] Widows and orphans were specially defenceless in ancient days: Is. x. 2; Mal. iii. 5; 2 Macc. iii. 10; Acts vi. 1; Jas. i. 27.

the ancient gray hairs of the aged.] The expression is pleonastic, as is so common in a style coloured by Semitic idioms. Some have imagined that there is an allusion to the barbarities practised on the ancient Eleazar (see 2 Macc. vi. 18–31), but in that crime the offenders were heathen soldiers of Antiochus Epiphanes. The reader will find many analogies to the acts of oppression here described in Philo's 'Embassy to Gaius,' and his treatise against Flaccus. In the latter book he will read of Jews starved, insulted, trampled on, flogged, despoiled, and even burnt, by the Alexandrian populace, abetted or connived at by the Roman governor. Considering that Philo's own nephew, Tiberius Alexander, apostatised and became Procurator of Judea, it may be assumed that many other Jews had abandoned their nationality.

11. Let our strength be the law of justice.] The ambiguity of the expression led to the reading injustitiae in some MSS. of the Vulg.; but the meaning is, "With us let might be right." "Jus est in armis" (Senec. 'Herc. F.' 250).

is found to be nothing worth.] Lit., "is convicted of being a useless thing."

12. let us lie in wait for the righteous.] The language is coloured by Psalm x. 8–10. Secret plots are mingled with open violence.

because he is not for our turn.] The curious word δύσχρηστος (Vulg. inutilis), here happily rendered "not for our turn" (comp. Shakspeare's 'Taming of the Shrew,' ii. 1: "My daughter is not for your turn"), is only found in a strange divergence from the Hebrew text by the LXX. in Is. iii. 10. It means "unmanageable," "intractable."

clean contrary.] This is an old English expression for "quite contrary." It is found in Josh. iii. 17; Psalm lxxvii. 8, &c. Latimer and Ascham use this phrase.

the law.] This can only mean "the Mosaic law;" it shews that the writer is alluding to Jews. Of these Hellenising Jews we find a description in 1 Macc. i.; 2 Macc. iv. The worst type of them were men like the priests Menelas and Jason, and like Herod the Great. Philo also describes this class of persons as men who "violated the laws in accordance with which they were born and nurtured, abandoned all reverence for antiquity, and violently set aside the customs of their countrymen to which no just blame attaches." ('Vit. Mos.' i. 6.)

objecteth to our infamy.] The Greek verb simply means "reproaches us with."

the transgressings of our education.] "Sins

13 He professeth to have the knowledge of God: and [f] he calleth himself the child of the Lord.

14 He was made [g] to reprove our thoughts.

15 [h] He is grievous unto us even to behold: for his life is not like other men's, his ways are of another fashion.

16 We are esteemed of him as

[f] Matt. 27. 43. John 19. 7
[g] John 7. 7. Ephes. 5. 13.
[h] Isai. 53. 3.

against our training." The genitive is objective. There is no reason therefore for the reading ἀναιδείας, "sins of our impudence," adopted by the Syriac for παιδείας, nor for the Alexandrine reading παιδίας, "of our youth" (=νεότητος, Psalm xxiv. 7), or παιδιᾶς, "of our jest." The loyal Jew is supposed to have upbraided these renegades with their defection from the holy lessons of their early days.

13. He professeth.] "Boastfully proclaims" (edicit, 1 Tim. ii. 10).

the knowledge of God.] The γνῶσις is here supposed to be boastfully claimed, as it was in later ages by the Gnostics.

the child of the Lord.] The word (παῖδα) might also mean "servant," as often in the LXX., where it is used to render Ebed Jehovah; but that it should here be rendered by "child" or "son" seems clear from vv. 16, 18.

It has been much disputed whether the many remarkable expressions of this passage have any connexion with the Gospel history or not. Among the Greek Fathers, Barnabas, Justin, Origen, Hippolytus, Eusebius; among the Latin Fathers, Tertullian (c. Marc. iii. 22), Cyprian ('Testimon.' ii. 14), Lactantius, Ambrose, Augustine, treat them as a direct prophecy. They are followed by Lorinus, Corn. à Lapide, Calmet, and many Romanist commentators; and by Protestants like Calovius. On the other hand, Grotius regarded them as a Christian interpolation ("quia locutiones quaedam magis Evangelium sapiunt quam vetustiora tempora"), and Noack considers the whole book to be of Christian origin. Undoubtedly the coincidences of thought and expression with passages in the N. T. are close and curious. Compare "he calls himself a son of God," and "he boasts of God as his Father," with John v. 18, xix. 7; Matt. xxvii. 43. &c.: "he proclaims that he has knowledge of God" with John xv. 15; Matt. xi. 27: "they erred as to the mysteries of God" with John xii. 40. Cornelius à Lapide goes so far as to see in the "unseemly death" (v. 20) an allusion to the Cross, and in the word δυσχρηστὸς an insulting reference to the name Χρίστος, which was often confounded with χρηστὸς (a heathen confusion which is perhaps even alluded to in 1 Pet. ii. 3). But these theories fall to the ground on the slightest examination. "The just man" is a general term for the faithful Israelite (iii. 1). It is used without difference of meaning alike in the singular and in the plural. The circumstances of the persecution and the methods of the persecutors are an ideal picture, suggested partly by the language of the O. T. (especially of Is. liii.), partly by recent or contemporary circumstances. They generally resemble the facts of every age in which persecution has occurred. The decisive point, however, is that the opponents of Christ were not apostatising infidels, like those here described, but were on the contrary Sadducean priests, and Pharisees of "the most straitest sect of the Jews' religion." Further, it is certain that no Christian could thus have approached the subject without at least an allegoric reference to the glory of Christ's resurrection.

14. He was made to reprove our thoughts.] Lit., "He proved to be to us for the reproof of our designs;" i.e. his mere existence, by pointing a contrast unfavourable to us, thwarts and shames our ideal. Thus Capito complained to Nero of Thrasea and others that they were "rigidi et tristes quo tibi lasciviam exprobrent." The children of darkness hate the light (John iii. 20; vii. 7).

15. grievous.] Lit., heavy. Similarly Antisthenes, as quoted by Philo, said that the sober and earnest man was "grievous to be borne" (δυσβάστακτος); and Max. Tyrius, in a striking passage, says that "the majority could not bear the very name 'philosopher';" and that "wicked men cannot tolerate the lovely air of the virtues in the midst of them." John xv. 19: "Because ye are not of the world, the world hateth you."

even to behold.] We cannot bear his very look. See Gen. xxxvii. 4, 18; 1 K. xxi. 20; Is. liii. 3.

his life is not like other men's.] In the original it is "his life is not like the rest"—a comparatio compendiaria (brachylogy of comparison) for "like the life of the rest." The "just" are in "the world," but not "of it."

his ways.] His moral walk in the world.

of another fashion.] ἑξηλλαγμέναι. Vulg. immutatae, "changed" (from the ordinary). These renegades treat virtue as an affected eccentricity.

16. We are esteemed of him.] Lit., "we were reckoned." The aorist may either indicate the swift instinctive judgment formed by the good man, or may be the gnomic aorist.

Digitized by Microsoft®

‖ Or, false coin. ‖ counterfeits: he abstaineth from our ways as from filthiness: [i] he pronounceth the end of the just to be blessed, and maketh his boast that God is his father.

[i] Numb. 23. 10.

17 Let us see if his words be true: and let us prove what shall happen in the end of him.

18 For if the just man be the [k] son of God, he will help him, and deliver him from the hand of his enemies.

[k] Ps. 22. 8, 9. Matt. 27. 43.

19 Let us [l] examine him with despitefulness and torture, that we may know his meekness, and prove his patience.

[l] Jer. 11. 19.

20 Let us condemn him with a shameful death: for by his own saying he shall be respected.

21 Such things they did imagine, and were deceived: for their own wickedness hath blinded them.

as counterfeits.] The marg. gives "as false coin;" and this is the ordinary meaning of κίβδηλος. There is indeed no religious hypocrisy in the case, since these men openly proclaim their irreligion; but still they estimate themselves as sensible, practical, clever; and the good man sees through them, and knows them to be as valueless as tinsel and dross (Vulg. tamquam nugaces).

the end of the just.] He asserts that the just will always be happy at the last. The neut. adj. ἔσχατα represents the Hebrew אַחֲרִית, as in Is. lxvi. 24 (Symmachus); Ecclus. i. 13, vii. 35. For the sentiment, see Prov. x. 7; Dan. xii. 7, &c.

maketh his boast.] The word ἀλαζονεύεται is contemptuous: "he vauntingly and idly brags." The word at least shews the feeling of these infidels that the claim to be sons of God was "an immense pretension."

that God is his father.] See v. 13.

17. Let us see if his words be true.] Comp. Matt. xxvii. 49.

in the end of him.] Ἔκβασις is here used for "death." Comp. Heb. xiii. 7, and the use of ἔξοδος for death in Luke ix. 31; 2 Pet. i. 15.

18. he will help him.] Comp. Matt. xxvii. 43; Psalm xxii. 8, 9. But many of the saints of God know that God's help is not always granted in the sense in which the world uses the words. They accept with perfect faith an apparent finality and completeness of earthly failure, and they die contentedly, as the martyrs did, among the triumphant taunts of their enemies (Euseb. 'H. E.' v. 1).

19. with despitefulness.] Rather, "with insolence," which is the old meaning of despite. "Insolence" would test his "meekness," and "torment" his "endurance."

torture.] No doubt the history of Alexandria supplied the writer with recent or historical instances in which apostates, siding with the heathen, had brought torture on their countrymen.

patience.] ἀνεξικακίαν. The word occurs also in 2 Tim. ii. 24.

20. Let us condemn him with a shameful death.] So St. James (v. 6) says, "Ye condemned, ye murdered the just; he doth not resist you"—words which might almost be regarded as a prophecy of his own approaching martyrdom. Hegesippus, in his narrative of that martyrdom preserved by Eusebius, 'H. E.' ii. 23 (see Routh, 'Rel. Sacr.' i. 195), evidently has this passage of the Book of Wisdom in his mind. Plato, in describing the agonies to which "the just man" will be subjected, ends by saying, "he will be impaled" (ἀνασχινδυλευθήσεται, 'Rep.' ii. 5).

by his own saying he shall be respected.] The A. V. follows the Vulg. The meaning is, "in accordance with what he himself says (see vv. 16, 17) God will have regard to him;" so that, if his words are true (17), we need feel no compunction. Such translations as Luther's, Da wird man ihn kennen an seinen Worten, or "His own words will give us an occasion of punishing him;" or Churton's, "there shall be an enquiry into the truth of his words,"—give impossible meanings to the word ἐπισκοπή, which can only refer to God's oversight and protection of His child: Luke xix. 44; 1 Pet. ii. 12.

21–24. The cause and the consequences of these errors and crimes.

21. they did imagine.] On the use of the aorist to express general facts, see note on i. 16.

their own wickedness hath blinded them.] Rather, "blinded," or as we should say, idiomatically, "blinds" them. "God," as St. Augustine says, "scatters penal blindness upon forbidden lusts." The truth is expressed with equal clearness by Aristotle ('Eth. Nic.' vi. 6), where he speaks of wickedness (κακία) as being φθαρτικὴ ἀρχῆς, and by Shakspeare:

"For when we in our viciousness grow hard,
O misery on 't! the wise gods seal our eyes,
In our own filth drop our clear judgments, make us
Adore our errors, laugh at us, while we strut
To our confusion."

St. Paul most forcibly illustrates the deepening of this self-induced darkness in Rom.

Digitized by Microsoft®

22 As for the mysteries of God, they knew them not: neither hoped for the wages of righteousness, nor ‖ discerned a reward for blameless souls.

‖ Gr. preferred, or, esteemed the reward.

23 For God created man to be immortal, and made him to be an [m] image of his own eternity.

24 [n] Nevertheless through envy of the devil came death into the world: and they that do hold of his side do find it.

[m] Gen. 1. 26, 27. & 5. 1. Ecclus. 17 3.

[n] Gen. 3. 13.

i. 18–32, and in Eph. iv. 18 (ἐσκοτισμένοι . . . ἀγνοίαν . . . πώρωσιν).

22. the mysteries of God.] Vulg., sacramenta Dei. God's "mysteries" are the deeper truths which He only reveals to pure eyes and open hearts. For the use of the word in the N. T., see Rom. xvi. 25; Eph. i. 9. Here the reference is to God's ways of dealing with His children.

hoped for.] Hope is a virtue, as well as a blessing and a reward.

the wages of righteousness.] Rather, "of holiness." The word "holy" (ὅσιος) describes our relation to God; "blameless" (ἄμωμος) describes our relation to men. It is the LXX. rendering of the Hebrew חָסִיד (Ps. xvi. 10, xxxii. 6, &c.), from which is derived the name Chasidim, or Assidæans, "the Pious" (see 1 Macc. ii. 42, vii. 13; 2 Macc. xiv. 6), which was the designation chosen by the anti-Hellenistic Jews. The words ὅσιος, ὁσιότης, occur constantly in this book. Such "holiness" is regarded as a necessary manifestation of "wisdom." The reward is "the gift of faith, and inheritance in the temple of the Lord" (iii. 14).

nor discerned a reward for blameless souls.] The margin also suggests "preferred" or "esteemed" for ἔκριναν; but by supplying the infinitive εἶναι, the word may retain its ordinary signification, "nor judged that there is a guerdon."

23. For.] The word introduces the statement that there is such a guerdon, and that it is nothing less than a blessed immortality.

to be immortal.] Vulg., "creavit hominem inexterminabilem." The word used for "immortality" means literally "incorruption" (ἀφθαρσία, 1 Cor. xv. 42; 1 Tim. ii. 10, &c.). The immortality implied is a joyful eternity, which "maketh us near unto God," vi. 19. In the LXX. the word only occurs in Ps. lxxiv. 1.

an image of his own eternity.] The A.V. here adopts the reading ἀϊδιότητος, with Athanasius, Methodius, and other Fathers. Other MSS. followed by the Vulg. and Syriac read ὁμοιότητος (Vulg., ad imaginem similitudinis suae), perhaps an ancient gloss for ἰδιότητος, which is found in Clement of Alexandria, and is adopted by the Complutensian text. If the author had been specially referring to the LXX. (Gen. i. 26), he would have used ὁμοιώσεως. The assonance involved in τῆς ἰδίας ἰδιότητος is in favour of that reading, and man can be more easily regarded as "an image of God's likeness" (Col. iii. 10) than "of His eternity."

24. through envy of the devil.] Διάβολος, like the Hebrew "Satan," does not need the article, being regarded as a proper name (1 Pet. v. 8). Doubtless the Devil is here identified (for the first time in Jewish literature) with the Serpent of Paradise, as in Rev. xii. 9, xx. 2, and in Talmudic literature. The envy of the Devil can only allude to the Eastern and Rabbinic legends that the fall of Satan was due to his scorn and envy manifested at the creation of mankind. Josephus ('Antt.' I. i. § 4) says that "the Serpent living with Adam and his wife was envious (φθονερῶς εἶχεν) at the blessings which he thought that they would enjoy if they obeyed the commandments of God." See, too, Eisennenger, 'Entd. Jud.' i. 827. In Ecclus. xi. 16 we read, "Error and darkness had their origin together with sinners:" but the passage is probably an interpolation. That envy is specially a "peccatum diabolicum," is implied in Job i. 1–11, ii. 4, 5; Is. xiv. 12–15. This is one of the passages in which the writer diverges widely from the theology and philosophy of Philo, who, after his usual allegorising methods, makes the Serpent a mere symbol of seductive temptation ('De Mund. Opif.' 56).

came death into the world.] Rom. v. 12. In John viii. 44 the Devil is called "a murderer (ἀνθρωποκτόνος) from the beginning;" and in Heb. ii. 14 he is spoken of as "him that hath the power of death." In the Gospel of Nicodemus, c. 23, he is addressed as "the beginning of death, and the root of sin." In the confused demonology of the Jews, with its curious foreign admixtures, he is sometimes identified with, but more often distinguished from, the Angel of Death.

they that do hold of his side.] See i. 16; 1 John iii. 12. Cain was "of the wicked one."

do find it.] They fall under the power of death (Rom. vi. 23); in other words, they pass into an existence of darkness and misery. There is no classical instance in which the verb πειράζω means "I experience," but it seems to approximate to this sense in xii. 26 (where the Vulg. renders it experti sunt), Ecclus. xxxix. 4, and Eccles. viii. 5 (Symmachus).

Digitized by Microsoft®

CHAPTER III.

1 The godly are happy in their death, 5 and in their troubles: 10 the wicked are not, nor their children: 13 but they that are pure are happy, though they have no children: 16 for the adulterer and his seed shall perish.

BUT [a] the souls of the righteous are in the hand of God, and there shall no torment touch them. [a] Deut 33. 3.

2 [b] In the sight of the unwise they seemed to die: and their departure is taken for misery, [b] ch. 5. 1.

In this verse the Vulg. refers αὐτὸν not to "death," but to the Devil, and renders the clause "imitantur autem illum qui sunt ex parte illius."

III.–V. The Righteous and the Wicked.

CHAPTER III.

1–9. The hopes and blessings of the righteous. 10–iv. 6. The offspring of the righteous and of the godless.

1. But the souls of the righteous are in the hand of God.] The subject of the last chapter is continued. The wages of sin is spiritual death; the wicked die, and pass into a misery which is but a life-in-death. The righteous die the death of the body, but that death is life. Their souls, when they pass away, are "in the hand," i.e. under the protecting care of God (Ps. lxxxviii. 5; Is. li. 16, "I have covered thee with the shadow of my hand;" John x. 28, "Neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand;" Lk. xxiii. 46, "into Thy hands;" xvi. 23, "Lazarus in his bosom").

there shall no torment touch them.] In the future life—which the Jews after the days of the Exile, and especially at the epoch when this book was written, recognised more distinctly than their fathers—the wicked shall be in "torment," which shall not touch the righteous. The nature and continuance of their future torment are not defined, and were not clearly realised; but, as in the Book of Enoch and the parable of Dives, their fate is metaphorically described in language borrowed from the imagery of the ancient prophets (Lk. xvi. 23; Rev. xiv. 10; Is. lxvi. 24). The word βάσανος only occurs once or twice in the LXX., and in the N. T. only in Matt. iv. 24 (of sickness) and Lk. xvi. 23, 28; but βασανίζω and βασανισμὸς are applied in the Apocalypse to punishment beyond the grave. The word means: (1) a touchstone; (2) examination by torture; (3) torment in general.

2. In the sight of the unwise.] Lit., "in the eyes." A Hebraism (בְּעֵינֵי) for "in the judgment of." Comp. ix. 9; Deut. xii. 8; Judg. xvii. 6; Judith iii. 4; Ecclus. viii. 16. "The unwise," like the friends of Job, who judge by appearances and cannot rise beyond a cruel traditional orthodoxy, form false judgments about the sorrows of the righteous.

of the unwise.] The word ἀφρόνων means the morally unwise. In all scriptural writings, folly and wickedness are identified: i. 3; Is. lix. 6; Prov. xvi. 27; Judg. xx. 6, 10, &c. (LXX.)

they seemed to die.] Rather, "to be dead." In this and the following verses we have the contrast between the semblance of death and the reality of life which has been dwelt upon by many great writers. Probably Euripides was one of the earliest Greeks to express this thought in his famous lines:

> τὶς οἶδεν εἰ τὸ ζῆν μέν ἐστι κατθανεῖν
> τὸ κατθανεῖν δὲ ζῆν;

The incessant jests which Aristophanes points at this deep question, prove the astonishment which it excited. Afterwards the thought became almost a commonplace. In Maximus Tyrius, we find ('Dissert.' 25, p. 258, quoted by Grimm), "That which the many call death, that very thing was the beginning of immortality and the birth of the future life." Philo, in a passage closely resembling this ('Det. pot.' Opp. i. 200), says: "The wise man when he seems to be dead as to this corruptible life is living the incorruptible." In the eloquent Epistle to Diognetus, "the seeming death" is contrasted with "the reality of death" in aeonian fire. The Book of Enoch, cii. 4–cv. 2, furnishes several analogous thoughts. In the N. T. death is often represented as the gate of life. See especially Phil. i. 21–23; Rom. vii. 24; Col. iii. 3, 4; 2 Cor. v. 8; Rev. xiv. 13, &c. We meet with the same thought not only in Christian poets like Milton:

> "When Faith and Love, which parted from thee never,
> Had ripened thy just soul to dwell with God,
> Meekly thou didst resign this earthly load
> Of death, called life, which us from life doth sever;"

but even in poets like Shelley:

> "Ah no, he is not dead, he does not sleep—
> He hath awakened from the dream of life."

their departure.] This word ἔξοδος is used for "death" in Lk. ix. 3; 2 Pet. i. 15. Comp. vii. 6; ii. 17 (ἔκβασις); Ecclus. xxxviii. 23; Jos. 'Antt.' iv. 8, § 2, ἐξ ἐξόδου τοῦ ζῆν. This use of the word is not found in classical Greek, but "exitus" and excessus are used for death in Cic. 'Legg.' i. 1; Justin. xiv. 4, § 10; Lactant. 'De Mort. Persec.' 50.

is taken for misery.] Rather, "was counted a misfortune."

Digitized by Microsoft®

3 And their going from us to be utter destruction: but they are in peace.

4 For though they be punished in the sight of men, yet is their [c] hope full of immortality.

5 And having been a little chastised, they shall be greatly [‖] rewarded: because God proved them, and found them worthy for himself.

[c] Rom. 8. 24. 2 Cor. 5. 1. 1 Pet. 1. 13.
[‖] Or, benefited.

3. their going from us.] πορεία. Another euphemism for death. There seems to be no exact parallel for this expression, the nearest being Lk. xxii. 22, "the Son of Man goeth" (πορεύεται); comp. Acts i. 25. It is derived from the phrases "to go to our fathers," Gen. xv. 15, or "to go the way of all the earth," 1 Kings ii. 2, &c.

utter destruction.] σύντριμμα, "a crushing up." Vulg., exterminium, "annihilation." Rom. iii. 16; 1 Macc. ii. 7, &c.

but they are in peace.] The "but" is emphatic: "but on the contrary." "Peace" (Shalom—the ordinary form of Jewish greeting) was the ideal conception of happiness to the Hebrew, as joy (χαίρειν) was to the Greek. The "peace" of the departed righteous souls which is here contemplated is not the repose of unconsciousness, as in Shelley—

"Envy and calumny and hate and pain Can touch him not, nor torture him again"— and many similar passages; nor is it the immortality of posthumous memory, as in the famous lines:

"Oh may I join the choir invisible
Of those immortal dead who live again
In minds made better by their presence!"

but it is a state of deep and sentient blessedness,—"a rest" (ἀνάπαυσις, iv. 7; Heb. iii. 11; Rev. xiv. 13). It is "Paradise" (Lk. xxiii. 43). This truth goes beyond anything which was clear to most of the O. T. writers, who look on the grave as a dreamless sleep: Job iii. 13–19; Is. xxxviii. 11, 18; Eccles. ix. 10; Ps. vi. 5, xv. 9, lxxxviii. 11, &c. The idea of a joyous life beyond the grave was only revealed gradually, and the full knowledge of it was given by Him who brought life and immortality to light.

4–9. These verses obviate the objection which might be urged from the earthly afflictions of the righteous. They are meant only to test, and purge, and train for future bliss and glory.

4. though they be punished.] More accurately, "if they have been punished." Some suppose that there is an allusion to the martyrs in the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes: 1 Macc. i. 57–64. It is more probable that the writer had some recent events in his mind.

in the sight of men.] See v. 2. The Jews found it difficult to understand the problem of the earthly afflictions of the godly, which had perplexed both David (Ps. lxxiii.) and Job. David found the solution in the calamity and retribution which often overtake the wicked even in this life. The difficulties of Job are hushed by an appeal to the awful omnipotence of God, which requires unquestioning submission. In the age when this book was written, the Jews had advanced much further, and they were able to rest in the belief that the rewards and punishments of a future life would redress the wrongs and inequalities of the present. The transient "day" of feeble men (ἄνθρωποι) is incapable of judging aright as to the phenomena of life (1 Cor. iv. 3). We see but one small arc of an infinite circle. See 1 Cor. xv. 19.

yet is their hope full of immortality.] The currency of the phrase is due to its rich poetic depth. The righteous have a "full assurance (πληροφορία) of hope even to the end" (Heb. vi. 11, x. 22). Their hopes are not set on earthly things, but are filled with thoughts of the world to come. The word used for "immortality" is here ἀθανασία, not ἀφθαρσία. It is naturally wanting in the O. T., though Aquila used it in Ps. xlix. 15: but it occurs several times in this book (iv. 1, viii. 18, xv. 13; Ecclus. xix. 17). In viii. 13 it may mean (like Unsterblichkeit) an immortal memory, as when Milton said, "I dream of immortality:" but usually it means eternal life. In the N. T. it occurs in 1 Cor. xv. 53; 1 Tim. vi. 16. It was this hope which sustained the martyr-brothers who were so cruelly tortured and slain by Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Macc. vii. 9), to whose traditional utterances the writer may incidentally allude.

5. a little chastised.] The word for chastisement (παιδευθέντες) implies a divine education. This view of the sufferings of the godly is specially worked out in Heb. xii. 5–12; Jas. i. 12; Rev. iii. 19; but it was familiar also to the O. T. writers: Lev. xxvi. 23, 24; 2 Sam. vii. 14; Ps. xciv. 12, cxix. 75; Prov. iii. 12, &c.

they shall be greatly rewarded.] The thought is the same as in Rom. viii. 18; 2 Cor. iv. 17: "Our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us, more and more exceedingly, an eternal weight of glory."

proved them.] "God did tempt Abraham," Ex. xv. 25. In the view of the sacred writers, all afflictions are a test (δοκιμή, 2 Cor. viii. 2), a trial (πειρασμός, Jas. i. 12), a training (παιδεία, Heb. xii. 5), or an admonition (νουwarded: for God [d] proved them, and found them ‖ worthy for himself.

Digitized by Microsoft®

6 [e] As gold in the furnace hath he tried them, and received them as a burnt offering.

7 And in the time of their visitation [f] they shall shine, and run to and fro like sparks among the stubble.

8 They [g] shall judge the nations,

[d] Exod. 16. 4. Deut. 8. 2.
‖ Or, meet.
[e] Zech. 13. 9. Mal. 3. 3. Ecclus. 2. 5.
[f] Matt. 13. 43.
[g] Matt. 19. 28. 1 Cor. 6. 2.

θεσία, Eph. vi. 4). I can see no ground in this passage for Grimm's remark about the supposed unjust particularism of the writer in regarding the punishments of the Jews as disciplinary, and those of the Gentiles as retributive. In the punishments mentioned in xi., xii., the writer is speaking of wicked Gentiles, and his present remarks are a consolation to righteous Jews. It may, however, be pointed out that Scripture only represents punishment as being purely retributive when its disciplinary effect has wholly failed.

worthy for himself.] Rather, "worthy of Himself," i.e. worthy of His vision and of His sabbath; worthy to become a λαὸς εἰς περιποίησιν (1 Pet. ii. 9). This conception was greatly deepened by the teaching of Christ (Matt. x. 37, 38; Rev. iii. 20; John xiv. 17; 1 John iv. 12). When, in vision, St. Thomas Aquinas was asked what reward he desired, his answer was, "Non aliam (mercedem) nisi te Domine."

6. As gold in the furnace.] The word for "smelting-furnace" is rare, but the thought of fiery probation to purge away all mortal dross is common (1 Pet. i. 7, iv. 12; Zech. xiii. 9, &c.). Comp. Ov. 'Trist.,' i. 4. 25—

"Scilicet ut fulvum spectatur in ignibus aurum Tempore sic duro est inspicienda fides"— and Pope's epitaph on Mrs. E. Corbett in St. Margaret's, Westminster:

"So unaffected, so composed a mind,
So firm yet soft, so strong yet so refined,
Heaven as its purest gold with tortures tried:
The saint sustained it, but the woman died."

he tried them.] Tested their genuineness (ἐδοκίμασεν); proved that they were not counterfeits (κίβδηλα), like those alluded to in ii. 16.

received them.] Regarded them favourably (Job viii. 20, LXX.).

as a burnt offering.] See 1 Macc. i. 45. The martyrs under Antiochus were forbidden to offer sacrifices, but their life was itself a sacrifice. The curious phrase ὁλοκάρπωμα θυσίας means "a whole burnt offering" (holocaust). The sense of "fruit" (καρπὸς) has become quite obsolescent. This frequently happens to the etymological element of a word, as in "looking-glasses of silver;" "a silver box;" "a hecatomb of ten oxen," &c. The word does not occur in the N. T. (where we find ὁλοκαύτωμα, Matt. xii. 33; Heb. x. 6); but it is found in the LXX., Lev. xvi. 24. Comp. Ecclus. xlv. 14. For the thought see Rom. xii. 1; 1 Pet. ii. 5.

7. in the time of their visitation.] When God "visits" or "looks upon" them, to "reward them according to their works." We have the word ἐπισκοπὴ again in v. 13. In the LXX. it occurs in a bad sense of the penal visitation of God, as in Lev. xix. 20; Jer. vi. 15: in a good sense, in Job x. 12. In the N. T. we find it in Luke xix. 44; 1 Pet. ii. 12, v. 6: as well as in its general sense of "overseership," "bishoprick," Acts i. 20; 1 Tim. iii. 1. The writer has here left in shadow all specific details. Hence Bretschneider and others suppose him to be speaking of some golden age for Israel on earth. Gfrörer ('Philo,' ii. 256) refers the passage to the day of judgment; others, again, explain it as a description of triumph and happiness beyond the grave. The decision between these views is not easy; perhaps because no such decision is possible. The writer's object is to prophesy, in the glowing language of conviction, the final triumph and happiness of the good. The form and manner of the triumph are naturally expressed in general imagery.

they shall shine.] To explain this of "pure ethereal light-bodies," assumed by the just at their resurrection, as Gfrörer does, is perhaps too definite an explanation of a general metaphor. There can be little doubt that the expression is a reference to Dan. xii. 3, "They that be wise shall shine (LXX. ἐκλάμψουσι) as the brightness of the firmament." Comp. Is. lx. 1–3 and Matt. xiii. 43, "Then shall the righteous shine forth (ἐκλάμψουσιν) as the sun in the kingdom of their Father;" Phil. ii. 15.

and run to and fro like sparks among the stubble.] This, too, seems to be a general metaphor to express the victorious and sin-consuming power of the just hereafter. It is based on Obad. 18: "And the house of Jacob shall be fire, and the house of Joseph a flame, and the house of Edom for stubble, and they shall kindle in them and devour them" (comp. Ps. v. 24; Joel ii. 5, "like the noise of a flame of fire that devoureth the stubble"). The word "spark" (σπινθὴρ) occurs in a similar figure in Aquila and Symmachus, Is. i. 31. The wicked are compared to stubble in Mal. iv. 1.

8. They shall judge the nations.] Comp. Ecclus. iv. 15. This again is a metaphor and have dominion over the people, and their Lord shall reign for ever.

Digitized by Microsoft®

9 They that put their trust in him shall understand the truth: ‖ and such as be faithful in love shall abide with him: [h] for grace and mercy is to his saints, and he hath care for his elect.

‖ Or, and such as be faithful shall remain with him in love.

[h] ch. 4. 15

10 But the [i] ungodly shall be punished according to their own imaginations, which have neglected the righteous, and forsaken the Lord.

[i] Matt. 25. 41.

11 For whoso despiseth wisdom and nurture, he is miserable, and their hope is vain, their labours unfruitful, and their works unprofitable:

which frequently recurs in Scripture, and is founded on Dan. vii. 22. It evidently implies more than the mere ultimate vindication of the children of Wisdom, and the moral condemnation of those who have persecuted them: Matt. xix. 28; 1 Cor. vi. 2; Rev. xx. 4.

their Lord shall reign.] Rather, "the Lord shall reign over them." The expression may be a reminiscence of Jer. iii. 14, where the words "I am married to you" (rather, "I am your lord," i.e. your husband, as in xxxi. 34) are rendered by the LXX. ἐγὼ κατακυριεύσω αὐτῶν. The promise resembles therefore those in Ex. xxix. 45; Lev. xxvi. 12; 2 Cor. vi. 16.

for ever.] Lit., "to the ages," a rendering of the vague Hebrew לְעוֹלָם.

9. shall understand the truth.] Here faith in God is regarded as the secret of understanding the ways of His providence. St. John (vii. 17) records the promise of Christ that obedience (which springs from faith) shall be rewarded with knowledge.

such as be faithful in love shall abide with him.] The margin suggests "such as be faithful shall remain with Him in love." There can be but little doubt that this is the preferable rendering. "The faithful" (οἱ πιστοὶ, comp. Ecclus. i. 14) is an equivalent expression to οἱ πεποιθότες in the previous verse. The promise is found yet more fully and richly in John xiv. 16, xv. 10; Rev. iii. 20.

grace and mercy.] See iv. 15. The words are also combined with "peace" at the beginning of St. Paul's pastoral epistles.

to his saints.] Rather, "among his holy ones," if we adopt the reading ἐν τοῖς ὁσίοις αὐτοῦ. There are many variations of reading which do not in any important way affect the sense, and which may be partly owing to the fact that an exactly similar passage occurs at iv. 15. This title, "the holy" (ὅσιος), is given to the Israelites in x. 17; xviii. 1, 5, 9. It is not found in the N. T.

he hath care for his elect.] For the word ἐπισκοπὴ, here rendered "care," see the note on v. 7. This clause is omitted by the Vulg., but it is supported by the evidence of many of the best MSS. and versions. The phrase "mine elect" (comp. Tobit viii. 15) is found in Is. xlii. 1, &c., and Christians are called "elect" in Col. iii. 13; Tit. i. 1, &c.

10—iv. 6. Contrasted fates of the offspring of the righteous and the godless.

10. according to their own imaginations.] Rather, "in accordance with their reasonings"—the "crooked reasonings" referred to in i. 2, 3, ii. 1, which deserve the punishment which they naturally involve (Prov. i. 29–31).

which have neglected the righteous.] Τοῦ δικαίου may either mean "the just man" (justum, Vulg.) or "justice" in the abstract, as Augustine seems to have understood it ("qui neglexerunt justitiam"). The latter rendering would give a more exact parallel to the σοφίαν ἐξουθενῶν of the next verse. It also yields an easier sense. The neuter τὸ δίκαιον for "justice" is not common in Hellenistic Greek, but it occurs in Luke xii. 57, Col. iv. 1 (τὸ δίκαιον καὶ τὴν ἰσότητα); and in Job xxxiv. 10, παράξαι τὸ δίκαιον means "to disturb justice" (comp. 2 Macc. x. 12). On the other hand, it must be borne in mind that ὁ δίκαιος has occurred three times in the last chapter (ii. 10, 12, 18). The phrase "have neglected the righteous" may be an allusion to the supercilious contempt of renegade Jews for their faithful brethren, and their refusal to minister to their needs.

and forsaken the Lord.] This "apostasy" (ἀποστάντες) has already been hinted at in ii. 12, in the words "transgression against the law."

11. nurture.] παιδείαν. See ii. 12. The same phrase is found in Prov. i. 7.

miserable.] ταλαίπωρος, xiii. 10. This is one of the poetic words which became current in Hellenistic Greek. It is rare, however, both in the LXX. and in the N. T. (where it only occurs twice: Rom. vii. 24; Rev. iii. 17).

their hope.] The hope of all such.

unfruitful . . . unprofitable.] Grimm sees an instance of litotes here as in i. 11; but the two epithets are meant to describe the ineffectualness of all the aims and efforts of the wicked, which is often dwelt on in Scripture (Is. lii. 3; Job viii. 22; 1 Cor. ii. 6; Rev. xviii. 17, &c.), and which is implied in the

Digitized by Microsoft®

‖ Or, light, or, unchaste.

12 Their wives are ‖ foolish, and their children wicked:

13 Their offspring is cursed. Wherefore blessed is the barren that is undefiled, which hath not known the sinful bed: she [k] shall have fruit in the visitation of souls.

[k] Isai. 56. 5.

14 And blessed is the [l] eunuch, which with his hands hath wrought no iniquity, nor imagined wicked

[l] Isai. 56. 4, 5.

word ἁμαρτία—properly "a missing of the mark."

12. Their wives are foolish.] The word ἄφρονες (Vulg. insensatæ) sometimes has the meaning "light" or "unchaste," which is suggested in the margin: comp. 2 Sam. xiii. 13; Prov. v. 5 (LXX. ἀφροσύνης); Deut. xxii. 21.

their children wicked.] In this and some of the following verses we have one of the unsatisfactory generalisations by which the Jews tried to meet the speculative difficulties presented by the present condition of the world. Such a proverb as that in Ezek. xvi. 44, "As is the mother, so is the daughter," or the German proverb, "The apple falls not far from its stem," do indeed correspond to a general truth of experience, but the writer might have seen, even in Scripture history, that it is one which admits of far too many exceptions to have much value as an argument. The Son of Sirach says (Ecclus. xli. 5), "The children of the wicked are abominable children;" but yet the children of the wicked are, as Ezekiel implies (xviii. 1–18), sometimes holy, and the children of the holy are sometimes depraved. Compare, however, Juvenal ('Sat.' xiv. 1):

"Plurima sunt, Fuscine, et fama digna sinistra, Quae monstrant ipsi pueris, traduntque parentes."

13. Their offspring is cursed.] The expression must only be understood as implying the general law of sequence and heredity. It is notorious that many great and flourishing families have sprung from illicit unions. Our own kings for many generations were descended from William I., who was known as "the Bastard." The allusion may perhaps be to the children of mixed marriages, who were regarded as illegitimate;—yet Salmon married Rahab, and Boaz married Ruth.

Wherefore.] The reasoning of these verses is confused. It is possible that, in some conspicuous instances which had come under the writer's cognizance, the heathenising Jews against whom he is writing may have been blessed with abundant offspring, like those to whom David alludes (Ps. xvii. 14), while some of the faithful had (like Hannah) few or no children. The Jews plunged themselves into much needless perplexity by their unwarrantable way of regarding earthly prosperity and adversity as proofs of the favour or wrath of God—an error which the Book of Job was intended to refute. The writer truly points out that the barren and the impotent may earn blessings from God of far more worth than marriage, or sons or daughters. But these two verses are awkwardly interposed into his general and too absolutely stated argument that the children of the wicked are under the curse of God.

the barren that is undefiled.] The words are defined (ἥτις) by the next clause to mean "the married woman who has no children." The attempt of Corn. à Lapide, and other Roman Catholic commentators, to extract from this verse a glorification of celibacy, is as arbitrary as many other attempts to establish unauthorised dogmas by perverted texts. Unmarried women are never called "barren" in Scripture, and voluntary celibacy seems to have been wholly unknown to the Jews till the rise of the Therapeutae and Essenes, who were always a small body. The praises of celibacy could not, without singular incongruity, have been put into the mouth of a king who had 300 wives and 700 concubines. With the phrase "blessed is the barren," comp. Is. liv. 1; Luke xxiii. 29; Gal. iv. 27.

fruit.] The meaning is that she shall have spiritual fruit, better than "the fruit of the womb." It is the antithesis to barrenness.

in the visitation of souls.] See v. 7.

14. blessed is the eunuch.] Under the Old Covenant, the exclusion of eunuchs from "the congregation of the Lord" (Deut. xxiii. 1, 2) caused their lot to be exceptionally hard, and therefore Isaiah had addressed to them a special consolation (Is. lvi. 3–5) by promising to them a place in God's house and "a name better than of sons and daughters." It is clear that there is an allusion to this passage. In Matt. xix. 12, our Lord refers to three classes of eunuchs. The meaning of the words which describe the third class is uncertain. It is unnecessary to enter into that passage here, for the writer is evidently pointing, not to celibate persons, but to those who are from natural causes childless. There is not the smallest ground for adopting the theory of Grätz and others, that these verses have been interpolated in the interest of Christian asceticism and voluntary celibacy.

the special gift of faith.] The article is inaccurate. The meaning is that the godly eunuch shall receive "a precious (ἐκλεκτόν, comp. Ezek. xxvii. 24) spiritual blessing—namely, the blessing of faith (Eph. ii. 8);" the things against God: for unto him shall be given ‖ the special gift of faith, and an inheritance ‖ in the temple of the Lord more acceptable to his mind.

‖ Gr. the chosen.
‖ Or, among the people.

15 For glorious is the fruit of good labours: and the root of wisdom shall never fall away.

16 As for the children of adulterers, they shall not ‖ come to their perfection, and the seed of an unrighteous bed shall be rooted out.

‖ Or, be partakers of holy things.

17 For though they live long, yet shall they be nothing regarded: and their last age shall be without honour.

18 Or, if they die quickly, they have no hope, neither comfort in the day of ‖ trial.

‖ Or. hearing.

joy of assured confidence in God. Χάρις τῆς πίστεως can hardly mean "a reward for his faithfulness."

and an inheritance in the temple of the Lord.] The reading λαῷ for ναῷ (followed in the margin, "among the people") is clearly wrong, for there is unmistakably an allusion to Is. lvi. 5, and only indirectly to Deut. xxiii. 1.

more acceptable.] The word θυμήρεστερος occurs neither in the LXX. nor in the N. T. It is an epic word found in Homer. There is another reading, θυμηδέστερος, which means the same thing, and is found in Aeschylus. The recognition of God shall be to the faithful eunuch more acceptable than wedlock and offspring.

15. For glorious.] The verse, and each clause of it, is arranged in the oratorical order known as chiasmos. In the first clause the adjectives in the original are placed at the beginning and the end, and each clause balances the other.

"For of good toils the fruit is glorious,
And unfailing is the root of good intelligence."

The arrangement illustrates the extreme artificiality of the style. The Hebrew parallelism is expressed in rhythmic oratory.

For.] He gives the reason why even the barren woman and the eunuch, if they be godly, cannot perish without memorial. Their deeds live, and their example lives, and the blessedness which springs from their efforts continues to be their portion. They have a root which is eternally fruitful.

shall never fall away.] Ἀδιάπτωτος is a rare and late word. Hippocrates uses it in the sense of "infallible." It does not occur in the LXX. or in the N. T. It is here meant to recall the language of Ps. i. 3; cxii. 6, 7.

16. they shall not come to their perfection.] The meaning is that they shall neither be glorious nor immortal. The margin suggests that they shall not "be partakers of holy things." This is a rendering of ἀτέλεστα in its technical meaning of "uninitiated into the mysteries," as though the word implied the exclusion of bastards from the congregation of the Lord (Deut. xxiii. 1, 2). The meaning would then be that the exclusion of eunuchs on earth should be compensated by their admission into all the blessings of the future life, but that this should not be the case with bastards. But the parallelism shews that the simpler meaning (Vulg., inconsummati) is here intended. The word occurs again in iv. 5, κλῶνες ἀτέλεστοι, "branches that come to nothing."

shall be rooted out.] The metaphor belongs only to the English. The Greek is ἀφανισθήσεται (Vulg., exterminabitur), "shall disappear" or "be put out of sight;" i.e. they shall perish soul and body (comp. v. 17 and i. 12). The teaching is neither so true, nor so wise, nor so just as that of Ezek. xviii. 14–20. The view of heredity in wickedness is cruelly exaggerated. Like South, the writer regards these unfortunates as having been not "born into the world," but "damned into the world."

17. For though.] ἐάν τε. In v. 18 the same phrase is rendered "or if." Neither rendering is quite accurate, nor is that of the Vulg., which in both cases has et si. Ἐάν τε, repeated, is used to represent the Hebrew אִם . . . אִם, and should be rendered simply "if . . . if" (or "whether" and "or," as in Deut. xviii. 3).

they live long.] The Greek adjective is in the masculine (μακρόβιοι), referring to the sons of adulterers. The substantive used in v. 16 was τέκνα, but the construction follows the sense (κατὰ σύνεσιν).

their last age.] Lit., "their old age at the last." For the general idea of the verse, see note on iv. 14.

18. quickly.] ὀξέως; lit., "sharply." Vulg. celerius, "before their time." See LXX., Is. viii. 3, where ὀξέως is a synonym of ταχέως.

they have no hope.] Unlike the righteous, who "hath hope in his end." The writer may have been thinking of that law of physical consequences by which, as a matter of

Digitized by Microsoft®

19 For horrible is the end of the unrighteous generation.

CHAPTER IV.

1 The chaste man shall be crowned. 3 Bastard slips shall not thrive. 6 They shall witness against their parents. 7 The just die young, and are happy. 19 The miserable end of the wicked.

BETTER it is to have no children, and to have virtue: for the memorial thereof is immortal: because it is ‖ known with God, and with men. ‖ Or, approved.

2 When it is present, men take example at it; and when it is gone, they desire it: [a] it weareth a crown, and triumpheth for ever, having gotten the victory, striving for undefiled rewards. [a] ch. 5. 16. James 1. 12. 1 Pet. 5. 4. Rev. 2. 10.

3 But the multiplying brood of the experience, the sins of the fathers are visited, even to the third and fourth generation, upon their children, alike in moral tendencies and in physical results. But he goes far beyond this, so that his language becomes both unmerciful and unwarrantable, as well as exaggerated.

of trial.] διαγνώσεως. The word only occurs in the N. T. in Acts xxv. 21 ("the decision of the Emperor"). It is not found in the LXX.

19. horrible.] Rather "grievous" (χαλεπά).

CHAPTER IV.

1-6. The childlessness of the virtuous involves a surer immortality than guilty fatherhood. 7-9. Better a short and righteous life than godless old age. 10-14. The truth illustrated by the example of Enoch. 15-20. The world, to its own terrible ruin, fails to learn the lesson.

1. Better.] It is better, it involves a loftier blessedness to be childless and virtuous than, as the Son of Sirach expresses it, "to have impious children" (Ecclus. xvi. 4).

to have virtue.] The Vulg., perhaps from a dogmatic bias towards celibate asceticism, paraphrases the clause by "O quam pulchra est casta generatio cum claritate." Ἀρετὴ here does not mean "chastity," but is a general name for manly virtue (2 Macc. vi. 31). In the LXX. the word is chiefly used for "glory" (Hab. iii. 2; Zech. vi. 15). In the N. T. it is rare (Phil. iv. 8; 2 Pet. i. 3, 5), because the ideal of the Christian is holiness, which is a deeper and richer grace than virtue.

is immortal.] It remains unforgotten, because it is progressively recognised (γινώσκεται) both with God and among men. The author may have read the famous apologue of the Choice of Hercules by Prodicus (Xen. 'Mem.' ii. 1. 33), where we find the expression "I am honoured most of all among gods and among men."

2. take example at it.] Literally, "imitate it." Another and weaker reading is τιμῶσι, "honour it." The "imitation" of holy examples is often inculcated in the N.T. (2 Thess. iii. 7; Heb. vi. 12, xiii. 7; 1 Cor. iv. 16, &c.).

they desire it.] ποθοῦσι, they regret and yearn for it. In this verse again we have the chiastic arrangement (see iii. 15) of which the writer is so fond. Instead of saying, "men imitate it when present, and regret it when absent," he arranges the words more rhetorically—

παροῦσάν τε μιμοῦνται αὐτὴν καὶ ποθοῦσιν ἀπελθοῦσαν—

where the emphatic participles begin and end the sentence. Compare—

"Virtutem sublatam ex oculis quaerimus invidi."
HOR.

"Virtutem videant intabescantque relicta."
JUV.

"Et sibi, jam seri, vitam ingenuere relictam."
VIRG.

it weareth a crown and triumpheth.] Virtue is represented as wearing the wreath of victory, and passing to the end of time in triumphal procession. The conception is Roman, not Jewish. Neither of the words (στεφανηφοροῦσα, πομπεύει) occurs in the LXX. or N. T.; but πομπεύω is used in 2 Macc. vi. 7, of a triumphal procession in honour of Bacchus.

for ever.] Lit., "in the aeon;" i.e. in the indefinite aeon which stretches beyond the grave. The word "aeon" is one which must generally be interpreted by the light shed on it by the context. For other uses of the word, see the notes on xiii. 9, xviii. 4.

having gotten the victory, striving for undefiled rewards.] More accurately, "having won the contest for the undefiled rewards" (taking ἄθλων as the genitive of ἆθλα, "prizes of victory"), or "in the undefiled struggles" (taking it as the genitive of ἆθλοι). This seems to be the meaning of the Vulg. "incoinquinatorum certaminum praemium vincens," where praemium vincens (if the reading be correct) is the rendering of νικήσασα. The "undefiled rewards" would mean "the amaranthine crown" (1 Pet. v. 4), "the unwithering and undefiled inheritance" (1 Pet. i. 4)—rewards untainted by any earthly pollution.

Digitized by Microsoft®

ungodly shall not thrive, nor take deep rooting from bastard slips, nor lay any fast foundation.

4 For though they flourish in branches for a time; [b] yet standing not fast, they shall be shaken with the wind, and through the force of winds they shall be rooted out.

5 The [c] imperfect branches shall be broken off, their fruit unprofitable, not ripe to eat, yea, meet for nothing.

6 For children begotten of unlawful ‖ beds are witnesses of wickedness against their parents in their trial.

7 But though the righteous be prevented with death, yet shall he be in rest.

8 For honourable age is not that which standeth in length of time, nor that is measured by number of years.

[b] Matt. 7. 19.

[c] ch. 3. 16.

‖ Gr. sleeps.

The "undefiled struggles" are contests in which we wrestle not with flesh and blood (Eph. vi. 11, 12), and in which there are no garments rolled in blood (Is. ix. 5). This seems to be the meaning intended; for such a view of "the battle of life" is found in many ancient writers. See Plato, 'Rep.' p. 621; Epictetus, 'Enchir.' 29. 2, &c.; Philo, 'De Migr. Abr.,' 6, "Thou hast proved thyself to me a perfect athlete, and hast been deemed worthy of prizes and wreaths, while Virtue arranges the contest and holds forth to thee the rewards of victory." The same illustration is frequent in 4 Macc. and in the N. T. See 1 Tim. vi. 12; 2 Tim. ii. 3, κακοπάθησον ὡς καλὸς στρατιώτης Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ; 1 Cor. ix. 25; 2 Tim. iv. 7.

3. shall not thrive.] Lit., "shall not be useful;" comp. iii. 16.

nor take deep rooting.] For the metaphor comp. Matt. xiii. 5; Eph. iii. 18.

from bastard slips.] The Greek word (μοσχεύματα) is rare. It is derived from μόσχος, "a shoot." The fact that μόσχος also means a calf (vitulus) seems to have led the Vulg. to render it vitulamina, a mistake which St. Augustine ('De doctr. Christ.' ii. 12) criticises, and which perhaps led to the alternative reading plantationes in some MSS. of the Vulg. The word occurs in Theophrastus and in Philo ('De agric.' iv.; 'De plant.' i.; 'De sobriet.' 8; 'De mut. nom.' 30), but not in the Bible lay.] The rare verb ἑδράζω occurs in the LXX. (Prov. viii. 25, &c.). The combination of the metaphor "rooted" and "founded" is found also in Col. ii. 7, ἐῤῥιζωμένοι καὶ ἐποικοδομούμενοι.

4. yet standing not fast.] The neut. plur. βεβηκότα agrees with μοσχεύματα. It might well seem to be an awkward expression as applied to trees; but in Hellenistic Greek βέβηκα means "I stand," as in xviii. 16. It nearly approaches this sense in classical Greek, as in ἀσφαλέως βεβηκώς, "standing steady." Archil. 52; οἱ ἐν τέλει βεβῶτες, "those in office," Hdt. ix. 106, &c.

they shall be rooted out.] A frequent scriptural metaphor: Deut. xxix. 28; Matt. xiii. 29, xv. 23; Jude 12, &c.

5. The imperfect branches.] The same image is developed in John xv. 2–6; Jude 12; Rom. xi. 17.

6. beds.] Lit. "sleeps," as in the marg. The same euphemism occurs in vii. 2, and is as old as Hom. ('Il.,' xviii. 433).

in their trial.] When the parents stand before the judgment-seat of God, their illegitimate children are witnesses against them. That the children of unhallowed unions are living witnesses to the sins of their parents is obvious; but this fact has no logical bearing on the crude generalisations of the two previous verses, which also occur in Ecclus. xxiii. 24, 25; xli. 5–7.

7–9. Early death no proof of God's displeasure.

7. be prevented with death.] I.e. should die before his time. The construction of φθάνω with the infin. instead of the participle (as in vi. 13) is rare, but not without parallel.

yet shall he be in rest.] Ἀνάπαυσις here has much the same meaning as εἰρήνη in iii. 3, and is contrasted with the "torment" of the ungodly. See Is. lvii. 1, 2. The rendering of the Vulgate (in refrigerio) seems to point to a reading ἀναψύξει, but there is no variation in the Greek manuscripts. It is unlikely that these general expressions correspond to any rigid or detailed system of eschatology in the mind of the writer, and it is idle to quote them as authorities for purgatory, the intermediate state, &c. At the best they only illustrate certain tendencies of Jewish opinion, and acquire no authority from their expression here.

8. For honourable age, &c.] The truth expressed in this verse has been already illustrated (see note on iii. 17). It is the commonplace "whom the gods love die young," to which Grimm, in his admirable note, adduces many parallels. The Therapeutae, according to Philo ('De Vit. contempt.' 8), only regarded those as "old" who were old in wisdom, however young in years; and he says

Digitized by Microsoft®

[d] Gen. 5. 24. Hebr. 11. 5. See Isai. 57. 1.

9 But wisdom is the gray hair unto men, and an unspotted life is old age.

10 [d] He pleased God, and was beloved of him: so that living among sinners he was translated.

11 Yea, speedily was he taken away, lest that wickedness should ('De Abraham.' 40) that the true elder is not he who is old in years, but in a laudable life. Menander says that "the character of some is aged by nature." Comp. Cic., 'De Fin.' iii., "Stoicis non videtur optabilior nec magis expetenda vita si sit longa quam si sit brevis;" Seneca, "Vita non quamdiu sed quam bene acta refert." Similar statements are quoted from Plutarch, Chrysostom, &c.

9. the gray hair.] Prov. xvi. 31: "The hoary head is a crown of glory, if it be found in the way of righteousness." A close parallel to this verse occurs in Cic. 'De Senect.' xviii. 62.

an unspotted life.] Ἀκηλίδωτος is a Philonian word ('De Nobilit.' 6, &c.) not found in the N. T., nor in the LXX. except in a dubious reading (Prov. xxv. 18), but having much the same meaning as ἀκέραιος, ἀμίαντος, ἄσπιλος, 1 Pet. i. 19.

is old age.] Lit. "the age of old-age" (Vulg. aetas senectutis). The awkwardness of the pleonasm led Bretschneider to give the word ἡλικία the meaning of "stature" (as in Matt. vi. 27; Lk. ii. 52), but that gives a less obvious sense to the phrase. ὁ τρόπος ἐνίων ἐστὶ τῇ φύσει γέρων (Menand.).

10–14. Illustration of the foregoing truth from the life of Enoch.

10. He pleased God, and was beloved of him.] Literally, "having proved himself to be well pleasing to God (εὐάρεστος Θεῷ), he was beloved by Him." There is a clear allusion to Gen. v. 24, εὐηρέστησεν Ἐνὼχ τῷ Θεῷ. It was needless to mention Enoch by name, because—as is proved by this among other tacit allusions as well as by the general line of argument—the writer is not directly addressing the heathen, but his own wavering or apostatising countrymen. The object of the Book of Wisdom resembles that of the Epistle to the Hebrews, except that the class to whom that epistle is addressed had not advanced so far on the road to apostasy and crime. Another reason why Enoch is not expressly named is that his case is treated as being typical, not isolated. The case of Enoch supplied the Jewish dogmatists with a scriptural proof that "length of days" was not an exceptionless blessing, and therefore that early death was no proof of guilt or of God's displeasure. The Son of Sirach says (Ecclus. xlix. 14), "Upon the earth was no man created like Enoch;" and in Midrash Tillin, f. 10. 2, he is one of the thirteen who were born circumcised. In the Book of Enoch (xii. 2) it is said that "all his action was with the holy ones and with the watchers during his life."

he was translated.] The word μετατίθεσθαι means "to be moved from one place to another," and then generally "to be transferred" or "altered" (Is. xxix. 17; Ecclus. vi. 10; 2 Macc. vii. 24; Acts vii. 16; Gal. i. 6). From the expression of the LXX. in Gen. v. 24, διότι μετέθηκεν αὐτὸν ὁ θεός (Vulg. tulit), it was normally used by later writers to describe the translation of Enoch, as in Ecclus. xliv. 16, Ἐνὼχ εὐηρέστησεν Κυρίῳ καὶ μετετέθη (al. ἀνελήφθη). The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews (xi. 5, πίστει Ἐνὼχ μετετέθη (Vulg., translatus est) τοῦ μὴ ἰδεῖν θάνατον) goes farther than any previous writer in implying that the "transference" of Enoch was something more than an early death. He is followed, as in so many instances, by Clemens Romanus (1 Cor. 9, μετετέθη καὶ οὐχ εὑρέθη αὐτοῦ θάνατος).

The writer of the Book of Genesis only says that Enoch "walked with God; and he (was) no more, for God had taken him away." This expression, as we see in the Book of Enoch and the Book of Jubilees, as well as in Talmudic traditions, was by the Jews interpreted to mean that Enoch, like Elijah, was exempted from death, the common lot of mankind. This view was somewhat timidly and tentatively introduced. Josephus ('Antt.' i. 3, § 4) uses the reserved expression ἀνέχωρησε πρὸς τὸ θεῖον. Philo speaks of his ἀποδημία ('De proem. ac poen.,' 3), and, after his fashion, volatilises everything into moral allegory, Enoch being regarded as a symbol of "repentance" ('De Abrah.' 3) and of νοῦς ('De Poster. Cain.' 11). The Koran says that Edrig ("the learned," i.e. Enoch) was "exalted to a high place." Theological speculation has greatly occupied itself with questions as to the manner of his "translation," and the exact place to which he was removed. For such speculations there are no grounds; but we may mention the common view of ancient commentators that Enoch and Elijah are "the two witnesses" of Rev. xi. 3. [For further information, see the learned article of Prof. Westcott in Smith's 'Dict.' s. v. Enoch.] The notion of Noack and others that we have the veiled allusion of a Christian writer to the Ascension of Christ may be dismissed without further notice. It is on a par with the numerous other fanciful inferences and vagaries of the same writer.

11. Yea, speedily was he taken away.] The original only has the word ἡρπάγη (an un-alter his understanding, or deceit beguile his soul.

Digitized by Microsoft®

12 For the bewitching of naughtiness doth obscure things that are honest; and the wandering of concupiscence doth ‖ undermine the simple mind.

13 He, being made ‖ perfect in a short time, fulfilled a long time:

14 For his soul pleased the Lord:

‖ Gr. pervert.

‖ Or, sanctified, or, consummated, Hebr. 12. 23.

classical aorist for ἡρπάσθη; see Veitch, 'Gk. Verbs,' p. 90); Vulg. raptus est. It is used to indicate something miraculous or due to direct divine agency, in Enoch's departure (comp. Acts viii. 38; 1 Thess. iv. 17; 2 Cor. xii. 2; Rev. xii. 5). At the same time it is implied that the early death of the righteous is not so much death as translation.

should alter.] Namely, "for the worse," as the context implies, not the word itself (xii. 10).

his understanding.] σύνεσιν, his spiritual insight.

deceit.] Usually in the N. T. of human treachery: 1 Thess. ii. 3; Acts xiii. 10, &c.

beguile his soul.] Comp. Eph. v. 6; 1 Tim. ii. 14; Heb. iii. 13. The general thought is the same as in that which is often attributed to Is. lvii. 1: "The righteous is taken away from the evil to come." The meaning of that verse may, however, be different: "the righteous is swept away by the advancing tide of calamity," or "from the evils which encompass him."

12. the bewitching of naughtiness.] The writer is evidently fond of sonorous, picturesque, and unusual expressions. Βασκανία (Vulg. fascinatio) is used of the sorcery of the evil eye, 4 Macc. i. 26; Ecclus. xiv. 6, 8. In Scripture this notion is found in Deut. xxviii. 54, Prov. xxiii. 6; and it is alluded to in Gal. iii. 1. Φαυλότης, lit. "cheapness" (vilitas), here rendered by the Vulg. nugacitas, does not occur in the LXX. or N.T., though the adj. φαῦλος is used by Jas. iii. 16, &c.

doth obscure things that are honest.] The meaning is that the false glamour of worldliness throws a shadow over moral beauty. The word ἀμαυρόω was used by Greek philosophers to express this darkening of the moral sense.

the wandering.] Ῥεμβασμὸς is another unusual word, unknown to the LXX. or N. T. It means "giddiness," "vertigo" (Vulg. inconstantia). ῥεμβὸν means "a sling." The cognate verbs are found in Prov. vii. 12; Is. xxiii. 16 (LXX.); and ῥεμβὰς is applied to a drunken woman in some MSS. in Ecclus. xxvi. 8. Marc. Aurelius (ii. 7) says παύσαι ῥεμβόμενος; and Seneca says, "Does not a cyclone (turbo) whirl (rotat) your minds round and round?" ('De Vit. beat.,' 28.) The word may be illustrated by the passage of Dante ('Infern.' III. v. 31), which describes the undecided souls who are whirled round the confines of hell and follow the giddy fluttering of the sooty flag:—

> "La bufera infernal che mai non resta
> Mena gli spiriti con la sua rapina > Voltando e percontendo li molesta."

doth undermine.] μεταλλεύει. The A. V. here adroitly covers by a happy analogy what appears to be a simple mistake, into which the writer has been led by his fondness for unusual words. He clearly means to say that "the giddiness of sensual passion perverts the harmless mind," as is suggested in the margin (Vulg. transvertit). That this is the meaning is shewn by μεταλλευομένη ("altered") in xvi. 25; but this should be expressed by μεταλλοιόω, not by μεταλλεύω, which only means "I mine," as in Deut. viii. 9, ἐκ τῶν ὀρέων αὐτῆς μεταλλεύσεις χαλκόν. Such errors are not uncommon in later and especially in Hellenistic Greek. Thus in Mk. xii. 4, ἐκεφαλαίωσαν is used for "killed" (as though by a blow on the head), but it properly means "summed up." The truth that the effects of evil surroundings (1 Cor. xv. 33) are disastrous, is one which needs no further illustration. Perhaps the writer took Is. lvii. 1 in the sense "the righteous is taken away from the wickedness about him."

13. being made perfect in a short time.] Vulg., consummatus. Marg., "being sanctified" or "consummated." Philo speaks of the soul "perfected in the contests of virtue, and which has reached to the limit of the good." Enoch lived 365 years, which was "a short time" compared with the lives of other Antediluvian patriarchs.

fulfilled a long time.] In a brief life he consummated the work of a long life. Similarly St. Ambrose in his funeral sermon on Theodosius says, Perfecta est aetas ubi perfecta est virtus. Mr. Deane quotes Hooker's application of this verse to Edward VI. ('Eccl. Pol.' iv. 14, § 7); so, too,

> "Dum numerat palmas credidit esse senem."
> MART.

The clause (as Mr. Blunt says) derives fresh interest as having been selected by the Queen to inscribe on the monument near Balmoral, "To the beloved memory of Albert, the great and good."

14. hasted he to take him away.] Vulg., properavit educere illum. This can hardly be the therefore hasted he to take him away from among the wicked.

Digitized by Microsoft®

15 This the people saw, and understood it not, neither laid they up [e] ch. 3 9. this in their minds, [e] That his grace and mercy is with his saints, and that he hath respect unto his chosen.

16 Thus the righteous that is dead
[f] Matt. 12. 41. 42. shall [f] condemn the ungodly which are living; and youth that is soon perfected the many years and old age of the unrighteous.

17 For they shall see the end of the wise, and shall not understand what God in his counsel hath decreed of him, and to what end the Lord hath set him in safety.

18 They shall see him, and despise him; but God shall laugh them to scorn: and they shall hereafter be sense of ἔσπευσεν, since the accus. is not expressed. The word more probably means, "he hastened," or "it (his soul) hastened from the midst of wickedness." Grimm quotes parallels to the thought that a speedy death is a sign of God's approval, from Hom. 'Od.' xv. 244, f, g; Menander, ὃν γὰρ θεοὶ φιλοῦσιν ἀποθνήσκει νεός; Plaut. 'Bacch.' iv. 7. 18, Quem dii diligunt adolescens moritur. The list of illustrations might be largely increased, e.g.:

"Ostendent terris hunc tantum fata neque ultra esse sinent."—VIRG. Aen. vi. 870.

"In short measures life may perfect be."
BEN JONSON.

"The good die early,
And they whose hearts are dry as summer dust
Burn to the socket."—SHAKSPEARE.

"'Whom the gods love die young,' was said of yore."—BYRON.

"Man's life is measured by the work, not days:
Not aged sloth, but active youth, hath praise."
Epitaph on Francis Holles in Westminster Abbey.

15-20. The fate of the godless.

15. This the people saw, and understood it not.] Rather, "the peoples." The instance of Enoch has only been treated as generic. Others of the godly have similarly passed away, prematurely as men suppose, and their heathen or godless neighbours fail to see the explanation of their early death. "The peoples" in the LXX. is used for גּוֹיִם. This sentence in the original is an anakoluthon, i.e. it is left unfinished: "But the peoples seeing and not perceiving," &c. The finite verb εἰσι cannot be supplied, because the negative is μὴ not οὐ (since they perceived not, &c.).

this.] Lit., "such a fact as this;" namely, the truth which follows, "that His grace is with His saints." See note on iii. 9.

he hath respect.] See note on ii. 20.

16. that is dead.] The half-poetic euphemism καμὼν (lit., "weary," and then "having finished the work of life;" comp. xv. 9) is probably the right reading for the θανὼν of some MSS. The antithesis between the "dead" and the "living" shews that the "condemnation" here alluded to is not future punishment, but the disgrace reflected on wicked lives by the contrast which they present to the lives of those who have lived in God's faith and fear (comp. Matt. xii. 41; Heb. xi. 7).

perfected.] See note on v. 13.

the many years and old age.] Literally, "the many-yeared age." The epithet is not a superfluous or poetic addition, but is intended to contrast the old age which is reckoned by years with the old age which consists in wisdom (v. 9). "Wisdom is justified of her children" in every sense of the phrase.

17. For they shall see.] The future tense, like the aorist, is used to express normal and recurrent facts. What has been will be. It also serves to introduce the prophecies which follow.

of the wise.] The "wise" and the "righteous" are interchangeable terms (see v. 16).

to what end the Lord hath set him in safety.] Vulg., quare munierit illum. God "set the wise in security" by taking him from the seductive sorcery of the wickedness around him (vv. 11, 12).

18. shall laugh them to scorn.] They scorn the righteous; God, by "shewing all things in the slow history of their ripening," mocks at them: Ps. ii. 4, xxxvi. 13. The word ἐκγελᾶν does not occur in the N. T., but "laugh to scorn" is the rendering of καταγελάω, Mk. v. 40, &c.

hereafter.] In the world beyond the grave. Compare the magnificent passage of Isaiah about the King of Tyre (Is. xiv. 4–20).

a vile carcase.] This is the literal and probably the best rendering of εἰς πτῶμα ἄτιμον, which the Vulgate weakens into "erunt post haec decidentes sine honore." Others take πτῶμα to mean "a fallen fruit:" but there is an allusion to Is. xiv. 19; Jer. xxii. 19.

a reproach among the dead.] Is. xiv. 9–12; Ezek. xxxii. 24, 25.

for evermore.] δι' αἰῶνος. One of the phrases a vile carcase, and a reproach among the dead for evermore.

Digitized by Microsoft®

19 For he shall rend them, and cast them down headlong, that they shall be speechless; and he shall shake them from the foundation; and they shall be utterly laid waste, and be in sorrow; and their memorial shall perish.

‖ Or, to the casting up of the account.

20 And ‖ when they cast up the accounts of their sins, they shall come with fear: and their own iniquities shall convince them to their face.

CHAPTER V.

1 The wicked shall wonder at the godly, 4 and confess their error, 5 and the vanity of their lives. 15 God will reward the just, 17 and war against the wicked.

THEN shall the righteous man stand in great boldness before which the Jews used to express their vague conceptions of continuous time: Deut. v. 29; Is. lx. 21, &c. The phrases here used are ambiguous, as in i. 12, ii. 25, iii. 1; but they imply a retributive living-death after the death of the body.

19. he shall rend them.] The verse, expressed in the fiercest Jewish spirit, is a general and rhetorical threat of retribution. Ῥήξει, properly "He shall break," seems to be used by mistake in the sense of ῥάξει, "He shall hurl them down" (Jer. xxiii. 39; Is. ix. 11; Suid., ῥάξαι ἀντὶ τοῦ καταβαλεῖν), as also in Is. xiii. 16. The writer may have been thinking of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, who "laid him down upon his bed and fell sick for grief," 1 Macc. vi. 8–16. But if the writer belongs to the era of Caligula, the verse may equally well refer to the terrible fate of Flaccus, the persecutor of the Jews at Antioch, which is narrated with too unseemly pleasure by Philo ('c. Flaccum,' ad fin.): "And when his corpse was dragged into the trench which had been dug, the greater part of the limbs separated from the body." that they shall be speechless.] Matt. xxii. 12.

be in sorrow.] The metaphors of the uprooted tree, and the shaken building, and the wasted land are here dropped. The "anguish" of their future is contrasted with the "peace" and "rest" of the righteous (iii. 1; iv. 7).

their memorial shall perish.] As they had themselves anticipated, ii. 4.

20. when they cast up the accounts of their sins.] Lit., at the reckoning of their sins. Something more seems to be meant than the appearance of the sinner before the bar of his own conscience. Every man who sins

> "Ever bears about
> A silent bar of judgment in himself,
> Himself the judge and jury, and himself
> The prisoner at the bar, ever condemned;
> And that drags down his life."

The expressions of the writer are general, and apply both to the retributions of this life and to those beyond the grave.

with fear.] Lit., "as cowards." The word is placed with emphasis at the end of the clause. See Prov. xiii. 5 (LXX.).

their own iniquities.] They are confronted by the personified reality of their past misdeeds.

shall convince them to their face.] For the verb ἐλέγξει, see notes on i. 3, 5.

to their face.] Psalm l. 21. "Some men's sins are open, going before to judgment, and some they follow after." 1 Tim. v. 24. Comp. Luke xix. 22; Matt. xii. 37.

CHAPTER V.

1–5. Astonishment of the wicked at the joy and glory of the righteous. 6. Their remorse. 7–12. Their confession of the emptiness of their gains; 14, which the writer confirms. 15–16. Immortality of the righteous under the protecting care of God. 17–23. His panoply of righteousness and His wrath against the wicked.

1. Then.] What is the crisis contemplated by the writer in describing this scene of judgment? Böttcher ('De Inferis,' § 497) follows St. Augustine and many of the older commentators in referring it to the last great day. We do not, however, find any such conception elsewhere in the book. Others again suppose it to be a promise of the final triumph of the ideal Israel, and the vindication of righteousness in some earthly future of theocratic vengeance and triumph. It may be doubted whether more is intended than the dramatic illustration of the eternal principle which has found expression in so many proverbs. "Magna est veritas et praevalebit."

> "Truth crushed to earth shall rise again,
> The eternal years of God are hers;
> But Error wounded writhes in vain,
> And dies among her worshippers."

"Justice and Truth alone endure and live. Injustice and Falsehood may be long-lived, but doomsday comes to them in the end."—FROUDE.

The writer's conception of the circumstances which shall secure the triumph of Wisdom and the justification of her by all her children must of course have been coloured both by the Messianic promises of the prophets and by the eschatological beliefs of his own age; his object, however, is not to the face of such as have afflicted him, and made no account of his labours.

Digitized by Microsoft®

2 When they see it, they shall be troubled with terrible fear, and shall be amazed at the strangeness of his salvation, so far beyond all that they looked for.

3 And they repenting and groaning for anguish of spirit shall say within themselves, This was he, whom we had sometimes in derision, and a ‖ proverb of reproach:

‖ Or, parable.

4 [a] We fools accounted his life madness, and his end to be without honour:

[a] ch. 3. 2.

5 How is he numbered among the children of God, and his lot is among the saints!

systematise eschatology, nor to enter into details of the unknown future, but to produce an impressive conviction that Righteousness alone is immortal and blessed.

in great boldness.] Παῤῥησία means "boldness of speech," which is contrasted with the terrified speechlessness (ἀφώνους) and depression of the guilty (iv. 19; v. 3). See Eph. iii. 12; 1 Tim. iii. 13; Heb. iii. 6, iv. 16. It is the feeling which the wicked cannot have (Prov. xiii. 5, οὐχ ἕξει παῤῥησίαν, LXX.).

before the face of.] The frequency of such expressions (κατὰ πρόσωπον, ἐνάντιον, ἐνώπιον, ἐξεναντίας, iv. 19) is due to the pictorial Hebrew phrase לִפְנֵי.

and made no account.] Rather, "and who set at nought." The aorist θλιψάντων refers to special acts of cruelty and inflicted martyrdom (ii. 10, 12, 19); the present ἀθετούντων (1 Thess. iv. 8; Heb. x. 28) points to an habitual attitude of contempt (ii. 16–20). Vulg. qui abstulerunt labores eorum. Cyprian, "qui diripuerunt labores eorum." But the word ἀθετεῖν cannot bear the meaning of "plundering."

his labours.] The "labours" referred to are those which the righteous spend in the struggle for eternal life (iv. 2) and at which the ungodly sneer.

2. When they see it.] The aorist (ἰδόντες) implies a flash of sudden revelation. The unexpressed accusative (A. V. "it") is the "confidence" (παῤῥησία) of the righteous. The wicked have exhibited a boundless self-confidence on earth (ii. 1-20), but now that is silenced in a moment, and they can find no language but that of bitter self-reproach.

with terrible fear.] Comp. iv. 20 (δειλοί).

of his salvation.] Of the deliverance of the righteous from earthly anguish, and his elevation to fearlessness and joy in the presence of God. Comp. Luke xvi. 23, 25.

so far beyond all that they looked for.] A cumbrous addition of the A. V. to bring out the force of the word τῷ παραδόξῳ, "the unexpectedness."

3. repenting.] To draw from this word the inference that repentance after death is futile is to read into the verse the afterthoughts of theology. It is not even certain that the writer has definitely or exclusively in view the life beyond the grave. He is only illustrating the general fact that "truth seen too late" is itself a hell.

anguish of spirit.] Στενοχωρία means severe pressure and contraction: Rom. ii. 9; 2 Cor. vi. 4; 4 Macc. xi. 11.

shall say within themselves.] Rather, "shall say among themselves," "shall say to one another." The following verses (3–13) are not the soliloquy of the ungodly, but their confession (comp. ii. 1). It is as public as was the vaunting of their earthly insolence (ii. 1–20), to which this passage forms the tragic counterpart. The structure of the book is throughout balanced and artistic.

in derision.] Lit., "for a laughter;" i.e., as a subject of laughter.

a proverb of reproach.] The word παραβολή sometimes means "a proverb," LXX. Psalm xliii. 16; Jer. xxiv. 9; Eccles. i. 17; Tobit iii. 4. We find instances of such abbreviated parables in Matt. xxiv. 32; Luke iv. 23, vi. 39, &c.: and in the O. T., 1 Sam. x. 12; 1 Kings xx. 11, &c.

4. We fools.] See note on iii. 12. The word ἄφρονες is here used in the same sense as in Luke xi. 40, xii. 20.

madness.] In the N. T., the only place where the word μανία occurs is Acts xxvi. 24, where Festus charges St. Paul with madness. A similar reproach was addressed to our Lord himself (John x. 20).

his end to be without honour.] These now remorseful wretches had themselves inflicted on the righteous "a shameful death" (ii. 20). As Christ died upon the cross of shame, "the accursed tree," so many of His martyrs have perished—like Savonarola, Huss, and Cranmer—amid extreme ignominy and execration, accepting in perfect faith an apparently final failure.

5. among the children of God.] Rather, "among sons of God." The term does not refer to angels, but to the best and truest men. Comp. ii. 16, 18. The ungodly see the righteous standing in the very relation towards God at which they had so contemptuously sneered.

6 Therefore have we erred from the way of truth, and the light of righteousness hath not shined unto us, and the sun of righteousness rose not upon us.

‖ Or, filled ourselves, or, surfeited.

7 We ‖ wearied ourselves in the way of wickedness and destruction: yea, we have gone through deserts, where there lay no way: but as for the way of the Lord, we have not known it.

8 What hath pride profited us? or what good hath riches with our vaunting brought us?

9 All those things are [b] passed away like a shadow, and as a post that hasted by;

[b] 1 Chron. 29. 15. ch. 2. 5.

10 And [c] as a ship that passeth

[c] Prov. 30 19.

his lot is among the saints!] Comp. Dan. xii. 13; Acts xxvi. 18, τοῦ λαβεῖν αὐτοὺς . . . κλῆρον ἐν τοῖς ἡγιασμένοις.

6. Therefore.] Ἄρα. The word is classical as an expression of extreme surprise, but is unclassically placed first in the sentence. The light of conviction is now flashed for the first time upon sensual and deluded souls.

from the way of truth.] Comp. xii. 24; 2 Pet. ii. 2, 21. "The way" was, among early Christians, a synonym for Christianity: Acts ix. 2; xviii. 25; xix. 9, 23, &c.

the light of righteousness.] We have the same natural metaphor in 2 Sam. xxii. 29; John xii. 35; 2 Cor. iv. 6, and constantly in Scripture.

the sun of righteousness.] Mal. iv. 2, LXX.

7. We wearied ourselves.] Vulg. lassati sumus. Rather, "we were sated," or, in the middle sense, "we surfeited ourselves."

in the way of . . . destruction.] Matt. vii. 13, "broad is the way that leadeth to destruction." Comp. Psalm xvii. 4. There is a not uncommon confusion of metaphors in the verb and substantive (ἐνεπλήσθημεν τρίβοις) of this clause: Prov. i. 31; Psalm cvi. 40.

we have gone through deserts, where there lay no way.] Comp. Jer. xii. 10. The symmetry of the original would have been better kept by a briefer version:

"Yea, we traversed pathless wildernesses,
But the way of the Lord we recognised not."

8. pride.] Rather, "our haughtiness." Ὑπερηφανία is a strong word, which in the N.T. is only found in Mark vii. 22, though the adjective occurs five times (see 2 Tim. iii. 2; 1 Pet. v. 5). In the Apocrypha it is twice applied to the people of Sodom (Ecclus. xvi. 9; 3 Macc. ii. 5). It means a violent and contumelious bearing, whereas ἀλαζονεία means a braggart vaunt.

with our vaunting.] Ἀλαζονεία, "braggart vaunting," is only found twice in the N.T.: James iv. 16; 1 John ii. 16. In Job xxviii. 8 (LXX.) υἱοὶ ἀλαζόνων is used for "lions' whelps."

The verses 9-12 are composed of similes to describe the emptiness and evanescence of earthly pride and wealth. They have been much admired for their eloquence, and the separate pictures have great beauty. They are, however, singularly undramatic and out of place, when put into the mouth of the terror-stricken and agonised herd of sinners who for the first time perceive that their lives have been a criminal failure. The rhetoric is chiefly phraseological and on the surface. It wants the unity and concentration of the highest imaginative genius, and rings a little hollow. Grimm justly remarks that real depth of feeling would hardly shew itself in this piling up of elaborate metaphors. The delineation serves, he says, as a proof that, even among the nobler of the more cultivated Jews of this period, religion was much more a matter of intellectual study than of deep moral experience. Dante would have expressed more, and exercised a greater power over the imagination, by a single intense line. We find a similar coacervation of metaphors in the speech of Clytemnestra in the 'Agamemnon' of Aeschylus (865–870); and the poet, with exquisite psychological insight, uses it as an indication of her insincerity. In that speech Clytemnestra pauses in the middle of her comparisons and begins again, exactly as is the case in v. 15.

9. All those things are passed away.] The more emphatic order of the Greek is, "Passed are all those things." The same verb is used in ii. 4. What they had then lightly said as an excuse for self-indulgence is now bitterly felt as an aggravation of remorse. Compare the fine lines of Mr. Browning:—

"Time fleets, youth fades, life is an empty dream.
It is the echo of time, and he whose heart Beat first beneath a human breast, whose speech Was copied from a human tongue, can never Recall when he was living and knew not this.
Nevertheless long seasons pass o'er him
Till some one hour's experience shews what nothing,
It seemed, could clearer shew; and ever after An altered brow, and eye, and gait, and speech
Attest that now he knows the adage true,
'Time fleets, youth fades, life is an empty dream.'"—Paracelsus.

Digitized by Microsoft®

over the waves of the water, which when it is gone by, the trace thereof cannot be found, neither the pathway of the keel in the waves;

[d] Prov. 30. 19. ‖ Or, flieth.

11 [d] Or as when a bird ‖ hath flown through the air, there is no token of her way to be found, but the light air being beaten with the stroke of her wings, and parted with the violent noise and motion of them, is passed through, and therein afterwards no sign where she went is to be found;

12 Or like as when an arrow is shot at a mark, it parteth the air, which immediately cometh together again, so that a man cannot know where it went through:

13 Even so we in like manner, as soon as we were born, began to draw like a shadow.] See ii. 5; 1 Chron. xxix. 15.

as a post that hasted by.] The A. V. follows the Vulg. in taking ἀγγελία as equivalent to ἄγγελος (tanquam nuntius percurrens); but the sense is more forcible if we give to ἀγγελία the sense of rumour, as in 2 Sam. iv. 4. See Job viii. 9; ix. 25.

10. as a ship that passeth over the waves of the water.] Rather, "cleaving the swelling water." The metaphor is original and beautiful, but may have been partly suggested by Prov. xxx. 19.

of the keel.] The poetic genitive τρόπιος is used for the Attic τροπέως, and there is a very artificial assonance in ἀτραπὸν τρόπιος, which Grimm renders "Den Weg seiner Bewegung." The word does not occur in either Testament.

11. as when a bird hath flown through the air.] The "flieth" of the margin is better. The whole gist of the simile is in these words. The rest is simply pictorial. Comp. Tennyson's—

"And light
As flies the shadow of a bird she fled."
The Princess.

being beaten.] Comp.

"Some dolorous message bound beneath The wild pulsation of her wings."
TENNYSON, In Memoriam.

And Shelley speaks of wings

"Winnowing the crimson dawn."

of her wings.] ταρσῶν. Lit., "alar bones"—i.e. expanded wings. The word is also used of the flat blade of an oar.

parted.] Lit., "rent." Comp. Neh. i. 10.

"Illa levem fugiens raptim secat aethera pennis."
VIRG. Georg. i. 410.

with the violent noise and motion of them.] Lit., "with the force of the hurtling of her beating wings."

no sign.] Σημεῖον and τεκμήριον are here used as practically synonymous. For their technical meaning, see Arist. 'Rhet.' i. 2, § 17.

is to be found.] The aorists in this verse are the usual gnomic aorists, which are poetically varied with presents (εὑρίσκεται . . . εὑρέθη). Solomon (Prov. xxx. 19) speaks of "the way of an eagle in the air, the way of a ship in the midst of the sea."

12. immediately cometh together again.] ἀνελύθη. Lit., "is immediately resolved into itself." As this meaning of ἀναλύω is found in later Greek, there is no need to alter the reading, though the expression is somewhat fantastic.

13. Even so we.] Here we have a second apodosis. The series of similes which has been introduced to illustrate the evanescence of earthly joys, is now applied to the disappearance of the wicked themselves.

in like manner, as soon as we were born, began to draw to our end.] The A.V. throughout this book has a tendency to over-wordiness, and here has missed the meaning. It would be as true of the godly as of the ungodly that from birth onwards they were drawing towards their end. Render "So also we were born, and disappeared." The meaning is that in their case birth and death seemed almost synchronous, since their wicked life was no life, but only a living death. The better reading is not the imperf. ἐξελείπομεν, but the aorist ἐξελίπομεν. Vulg. desivimus esse. Comp. Lk. xvi. 9, ὅταν ἐκλίπητε, "when ye die."

no sign of virtue.] They had their "tokens of mirthfulness" (ii. 9) and their "memorial of foolishness" to shew,—if they were anything.

"Haec habui quae edi quaeque exsaturata voluptas Hausit; at illa manent pulcra et praeclara relicta."
CICERO (from the Greek).

See note on ii. 9.

were consumed.] I.e. were utterly spent. The word does not occur in the O. or N. T., but is found in Bel and the Dragon, 21.

Here ends the self-reproach of the ungodly. The Vulgate has no authority for the addition Talia dixerunt in inferno hi qui peccave- to our end, and had no sign of virtue to shew; but were consumed in our own wickedness.

14 [e] For the hope of the ungodly is like ‖ dust that is blown away with the wind; like a thin froth that is driven away with the storm; like as the ‖ smoke which is [f] dispersed here and there with a tempest, and passeth away as the remembrance of a guest that tarrieth but a day.

15 But the righteous live for evermore; [g] their reward also is with the Lord, and the care of them is with the most High.

16 Therefore shall they receive a glorious ‖ kingdom, and [h] a beautiful crown from the Lord's hand: for with his right hand shall he cover them, and with his arm shall he protect them.

17 [i] He shall take to him his jealousy for complete armour, and make the creature his weapon for the revenge of his enemies.

18 He shall put on righteousness

[e] Job 8. 14.
‖ Gr. thistle-down.
‖ Or, chaff.
[f] Ps. 1. 4. & 103. 16. Prov. 10. 25. & 11. 7. James 1. 10, 11.
[g] Gen. 15. 1. Rev. 22. 12.
‖ Or, palace: unless the word be taken improperly, as 2 Mac. 2. 17.
[h] ch. 4. 2. 2 Tim. 4. 8. Rev. 4. 4. & 9. 7.
[i] Isai. 59. 16, 17.

runt, which no doubt came from a marginal gloss. The words in inferno are an unauthorised addition.

14. For.] These remorseful acknowledgments are just, for, &c.

the hope.] Abstract for concrete, meaning "that on which they set their hope."

dust.] This might be the rendering of χοῦς, as in Mk. vi. 11, "the dust of your feet;" Gen. ii. 7, &c. The undoubted reading is χνοῦς, "chaff" (Hos. xiii. 3, &c.), "thistle-down," like what the Psalmist calls "a wheel" or "rolling thing," i.e. a winged seed driven by the wind. Vulg. lanugo. Comp. Job xxi. 18.

froth.] Πάχνη, the best-supported reading, means "rhime" or hoar frost, Job xxxviii. 24, which does not, however, suit the comparison. Hence some MSS. read ἄχνη (comp. Hom. 'Il.,' v. 499, ὡς δ' ἄνεμος ἄχνας φορέει), and some ἀράχνη, "a spider's web" (comp. Ps. lxxxix. 9). It is not impossible that the writer gave to πάχνη some such sense, or that he meant "snow." The word is used for "smoke" in Ps. cxix. 83. If English poets can mistake the meaning of words in their own language (as Byron misunderstood the words "ruth" and "kibe"), a Hellenistic Jew may be excused for such errors. The tendency to use (and sometimes misuse) uncommon words is often found in writers who are not using their native language (e.g. in Hindoo English).

smoke.] The marginal reading "chaff" of the A.V. seems to be accidentally misplaced. At any rate, καπνὸς can have no such meaning.

of a guest that tarrieth but a day.] κατα-λύτου μονοημέρου. Both words are rare. The former occurs in Polybius and Plutarch; the latter only in the 'Batrachomyomachia.'

15. But the righteous live for evermore.] This and the following verse are devoted to the rewards of the righteous, but the writer is far more copious and eloquent in dwelling on retribution than on reward, and he reverts almost immediately to the topics of wrath and punishment. The word "live" is here used in its high spiritual sense. Comp. 1 John ii. 18.

with the Lord.] The phrase ἐν Κυρίῳ occurs constantly in the N.T. to express the relation of the soul to God.

16. Therefore.] As a consequence of God's care for them.

a glorious kingdom.] The word βασίλειον might also mean "a crown" (2 Sam. i. 10) or "a palace" (Prov. xviii. 19); but probably the meaning here intended is "kingdom," as in 2 Macc. ii. 17. "The kingdom of splendour" is heaven (Ps. xcii. 1, LXX.). See x. 10; xviii. 15.

a beautiful crown.] The "diadem" was a band of purple silk sewn with pearls, the symbol of Oriental royalty. Comp. Is. xxviii. 5; 2 Tim. iv. 8; 1 Pet. v. 4.

shall he cover them.] Comp. xix. 8.

with his arm shall he protect.] Lit., "hold the shield over them," and so "fight for them:" 2 K. xix. 34; Prov. ii. 7, ὑπερασπιστής; Ps. xvii. 3.

> "From marge to blue marge
> The whole heaven grew his targe,
> With the Sun's self for visible boss,
> While an arm ran across,
> Which the earth heaved beneath like a breast,
> Where the wretch was close pressed."
>
> BROWNING, Instans Tyrannus.

17. his jealousy.] Comp. i. 10. The word implies a love which shews itself in fiery anger against all who would wrong the person loved.

for complete armour.] πανοπλίαν, Eph. vi. 11; Ecclus. xlvi. 8. The idea of the passage is found in Is. lix. 16–19; Ezek. xxxviii. 21–23.

make the creature his weapon.] He shall make the whole creation subserve the purposes of His retributive anger. Something of the same conception is found in Judg. v. 20, where "the stars in their courses" fought against Sisera, and the river Kishon swept away his army. Comp. Ecclus. xxxix. 29, as a breastplate, and true judgment instead of an helmet.

Digitized by Microsoft®

19 He shall take ‖holiness for an invincible shield.

20 His severe wrath shall he sharpen for a sword, and the world shall fight with him against the unwise.

21 Then shall the right aiming thunderbolts go abroad; and from the clouds, as from a well drawn bow, shall they fly to the mark.

22 And hailstones full of wrath shall be cast as out of a stone bow, and the water of the sea shall rage against them, and the floods shall cruelly drown them.

23 Yea, a mighty wind shall stand up against them, and like a storm shall blow them away: thus iniquity

‖ Or, equity.

30: "Fire, and hail, and famine, and death, all these were created for vengeance," &c. The thought is found also in Philo ('Vit. Mos.' i. 17), "The elements of the universe, earth and water and fire, are set in motion, when God thinks fit that the land of the impious should be destroyed;" and in Josephus ('Antt.' ii. 13, § 4), "To those who will stir against themselves the divine anger, things terrible are produced from all things; neither is the earth friendly to them, nor the air, nor are the births of children natural, but all things are inimical and hostile."

18. righteousness.] Meaning here God' avenging justice. This passage was probably in the mind of St. Paul when he described the Christian's armour, Eph. vi. 11–17, 1 Thess. v. 8.

true judgment.] Judgment unfeigned, i.e. without respect of persons. See the use of the word in Rom. xii. 9; 1 Tim. i. 5, &c. Hesych. ἀπροσωπόληπτος. Comp. xviii. 6.

19. holiness.] Vulg. aequitatem. Marg. "equity." The meaning, however, is "that holiness of God against which all reproaches and opposition are hurled in vain."

invincible.] Ἀκαταμάχητον is another of the sonorous words which had attractiveness for the writer, but which does not occur in the O. or N. T. It is found in Pseudo-Lucian (Philopatris) and Marc. Aurelius.

20. His severe wrath.] The A. V. does not notice the δὲ of the original, which contrasts the defensive with the offensive arms. The word for "severe" is ἀπότομος, lit. "abrupt," "precipitous" (Lat. abscisus), and then "inexorable" (vi. 5; xi. 10; xviii. 15). The substantive occurs once in the N. T., Rom. xi. 22: and the adverb in 2 Cor. xiii. 10; Tit. i. 13.

for a sword.] Comp. Rev. ii. 16.

the world.] That is, all created elements, as in v. 17.

shall fight with him.] A double compound verb, συνεκπολεμήσει, "shall go forth with him to fight."

the unwise.] παράφρονας. The word differs from ἄφρονας (amentes) in implying perverted intelligence (dementes).

21. right-aiming thunderbolts.] Lit., "right-aiming darts (comp. Heb. xii. 30) of lightnings." The language recalls that of Hab. iii., but is far less intense and simple. Comp. Ps. vii. 13.

well-drawn.] I.e. stretched to its full curve (Luther, hart gespannt). The A.V. takes τῶν νεφῶν in apposition to εὐκύκλου τόξου, but the figure is more startling and more in accordance with the writer's style if we render it "from the well-drawn bow of the clouds" (Vulg., a bene curvato arcu nubium).

shall they fly.] Lit., "they shall leap"—a metaphoric expression as old as Homer ('Il.' iv. 125).

22. And hailstones . . . bow.] The best way to take the words is, "And from the stone-bow of His wrath dense hailstones shall be hurled." If θυμοῦ be taken in agreement with πετροβόλου, as is done by the Vulg. (a petrosa ira), "from His stone-hurling wrath," God's wrath is described as a weapon; whereas in the other clauses some attribute of God is compared to a weapon. Wrath is His balista or catapult (1 Sam. xiv. 14, LXX.). The word πληρεῖς means "thick-flying," "not intermittent." Comp. Ex. ix. 23; Jos. x. 11; Is. xxviii. 2, 17; Rev. viii. 7, &c.

the water of the sea.] A frequent metaphor to imply terror and ruin (Ps. xviii. 16, &c.; Lk. xxi. 25), but with a special allusion to the overthrow of Pharaoh and his host in the Red Sea.

the floods shall cruelly drown them.] Here we have another marked instance of the fantastic or artificial paronomasia which pleased the ear of the writer—ποταμοὶ . . . ἀποτόμως. The rare verb συγκλύσουσι, "shall overwhelm them with deluge," occurs in the LXX. (Cant. viii. 7), and κατακλύζω in x. 4, 15; 2 Pet. iii. 6.

23. a mighty wind.] Rather, "the spirit of His power," which in the next clause is compared to a hurricane. Comp. 2 Thess. ii. 8.

shall blow them away.] "Shall winnow shall lay waste the whole earth, and ill dealing shall overthrow the thrones of the mighty.

Digitized by Microsoft®

CHAPTER VI.

1 Kings must give ear. 3 They have their power from God, 5 who will not spare them. 12 Wisdom is soon found. 21 Princes must seek for it: 24 for a wise prince is the stay of his people.

[a] HEAR therefore, O ye kings, and understand; learn, ye that be judges of the ends of the earth. [a] Ps. 2. 10.

2 Give ear, ye that rule the people, and glory in the multitude of nations.

them out," as chaff is blown from the wheat. Comp. xi. 20; Is. xli. 16; Ps. i. 4, &c.

iniquity shall lay waste the whole earth.] The ruin and ravage produced by the wrath of God is attributed directly to "lawlessness," by which that wrath is evoked. The expression "the whole earth" indicates that the thoughts of the writer, so far as they are meant to be specific, are, from v. 17 and onwards, occupied with Messianic or theocratic scenes of retribution of which this earth is the stage, and that he is not alluding to the great day of judgment, or to the punishment of the wicked after death.

ill-dealing.] Vulg., malignitas. The word κακοπραγία, in the sense of "evil-doing," does not occur in the Bible, but is found in Jos. 'Antt.' ii. 5, § 4. Its classical meaning is "ill-success" (Thuc. ii. 60). A more correct word for misdeeds would be κακοποιΐα.

the thrones of the mighty.] Rather, "thrones of potentates." Comp. Lk. i. 52. The word δυναστῶν skilfully links this chapter with the address in the following, in a manner also observable in the Epistle to the Hebrews.

It must remain uncertain what exact meaning the writer attached to this tremendous passage. In the older forms of Hebrew literature—e.g. in the Prophets—such passages refer almost exclusively to temporary and almost contemporary calamities. The conception of a Day of Judgment for the dead does not appear till a later stage of Jewish literature.

VI.–VIII. COMMENDATION OF THE BLESSINGS OF WISDOM AND MEANS WHEREBY WISDOM MAY BE ACQUIRED.

CHAPTER VI.

AN APPEAL TO RULERS.

1–11. Kings are reminded of their responsibility, which is proportionate to their greatness, and are warned of God's impartial justice. 12–16. Wisdom is easily found of them that truly seek her. 17–21. Wisdom is the secret of true power. 22–25. He promises a free instruction respecting Wisdom to all who will receive it.

1–11. The responsibility of kings.

The Vulg. heads the chapter with the words Melior est sapientia quam vires, et vir prudens quam fortis. There is no authority for the addition. It is founded on Eccles. ix. 16, and Prov. xvi. 32, xxiv. 5, but it furnishes a very insufficient description of the contents of this chapter, and breaks the continuity of the style.

1. Hear therefore, O ye kings.] Hear and understand, because misdeeds overthrow the thrones of potentates (v. 23). The verbs are combined in Is. vi. 9 (LXX.); Matt. xiii. 13. They imply the same as "read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest."

judges of the ends of the earth.] "Judges" is the characteristic Semitic conception for rulers. The phrase means the same as "ye that be judges of the earth," in i. 1. "The ends of the earth" means all lands, however distant. The long sufferings of Jews under heathen autocrats made them feel special interest in ideal warnings to kings. The writer can hardly have expected that his book would really fall into the hands of heathen rulers. The appeal to kings as his special auditors belongs only to the rhetorical form of the book, and to his assumption of the person of Solomon. His sweeping and exceptionless denunciations of heathendom, and of the fate which impends over all the unrighteous (v. 17–23; vi. 5), do not imply any hope that Pagan rulers will listen to his exhortations. The chapter recalls parts of Ps. ii., lviii., lxxxii.

2. Give ear.] This late verb (ἐνωτίζομαι) is only found in the N. T., in Acts ii. 14, but is common in the LXX.

the people.] Rather, "a multitude." The greatest kings are specially appealed to (comp. vv. 5, 6; xiv. 20).

glory.] γεγαυρωμένοι. A rare word, expressing the extreme of haughtiness. It is very inadequately expressed by the qui placetis of the Vulgate. In the LXX. the verb occurs in Num. xxiii. 24, ὡς λέων γαυρωθήσεται. Comp. 3 Macc. iii. 11. Philo only uses it when referring to this verse of the LXX. ('Vit. Mos.' i. 51), but he uses γαῦρος and γαυριάω. It is one of the poetic words which found their way into Alexandrian Greek. Comp. ξανθοῖς βοστρύχοις γαυρούμενος, Eur. 'Or.' 1532.

in the multitude of nations.] Rather, "in

Digitized by Microsoft®

[b] Rom. 13. 1, 2.

3 For [b] power is given you of the Lord, and sovereignty from the Highest, who shall try your works, and search out your counsels.

4 Because, being ministers of his kingdom, ye have not judged aright, nor kept the law, nor walked after the counsel of God;

5 Horribly and speedily shall he come upon you: for a sharp judgment shall be to them that be in high places.

6 For [c] mercy will soon pardon the meanest: but mighty men shall be mightily tormented.

7 For he which is Lord over all shall fear no [d] man's person, neither shall he stand in awe of any man's multitudes of nations." In the person of Solomon, the writer addresses kings like those of Persia, and rulers like those of Rome, who held many nationalities under their sway. No specific chronological indication can be attached to the words.

[c] Luke 12. 47, 48. [d] Deut. 10. 17. 2 Chron. 19. 7. Job 34. 19. Eccles. 35. 12–16. Acts 10. 34. Rom. 2. 11. Gal. 2. 6. Eph. 6. 9. Col. 3. 25. 1 Pet. 1. 17.

3. power.] Rather, "your dominion." Κράτησις, a late bad word, is found neither in the LXX. nor the N. T., but occurs in Josephus, 'c. Apion,' i. 26. The thought that "the powers that be are ordained of God"—that kings reign gratiâ Dei—is expressed in very different parts of Scripture: 1 Chron. xxxix. 11, 12; Dan. ii. 21; John xix. 11; Rom. xiii. 1, 2; 1 Pet. ii. 13. Josephus says that it was a special doctrine of the Essenes ('B. J.' ii. 8, § 7).

shall try.] See note on i. 9.

4. being ministers of his kingdom.] The heathen dynasts had failed to recognise that they were only vicegerents of God: John xix. 11; Ps. ciii. 19.

ye have not judged aright.] He charges heathen rulers in general with that "perversion of judgment" which springs from corrupt motives and "respect for persons." Comp. Deut. xvi. 19, xxiv. 17; Prov. xvii. 23; Is. i. 23, &c.; Mic. iii. 9.

nor kept the law.] Though they could not know the Law of Moses, they had the witness of a law written in their own hearts: Rom. i. 19–22; ii. 14.

5. Horribly.] φρικτῶς. The familiar thought (1 Thess. v. 3; Lk. xvii. 27–29, &c.) is expressed, as is usual with this writer, in uncommon phraseology.

shall he come upon you.] ἐπιστήσεται. The word implies sudden and hostile onset: Lk. xxi. 34.

sharp.] ἀπότομος. See note on v. 20, 22.

shall be to them that be in high places.] Lit., "takes place among the pre-eminent." Γίνεται expresses a law of universal application. Οἱ ὑπερέχοντες: comp. Rom. xiii. 1; 1 Pet. ii. 13. The thought is partly like that in Horace:

> "Celsae graviore casu > Decidunt turres."

The responsibility of the greatest is greatest; and therefore their judgment is more severe, and the consequent ruin more overwhelming.

6. For mercy will soon pardon the meanest.] Lit., "For the lowest is pardonable by mercy." Συγγνωστὸς with the genitive usually means "pardonable for." The genitive ἐλέους here means "by mercy," and this construction is so unparalleled that Nitzsch suspects ἐλέους to be a gloss. It must rather be explained by the bold and unusual phraseology and style of the writer. A simpler writer might have said, "is worthy of mercy, and may be pardoned." The general thought is that great privileges and opportunities imply great corresponding duties (noblesse oblige), and that the temptations of the poor may assume acuter forms, and therefore may receive greater allowance. Comp. Prov. vi. 30, and especially Lk. xii. 47, 48. Ἐλάχιστος does not mean (as the Syriac renders it) "the smallest king," but the humblest subject.

but mighty men shall be mightily tormented.] The alliteration and the half-poetic combination of the adj. and adv. (δυνατοὶ δὲ δυνατῶς, comp. 4 Macc. xii. 15) are characteristic. "Tormented" (Vulg., tormento patientur) is too strong a rendering for ἐτασθήσονται, "shall be chastised" (comp. ii. 19; Gen. xii. 17).

7. he which is Lord over all.] The same title is given to God in viii. 3; Lk. ii. 29; Acts iv. 24. In the LXX. it often corresponds to Elohim and Jehovah.

shall fear.] ὑποστελεῖται. The verb properly means "to shorten sail," then "to shrink from," and so "to fear." It is found in both Testaments (Job xli. 16), but in the N. T. it means "to shrink from" or withhold (Acts xx. 20, 27; Gal. ii. 12; Heb. x. 38). The Vulg. mistranslates the clause, "non subtrahet personam cujusquam Deus."

no man's person.] This phrase is borrowed from Deut. i. 17, and expresses the truth that God is answerable to none.

stand in awe of.] The verb ἐντρέπω means "I turn away," and then "I cause a person to turn away for shame," "I make to blush," 1 Cor. iv. 14. The passive means "I blush at" or "am afraid of" (Tit. ii. 8).

Digitized by Microsoft®

greatness: for he hath made the small and great, and careth for all alike.

8 But a sore trial shall come upon the mighty.

9 Unto you therefore, O kings, do I speak, that ye may learn wisdom, and not fall away.

10 For they that keep holiness holily shall be ‖ judged holy: and they that have learned such things shall find ‖ what to answer.

‖ Or, justified

‖ Or, a defence.

11 Wherefore set your affection upon my words; desire them, and ye shall be instructed.

12 Wisdom is glorious, and never fadeth away: yea, [e] she is easily seen of them that love her, and found of such as seek her.

[e] Deut. 30 11, &c. John 7. 17.

13 She preventeth them that desire her, in making herself first known unto them.

14 Whoso seeketh her early shall have no great travail: for he shall find her sitting at his doors.

15 To think therefore upon her is the small and great.] A common phrase in all languages for "high" and "low:" Deut. i. 17; Rev. xiii. 6.

The middle voice means, as here, "I reverence" and "am afraid of," Matt. xii. 6; Lk. xviii. 2.

careth for.] "The rich and poor meet together; the Lord is the Maker of them all," Prov. xxii. 2. "That accepteth not the persons of princes, nor regardeth the rich more than the poor: for they are the work of his hands," Job xxxviii. 19. Πρόνοια is God's protecting providence (xiv. 3). "His tender mercies are over all his works," Ps. cxlv. 9.

alike.] "The very least as feeling His care, and the greatest as not exempted from His power."—HOOKER.

8. a sore trial.] Rather, "a stringent scrutiny."

shall come upon.] Lit., "is imminent over." The same verb is used as in v. 5. See Lk. xii. 48, "Where much is given much is required."

9. O kings.] The word used is "tyrants," but in the LXX. this is nothing but a synonym for kings: Hab. i. 10; Prov. viii. 16; "satraps," Esth. ix. 3. Bildad is called a τύραννος in Job ii. 11.

fall away.] xii. 2; Heb. vi. 6. One of the words for a sin is παράπτωμα, "a swerving aside."

10. shall be judged holy.] The "justified" of the margin and the justificabuntur of the Vulg. must not be mixed up with later theological connotations. The meaning is the same as in 1 John iii. 27, "He that doeth righteousness is righteous," and (id. ii. 29) is "born of God." For the form of expression, comp. v. 6, and the phrase Sanctus sancta sancte tractat.

what to answer.] Lit., "an apology." Their plea of innocence shall be held sufficient in the stringent scrutiny. Comp. Ecclus. xviii. 19; Heb. iv. 16.

11. ye shall be instructed.] The verb often implies the notion of moral discipline: Ps. lxxxix. 12; 1 Cor. xi. 32; 2 Cor. vi. 9; 1 Tim. i. 20.

12–16. Wisdom is found of them that seek her.

12. glorious.] Lit., "bright (i.e. pure and radiant: Ecclus. xxxvi. 10) and unfading (1 Pet. i. 4) is wisdom."

easily.] εὐχερῶς is not found in either Testament, but occurs in Judith iv. 5; 2 Macc. ii. 31. It is a classical word.

found.] Prov. viii. 17; Jer. xxix. 13. Throughout the passage Wisdom is poetically personified.

13. preventeth.] I.e. anticipates.

in making herself first known unto them.] These seven words represent the single word προγνωσθῆναι of the original. This infinitive may not be meant to depend on φθάνει (by the same unclassical construction as in iv. 7), but may be the explanatory infinitive—"so as to be known beforehand."

14. seeketh her early.] ὀρθρίσας, "rising in the morning." The verb occurs in Lk. xxi. 38. The classic form is ὀρθρεύω. The "morning" alluded to here is "the morn of life," i.e. youth.

shall have no great travail.] Vulg. non laborabit; "shall not grow weary," Matt. xi. 28; John iv. 6.

sitting at his doors.] Lit., "an assessor of his gates," i.e. close at hand: Jas. v. 9; Prov. viii. 34; Jer. xxxix. 3.

15. perfection of wisdom.] Rather, "of intelligence" (φρονήσεως). As Grimm points out, the writer uses the word φρόνησις very loosely, and without attaching to it any accurate definition. In iii. 15, iv. 9, vii. 7, it seems to be a synonym for wisdom; in viii. 7 it is a result of wisdom (A. V. "prudence") as one of the four cardinal virtues. Here again it is a step on the way to wisdom. No doubt these varied expressions can be made con-perfection of wisdom: and whoso watcheth for her shall quickly be without care.

Digitized by Microsoft®

16 For she goeth about seeking such as are worthy of her, sheweth herself favourably unto them in the ways, and meeteth them in every thought.

17 For the very true beginning of her is the desire of ‖discipline; and the care of discipline is love;

18 And love is the keeping of her laws; and the giving heed unto her laws is the assurance of incorruption;

19 And incorruption maketh us near unto God:

20 Therefore the desire of wisdon bringeth to a kingdom.

21 If your delight be then in thrones and sceptres, O ye kings of the people, honour wisdom, that ye may reign for evermore.

‖ Or, nurture.

sistent if φρόνησις be understood as "intelligence," "good sense;" but clearly the parallelisms and variations and amplified repetitions of the Hebrew-Greek style are unfavourable to minute accuracy of expression.

without care.] Free from sordid, worldly anxieties, vii. 23; Matt. vi. 25, xiii. 22, &c.

16. meeteth them.] The thought is the same as in Is. lxv. 24. It is obvious that in these verses Wisdom is not theologically regarded as in Philo's treatment of the Logos, but is merely personified in a poetic manner, as in the Books of Proverbs and Ecclesiasticus.

17–21. The steps from the love of Wisdom to immortality.

17. the very true beginning of her.] Wisdom will find those that are worthy of her; for Wisdom begins in desire for discipline; which leads to love of Wisdom; which leads to obedience to her laws; which leads to assurance of immortality; which brings near to God. Hence the desire for Wisdom is the lowest step to a throne. The reasoning is little more than verbal assertion, but the general thought is that > "Self-reverence, self-knowledge, self-control—

> These three alone lead man to sovereign power."

The rhetoric of the passage is remarkable. It takes the form of a sorites, or series of syllogisms, in which the conclusion of one forms the premiss of the next. But the love for variation and emphasis leads the writer to weaken the sorites by altering the phraseology of each new premiss. Thus ἐπιθυμία παιδείας becomes φροντὶς παιδείας, τήρησις νόμων is changed to προσοχὴ νόμων, βεβαίωσις ἀφθαρσίας becomes ἀφθαρσία; and, in the conclusion, he alters ἐπιθυμία παιδείας into ἐπιθ. σοφίας. Further he substitutes "a kingdom" for "nearness to God." This Greek form of reasoning does not occur in Scripture, but there is found a species of anadiplosis, which has some external resemblance to it: Hos. ii. 21–23; Joel i. 3; Rom. v. 3–5, &c. It is uncertain whether we should take "truest" with "beginning" or with "desire." The sense is much the same in either case, and the word merely implies additional emphasis. If taken with ἀρχή, it means "the most secure beginning;" if with ἐπιθυμία, it means "the most genuine desire."

of discipline.] See note on v. 11.

18. love.] Not in the Christian sense, but "love of wisdom." Men love Wisdom more in proportion as they submit to her discipline.

love is the keeping of her laws.] The words at once recall Matt. xix. 17; John xiv. 15, 21, 24. The love of God is always closely conjoined with obedience to His will: Ex. xx. 6; 1 John v. 3, &c.

the assurance of incorruption.] I.e. "of immortality," ii. 23; Rom. ii. 7. The loss of immortality can only come from moral suicide (i. 12), and the righteous feel in themselves the principle of life: 1 John v. 12. The same thought—that virtue involves immortality—occurs frequently in Philo.

19. maketh us near unto God.]

> "Love Virtue; she alone is free:
> She will teach you how to climb
> Higher than the sphery chime;
> Or if Virtue feeble were,
> Heaven itself should stoop to her."
> MILTON, Comus.

The germ of this thought is possibly borrowed from Plato ('Phaedo,' p. 63, c), but Ritter ('Gesch. d. Philos.' ii. 382, quoted by Grimm) points out that this writer may claim originality in having been the first to give it clear expression among his countrymen.

20. to a kingdom.] If Wisdom brings us near to God, it leads us to the foot of the loftiest of all thrones, and makes us partakers of a spiritual kingdom beyond the grave: Rom. v. 17; 2 Tim. ii. 12.

21. that ye may reign for evermore.] The eternal contrast between the semblance of earthly power and the realities of the divine kingdom is here briefly and forcibly indicated.

22–25. A promise of free instruction as to the nature of Wisdom.

Digitized by Microsoft®

22 As for wisdom, what she is, and how she came up, I will tell you, and will not hide mysteries from you: but will seek her out from the beginning of her nativity, and bring the knowledge of her into light, and will not pass over the truth.

23 Neither will I go with consuming envy; for such a man shall have no fellowship with wisdom.

24 But the multitude of the wise is the welfare of the world: and a wise king is the upholding of the people.

25 Receive therefore instruction through my words, and it shall do you good.

22. what she is.] The writer sets forth the results and blessings of wisdom, but nowhere defines it.

how she came up.] Lit. "how she became" (Vulg. quomodo facta est): i.e. the origin of Wisdom. Nothing, however, is said of the origin of Wisdom, except the statement that she is the breath of God, vii. 25. Ewald and others suppose the words to mean "how she occurred to me," i.e. how I gained wisdom; but the ἐμοὶ could not have been left unexpressed. Perhaps the writer felt that as to the birth or creation of Wisdom nothing further can be said than that she is an emanation of the Divine, and that she was one of the primeval attributes of God, and first received concrete manifestation in the creation of the Universe: Prov. viii. 22–31; Ecclus. i. 4–10, xxiv. 8, 9.

mysteries.] Deep truths, once hidden, but now revealed. The writer promises that he will tell all the truth he knows, and that there shall be nothing esoteric which he conceals. He will have no "mysteries," which are only meant for the initiated. Some of the Alexandrian theosophists had borrowed from the heathen philosophers the notion that there are truths which ought to be concealed from the vulgar multitude. Philo, in a passage closely analogous to this, indignantly complains that, if the truths which were revealed to the initiated were really beautiful and useful, those who possessed such knowledge had no right to shut themselves up in deep darkness and only to benefit two or three persons. All men, even in mid market-place, ought to be fearlessly invited to share in all knowledge which can make life better and happier. (Philo, 'De Sacrif.' 12.) will seek her out.] Lit., "track her step by step" (ix. 16); ἐξιχνιάσω (Job x. 6). The classical form of the verb is ἐξιχνεύω. It does not occur in the N.T., but we have ἀνεξιχνίαστος twice (Rom. xi. 33; Eph. iii. 8).

from the beginning of her nativity.] If this had been the meaning, we should have required the pronoun αὐτῆς. The meaning is, "from the beginning of creation" (Prov. viii. 22, 23).

bring the knowledge of her into light.] The phrase is like the German in das klare setzen. The thought resembles the ἐν ἀγορᾷ μέσῃ τὰ τῆς ὠφελείας προθέντας of Philo (see the previous note).

pass over.] Leave it on one side, as a thing to be neglected: x. 8 (i. 8; ii. 7).

23. will I go.] συνοδεύσω, "will I accompany you" (Gen. xxxiii. 12; Aquila, συνοδία; Lk. ii. 44). The word is chosen from its assonance with παροδεύσω.

with consuming envy.] "Consuming" here means "wasting" or "melting away." The verb intabescere is used by Ovid ('Met.' ii. 780) as descriptive of envy. The writer promises an ungrudging communication of his experience to those who accompany him on the path of inquiry. So Philo says (l. c.) φθόνος γὰρ ἀρετῆς διώκισται. There is no room for so mean a vice as envy in the sphere of virtue. In another passage, Philo quotes Plato ('Phaedr.' p. 247) as saying that "Envy stands outside the divine choir;" and he adds that "Wisdom, a thing most divine and participative, never shuts her halls of thought, but ever welcomes those who thirst for draughts of instruction" ('Quod omnis prob. lib.,' Opp. ii. 44). The philosophers would have denied that "envy" had anything to do with their suppression of truths which they believed to be beyond the reach of the multitude; but φθόνος involves the notion of "grudging" and "withholding."

such a man.] Vulg. talis homo. Rather "it," i.e. Envy.

24. But.] He proceeds to shew that the unmeet withholding of the truth is an injury to humanity.

upholding.] εὐστάθεια: Esth. ii. 5; 2 Macc. iv. 6.

VII., VIII. The Glory of Wisdom. How Wisdom may be attained.

CHAPTER VII.

1–7. Solomon, being but a mortal man, like all others, prayed for wisdom, which (8–10) he esteemed above all earthly blessings. 11–14. All other earthly blessings came with wisdom. 15–21. The fulness of knowledge which comes from God. 22–30. The glory and the nature of Wisdom.

Digitized by Microsoft®

CHAPTER VII.

1 All men have their beginning and end alike.
8 He preferred wisdom before all things else.
15 God gave him all the knowledge which he had. 22 The praise of wisdom.

I MYSELF also am a mortal man, like to all, and the offspring of him that was first made of the earth,

2 And in my mother's womb was fashioned to be flesh in the time of ten months, [a] being compacted in blood, of the seed of man, and the pleasure that came with [b] sleep.

[a] Job 10.
[b] ch. 4. 6.

3 And when I was born, I drew in the common air, and fell upon the earth, which is of like nature, and

1. I myself also am a mortal man.] Such an acknowledgment might seem superfluous, but it is explained partly by the extraordinary development of supernatural legends which had clustered round the name of Solomon in the Jewish Hagadah, and partly by the writer's object,—which is to illustrate (i.) that before honour is humility, and (ii.) that the attainment of wisdom by Solomon was not due to any miraculous endowments, but is possible to the simplest of the children of men who will seek it by prayer.

like to all.] I was no being of a superior order to the rest of mankind.

the offspring of him that was first made of the earth.] Three words in the original—a "descendant of the earthborn protoplast," i.e. of Adam (Gen. ii. 7; 1 Cor. xv. 47, ὁ πρῶτος ἄνθρωπος ἐκ γῆς χοϊκός; Ecclus. xvii. 1). The word "protoplast" occurs again at x. 1. It became a common word in Greek ecclesiastical literature, and, though not perhaps invented by this writer, was first brought into currency by him.

2. in my mother's womb.] No unusual circumstances accompanied his birth.

was fashioned to be flesh.] ἐγλύφην; lit., "I was sculptured," i.e. moulded. xiii. 13. Comp. Eccles. xi. 5; Is. xliv. 2. The "flesh" is regarded as being shaped in the womb, and then endowed with a pre-existent soul (viii. 9). So Macrobius calls the womb "formandi hominis monetam." In the language of later theological controversy the writer is rather a Creationist than a Traducianist. His views agree with those of Philo, who held that the pre-existent souls are "fleshless and bodiless," and "have no participation with earthly matter" ('De Gigant.' 7; 'Leg. Allegg.' i. 12). For fuller details see Siegfried, 'Philo,' pp. 242, 243. The writer does not touch on the question as to the exact moment in which the soul is supposed to be united to the body. The Alexandrian psychology was probably derived from the Stoics, who deduced their views allegorically from Homer, 'Il.,' ix. 609, &c. (Siegfried, p. 15.) In the common Jewish Hagadoth each soul, before entering the body, is supposed to be shewn the future places of reward and punishment that it may be without excuse hereafter; and the yet unborn souls of all Jews are represented as having been present to hear the Law delivered on Mount Sinai.

in the time of ten months.] A common expression in ancient literature (Arist. 'Hist. Animal.' x. 4; Plin. 'H. N.' vii. 5; Terent. 'Adelph.,' iii. 5, 28; Ovid, 'Fast.,' i. 33; "Matri longa decem tulerant fastidia menses," Virg.), originating probably from the earliest division of the year into lunar months of 28 days. For the conception of the soul as separate from the body, see viii. 19.

being compacted in blood.] It is hardly worth while to enter into the empiric details of the writer's embryology. He seems to have held the physical views of Aristotle ('De generat. animal.,' ii. 4; comp. Plin. 'H. N.' vii. 15), which Philo rejected ('De opif. Mund.' 45), but which the writer may have identified with Job x. 10. (Comp. 4 Macc. xiii. 19.) Pseudo-Solomon, in touching on physical details which in that age were mostly a matter of guesswork, shews less wisdom than the sacred writers, who on this subject pretend to no knowledge: Ps. cxxxix. 13–16; Eccles. xi. 5. (Comp. 2 Macc. vii. 22.)

that came with sleep.] The same euphemism as in iv. 6.

3. And when I was born.] "Yea and I too, when born." Not only my birth, but my infancy was simply normal.

the common air.] A phrase first used (apparently) by Menander (Brunck, 'Gnom. Poet. Fr.' vi. 6).

fell.] A phrase for birth found both in Scripture (see the commentators on Is. xxvi. 19) and in Greek writers ('Il.' xix. 110), and in the Latin cadere. It is still used in English of animals ("to fall a lamb," &c.). Here the word is used to imply the common helplessness of infancy.

"Tellure cadentem Excepi."—PAPINIUS.

which is of like nature.] Vulg., similiter factam. In the N. T. the word (ὁμοιοπαθής) occurs twice (Acts xiv. 15; Jas. v. 17), and is rendered "of like passions." Grimm understands it here in the sense of "aequa tellus" (Hor. 'Od.,' ii. 18, 32), "impartial," "treating all alike." Solomon is made to the first voice which I uttered was crying, as all others do.

4 I was nursed in swaddling clothes, and that with cares.

5 For there is no king that had any other beginning of birth.

[c] Job 1. 21. 1 Tim. 6. 7.

6 [c] For all men have one entrance into life, and the like going out.

[d] 1 Kings 3. 7, &c.

7 Wherefore [d] I prayed, and understanding was given me: I called upon God, and the spirit of wisdom came to me.

[e] Job 28. 15, &c. Prov. 3. 14, 15. & 8. 10, 11.

8 I [e] preferred her before sceptres and thrones, and esteemed riches nothing in comparison of her.

[‖] Gr. stone of inestimable price.

9 Neither compared I unto her any [‖] precious stone, because all gold in respect of her is as a little sand, and silver shall be counted as clay before her.

10 I loved her above health and beauty, and chose to have her instead of light: for the light that cometh from her never goeth out.

imply that at his birth he received only the universal blessings of earth and air, like all other infants. Compare the lines—

> "For Mother Earth, she gathers all > Into her bosom, great and small."

the first voice which I uttered was crying, as all others do.] Lit., "weeping equally my first utterance, like all." φωνὴν is here a cognate accusative after κλαίων. "Like all" is a brachylogy for "like the voice of all" (comp. ii. 15). Ἴσα, "equally," not ἦκα, "I uttered" (Vulg. emisi), is the true reading. The reading ἦκα arose from not understanding the idiom κλαίων φωνὴν, and from a dislike of the tautology ὁμοίαν . . . ἴσα. Men in all ages have noticed with a sense of melancholy that the first human utterance is a cry. See Lucret. v. 227.

> "On mother's knees, a naked new-born child, > Sad thou didst weep while all around thee smiled."—Sir W. Jones (from the Persian).

4. and that with cares.] Lit., "and amid cares"—namely, the cares of those who guarded my infancy.

5. of birth.] Γένεσις is here used for "life" in general.

6. going out.] See note on iii. 2. This commonplace of moralists is expanded in Ecclus. xl. 1–7.

7–10. Solomon's prayer for Wisdom, and his love for her.

7. Wherefore.] Knowing my helplessness in common with all the rest of mankind (ix. 5, 6).

I prayed.] viii. 21.

understanding.] φρόνησις. See note on vi. 15.

I called upon God.] The verb ἐπικαλοῦμαι has this sense also in the LXX. (Gen. xiii. 4; Symmachus, Ps. lxv. 17), and in the N. T. (Acts vi. 59).

the spirit of wisdom.] The best commentary on the verse is Jas. i. 5. It is clear that St. James was familiar with this book (see Dean Plumptre's 'St. James,' p. 33). The special parallels suggested by writers like Hengstenberg and Stier ('Die Apokryphen') may be sometimes vague, as Keerl has shewn in his 'Apokryphenfrage;' but they are too numerous to be quite accidental. The full idea of "the spirit of wisdom" was only revealed by Christ (Lk. xi. 13). The writer is of course alluding to 1 K. iii. 5–15; iv. 29–34.

8. I preferred her before . . . thrones.] This passage resembles others in the Sapiential literature of the Jews (Prov. iii. 8–10; viii. 10, 11, &c.); and in the Book of Job (xxviii. 15–19).

9. any precious stone.] Marg., "stone of inestimable price." Ἀτιμητὸν is "unvalued," in the sense of "beyond the power to value." Comp. 3 Macc. iii. 23, τὴν ἀτιμητὸν πολιτείαν, "the priceless citizenship." Comp. Shakspeare—

> "I thought I saw a thousand fearful wrecks, > Inestimable stones, unvalued jewels."
> Richard III. i. 2.

all gold.] ὁ πᾶς χρυσὸς, "the sum total of gold in the world." Comp. Menander, σοφία δὲ πλούτου κτῆμα τιμιώτερον.

10. instead of light.] Inward light would have compensated me even for outward blindness. For wisdom is the true light (Ps. cxix. 105), without which all is darkness (Matt. vi. 23).

> "So much the rather thou, celestial light, > Shine inwards, and the mind through all her powers > Irradiate; there plant eyes, all mist from thence > Purge and disperse, that I may see and tell > Of things invisible to mortal sight."
> Milton, Par. Lost, iii.

never goeth out.] Lit., "is sleepless." Vulg., inextinguibile.

11–14. Wisdom brought all other blessings in her train.

11. All good things.] In the original, "But

Digitized by Microsoft®

11 ✓ All good things together came to me with her, and innumerable riches in her hands.

12 And I rejoiced in them all, because wisdom goeth before them: and I knew not that she was the mother of them.

13 I learned ‖ diligently, and do communicate her ‖ liberally: I do not hide her riches.

14 For she is a treasure unto men that never faileth: which they that use ‖ become the friends of God, being commended for the gifts that come from learning.

15 ‖ God hath granted me to speak as I would, and to conceive as is meet for the things that ‖ are given me: because it is he that leadeth unto wisdom, and directeth the wise.

✓ 1 Kings 3. 13. Prov. 3. 16. Matt. 6. 33.

‖ Gr. without guile.

‖ Gr. without envy.

‖ Or, enter friendship with God.

‖ Or, God grant.

‖ Or, are to be spoken of all good things." I valued her above all earthly blessings, but she gave me these as well.

innumerable riches.] See 2 Chron. i. 12, ix. 1–28; Ecclus. xlvii. 18.

12. because wisdom goeth before them.] The meaning is that earthly blessings become real blessings, when Wisdom is their leader, i.e. presides over their use; but when he prayed for wisdom, he was entirely unaware (ἠγνόουν) that she is the mother of temporal as well as of eternal blessedness. In other words, he desires to intimate that his prayer was pure and untainted by lower motives. Throughout the book the writer is thinking of the ideal and legendary Solomon, rather than of the far-from-faultless king—

> "Whose heart, though large,
> Beguiled by fair idolatresses, fell
> To idols foul."

Possibly, too, he desires to correct the pessimistic views of the Book of Ecclesiastes.

I knew not.] This imperfect (ἠγνόουν) must neither be treated as though it were a pluperfect (Gutbertet), nor taken (as by Grimm) to mean that the author continued to be unaware of the connexion between wisdom and prosperity. It refers to the days when he was praying for wisdom, before his great prosperity began.

13. diligently.] Rather, "without guile"—a reference to the purity of his motives in desiring wisdom, as explained in the last verse.

do communicate.] The Greek present often involves the notion of a wish. "I am for communicating her," "I desire to diffuse her."

liberally.] "Ungrudgingly," "without envy;" a reference to vi. 23.

I do not hide.] "I do not wish to hide," as in the last clause.

14. which they that use.] Χρῆσθαι, with an accusative instead of with the instrumental case, is a very unclassical construction, and some MSS. here read κτησάμενοι. But it is certain that no scribe would have altered this to the rarer construction which is found also in 1 Cor. vii. 31 (leg. τὸν κόσμον).

become the friends of God.] The aorist is gnomic, and corresponds to the English present aorist "become." The phrase στέλλεσθαι φιλίαν means "to provide friendship for oneself." Comp. Is. xli. 8, "Abraham my friend" (El Khalíl); Jas. ii. 25; John xv. 14.

being commended.] Namely, "to God" (συσταθέντες). The verb is used in 1 Macc. xii. 43 in the sense of "introduce to a friend," as also in Rom. xvi. 1. It is rendered "commend" in 2 Cor. x. 18.

for the gifts that come from learning.] Rather, "from training" (ἐκ παιδείας). The "training" may either be "moral discipline" (i. 5), or more generally "education." The spiritual gifts derived from such training or instruction are compared to the gifts which recommend a suitor or visitor to an Eastern king. In iii. 6, by another figure, the self-devotion of the righteous is compared to a whole burnt offering acceptable to God.

15–22. Extent of the wisdom which God has bestowed on Solomon.

15. God hath granted me.] This is the reading of the Vulg. and Arabic versions, and of the Complutensian and Aldine texts. Grimm thinks that δῴη, "may He grant," has been purposely altered into δέδωκε by scribes who thought that the gift of wisdom, which the writer professes to have attained, must necessarily involve the fitting expression and worthy conception of the gifts he has received. But this does not follow. Though he had received wisdom from God, he might yet desire guidance as to "how" or "what" he should speak (Matt. x. 19).

for the things that are given me.] Vulg., quae mihi dantur. The true reading seems to be διδομένων, which implies that the gift of wisdom is continuous. The reading λεγομένων (Alex. and other MSS., Syriac, Arabic, Armenian versions, &c.) refers back to his promises in v. 13; but does not suit the sense so well, and cannot be rendered "are to be spoken of," as in the margin.

Digitized by Microsoft ®

16 For in his hand are both we and our words; all wisdom also, and knowledge of workmanship.

17 For he hath given me certain knowledge of the things that are, namely, to know how the world was made, and the operation of the elements:

18 The beginning, ending, and midst of the times: the alterations of the turning of the sun, and the change of seasons:

19 The circuits of years, and the positions of stars:

20 The natures of living creatures, and the furies of wild beasts: the that leadeth unto wisdom.] Rather, "guide of wisdom." Vulg., sapientiae dux. The context shews that the Vulgate is right, for σοφίας ὁδηγός is the parallel to τῶν σοφῶν διορθωτής. God is both the leader of wisdom and the teacher of the wise.

directeth.] διορθωτής. Vulg., emendator. The word properly means "a critic" or "corrector." Both wisdom and the wise still need the superintending providence of God.

16. For.] This gives the reason for the prayer of the last verse, and therefore supports the reading δῴη, v. 15. The wise still need God's guidance; for all speech, and all knowledge, and all practical skill come from Him.

wisdom.] Rather, "skill" (φρόνησις). The rendering of the A.V. is confusing. See on vi. 15.

of workmanship.] The gifts of wisdom include even the genius of the artist and the skill of the artisan. In Ex. xxxi. 3 the ability of Bezaleel is attributed to inspiration.

17. For.] This "for" only introduces a second and special illustration of the truth proclaimed in v. 15. God corrects and teaches the wise, generally, for (v. 16) all knowledge comes from Him; and specially (vv. 17–21) He has granted to Solomon his manifold learning. The emphasis thus falls on "me."

hath given.] Rather, "gave" (ἔδωκε).

how the world was made.] The organisation (σύστασιν) of the universe. The word, in this sense, comes from Plato ('Tim.' p. 32), possibly through Philo ('Leg. Allegg.' i. 1). This may be the meaning of συνεστῶσα in 2 Pet. iii. 5, and the same phrase is found in Col. i. 17.

operation of the elements.] Their effective force. Vulg., virtutes. The first who reduced matter to four elements, which he called ῥιζώματα, was Empedocles; the first who tentatively used the word στοιχεῖα (οἱονπερεὶ στ.) was Plato ('Theaet.' 201 E; 'Tim.' 48 B), and from him it gained currency.

18. The beginning, ending, and midst of the times.] This somewhat obscure expression seems to mean the ability to regulate the calendar by astronomy. Owing to the importance of correct systems for the division of the year by the rising and setting of various constellations, this subject had attracted deep attention, and those who helped to elucidate it were rightly regarded as benefactors (Aesch. 'Prom.' 457, 458). Much more is meant than the mere divisions of the seasons or of the months.

the alterations of the turning of the sun.] τροπῶν ἀλλαγάς. Lit., "the changes of the solstices." This, and not "of manners" (τρόπων), is evidently the meaning, as is shewn by the context. The word τροπὴ in this or an analogous sense occurs in LXX., Deut. xxxiii. 14; Job xxxviii. 33 (A.V. "the ordinances of heaven;" LXX., τροπάς); and in Jas. i. 17 there can be little doubt that this is the correct explanation, though it is only one of many. The only special knowledge attributed to Solomon in Scripture—apart from insight into character and skill in government—is that of botany and natural history (1 Kings iv. 29–34); but all details respecting him had been indefinitely extended in Jewish and Eastern legends, which credited him with universal knowledge. The Book of Ecclesiastes attributes to him deep research, but gives no particulars (Eccles. i. 13, 14).

the change of seasons.] Besides a knowledge of the summer and winter solstice, he knew about months and seasons, and their interchanges (μεταβολάς). The expression is somewhat vague.

19. The circuits of years.] Another expression of somewhat indefinite meaning. In xiii. 2 we have κύκλος ἀστέρων. In Euripides ('Or.' 1645) ἐνιαυτοῦ κύκλος means "the circling seasons." Here apparently Solomon is made to claim knowledge of solar and lunar cycles, intercalations, &c.

positions.] θέσεις. This includes the knowledge of which Cicero speaks ('De Nat. Deor.' ii. 61): "Nos astrorum ortus, obitus, *cursus*que cognovimus."

"The heavens themselves, the planets, and this centre Observe degree, priority, and place,
Insisture, course, proportion, season, form,
Office, and custom, in all line of order."
SHAKSPEARE, Troil. and Cress. i. 3.

20. The natures of living creatures.] "He violence of winds, and the reasonings of men: the diversities of plants, and the virtues of roots:

Digitized by Microsoft®

21 And all such things as are either secret or manifest, them I know.

22 For wisdom, ℰ which is the worker of all things, taught me: for ℰ ch. 8. 5.

spake parables," says Josephus, "about all sorts of living creatures, whether on the earth or in the sea, or in the air; for he was not unacquainted with any of their natures."

the violence of winds.] Comp. iv. 4. So too the Vulg., vim ventorum; but the parallel clause ("and the reasonings of men") shews that the real meaning is "the forces of spirits," whether good or evil. Josephus ('Antt.' viii. 2, § 1) says that Solomon had "understanding and wisdom in such a degree as no other mortal man ever had:" and also that "God enabled him to learn that skill which expels demons, which is a science useful and sanative to men." All Eastern legends are full of stories concerning Solomon's power over spirits. One long story of his dealings with the demon Ashmedai is related in 'Gittin,' f. 68. 1, 2.

"To him were known, so Hagar's offspring tell,
The powerful vigil and the starry spell,
The midnight call Hell's shadowy legions dread,
And sounds that wake the slumbers of the dead.
Hence all his might: for who could these oppose?"—HEBER, Palestine.

See Eisenmenger, 'Entd. Judenth.' ii. 440, sq.; Hamburger, 'Talmud. Wörterb.' s. v. Salomo.

the reasonings of men.] "The Spirit searcheth all things," 1 Cor. ii. 10. "The spirit of man is the candle of the Lord, searching all the inward parts of the belly," Prov. xx. 27.

diversities of plants.] Botanic classifications. The claim is founded on 1 Kings iv. 33.

"Who every bird, and beast, and insect knew,
And spake of every plant that quaffs the dew."
HEBER.

virtues of roots.] There was one root, for instance (familiar to Solomon), with which Josephus saw a Jewish exorcist, named Eleazar, in the presence of Vespasian and Titus, draw out an evil spirit through the nostrils of a demoniac. ('Antt.' viii. 2, § 5.)

21. secret or manifest.] That is, "I had both a knowledge of phenomena, and of their hidden causes;" and as the clause is parallel to the preceding verses, "I knew the actions of men, and, by psychologic insight, saw their innermost motives." (Ecclus. xix. 29.) Cp. 1 Cor. ii. 10, "The Spirit searcheth all things, yea the deep things of God." The legendary wisdom of Solomon is here expanded into that range of knowledge which was possessed by the most cultivated Jews of Alexandria during the two centuries before Christ. He is represented as understanding cosmography, physics, astronomy, chronology, meteorology, zoology, angelology and demonology, psychology, botany, herbalism, as well as (viii. 8) rhetoric and history. See Grimm, 'Einl.' p. 151.

22 a. the worker of all things.] Reuss renders this "l'artiste universelle." Wisdom is spoken of as "an artificer" in viii. 6, and wisdom is ascribed to the artist (τεχνίτη) in xiv. 2. God is called the Artificer of the universe in xiii. 1; and in Prov. viii. 30, the words "as one brought up with him" should rather be rendered "as a master-worker." Comp. Ecclus. xxiv. Philo speaks of Wisdom as the "mother" and "nurse" of all things. Eustathius, in an interesting note on Homer, 'Il.' xv. 411, says that "the ancients called all artificers wise." In Ex. xxxv. 31, God is said to have filled Bezaleel "with the Spirit of God, in wisdom, in understanding, and in knowledge, and in all kinds of workmanship." Similarly in Ex. xxviii. 4, Aaron's garments are to be made by "all that are wisehearted, whom I (the Lord) have filled with the spirit of wisdom."

22 b. The division of clauses would be better at this point. The rest of the chapter is occupied with the qualities (22, 23); the nature (24–26); the effects (27, 28); and the glory of wisdom (29, 30).

22 b. For in her is a . . . spirit.] This (ἐν αὐτῇ) is the best reading. It is supported by the Vatican MS. and the four versions. Some have suspected that the reading was introduced by some Christian reader who wished to distinguish between the Son (= Wisdom) and the Holy Spirit, in the interests of Trinitarian controversy. Calovius and others, accepting it as the true reading, draw this theological inference from it. The inference is very remote, and has not the smallest argumentative value; and the reading (since it is accepted in the Itala) is certainly older than Arian disputes. It is the more difficult reading, but means that in the practical results of wisdom a spirit reveals itself, which is described by the following epithets. The other readings are αὐτὴ, αὑτὴ ("she," or "she herself is"), and αὕτη (a demonstrative, as in vi. 16), which identify Wisdom with the Spirit of God (comp. i. 4; vii. 7; ix. 17; xii. 1). See Nitzsch, 'Syst. of Christian Doctrine.'

in her is an understanding spirit, holy, ‖ one only, manifold, subtil, lively, clear, undefiled, plain, not subject to hurt, loving the thing that is good, quick, which cannot be letted, ready to do good, understanding.] νοερόν. The word is a technical term of the Stoic philosophy, and may be rendered "intelligential." The Stoics are said by Plutarch ('De plac. philos.' 6) to have defined God in these very words as "an intelligential Spirit" and "intelligential fire." Attempts have been made by Hasse and Baumgarten-Crusius to classify these epithets in a significant order. Hasse classes them under three heads. He says that the first seven express the permanent nature of Wisdom; the next seven her active work; and the last seven her exalted power. Baumgarten-Crusius says that the first four epithets are general, and all the others illustrative of them. A careful examination shews decisively that neither classification is tenable; and a certain resemblance of some of the epithets to each other, not without something like tautology, seems to prove that the writer was mainly influenced by rhetorical and numerical considerations. The passage may be profitably compared with Hooker, 'Eccl. Pol.' ii. 1, § 4: "The boundaries of Wisdom are large, and within them much is contained. . . . Whatsoever either men on earth or the angels of heaven do know, it is a drop of that unemptiable fountain of Wisdom."

‖ Gr. only begotten.

23 Kind to man, stedfast, sure, free from care, having all power,

§ 75. After this word "spirit," there follows a series of no less than twenty-one epithets. The number 21 is no doubt deliberately chosen as a product of the two sacred numbers 3×7. (See Gfrörer, Philo, ii. 98.) It is probably from this passage (as Lipsius was the first to suggest) that the Book of Wisdom got its title of Πανάρετος Σοφία, or All-Virtuous Wisdom, or sometimes ἡ Πανάρετος alone;—a title which was extended to the other Sapiential Books, Proverbs and Ecclesiasticus. The word "for" introduces the explanation of the phrase "artificer of all things."

one only.] μονογενές. The marg. suggests the literal rendering, "only begotten" (John i. 14). The meaning is decided by the contrast with the following word. This spirit is at once "unique," yet manifold. Similarly Clemens Romanus speaks of the Phœnix as "unique" (μονογενές).

manifold.] The Spirit of Wisdom, though unique in essence, confers manifold gifts, and works in manifold operations (1 Cor. xii. 4–11).

subtil.] λεπτόν. Lit., "fine," but implying here the sense of "immaterial." Philo employs the word in a similar sense ('De cherub.' 32): λεπτομερὴς γὰρ ἡ φύσις αὐτῆς (τῆς ψυχῆς) ὡς μηδεμίαν ἐμπάρεχειν λαβὴν σώματι. Anaxagoras spoke of the mind as "the subtlest and purest of all things," by which he meant that it was the most incorporeal. Euripides, in some of whose plays the word occurs so frequently as to excite the ridicule of Aristophanes, used it in the sense of "refined."

lively.] εὐκίνητον. In xiii. 11 it is used in the sense of "easily handled;" here it means "swift-moving" (comp. v. 24). An ancient gloss makes it almost equivalent to "ubiquitous" (ὅπου θέλει γινόμενον). Similarly Philo calls the Logos ὀξυκινητότατος ('De cherub.' 9).

clear.] Rather, "penetrative" (τρανὸν, from τετραίνω, "I bore"). The Vulg. renders it disertus, and in the Syriac also it is understood to mean "eloquent" (comp. x. 21; Is. xxxv. 6, τρανὴ ἔσται γλῶσσα μογιλάλων). In classic Greek τρανὴς means "perspicuous." Both penetrative power (ὀξὺ) and perspicuity (σαφὲς) are attributed to the Spirit of Wisdom in the subsequent epithets.

undefiled.] ἀμόλυντόν, immaculate, and incapable of defilement (i. 4).

plain.] σαφές, "transparent," whether in essence or in undeceiving manifestations.

not subject to hurt.] ἀπήμαντον. Nothing can inflict injury on the Spirit of Wisdom. It is impassible, in the same sense as Anaxagoras called the mind ἀπαθῆς. The word is used in this passive sense in 2 Macc. xii. 5; 3 Macc. vi. 5. It might also mean "injuring none," but that would be a feeble epithet in the midst of so glowing an encomium.

loving the thing that is good.] Comp. Ps. xcvii. 10.

quick.] ὀξύ, "piercing." So Philo speaks of the Logos as "the cutter Word" (τομεύς, 'Quis rer. div. haer.'). Comp. Heb. iv. 12.

which cannot be letted.] ἀκώλυτόν, "irresistible."

ready to do good.] Wisdom is the sole true "Euergetes", (comp. Lk. xxii. 25). This epithet represents the active side of the "philanthropy" attributed to Wisdom in the next epithet.

23. Kind to man.] φιλάνθρωπον. The adj. does not occur in either Testament. See note on i. 6. On the other hand, this epithet admirably characterises the tender humanism of Wisdom as illustrated by the Book of Proverbs, with its genial regard for every overseeing all things, and going through all understanding, pure, and most subtil, spirits.

Digitized by Microsoft®

24 For wisdom is more moving than any motion: she passeth and goeth through all things by reason of her pureness.

25 For she is the ‖ breath of the ‖ Or, vapour.

phase and aspect of human life (Prov. xii. 10; xvii. 22; xv. 30; xi. 16; xx. 29, &c.). The Hebrew Wise-man could have said more truly than the Roman comedian, Homo sum; humani nihil a me alienum puto.

"Every way of man, and every expression of his mind and nature, has a charm for him."

stedfast.] βέβαιον, "unchangeable," in spite of its diversity of operation.

sure.] ἀσφαλές, "trustworthy," "forthright," "that may be relied on."

free from care.] ἀμέριμνον. The word implies independence of all anxieties; self-dependence; self-sufficiency.

having all power.] παντοδύναμον, "all-sovereign" (xi. 17; xviii. 15). It is the word rendered "Almighty" in the first clause of the Creed. It does not occur in the O. or N. T., which use παντοκράτωρ. See Pearson 'on the Creed,' art. "Almighty."

overseeing all things.] παντεπίσκοπον. This word is also extremely rare. Comp. i. 6, and πανεπόπτης, 2 Macc. ix. 5.

and going through . . . spirits.] There is nothing so subtle as to resist its permeating power, not even the "spirits" of men or angels. The epithets "understanding" and "subtle" have already been applied to the Spirit of Wisdom; "pure" means free from earthly admixtures (v. 24). Hooker refers to this passage ('Eccl. Pol.' v. lvi. 5).

24. For.] This verse gives the reason for the penetrative and permeating power of Wisdom; namely, because she is infinitely mobile and uncompounded.

more moving than any motion.] A somewhat fantastic expression to imply that her swiftness admits of no earthly comparison (comp. εὐκίνητον, v. 22). The neuter adj. in agreement with a feminine substantive is quite classical, as in ἥδιστον ἡ εὐδαιμονία (Arist. 'Eth. Nic.' i. 5). Varium et mutabile semper Foemina. With the thought we may compare Cowper's lines—

"How fleet is the glance of the mind!
Compared with the speed of its flight,
The tempest itself lags behind,
And the swift-winged arrows of light."

she passeth and goeth through.] These verbs διήκει and χωρεῖ were specially used by the Stoics to describe the universal diffusion of the Godhead, of which Grimm quotes many instances. Wordsworth uses a similar phrase—

"A motion and a spirit that impels
All thinking things, all objects of all thought,
And rolls through all things."

And Pope—

"All are but parts of one stupendous whole,
Whose body Nature is, and God the soul;
That changed through all and yet in all the same,
Great in the earth as in the ethereal frame;
* * * *
Lives through all life, extends through all extent, Spreads undivided, operates unspent."

So, too, the Son of Sirach says of God that "He is the All" (τὸ πᾶν ἐστιν αὐτός, xliii. 27). This must not be confused with mere Pantheism. It is only the recognition of God's all-pervading providence. See Corn. à Lapide on these passages.

goeth through all things by reason of her pureness.] The Spirit of Wisdom is "unessential" in Milton's sense. Compare also the lines:—

"So soft
And uncompounded is their essence pure."
Par. Lost, i. 425.

Tertullian quotes Kleanthes as speaking of "spiritum . . . permeatorem universitatis" ('Apolog.' 21).

With the use of these twenty-one epithets we may compare the fact that Philo ('De confus. linguæ,' Opp. i. 427) calls the Divine Word "a many-named angel" (ἄγγελος πολυώνυμος); and the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews says that God has revealed Himself πολυμερῶς καὶ πολυτρόπως, "fragmentarily and multifariously." The literary form of this passage may have been influenced by a celebrated fragment of the Stoic Kleanthes, preserved in Clemens Alexandrinus ('Protrept.' vi. 72) and Eusebius ('Praep. Ev.' xiii. 3), in which he defines "the good," or the summum bonum, by twenty-six epithets, many of which (e.g., ὅσιον, χρησιμόν, καλόν, αὐθέκαστον, ἀεὶ συμφέρον, ἄλυπον, ἄφοβον, λυσιτελές, ἀνώδυνον, ἄτυφον, σφοδρόν, ἀεὶ διαμένον) are closely analogous to those here used. This accumulation of adjectives (πύργωσις ἐπιθετῶν, as it is technically called) is not unknown in classic poets. In one passage of Aeschylus fifteen epithets are attached in succession to one substantive. The object of the writer in this passage is, however, not by any means exclusively rhetorical. He desires to give some conception of what Wisdom is, by describing her qualities and the results which she produces.

power of God, and a pure influence flowing from the glory of the Almighty: therefore can no defiled thing fall into her.

One careful definition would have been at least equally serviceable. All that is clear is, that by "wisdom" the writer meant much the same as was meant by Solomon in Proverbs (viii. ix.) and by the Son of Sirach in Ecclus. i. We can, therefore, only regard wisdom in its highest sense as a personification of the spiritual power of God which pervades the universe, and expresses itself in all things artistically beautiful, mentally pure, and spiritually noble. Still the writer nearly approaches the attribution to Wisdom of a distinct personality, a separate essence. Wisdom has to him that ideal reality which he, as a partial Platonist, would have regarded as more real than any physical existence. If the Logos of Philo, though never distinctly hypostatised, constantly reminds us of the Eternal Son, so the Wisdom of this book is often spoken of in terms which might be directly applied to the Holy Spirit.

It may be doubted whether the author meant by these epithets all the profound thoughts which commentators have extracted from them. Some of them are intellectual, some moral; some are inherent qualities of personified Wisdom, others are the results of wisdom in the soul of man. Reuss may not be far wrong in seeing in this list of qualities "une énumération faite au hasard au gré d'une rhétorique exubérante."

25-30. The nature and glory of Wisdom.

25. For she is the breath of the power of God.] The "for" is intended to explain why Wisdom is entitled to all these manifold and glorious predicates. This and the following verse are interesting because they were evidently in the mind of the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews in the noble proem to his epistle (Heb. i. 3). The word ἀτμὶς means properly "vapour," as in the marg. (see LXX., Lev. xvi. 13, 30; ἀτμὶς καπνοῦ, Hos. xiii. 3). Compare Job xxxiii. 21; Ecclus. xliii. 4, ἀτμὶς ὑψηλῶν. "I came forth from the mouth of the Most High, and covered the earth like a cloud" (Baruch).

a pure influence flowing from] ἀπόῤῥοια εἰλικρινής, "an unmingled emanation." Compare Ecclus. i. 9, "He poured her out upon all His works." Enoch (xlix. 1, "Wisdom is poured out like water." But the word ἀπόῤῥοια is used of dispersing by Aquila (Ezek. i. 14). Philo ("De monarch." 8) applies the word to the sunbeams, and it was employed by Empedocles and Democritus to express the effluvia by which material objects become perceptible (comp. Plato, "Meno," 76). It is applied to light by Marc. Aurel. (iii. 4) and by Athenagoras, who says ("Apol." 22) that the Holy Spirit is an "effluence of God, flowing from Him . . . like a ray of the sun." Probably, therefore, the writer is thinking, not of water (as in Ecclus. i. 9), but of light, as in the following word, ἀπαύγασμα.

> "Bright effluence of bright essence uncreate.
> Or hear'st thou rather pure ethereal stream, > Whose fountain who shall tell?"
> MILTON, Par. Lost, iii. 8.

"We have here and there a little clear light, some sparks of bright knowledge" (Locke).

pure.] There is nothing therefore in Wisdom which is not divine, for, according to Philo, the epithet εἰλικρινὴς cannot be attached to any sensible things ("De opif." 8). This "purity" of the divine essence of Wisdom explains why she is "holy," "unique," "subtle," "swift," "perspicuous," "immaculate," "resistless."

of the Almighty.] τοῦ Παντοκράτορος. For the distinction between Παντοκράτωρ and Παντεπόπτης, see Pearson, l. c. Παντοκράτωρ implies the possession of force, παντοδύναμος the exercise of sovereignty.

no defiled thing.] She is ἀμόλυντον, v. 22.

can . . . fall into her.] The compound verb παρεμπίπτει describes a sudden, secret infusion of evil, irrepit, rather than the incurrit of the Vulg. The word does not occur in the LXX. or N. T., but is used by Plato and by the Attic orators to imply intrusive and surreptitious agents.

26. brightness.] ἀπαύγασμα. This rare word is adopted by the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews (i. 3), and also occurs in Philo ("De Mund. opif." § 51, where man is called "an impress, a fragment, or apaugasma of the blessed nature;" and in "De concupiscent." 11, "De plantat. Noe," 12, where he defines ἀπαύγασμα as ἀρίστων ἀπαύγασμα, ὡσανεὶ ἀκτῖνα ἀφεγγῆ). Properly speaking, it does not imply reflexion, but emanation. "Wisdom" (in Philo "man," and in Heb. i. 3 "the Son of God") is described as "light of (i.e. from) light" (φῶς ἐκ φωτός). That Philo, however, meant by ἀπαύγασμα not "emanating light," but "reflected light," seems clear from his description of the world as ἀρχέτυπον ἀπαύγασμα, and the word thus resembles ἀντήχημα, "an echo," ἀποσκίασμα, "an adumbration." If this be the meaning here, Wisdom is described as reflecting the glory of God, as in the next clause; just as Philo calls the Logos "the shadow, and as it were copy (ἀπεικόνισμα) of God" ("Leg. Allegg." iii. 31). We cannot, however, be sure that the author of the Book of Wisdom did not use the word

[k] Hebr. 1. 3.
[l] 2 Cor. 4. 4. Col. 1. 15.

26 For she is the [k] brightness of the everlasting light, the unspotted mirror of the power of God, and [l] the image of his goodness.

27 And being but one, she can do all things: and remaining in herself, she [1] maketh all things new: and in all ages entering into holy souls, she maketh them friends of God, and prophets.

28 For God loveth none but him that dwelleth with wisdom.

29 For she is more beautiful than the sun, and above all the order of stars: being compared with the light, she is found before it.

[1] Or, createth.

in the higher sense attributed to it by the lexicographers (Hesych. ἡλίου φέγγος: Suid. Phavor. ἔκλαμψις: Lex. Cyrill. ἄκτις ἡλίου). Wisdom might be described relatively as a reflection, absolutely as an emanation. In the O. T. God is constantly spoken of under images of fire and light, and in 1 John i. 5 we read "God is Light." St. John would have been as anxious as Philo to explain that he did not mean physical light, but "spiritual light," an "unembodied splendour" (ἀσώματος αἰγὴ. φῶς ψυχικὸν). See Siegfried, 'Philo,' 208. 216.

of the everlasting light.] Wisdom is therefore preferable to an earthly light (v. 10). Ἀΐδιος means "everlasting" in the strict sense of the word, without the more metaphysical connotations of αἰώνιος. It only occurs once in the N. T. (Rom. i. 20: Jude 6. In the latter passage it is used rhetorically).

unspotted.] See note on iv. 9.

the power.] ἐνεργείας. By δύναμις is meant power in the abstract: ἐνέργεια is power in operation.

the image.] 1 Cor. xi. 7: 2 Cor. iv. 4: Col. i. 15, iii. 10. For its full meaning of "manifestation," see Bp. Lightfoot's 'Colossians,' pp. 215, 281.

of his goodness.] See note on i. 1. According to Phavorinus, ἀγαθότης has exactly the same meaning as ἀγαθωσύνη, which is attributed to God in 2 Thess. i. 11. On the latter word see Trench, 'New Test. Synonyms,' p. 218. The resemblances to Christian theology in this passage are purely superficial.

27. being but one, she can do all things.] This is an amplification of the epithets "unique" and "manifold" in v. 22. Comp. 1 Cor. xii. 11.

remaining in herself, she maketh all things new.] Ps. cii. 26, 27, "As a vesture shalt Thou change them, and they shall be changed: but Thou art the same." Ps. civ. 30, "Thou renewest (ἀνακαινίζεις) the face of the earth." Wisdom is a permeating spirit, "changed through all, and yet in all the same."

in all ages.] Lit., "throughout the generations."

entering.] διαβαίνουσα, "passing from one to another." Vulg., in animas sanctas se transfert.

friends of God.] It is often difficult to be certain whether the writer is thinking most immediately of expressions which have at least their analogue or germ in Scripture, or of passages in the philosophic writers. Abraham is called "the friend of God" in Is. xli. 8: "Abraham my friend" (אֹהֲבִי, Vulg., amici mei: LXX., ἠγαπημένε: Jas. ii. 23, φίλος θεοῦ ἐκλήθη). The name by which Abraham is universally known in the East—El Khalil—means "the Friend." The term is not, however, exactly applied to him in the LXX., and the writer may have had in his mind such passages as ὁ μὲν σώφρων θεῷ φίλος· ἄνοπλος γάρ (Plato, 'Legg.' iv.): and Philo, πᾶς σοφὸς θεοῦ φίλος (Philo, 'Fr.').

prophets.] "Prophets" are all great moral and spiritual teachers and reformers, whether with or without the power to foretell events. Grimm would confine the term here to the Jewish prophets, because of the writer's burning hatred toward heathendom: and he would similarly confine the bearing of Philo's remark, "The sacred word witnesseth prophecy to every noble-hearted man." But as the Alexandrian Jews recognised the prophetic character of the Sibyls, so they certainly exempted the great Greek philosophers from the abhorrence with which they regarded the coarse and vicious heathens. In this respect the greater Fathers shared their views. They believed in the reality of an ethnic inspiration. Neither Philo nor this writer confined the gift of inspiration to the sacred writers. Philo says that he was sometimes inspired, θεολογούμενα ('De cherub.' 9: 'De migr. Abr.' 7): and Josephus not only attributes inspiration to Hyrcanus ('Antt.' xiii. 10. § 7: and to some Essenes ('B. J.' ii. 8. § 12), but even claims some such power for himself ('B. J.' viii. 3. § 9). See Gfrörer, 'Philo,' i. 54.

28. that dwelleth with wisdom.] Comp. i. 1—5. The verb συνοικεῖν often means "to be married to" (Gen. xx. 3: Prov. xxx. 23): but as it is used with such expressions as "grief," "fear," &c., there is no proof that it has that meaning here.

29. more beautiful than the sun.] God is 30 For after this cometh night: but vice shall not prevail against wisdom.

CHAPTER VIII.

2 He is in love with wisdom: 4 for he that hath it hath every good thing. 21 It cannot be had but from God.

WISDOM reacheth from one end to another mightily: and ‖ sweetly doth she order all things. ‖ Or, profitably.

2 I loved her, and sought her out from my youth, I desired ‖ to make her my spouse, and I was a lover of her beauty. ‖ Or, to marry her to myself.

Light and the Creator of all forms of earthly light, yet Wisdom is nearer to His essence than light itself. Aristotle calls virtue "lovelier than the evening star."

order.] θέσιν. Comp. v. 19.

30. after this cometh night.] Darkness prevails over light in the constant succession of night to day, but vice can never thus displace and prevail against wisdom. With the construction σοφίας . . . ἀντισχύει comp. Matt. xvi. 18. If any one had objected that Solomon himself furnished a proof of the power of vice to prevail over wisdom, the writer would probably have answered that Wisdom never enters into contact with vice, but withdraws from the soul, step by step, as evil enters into it. See i. 3, 5.

CHAPTER VIII.

Universality and rule of Wisdom (1). Solomon's love for her (2) because of her affinity to God (3, 4). She is better than riches (5) and intelligence (6). She teaches the virtues (7) and gives experience and insight (8), and is specially necessary for rulers (9–16). Considering all the blessings which she bestows, and knowing that she comes from God alone, Solomon prayed for Wisdom (17–21).

1. Wisdom reacheth from one end to another.] This verse belongs properly to the last chapter. The word διατείνει has a middle sense, "expands herself." Philo uses this and similar verbs to express the diffusiveness of wisdom. He says that "The universe is held together by unseen powers, which the Creator extended (διέτεινε) from the ends (ἐσχάτων) of the earth to the bounds (περάτων) of heaven" ('De migr. Abr.' § 32).

mightily.] This adverb (εὐρώστως) is not in the Greek Bible, but occurs three times in the 2nd Book of Maccabees. The verb (εὐρωστέω) is used by Philo.

sweetly.] χρηστῶς. Marg., "profitably." Lit., "excellently," "kindly." God's "tender mercies are over all His works."

doth she order.] διοικεῖ (xii. 18; xv. 1); whence comes our word "diocese." The verb was used by the Stoics (Chrysippus, Epictetus, Marc. Aurelius), who decided in the affirmative the question "Is the world managed (διοικεῖται) by forethought?" (Diog. Laert. vii. 133.) It was borrowed from the Stoics by Josephus and Philo. Wisdom is here only another name for the immanent Divine power which sustains and governs the whole order of things. Anaxagoras (Plato, 'Cratyl.' p. 413) spoke of "Mind" as "ordering (κοσμεῖν) all things, going through all things."

2. I loved her.] We have here a stronger expression of the thought touched upon in vii. 7 (comp. Ecclus. li. 13–21). The word used for "loved" (ἐφίλησα, amavi) expresses the love of warm personal affection, and not merely of high esteem (ἠγάπησα, dilexi). Hence we never find in the Bible the phrase φιλεῖν τὸν Θεόν, but always ἀγαπᾶν. On the other hand, φιλεῖν is used of the love of God to Christ (John v. 20) and to redeemed man (id. xvi. 27). In 1 Cor. xvi. 22 we have φιλεῖν used of our love to Christ, as in John xvi. 27, &c. (See Trench, 'N. T. Synonyms,' § xii.)

from my youth.] See 1 K. iii. 1, xviii. 12; Prov. ii. 17; Eccles. xii. 1; Ecclus. vi. 18.

I desired.] ἐζήτησα. Having sought her out (ἐκζητήσας, Vulg. exquisivi), he sought to wed her to himself.

to make her my spouse.] The metaphor is a natural and universal one. (Comp. Ecclus. xv. 2.) It runs throughout the writings of the Mystics—St. Bonaventura, St. Bernard, St. Hugo, and St. Richard de Victore. Luther says, "The Epistle to the Galatians is my Epistle. I have espoused her to myself. It is my wife." This is one of the passages which have been quoted to prove that the writer of the Book of Wisdom belonged to the Therapeutae, of whom Philo says that "they despised bodily pleasures out of love for Wisdom, and eagerness to dwell with her" ('De vit. contempt.' Opp. ii. 482). The inference is obviously of the most precarious kind.

I was.] Rather, "I became;" "I shewed myself."

a lover.] ἐραστής. The word means a lover in the most human sense, and it proves the tendency of mystical language to adopt sensuous images—a tendency which leads writers like St. Jerome, as well as many of the later Mystics, into most unseemly and irreverent expressions. The same word occurs in xv. 6. In the LXX. it is only used by the translator of Jeremiah. Neither the verb ἐράω nor any of its cognates or deriva-

3 In that she is conversant with God, she magnifieth her nobility: yea, the Lord of all things himself loved her.

4 For she is ‖ privy to the mysteries of the knowledge of God, and a ‖ lover of his works.

5 If riches be a possession to be desired in this life; [a] what is richer than wisdom, [b] that worketh all things?

6 And if [c] prudence work; who of all that are is a more cunning workman than she?

7 And if a man love righteousness, her labours are virtues: for she teacheth temperance and prudence, justice and fortitude: which are such

‖ Or, teacher.

‖ Or, chooser.

[a] ch. 7. 8, 9.

[b] ch. 7. 22

[c] Exod. 31. 3, 6.

tives occur in the N. T. The sacred writers who gave depth and universality to such words as ἀγαπή, found the word ἔρως too deeply dyed in heathen associations to be at all redeemable for holy usage.

of her beauty.] Plato ('Phaedr.' 250 d) says that Wisdom (φρόνησις) is invisible to mortal eyes, because otherwise her image would have inspired overwhelming passions. Prodicus, in his famous apologue of the Choice of Hercules, speaks of the comely and winning beauty of Virtue (Xen. 'Mem.' II. i. 22). Aristotle, in his hymn to Virtue, says—

σᾶς περὶ, παρθένε, μορφῆς καὶ θανεῖν ζηλωτὰς ἐν Ἑλλάδι πότμος.

3. conversant with God.] She is the bride of God. The word συμβίωσις—the common life of wife and husband—occurs again in vv. 9, 16. The thought had been already expressed by Solomon (Prov. viii. 22). Philo speaks of God as the Father, and Knowledge as the mother of created things ('De ebriet.,' 8).

she magnifieth her nobility.] This is the right rendering, not "she glorifies the nobility of men." (Vulg., generositatem illius glorificat.) The "nobility" of Wisdom is her divine origin. Comp. Epictet. ii. 8, § 11.

yea.] Vulg., sed et. The word rightly expresses the accumulative force of the καὶ in the original. God loved her, though He is the Lord of all.

4. For.] This is the reason why God loved her. She was ever with Him (Prov. viii. 30).

privy to the mysteries.] Μυστὶς is the feminine of μύστης, which means (1) "one initiated," or (2) μυσταγωγὸς, "a mystagogue," "one who initiates into mysteries." The marg. therefore suggests the alternative rendering "teacher" (Vulg., doctrix).

of the knowledge of God.] The genitive is here not objective, "knowledge about God," but subjective, "God's own knowledge" (comp. John xv. 15).

a lover.] Αἱρετὶς means literally, as in the margin, "a chooser." Vulg., electrix. The extreme rarity of the word led to the numerous variations of the MSS. It is strange that in two consecutive verses the A. V. should select the same word "lover" to render two words so unlike each other as ἐραστὴς and αἱρετίς.

5. that worketh all things.] Ἐργάζεσθαι means "to work," and also "to get gain" or "to trade" (οἱ ἐργαζόμενοι, "tradesmen"). The writer here plays on the interchange of meaning. Heavenly wisdom, as a Divine force, brings about all God's ends; earthly wisdom produces all man's gains (Prov. viii. 18).

6. prudence.] φρόνησις. See on iii. 15; vi. 15. The ideal wife is prudent (Prov. xxxi. 10–31).

work.] There is still a play on the word —"works" and "is gainful" (comp. John vi. 27).

who of all that are.] Rather, "who is more an artificer of the things that are than she?"

workman.] τεχνίτης. Vulg., artifex. "Artisan" or "artificer" would have been a better rendering.

7. her labours.] Here, as often, the abstract is used for the concrete—the results of her toil. (Comp. x. 10; Ecclus. xiv. 15, xxviii. 15.)

she teacheth.] Rather, "she thoroughly teacheth."

temperance and prudence, justice and fortitude.] These are the four "cardinal virtues" of the Platonists, which occur also in 4 Macc. i. 18, v. 22, 23, xv. 7, with the substitution in the latter passages of piety (εὐσέβεια) for prudence (φρόνησις) or fortitude (ἀνδρεία). According to Xenophon, εὐσέβεια was also used by Socrates as one of the cardinal virtues. Philo refers to them, and compares them to the four rivers of Eden ('Leg. Allegg.' i. 19–23). Comp. Ambrose, 'De Parad.' 3. See Siegfried, 'Philo,' 21, 22, 272. The writer interchanges σοφία (v. 5) and φρόνησις (v. 6), "prudence." Plato himself did so in his later writings (Zeller, 'Philos.' ii. 319), from which the Stoics adopted the term φρόνησις. How far the names of these virtues are here used in the senses attached to them by the Greek philosophers is uncertain, since we have no definition of them in things, as men can have nothing more profitable in their life.

Digitized by Microsoft®

8 If a man desire much experience, she knoweth things of old, and conjectureth aright what is to come: she knoweth the subtilties of speeches, and can expound dark sentences: she foreseeth signs and wonders, and the events of seasons and times.

9 Therefore I purposed to take this book. Cicero defines them popularly in 'De Off.' i. 5; 'De Fin.' v. 23. The δικαιοσύνη contemplated by Pseudo-Solomon (see i. 1) was, as it was with Plato, something more than a separate virtue. Still the writer's view of these virtues could not have been identical with Plato's, because that depended on his fundamental trichotomy of human nature into τὸ ἐπιθυμητικόν, τὸ θυμοειδές, τὸ λογιστικόν, which this writer does not recognise (see Ueberweg, 'Hist. of Philos.' i. 128). The allusions to the four cardinal virtues are frequent in the Middle Ages. They are painted by Giotto in the Chapel of the Arena at Padua, and allegorised by Dante—

"Dalla sinistra quattro facean festa,
In porpira vestiti dietro al modo D'una di lor, ch'avea tre ocche in testa."
Purgatorio, xxix. 130.

The virtue which has the three eyes is "Prudence," who sees the Past, the Present, and the Future. They are called "cardinal" virtues because they are, as it were, the hinges (cardines) on which the other virtues turn. Thurot ('De l'Entendement,' i. 162) says that they are rather the necessary and essential conditions of virtue than each individually a virtue. Dr. Whewell considers that the division fails altogether, "since the parts are not distinct, and the whole is not complete. The portions of morality so laid out, both overlap one another or are indistinguishable; and also leave parts of the subject which do not appear in the distribution at all" (Whewell, 'System Mor.' iv.).

8. experience.] Comp. Ecclus. xxv. 6. Already, in vii. 17–21, a knowledge of all arts and sciences has been attributed to Wisdom; here she is spoken of as mistress of all the experience and insight and foresight of which the mind is capable. The A.V. omits the καὶ. "And if any one longs for even wide experience," which is better than earthly wealth. As applied to the future, the word means that Wisdom is versed in the coming issues of events.

conjectureth.] Her knowledge of the past ("cogitavi dies antiquos," Ps. cxliii. 5) helps her to foresight of the future. Homer says of Kalchas ('Il.' i. 70) that "he knew both the present, the future, and the past."

"Multa tenens antiqua, vetusta, sepulta."
ENNIUS.

the subtilties of speeches.] στροφὰς λόγων. This phrase comes from the LXX., Prov. i. 3. Comp. Ecclus. xxxix. 2. The Jews, like all Orientals, delighted in elaborate and recondite forms of expression. Hence στροφὴ is here used (apparently) in a good sense, though both in Greek and in Latin it is used in a bad sense. Ar. 'Plut.' 1154, οὐ δεῖ στροφῶν, "No tricks here!" Plat. 'Rep.' 405 c: πάσας στροφὰς στρέφεσθαι. In Plautus strophae means "slippery wiles," and strophosus = δόλιος.

can expound dark sentences.] Lit., "and solvings of riddles." The Jews were familiar with "riddles" in the ordinary sense of the word (Lat. scirpus), as appears both in Scripture (Judg. xiv. 12, 14) and in the Talmudic legends. The word αἴνιγμα is also used for any "dark saying:" Num. xii. 8; 1 K. x. 1; 2 Chron. ix. 1; Prov. i. 6. In the N. T. the word only occurs in 1 Cor. xiii. 12, δι' ἐσόπτρου ἐν αἰνίγματι. Solomon was renowned for his skill in "riddles" of all kinds (1 Kings x. 1; 2 Chr. ix. 1, LXX.; Ecclus. xlvii. 15, 17). See Bellerman, 'Aenigmata Hebraica,' 1798. "Manifestis pascimur," says Augustine, "obscuris exercemur" ('De doctr. Christ.' ii. 6). He calls a riddle "obscura allegoria" ('De Trinitate,' xv. 19), and points to Prov. xxx. 15 as a specimen.

signs and wonders.] The words are again conjoined in x. 16, in the Gospels (Matt. xxiv. 24; Mk. xiii. 22; John iv. 48), in the Acts, and in the Epistles. Σημεῖον, the favourite word of St. John, indicates a miracle regarded as a proof of the power by which it was worked; τέρας means a miracle which excites the astonishment of those who witness it. The word "foreseeth" shews that the writer is here speaking of prophecies, and of portents and prodigies exhibited for a divine purpose in the sphere of natural phenomena. It appears from xi. 19–21; xix. 6, 18–21, that the writer regarded "miracles" as results produced by God in accordance with laws which are themselves natural, although they transcend the ordinary workings of nature. They are (to use St. John's term) the ordinary ἔργα of God.

the events of seasons and times.] By "times" the writer means the longer periods or epochs of history; by "seasons" he means the decisive crises and turning points in human affairs. The words are joined in Dan. ii. 21; Acts i. 27; 1 Thess. v. 1. Wisdom knows "the issues" or "outcome" of all human events; both of these in which "God shews all things her to me to live with me, knowing that she ‖ would be a counsellor of good things, and a comfort in cares and grief.

Digitized by Microsoft®

‖ Gr. will.

10 For her sake I shall have estimation among the multitude, and honour with the elders, though I be young.

11 [d] I shall be found of a quick conceit in judgment, and shall be admired in the sight of great men.

[d] 1 Kings 3. 28.

12 [e] When I hold my tongue, they shall bide my leisure, and when I speak, they shall give good ear unto me: if I talk much, they shall lay their hands upon their mouth.

[e] Job 29. 8, 9, 10.

13 Moreover [f] by the means of her I shall obtain immortality, and leave behind me an everlasting memorial to them that come after me.

[f] ver. 17.

14 I shall ‖ set the people in order, and the nations shall be subject unto me.

‖ Or, govern.

15 Horrible tyrants shall be afraid, in the slow history of their ripening," and of those in which the intense action of a few years exerts an influence over many generations.

9–16. The writer here passes from the general blessings conferred by Wisdom on mankind, to those which she specially confers on rulers both in their public (9–15) and in their private life (16).

9. I purposed.] Ἔκρινα, "I decided" (as in 1 Cor. ii. 2).

to live with me.] Ἀγαγέσθαι (v. 2) πρὸς συμβίωσιν (see note on v. 3).

a counsellor of good things.] σύμβουλος ἀγαθῶν. The parallel clause shews the meaning to be "an adviser in prosperity." The genitive ἀγαθῶν cannot properly mean this, but seems to be used by a sort of false analogy.

a comfort in cares and grief.] No other instance is quoted in which παραίνεσις has this meaning. In classical Greek it means "an exhortation." It does not occur in the LXX. nor in the N. T., but is used by Symmachus in Ps. cxix. 100 in the sense of "precepts." The Lexicographers do not give it the sense of "consolation," but it is obvious that "an admonition" (e.g. to bear sorrows bravely) may come as a consolation, and this is the sense involved in the Vulg. allocutio.

10. among the multitude.] In all public gatherings. Comp. 1 K. iii. 28.

though I be young.] This allusion is valuable, as shewing that the writer is speaking throughout in the person of Solomon at the beginning of his reign, and in the zenith of his power and wisdom. It thus becomes needless for him to enter into any of the questions suggested by the fact that his ideal teacher in the ways of Divine Wisdom himself became a conspicuous example of unwisdom and self-indulgence. What was the exact age of Solomon when he came to the throne we cannot tell; but in his prayer at Gibeon he says, "I am but a little child" (1 K. iii. 7), and David speaks of him as "young and tender" when the people first swore allegiance to him (1 Chron. xxix. 1; comp. xxii. 5). "How wise wast thou in thy youth!" Ecclus. xlvii. 14. Josephus ('Antt.' viii. 7, § 8) says that he was fourteen at his accession.

11. of a quick conceit in judgment.] An obvious allusion to 1 K. iii. 16–28. "Conceit" is used in the Elizabethan sense of the word to mean "understanding." It is derived from the Latin conceptum. Hence in our Translators' preface "If any man conceit" means "if any suppose." of great men.] Lit., "of potentates." An allusion to the respect felt for Solomon by Hiram (1 K. v. 7, ix. 14), Pharaoh (1 K. ix. 24), the Queen of Sheba (1 K. x. 5–9), and other rulers (1 K. iv. 24).

12. when I speak.] The verse indicates the deep and universal admiration for Solomon's wisdom, as excelling "the wisdom of all the children of the east country, and all the wisdom of Egypt." He "was wiser than all men" (1 K. iv. 30, 31). The form of the passage is influenced by Job xxix. 7–11.

if I talk much.] λαλοῦντος ἐπὶ πλεῖον. Vulg., sermocinante me plura, "if I extend my discourse."

they shall lay their hands upon their mouth.] In sign of deep and humble respect: Judg. xviii. 19; Job xxi. 5, xxix. 9, xl. 4. Comp. Ps. xxxi. 9.

"Conticuere omnes intentique ora tenebant." VIRG.

13. by the means of her.] Rather, "on her account" (δι' αὐτήν), as in v. 10.

immortality.] Here, as the context shews, "undying fame." The word first occurs in the writings of Plato (see v. 17; iv. 1; xv. 3).

14. I shall set . . . in order.] Διοικήσω. See v. 1.

the people.] The tribes subject to me (1 Kings iv. 24) as far as the Euphrates.

the nations.] The Gentiles (Goîm).

15. Horrible tyrants.] Perhaps the writer is when they do but hear of me; I shall ‖ Or, appear. ‖ be found good among the multitude, and valiant in war.

Digitized by Microsoft®

16 ‖ After I am come into mine house, I will repose myself with her: for her conversation hath no bitterness; and to live with her hath no sorrow, but mirth and joy.

17 Now when I considered these things in myself, and [g] pondered them in my heart, how that to be allied unto wisdom [h] is immortality;

18 And great pleasure it is to have her friendship; and in the works of her hands are infinite riches; and in the exercise of conference with her, prudence; and in talking with her, a ‖ good report; I went about seeking how to ‖ take her to me.

19 For I was a witty child, and had a good spirit.

20 Yea rather, being good, I came into a body undefiled.

21 Nevertheless, when I perceived

‖ Or, Being entered into mine house.

[g] Prov. 7. 3.

[h] ver. 13.

‖ Or, fame.

‖ Or, marry her.

thinking of Pharaoh and other Gentile kings whose daughters Solomon married.

valiant in war.] Solomon was never engaged in any actual war, but the whole characterisation is ideal. In the description of a perfect king, a "good and valiant," the writer may have silently recalled Homer's description of Agamemnon as "both a good king and a stalwart warrior"— ἀμφότερον βασιλεύς τ' ἀγαθός, κράτερός τ' αἰχμητής.

Plutarch says that this line was constantly on the lips of Alexander the Great.

16. After I am come into mine house.] Wisdom confers domestic peace as well as public glory.

mirth and joy.] Comp. 1 Macc. v. 54. "Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace" (Prov. iii. 17). Various expressions in this ideal picture of Wisdom shew that the writer had read Prodicus's famous and beautiful apologue, "The Choice of Hercules" (Xen. 'Mem.' ii.).

17, 18. A recapitulation.

17. immortality.] See v. 13. The word is here used in its loftier sense of personal immortality.

18. great pleasure.] "Pure delight," v. 16.

infinite riches.] V. 5; vii. 14.

in the exercise of conference with her.] Συγγυμνασία, "fellow-exercise," is a late Greek word, used also by Plutarch. It means the wrestling of soul required by intercourse with Wisdom, and aided by her.

a good report.] "Glory," v. 15.

to take her to me.] Marg., "to marry her." Εἰς ἐμαυτὸν has the same sense as εἰς ἐμαυτοῦ, "into my own house."

19-21. Wisdom only obtainable from God by prayer.

19. a witty child.] The English word "witty" is here used in its former sense of "clever" (Vulg. ingeniosus), as in Prov. viii. 12. Judith xi. 23, "Thou art beautiful in thy countenance, and witty in thy words." The word εὐφυής, "well-natured," degenerated in meaning (just as "witty" has done, but to an even greater extent) till it came to mean jocose, like εὐτράπελος, or even βωμολόχος. Here it is used in its best sense, to imply excellent natural disposition, as in Arist. 'Eth. Nic.' iii. 5, 17. Possibly, however, the writer intended it to mean merely "comely," and to imply that the bodily beauty of Solomon was perfected by the assignment to him of a nobler soul. Jewish legends made Solomon as supreme in loveliness as in wisdom. The thought would then resemble that of Virgil—but we must not import into it any fancies about pre-established harmony. The interpretation of the passage as a prophecy of Christ (Aug. 'De Gen.' ad lit. x. 18) belongs to the uncritical and unhistorical misapplications of Scripture which occupy so large a part of exegesis.

"Gratior et pulchro veniens in corpore virtus;"

had a good spirit.] Lit., "I obtained as my lot a good soul,"—an expression on which we need not dwell, because the writer proceeds, in the next clause, to correct it, and to intimate the view which he took of the relations between the soul and body. By a "good" soul is meant a soul naturally inclined to virtue—endowed with good dispositions.

20. Yea rather.] The last clause needed correction in two respects: (1) It involved the use (however accidental and cursory) of "I" in the sense of "my body;" and (2) it left room for a possible error, if any understood the word ἔλαχον to imply the godless opinion that the possession of a "good soul" was a matter of haphazard (ii. 2). In this clause he uses "I" of the soul, and treats the body as its mere receptacle (σκεῦος, 2 Cor. iv. 7; 1 Thess. iv. 4. Comp. vas, Lucret. iii. 441; Cic. 'Tusc. Disp.' i. 5).

being good, I came into a body undefiled.] This clause opens the way for endless inferential speculations. St. Augustine, for instance, claims it as a support of Creathat I could not otherwise obtain her, except God gave her me; and that was a point of wisdom also to know whose gift she was; I ‖ prayed unto the Lord, and besought him, and with my whole heart I said, tianism (the view that each separate soul is created immediately by God) as against Traducianism (the view that our souls are derived from our parents ex traduce, in the ordinary process of birth). There can be no doubt that the former, whatever may be its difficulties, is the view implied by Scripture (Eccles. iii. 21, xii. 7; Zech. xii. 1, "the Lord who . . . formed the spirit of man within him"). We need not enter into such controversies, because our only object is to explain the meaning of the writer. It is clear then that this passage implies the author's belief in the pre-existence (προύπαρξις) of souls. Compare Dante, 'Purgatorio,' xvi. 85–90:

Digitized by Microsoft®

‖ Or, went.

"Esce di mano a lui, che la vagheggia
Prima che sia, a guisa di fanciulla, Che piangendo e ridendo pargoleggia.
L'anima semplicetta, che sa nulla
Salvo che, mossa da lieto Fattore Volentier torna a ciò che la trastulla;"

and xxv. 68–73 ["know that so soon as the articulation of the brain is complete, the Mover turns to it with joy, and breathes into it a new spirit"].

We find the same thought in Wordsworth's

"Not in entire forgetfulness,
Nor yet in utter nakedness,
But trailing clouds of glory do we come From God, who is our home."

Here, however, the Roman Catholic commentators found themselves involved in a difficulty. The doctrine of the pre-existence of souls was condemned as heretical by the Second Council of Constantinople; and yet the Apocrypha was regarded as inspired. It followed, in accordance with the rule so fatal to all sound and honest exegesis, that the passage must be forced into accordance with orthodox dogma. One way of doing this was to take μᾶλλον with ἀγαθός, as is done by the Vulgate ("Et cum essem magis bonus"), and to explain it to mean, "when I became better," or "after making progress in goodness," in consequence of good training (Luther, Osiander, Calov), or of special grace (Bonaventura). Protestants, who regarded the doctrine of pre-existent souls as militating against their view of original sin, either looked on the passage as a proof that the book is not canonical and not inspired (Buddeus); or if they belonged to the school of Hengstenberg and Stier, which undertook a defence of the Apocryphal orthodoxy, they explained the verse away by rendering ἦλθον as a pluperfect, "I had come," or adopted other impossible means of reconciling the writer's view with that of the Protestant Confessions. See Grimm on this passage. The translation of the verse is perfectly simple. Even if (with Schmid) we could make παῖς the nominative to ἦλθον, the clause cannot be tortured into the meaning that he acquired bodily purity as he grew up. Setting aside these efforts to make the passage express the doctrinal views of the commentators, it is obvious that the words can only bear one sense; namely, that the soul exists before and apart from the body. This was the general belief of the Jews at this epoch. It is found in Philo, who held that Gen. i. 27 narrated the creation of a "heavenly" and "sexless" man ('Leg. Allegg.' i. 12, 28; ii. 4); and that Gen. ii. 15 described his reception of (λαμβάνειν) "a created mind" (ὁ ποιηθεὶς νοῦς, ib. 28), which was pre-existent and perfect (ib. i. 30). See also 'De Somn.' 22; 'De Gigant.' ii. 3; and Siegfried, 'Philo,' p. 242. It is also found in the current opinion of the Essenes, who believed in the transmigration of souls ('B. J.' II. viii. § 11); in the Kabbalah ('Zohar.' ii. 96); and in the Talmud generally. The Jews held that all the unborn souls of Jews were summoned to Sinai to hear the moral law, and that before birth the soul of every human being was taken to see both Paradise and Gehenna, that it might learn the rewards of virtue and the penalty of sin. Some have found precarious traces of this view in John ix. 2, and in Deut. xxix. 14, 15; Job xxxviii. 21. The Alexandrians derived it from Plato and the Stoics ('Phaedr.' 248, c). The doctrine of pre-existence was openly held by Synesius even after he became a bishop. The views of St. Augustine may be found in 'De libero Arbitrio,' i. and iv.; 'Ep.' cxx. A panegyrist on Theodosius says, "Sive ille divinus animus venturus in corpus dignum metatur hospitium, sive cum venerit fingit habitaculum pro habitu suo." Pseudo-Solomon differs, however, both from the Stoics and from Philo in that he does not dwell on the body as irredeemably evil, or as the tomb of the soul (σῶμα = σῆμα); nor does he hold that only the sensuously-inclined souls (ἴνγγί τινι φυσικῇ κατασπωμέναι, Jos. l. c.) become incorporated with bodies. His view is that souls are created "good" or "bad," in the sense that they are more or less well- or ill-disposed; or at any rate that they may have become good or bad in previous states of existence.

21. I could not otherwise obtain her.] Some would render the words ὅτι οὐκ ἄλλως ἔσομαι ἐγκρατὴς "that otherwise I shall not be temperate," or "have mastery over myself."

Digitized by Microsoft®

CHAPTER IX.

1 A prayer unto God for his wisdom, 6 without which the best man is nothing worth, 13 neither can he tell how to please God.

O GOD of my fathers, and Lord of mercy, [a] who hast made all things with thy word,

2 And ordained man through thy wisdom, that he should [b] have dominion over the creatures which thou hast made,

3 And order the world according to equity and righteousness, and execute judgment with an upright heart:

[a] Gen. 1. Ps. 33. 9. John 1. 3.

[b] Gen. 1 28. Ps. 8. 6.

The Vulgate (quoniam aliter non possem esse continens) might have this meaning, but may also intend the same as the A. V. No doubt "continence," in the sense of mastery over bodily desires, was regarded by the writer as an essential element of Wisdom (ix. 15); nor is the incontinence of Solomon any argument against this rendering, since the writer has before him both an ideal and a youthful Solomon (v. 10). Ἐγκρατὴς has the meaning of "chaste" in Ecclus. xxvi. 15, and in Tit. i. 8 (where alone it occurs in the N. T.). On the other hand, the more common meaning of ἐγκρατὴς is compos voti; and although the genitive is almost invariably expressed (ἐγκρ. γνώσεως, Ecclus. xv. 1, &c.), yet in Ecclus. vi. 27 we find ἐγκρατὴς γενόμενος μὴ ἀφῇς αὐτήν, "when thou hast got hold of her (Wisdom), let her not go." It is true that there the σοφίας is easily supplied; but so it is in this passage, for σοφία is the subject of the whole chapter and of the whole book, though φρόνησις (in its lower sense) is a prominent substantive in these clauses. The A. V. is therefore probably right.

and that was a point of wisdom also.] The meaning is, "Yea and this (τοῦτο, the following) required thoughtful intelligence;" namely, to know to whose gift of grace wisdom belongs. Jas. i. 5, 17.

with my whole heart.] Deut. vi. 5; Josh. xxii. 5.

CHAPTER IX.

Solomon's Prayer for Wisdom.

An appeal to the love of God as the Creator (1–4), because Solomon is but weak and human, and needs wisdom (5, 6) as a king (7), and that he may build the Temple (8); since without the guidance of Wisdom and her universal knowledge he cannot rule worthily (9–12). For man is ignorant (13), feeble (14), sensuous (15), and incapable of knowing heavenly or spiritual things (16, 17), and Wisdom is the only Saviour of mankind (18).

1. God of my fathers.] This form of address is derived from Gen. xxxii. 9. The vocative Θεέ of the original is only used in late Greek. The prayer in this chapter is suggested by the prayer of Solomon in 1 K iii. 6–9 and 2 Chron. i. 8–10.

Lord of mercy.] The title concentrates the force of the very numerous passages of Scripture which speak of mercy as the most essential among the Divine attributes: Ex. xxxiv. 7; Num. xiv. 18; Ps. lxxxvi. 15, &c. God is called in the N. T. "the Father of uttermost compassion" (πατὴρ τῶν οἰκτιρμῶν, 2 Cor. iii. 1), and the "God of all grace" (1 Pet. v. 10). Some MSS. read "Lord of thy mercy." In a striking passage of the Talmud we find the story of Rabbi Ishmael ben Elishah, who, entering into the Holy of Holies, saw Acathriel Jah, Lord of Sabaoth, sitting on a throne, and prayed: "May it please Thee to cause Thy mercy to subdue Thy anger; may it be revealed above Thy other attributes; and mayst Thou deal with Thy children according to the quality of mercy." And it seemed as though God was pleased at the prayer. ('Berakhoth,' f. 7. 1.) It is well known that every sura of the Koran begins with the words "In the name of God the Compassionate, the Merciful." One of Mohammed's traditional sayings is, "When God created the creation, He wrote a book, which is near Him upon the sovran throne, and what is written is this, 'Verily my compassion overcometh my wrath.'" Comp. Jas. ii. 13, κατακαυχᾶται ἔλεος κρίσεως.

with thy word.] Ps. xxxiii. 6. This is parallel to "by thy wisdom" in the next verse. Both "word" and "wisdom" may sometimes be used in the Philonian sense of a personified, though not incarnate, Logos; but it is much more probable that in a prayer based on Old Testament analogies the words bear their ordinary sense: Gen. i. 2; Ecclus. xlii. 15.

2. through thy wisdom.] Christ is called "the power of God and the wisdom of God" in 1 Cor. i. 24: but expressions like these in the Book of Wisdom only dimly prefigure the future revelation.

that he should have dominion.] Gen. i. 26–30; Ps. viii. 6–8; Ecclus. xvii. 4.

the creatures.] The word κτίσμα properly means "a building" (Hesych. οἰκοδόμημα) or "a colony" (Strabo). It does not occur in the LXX., and in the N. T. only in 1 Tim.

Digitized by Microsoft®

[c] 1 Kings 3. 9.

4 Give [c] me wisdom, that sitteth by thy throne; and reject me not from among thy children:

[d] Ps. 86. 16. & 116. 16.

5 For I [d] thy servant and son of thine handmaid am a feeble person, and of a short time, and too young for the understanding of judgment and laws.

6 For though a man be never so perfect among the children of men, yet if thy wisdom be not with him, he shall be nothing regarded.

7 Thou hast chosen me to be a [e] king of thy people, and a judge of thy sons and daughters:

[e] 1 Chron. 28. 5. 2 Chron. 1. 9.

8 [f] Thou hast commanded me to build a temple upon thy holy mount, and an altar in the city wherein thou

[f] 2 Sam. 7. 12, 13.

iv. 4; Jas. i. 18; Rev. v. 13, viii. 9, where it has the same sense as here, and in xiii. 4, 5, viz. "a created thing."

3. equity and righteousness.] Rather, "holiness and righteousness." The same words are conjoined in Luke i. 75; Eph. iv. 24. Even in Plato we find the definition that ὅσιος refers to holiness towards God, and δίκαιος to just conduct towards men ('Gorg.' 507, b). Man's dominion over the material universe and its living inhabitants is indeed to be absolute (ἵνα δεσπόζῃ), but it is not to be arbitrary and tyrannical.

execute judgment.] That is, "maintain his rule." See note on i. 1. Here the phrase is applied to the dominion of man over the world.

with an upright heart.] So, too, in 1 K iii. 6. Solomon prays that he may govern "in uprightness of heart."

4. Give me wisdom.] The writer has not overlooked the fact that man must do his part as well as God, and that, while he thus prays for wisdom, he must also by moral purity and faithfulness strive after its attainment (i. 1–5, &c.). "Nur durch ein göttliches Leben wird der Mensch Gottes inne" (Jacobi).

that sitteth by.] The metaphorical expression that Wisdom is "the Assessor of God's throne" is founded on Prov. viii. 30, 31, "Then was I by Him." Comp. Ecclus. i. 1. So in the classic poets the words πάρεδρος, σύνθρονος, σύνεδρος (τῷ θεῷ) are applied to Justice, Righteousness, Themis, &c. (Pind. 'Ol.' viii. 22; Soph. 'O. C.' 1382; Eur. 'Iph. Aul.' 192, &c.; Philo, 'Vit. Mos.' ii.)

thy throne.] Lit., "thy thrones." The pluralis excellentiae for "throne," as in v. 12; xviii. 15. The use of this plural in Dan. vii. 9 led to a great and important controversy among the Jewish Rabbis. The true rendering of that verse is "the thrones were placed," and in the discussion about the plural Rabbi Iddith said that a second throne was placed for Metatron (μεταθρόνιος). In all such speculations we trace the dim influence of Christian doctrine, and the instinctive yearning for "a Mediator between God and man, the Man Christ Jesus." See 'Yevamoth,' f. 16. 2; 'Chagigah,' f. 14. 2; 'Sanhedrin,' f. 38. 2.

reject me not.] Ἀποδοκιμάζω means "I test, and reject." Thus in Jer. vi. 30, ἀργύριον ἀποδεδοκιμασμένον means silver "tested and found to be spurious." Hence the word ἀδόκιμος, "reprobate:" Is. i. 22; 2 Cor. xiii. 6; 2 Tim. iii. 8; Heb. vi. 8, &c.

from among thy children.] See ii. 13.

5. thy servant and son of thine handmaid.] Ps. lxxxvi. 16; cxvi. 16.

a feeble person, and of a short time.] Ps. lxxxix. 47.

too young.] Comp. viii. 10. Founded on 1 K. iii. 7.

6. shall be nothing regarded.] Lit., "shall be reckoned for nought." Man's "nothing-perfect," even when it is perfect relatively to human estimate, becomes valueless in contrast with "God's All-complete." 1 Cor iii. 19, "The wisdom of this world is folly with God," and "the foolishness of God is wiser than men" (id. i. 25). Compare also 2 Cor. xiii. 1–3.

7. hast chosen me.] Lit., "chosen me beforehand" or "by preference," "before all the house of my father," 1 Chron. xxviii. 5. An allusion to the prophecy of Nathan to David (2 Sam. vii. 12–14).

of thy sons and daughters.] The rarity of the latter expression ("daughters of God") is due perhaps to the depressed condition of Eastern womanhood. It occurs in Is. xliii. 6; 2 Cor. vi. 18. The Jews are here regarded as being God's "sons and daughters," not because God is "the Father from whom every fatherhood is named," but in a special and peculiar sense.

8. to build a temple.] 2 Sam. vii. 13; Ex. xxv. 40.

upon thy holy mount.] Moriah. It was hallowed by the tradition of the Jews that there Abraham had slain the ram in place of Isaac; and by the vision of the Angel to David on the threshing-floor of Araunah. Afterwards it was called "the holy hill," because of the Temple (Ps. xxiv. 3; xlviii. 1; lxxxvii. 1, &c.). The Jews spoke of it as dwellest, [g] a resemblace of the holy tabernacle, [h] which thou hast prepared from the beginning.

9 And [i] wisdom was with thee: which knoweth thy works, and was present when thou madest the world, and knew what was acceptable in thy sight, and right in thy commandments.

10 O send her out of thy holy heavens, and from the throne of thy glory, that being present she may labour with me, that I may know what is pleasing unto thee.

11 For she knoweth and understandeth all things, and she shall lead me soberly in my doings, and preserve me ‖ in her power.

12 So shall my works be acceptable, and then shall I judge thy people righteously, and be worthy to sit in my father's seat.

13 For [k] what man is he that can know the counsel of God? or [g] Hebr. 8. 5.

[h] Matt. 25. 34. Hebr. 11. 10.
[i] Prov. 8. 22. John 1. 1, 2, 3, 10.
‖ Or, by her power, or, glory.
[k] Isai. 40. 13. Ecclus. 1. 6. Rom. 11. 34. 1 Cor. 2. 16.

"the Hill of the House." These phrases were probably later than Solomon's days.

in the city wherein thou dwellest.] Lit., "of thine encampment." Comp. LXX. 2 Chron. vi. 21. Jerusalem was called "the City of God" (Ps. xlvi. 5; lxxxvii. 3). It is still called "The Holy, the Noble" (El Koodsh es Shereef). With the word κατασκήνωσις compare Heber's lines:

"Ye guardian saints! ye warrior sons of Heaven,
To whose high charge Judea's state was given!
Oh wont of old your nightly watch to keep,
A host of gods on Sion's towery steep!"

a resemblance.] Lit., "an imitation." The word is in apposition both to "temple" and "altar." The allusion is to Ex. xxv. 40, "Look that thou make them after their pattern, which was shewed thee in the mount;" Acts vii. 44; Heb. viii. 5.

which thou hast prepared from the beginning.] Rather, "which thou preparedst." The same verb is used in Ex. xv. 17; Prov. iii. 19. The various allusions to the heavenly archetype of the earthly tabernacle were seized upon both by superstition and by philosophy. The literalist school of Jewish Rabbis, those who devoted themselves to the Halakhah and spent their lives in glorifying the minutiae of ritual, said that there was in heaven an actual material temple and altar of fire corresponding to the real ones ('Menachoth,' f. 29. 1).

On the other hand, the Alexandrian school of Jewish hagadists and philosophers eagerly applied these passages to support the doctrine of ideas, and expanded them into the conception that all things have an eternal archetype, and that

"Earth
Is but the shadow of heaven, and things therein
Each to the other like more than on earth is thought."

As a matter of fact, Solomon's temple diverged very widely from the tabernacle in the wilderness, and therefore from "the pattern in the mount." The conception of "a heavenly tabernacle" is found in Heb. viii. 2, ix. 11; Rev. xiii. 6. Clement of Alexandria ('Strom.' iv. 8) calls the earthly Church "an image (εἰκὼν) of the heavenly."

from the beginning.] The phrase might be used in its ordinary scriptural sense (Is. xlv. 21, &c.), in which it is equivalent to "from the dawn of Jewish or of human history," "from the foundation of the world" (Rev. xiii. 8). Many Alexandrian readers of the book would, however, interpret such expressions in accordance with the philosophy of Eternal Ideas which they fancied that they could read into Scripture. That such notions were in harmony with those of the author appears from his remarks on the High Priest's robes (xviii. 24).

9. wisdom was with thee.] The verse expresses exactly the same thoughts as Prov. viii. 22–31.

acceptable in thy sight.] Gen. xvi. 10.

right in thy commandments.] Εὐθὲς is often used in the LXX. (for εὐθὺ) as a translation of טוֹב, "good." The writer implies that even the works of the natural creation were carried out in accordance with moral laws.

10. out of . . . from.] The prepositions ἐξ and ἀπὸ are here correctly used, the former meaning "from within," and the latter merely "from;" but that the writer paid no special heed to these distinctions appears from his reversing the expressions in xviii. 15, ἀπ' οὐρανῶν ἐκ θρόνων. The A. V. omits the "send" (πέμψον) of the second clause.

11. in her power.] Rather, "in her glory." Her glory—an emanation of the divine glory (vii. 26)—shall be like a protecting atmosphere around me. The Jews sometimes spoke of the Shechinah as an overshadowing tent.

12. acceptable.] Προσδεκτὰ is a rare word, which only occurs in Prov. xi. 20; xvi. 16 (LXX.). The word rendered "acceptable" in v. 9 is ἀρεστόν.

seat.] "Thrones," as in v. 4; Ps. cxxi. 5.

13. For.] He gives the reason why it is so

Digitized by Microsoft®

who can think what the will of the Lord is?

14 For the thoughts of mortal men are ‖ miserable, and our devices are but uncertain.

15 For the corruptible body presseth down the soul, and [l] the earthy tabernacle weigheth down the mind that museth upon many things.

16 And hardly do we guess aright at things that are upon earth, and with labour do we find the things that are ‖ before us: but the things that are in heaven who hath searched out?

‖ Or, fearful.

[l] 2 Cor. 5. 1, 4.

‖ Gr. at hand.

necessary for him to seek wisdom from God. The passage closely resembles Is. xl. 13, 14; Rom. xi. 34, 35; 1 Cor. ii. 16. Comp. Job xxxvi. 22, 23, 26.

14. For the thoughts of mortal men are miserable.] Rather, "the reasonings of mortals are timid," i.e. vacillating and uncertain, or "wretched." Δειλοὶ is used but seldom in the LXX., and may have either meaning. In the N. T. it has the former sense (Matt. viii. 26; Rev. xxi. 8). Comp. 1 Cor. iii. 20, "The Lord knoweth the thoughts (διαλογισμοὺς) of man that they are vain" (Ps. xciv. 11).

are but uncertain.] ἐπισφαλεῖς, "unstable." Comp. ἐπισφαλῶς, iv. 4; Acts xxvii. 9. The word does not occur in the LXX.

15. the corruptible body presseth down the soul.] The writer does not say that matter is inherently evil, but he evidently shares the feelings of many schools of philosophy which looked on the body as a burden. See Cic. 'Somn. Scip.' 3. For the views of Philo see Siegfried, pp. 235–237. He goes so far as to call the body an "utterly polluted prison" (παμμίαρον δεσμωτήριον, 'De Migr. Abr.' 2; Opp. i. 437). Josephus also says that the soul suffers harm from its close union with the body ('c. Ap.' ii. 24). These views are derived from Plato, who says ('Phaed.' 83, d) that "each pleasure and pain has, as it were, a nail, and nails down the soul to the body, and fastens it to the body and makes it corporeal." Plotinus "blushed that he had a body;" and through the Neo-Platonists there filtered down to the Fathers, and from them to the Middle Ages, the notion that the body was a source of all corruption, and was to be crushed as an enemy. St. Francis of Assisi spoke of his body as "my brother, the ass," and the Curé d'Ars as "ce cadavre." presseth down the soul.] Compare Hor. 'Sat.' ii. 77–79:—

> "Quin corpus onustum > Hesternis vitiis animam quoque praegravat una,
> Atque affigit humi divinae particulam aurae."

The phrase may be borrowed from Plato ('Phaedo,' 81, c), where he speaks of the body as ἐμβριθὲς and βαρύ, and says that the soul is "weighed down" (βαρύνεται) by its earthiness. So, too, Seneca ('Ep.' 65), "Corpus hoc animi pondus et poena est: premente illo urgetur, in vinculis est."

the earthy tabernacle.] The body is often compared to a tent: Is. xxxviii. 12, "a shepherd's tent;" Job iv. 19, "them that dwell in houses of clay;" 2 Cor. v. 4, "We that are in this tabernacle, do groan, being burdened;" 2 Pet. i. 13, "As long as I am in this tabernacle." St. John says that the Word "tabernacled (ἐσκήνωσεν) among us" (i. 14). So, too, Plato called the body "an earthy tabernacle" (γήϊνον σκῆνος, ap. Clem. Alex. 'Strom.' v. 593), and "a house that is united with the soul" ('De Somn.' i. 20); Hippocrates, 'Aphor.' viii. 18, ἀπολείπουσα ἡ ψυχὴ τοῦ σώματος σκῆνος. Aelian uses it even of animals, τὸ λοιπὸν τοῦ ζώου σκῆνος ('H. Animal.' v. 3).

> "Here in the body pent, > Afar from Him I roam,
> Yet nightly pitch my moving tent
> A day's march nearer home."
> J. MONTGOMERY.

Longfellow speaks of death as > "Nought but a step into the open air

> Out of a tent already luminous > With light, that shines through its transparent folds."

the mind that museth upon many things.] Vulg., multa cogitantem, "the much-pondering" mind. "Mind" is here only a varied phrase for "soul" in the previous clause. The writer nowhere recognises the Platonic trichotomy of the being of man. Πολυφροντὶς more often means "full of care," but that sense is here unsuitable to the context.

16. things that are upon earth, &c.] We have but an imperfect inkling (viii. 8) of earthly phenomena (vii. 20), and the discovery of what immediately concerns us requires labour; who then can track out (vi. 22) the secret things which are known only to God? The antithesis is the same as in John iii. 12. Comp. 4 Esdr. iv. 21: "They that dwell upon the earth can understand nothing but what is upon the earth; and he who is above the heavens, what is above the height of the heavens."

the things that are in heaven.] Comp. our Lord's words to Nicodemus: "If I have told you earthly things and ye believe not, how shall ye believe if I tell you of heavenly things?" (John iii. 12.)

Digitized by Google

17 And thy counsel who hath known, [m] except thou give wisdom, and send thy Holy Spirit from above?

[m] 1 Cor. 2. 10.

18 For so the ways of them which lived on the earth were reformed, and men were taught the things that are pleasing unto thee, and were saved through wisdom.

CHAPTER X.

1 What wisdom did for Adam, 4 Noe, 5 Abraham, 6 Lot, and against the five cities, 10 for Jacob, 13 Joseph, 16 Moses, 17 and the Israelites.

SHE preserved the first formed father of the world, that was created alone, and brought him out of his fall.

17. thy counsel who hath known?] God's counsel is known only to Wisdom (*vv.*9–12) and to those to whom she partially reveals it (v. 18).

thy Holy Spirit.] See on vii. 22, 25. The verse must not of course be interpreted in the full sense of modern doctrine; but the thought is similar to that in 1 Cor. ii. 10–12: "The Spirit searcheth all things, even the depths of God." St. Paul very possibly had this passage in his mind.

from above.] Lit., "from highest realms," Job xxii. 12 (LXX.); τὰ ἐπουράνια, "the heavenlies," Eph. i. 3, &c.

18. were reformed.] Vulg., correctae. The verb διορθόω is used in Jer. vii. 2 to express amendment, ἐὰν διορθώσητε τὰς ὁδοὺς ὑμῶν. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews (ix. 10) speaks of "the epoch of amendment" (μέχρι καιροῦ διορθώσεως). As it is, mankind is walking in "crooked ways:" i. 3; Prov. ii. 15.

and were saved through wisdom.] The word "saved" has many shades of meaning, and we may consequently say that we are saved by faith (Lk. vii. 50); "by grace through faith" (Eph. ii. 5); or "by hope" (Rom. viii. 24); or by the Gospel (1 Cor. xv. 2); or "according to mercy" (Tit. iii. 5); or by love (Lk. vii. 47); or, as here, "by wisdom." Wisdom saves men by turning them from the paths of sin and error. The answer to the question "Who are they who are thus saved?" is practically given by the words here added in the Vulgate, quicumque tibi placuerunt, Domine, a principio. The answer is meant to be furnished by the entire remainder of the book. The prayer of Solomon ends here, and the subject of the second great division of the book is ingeniously introduced by this last verse. This first great section is complete in itself, and is superior both in style, depth, and originality to the following section.

X.–XIX. Wisdom exemplified as a Power in History.

How Wisdom saved individual souls and the Israelites in general (x.). A contrast of the fortunes of Israel and idolatrous Egypt (xi. xii.). The origin, the folly, and the punishment of idolatry (xiii.–xv.). Development of the contrast between the fortunes of Israel and Egypt (xvi.–xix.).

In the following chapters of the book we have a Jewish philosophy of history, in which the lessons of the past are deduced from the scriptural notices of Patriarchs from Adam and Moses (x. 1–14); and of the Israelites, especially in the days of the Exodus (x. 15–xii.), and after the Exodus (xvi.–xix.). The same theme is also illustrated by a digressive sketch of the history of idolatry (xiii.–xv.). The object of the writer is to glorify Wisdom by shewing that the wise, the just, the upright, who feared God, were by her preserved and blessed, while guilty men and idolatrous nations were punished. The two thoughts most prominently developed are the baseness of idolatry and the punishment of guilt. This section is chiefly remarkable (1) for the extreme elaboration of the style, which is always highly rhetorical, and sometimes degenerates into bombast, euphuism, and affectation; (2) for the licence with which the writer deals with the scriptural records, amplifying, exaggerating, idealising, and not unfrequently availing himself of details either invented by himself or borrowed from the Jewish Hagadah. Attention will be drawn to these points in some of the following notes.

Similar passages, so far as a moral and spiritual review of the lessons of history is concerned, are Judges ii. 1–23, vi. 7–10; 2 Kings xvii. 7–23; Nehem. ix. 9–31; Pss. lxxviii., lxxx., cv., cvi., cxxxv., cxxxvi.; Acts vii.; Heb. xi.; Clemens Rom. 1 Ep. ad Cor. 9–12; and parts of the Ep. of Barnabas.

Readers may recall the fine prayer in Cardinal Newman's 'Dream of Gerontius.'

CHAPTER X.

Wisdom saved Adam (1, 2); punished Cain and his guilty descendants, but saved Noah (3, 4); preserved Abraham (5); preserved Lot, but punished the Sodomites and Lot's wife (6–9); preserved Jacob (10–12); Joseph (13, 14); and the Israelites by the instrumentality of Moses (15–21).

1. She preserved the first formed father of

Digitized by Microsoft®

[a] Gen. 1. 28. 2 And [a] gave him power to rule all things.

[b] Gen. 4. 8. 3 [b] But when the unrighteous went away from her in his anger, he perished also in the fury wherewith he murdered his brother.

[c] Gen. 7. 19, 21, 22, 23. [2] Pet. 2. 5. 4 For whose cause the [c] earth being drowned with the flood, wisdom the world.] The writer begins with Adam, whom he again calls "the protoplast" (vii. 1); and he shews that Wisdom saved him. "Wisdom" throughout these chapters—though the various meanings attached to the word still continue to be interchanged — is generally used to express the active redeeming principle which is at work in the world; the Divine Providence which protects the righteous, because it is trusted in and apprehended by them. The writer is fond of using the emphatic pronoun αὕτη for Wisdom (vii. 10, 29; viii. 1, 7, 9, &c.).

that was created alone.] "Adam, who was the Son of God" (Lk. iii. 38). This is the simplest way of taking the words. Adam alone was "created;" other men are born to their parents. Great stress is laid upon this fact in 'Sanhedrin,' f. 38. 1; and Targ. Jonathan, Gen. iii. It is true that even Traducianists might speak of all men as "created," but the word applies to Adam with special force. Other versions are suggested; as, "while he was the only-created," i.e. before the birth of Eve, as it is understood by Pellicanus, Osiander, Tirinus, &c. But though such a rendering may be analogous to 1 Tim. ii. 14, and to the views of Philo ('De opif. mund.' § 63), neither the Greek nor the context admit of it. Grimm, Calmet, Wahl, Schmid, &c., give to μόνον the sense of "unprotected," "left to himself," as in John viii. 29, xvi. 32; but in those passages μόνος derives that shade of meaning exclusively from the context. Wisdom "protected" Adam, not from sin, nor from external dangers (Corn. à Lapide, Grimm, &c.), but from final ruin, in the sense implied by the next clause.

and brought him out of his fall.] Lit., "rescued him out of his own transgression." Wisdom—i.e. the redeeming power of God working in the penitent heart of man—"rescued" Adam, as Tirinus says, "inspirando poenitentiam et indulgendo veniam." It is true that Adam's repentance is nowhere distinctly stated in Scripture, but it seems to be implied in the Book of Genesis. The Rabbis ('Bereshith Rabba,' viii.; 'Nishmath Chajim.' f. 152. 2), and the Fathers generally, believed in the final salvation of Adam (Iren. 'c. Haer.' iii. 23; Tert. 'de poenit.' 12; Epiphan. 'Haer.' xlvi., &c.), and that he was delivered from purgatory when Christ "descended into Hades." See Dante, 'Purgat.' xxxiii. 61, 62. In the 'Paradiso,' xxxii. 121, he is represented sitting in the very heart of the Celestial Rose.

"He who is sitting near her on the left
Is that great sire, through whose temerity Mankind were of their happiness bereft."

Dähne, Nitzsch, Keerl, and others have given other explanations of this verse, which are needless, and indeed untenable. What was meant by the strange addition in some MSS. of the Vulgate, et eduxit illum de limo terrae, it is difficult to say. It may be a mere blunder. "Fall" is παράπτωμα, "trespass" (Rom. v. 15, 17, 18). To refer Adam's "peculiar fall" to the ante-natal offence of desiring to be born (Gfrörer, 'Urchristenthum,' ii. 242) is quite unwarrantable.

2. power to rule all things.] Probably no more is meant than an allusion to Gen. i. 20; Ps. viii. 1. Ἰσχὺς properly means "strength." The Rabbis supposed Adam to be endowed with superhuman size, strength, and knowledge, but there is no certain reference here to these Hagadoth ('Bereshith Rabba,' viii., xvii., &c.). See Hamburger, 'Geist d. Hagadah,' s. v. Adam.

3. the unrighteous.] Cain. It is true that the writer means each scriptural personage to stand for a class, yet the continuous suppression of the names can hardly be excused from a charge of literary affectation.

from her.] From Wisdom.

he perished also in the fury wherewith he murdered his brother.] These eleven words somewhat tamely represent the almost Aeschylean energy of the three words of the original—ἀδελφοκτόνοις συναπώλετο θυμοῖς. The manner in which Cain "perished with" Abel through his fratricidal passion is not detailed. There are in the Talmudic writings two legends respecting the death of Cain. One was that he was "the man" whom Lamech accidentally slew (Gen. iv. 23); another that he was crushed in the ruins of a falling house. The word συναπώλετο seems to imply that he perished with Abel by incurring spiritual death in the very act of inflicting natural death. The blow that murdered his brother, murdered also his own soul. What makes this explanation nearly certain is that (1) it harmonises with the literary manner of the author; and (2) it agrees with the remark of Philo ('Quod det. pot.' 14) that "Cain rose up, and slew himself, but not his brother," because his soul died to virtue when he became a murderer. (See on Cain, 'Bereshith Rabba,' § 22.)

4. For whose cause.] "On whose account"—because the guilt of Cain was trans-

Digitized by Microsoft®

again preserved it, and directed the course of the righteous in a piece of wood of small value.

[d] Gen. 11. 9.

5 Moreover, [d] the nations in their wicked conspiracy being confounded, she found out the righteous, and preserved him blameless unto God, and [e] kept him strong ‖ against his tender compassion toward his son.

[e] Gen. 22. 10. ‖ Or, in.

6 [f] When the ungodly perished, she delivered [g] the righteous man, who fled from the fire which fell down upon ‖ the five cities.

[f] Gen. 19. 16. [g] 2 Pet. 2. 7. ‖ Gr. Pentapolis.

7 Of whose wickedness even to mitted to his descendants, who filled the world with crime (Gen. vi. 4, 5). Josephus dwells on the fact that Cain's descendants became worse and worse (κατὰ διαδοχὴν καὶ μίμησιν) by handing on an evil disposition and an evil example ('Antt.' I. ii. 2). In this enumeration Enoch is passed over, perhaps because he has been already mentioned in iv. 10; or because the writer wished to connect the Deluge immediately with the guilt of Cain.

> "'Twas but a little drop of sin
> We saw this morning enter in;
> And lo! at eventide a world is drowned!"
> KEBLE.

Grimm's notion that he meant to discountenance those of his contemporaries who regarded Enoch rather than Solomon as a type of perfect wisdom is surely very far-fetched.

being drowned.] κατακλυζομένην. The word for the Deluge in Gen. vi. 17, &c., is κατακλυσμός. Comp. 2 Pet. iii. 6.

preserved it.] Saved the earth and the race from final destruction, by "steering the just man by a contemptible log." St. Peter (iii. 20) uses the curious expression that Noah and his family were saved "by" or perhaps "through" water (δι' ὕδατος).

the righteous.] Noah represented the ideal just man, i.e. the faithful Hebrew: Gen. vi. 9; Heb. xi. 7.

in a piece of wood of small value.] Lit., "by a cheap log." The writer is not disparaging the size of the Ark as described in Genesis, but is only contrasting the insignificance of the means of safety with the terrors of the great Deluge. Similarly, in xiv. 5 he calls a ship ἐλάχιστον ξύλον, just as Seneca uses "tenue lignum" ('Med.' 306). Both words—εὐτελὲς, "cheap," "valueless," and ξύλον, "a log," "a piece of timber"—are contemptuous. The passage is analogous to xiv. 3–5, where the "wisdom" which is here described as the saving principle is called "the providence of God."

5. Moreover.] The verse again begins with the emphatic "she," and might be rendered, "She also, when the nations were mixed together in unanimity of wickedness, recognised the just man." The contemptuous term συγχυθέντων seems to be an allusion to Babel with its confusion of tongues (συγχέωμεν, σύγχυσις, LXX., Gen. xi. 7, 9). The "concord of wickedness" means universal idolatry.

found out.] This is a rendering of εὗρε, which is found in some MSS., but ἔγνω, "recognised," is better supported. Comp. 2 Tim. ii. 19, ἔγνω Κύριος τοὺς ὄντας αὐτοῦ.

the righteous.] Abraham (Gen. xvii. 1). If the words are pressed, the writer seems to make Abraham a contemporary of the building of Babel. It is not improbable that he held this view, for the Jewish Hagadists told how Abraham had been saved out of a burning furnace, into which he was put by Nimrod, for destroying the idols which his father Terah made. The whole legend is framed out of the word Ur, which means "fire" or "light." See 'Sanhedrin,' f. 93. 1.

unto God.] Comp. Jon. iii. 3; Acts vii. 20.

kept him strong against his tender compassion toward his son.] ἐφύλαξεν; custodivit, "guarded." In the last clause the verb was ἐτήρησεν, conservavit, "preserved" (comp. ἐτήρουν ... ἐφύλαξα, John xvii. 12). The meaning is that Wisdom protected him from the temptation to disobey God's command out of love for his son: Gen. xxii. 1; Ecclus. xliv. 20, "when he was proved, he was found faithful;" 1 Macc. ii. 52; Heb. xi. 18; Jas. ii. 21.

6. When the ungodly perished.] Rather, "were being destroyed;" namely, in the overthrow of Sodom.

the righteous.] Lot (Gen. xix. 17–22). Comp. xix. 17; 2 Pet. ii. 7.

which fell down upon the five cities.] καταβάσιον Πενταπόλεως. In late Greek (Plutarch) αἱ καταβάσιαι is used for lightning-flashes ("fulmen caducum," Hor.; "the rushing thunderstroke," E. B. Browning). Aeschylus calls Zeus "the lightener" (καταιβάτης). For the five cities—Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboiim, Zoar (Gen. xiv. 2)—the writer uses the classic term Pentapolis. We find the same tendency to make use of classical analogies in the LXX., which even goes so far as to render the name Keren Happuch by Amalthea's horn (Job xlii. 14).

7. the waste land that smoketh is a testimony.] A reference to Gen. xix. 28, and to the current belief that the land around the shores of the Dead Sea still smoked in sign of the divine vengeance. The same belief is found in Philo ('De Abrah.' 27), Josephus this day the waste land that smoketh is a testimony, and plants bearing fruit that never come to ripeness: and [h] a standing pillar of salt is a monument of an unbelieving soul.

Digitized by Microsoft®

[h] Gen. 19. 26.

8 For regarding not wisdom, they gat not only this hurt, that they knew not the things which were good; but also left behind them to the world a memorial of their foolishness: so that in the things wherein they offended they could not so much as be hid.

9 But wisdom delivered from pain those that attended upon her.

10 When [i] the righteous fled from his brother's wrath, she guided him in right paths, shewed him the king-

[i] Gen. 23. 5, 12.

('B. J.' iv. 8, § 4), and in Jude 7. It is also found in the Fathers (Tert. 'Apolog.' 40). In ancient days this bituminous soil may have smoked, like burnt Phrygia, the Solfatara, parts of Idumea (Isa. xxxiv. 10), and, according to the Rabbis, the Valley of Hinnom; or the dense mist which rises from the scorched hollow in which the Dead Sea lies may have led to this notion. The Rabbis made Job xxviii. 5 a description of the land of Sodom ('Sanhedr.' f. 109. 1). The word Sedôm, perhaps, means "burning" (Gesenius, 'Thesaur.' 939 a).

plants bearing fruit that never come to ripeness.] Lit., "plants fruit-bearing in unperfected seasons." The writer seems to think that the burning and accursed soil ripened before their time the fruits, which consequently came to nothing. He must have heard of the famous "apples of Sodom," which look alluring outside, but are full of dust and bitterness, or, in the exaggerated expression of Josephus ('B. J.' iv. 8, § 5), "dissolve into smoke and ashes." Solinus ('Polyhist.' 38) describes the fruit as "having indeed an appearance of ripeness, but covering within an ashen griminess" (fuliginem favillaceam). Tacitus, who had heard these stories, devotes to this region a descriptive chapter, and says that the natural productions of the soil, even when they grow to the semblance of maturity, "black and empty, vanish as it were into ashes." There are various fruits—such as the fruit of the Asclepias gigantea, Solanum sanctum, Calotropis procera, and Solanum melangaena—of which an exaggerated description might correspond with the legends of > "Dead Sea fruits that tempt the eye, > But turn to ashes on the lips."

is a testimony.] Comp. Jas. v. 3.

a standing pillar of salt is a monument of an unbelieving soul.] Lot's wife is called "an unbelieving soul," because the root of her longing to return to Sodom was want of faith. The catastrophe which befel her during the flight from Sodom is expressed in language of somewhat uncertain meaning; but it is certain that, in later days, the verse (Gen. xix. 26) was understood to mean that she actually became "a pillar of salt." This pillar was identified with the curious detached columns of crystallised salt, 40 feet high, above their natural pedestal, which are found in a valley of Usdum, on the S.W. of the Dead Sea (see Ritter, 'Erdkunde,' xv. 733). We find in the Jerusalem Targum, "Because the wife of Lot was of the children of the people of Sodom, she looked behind to see what would be the end of her father's house; and behold she was made to stand a statue of salt, until the time of the resurrection shall come" (Etheridge, 'Targums,' i. 217). Ancient travellers who saw these strange phenomena were told by the inhabitants, and sincerely believed, that they had seen the salt pillar into which Lot's wife had been turned (Iren. 'Haer.' iv. 31, § 3; Justin Mart. 'Apolog.' i. 53). Thietmar (A.D. 1217), in his 'Peregrinatio,' mentions (xi. 47) the spot where he had seen "the statue of salt into which Lot's wife was turned." There is a curious legend ('Bereshith Rabba,' § li.) that she made a pretence of borrowing salt to betray the presence of her guests.

8. regarding not.] παροδεύσαντες. See note on vi. 22.

to the world.] Lit., "to life," i.e. to all living men, as in xiv. 21.

a memorial.] Namely, the smoking soil, the "Hell-apples," and the pillar of salt.

of their foolishness.] ἀφροσύνης. See note on iii. 12.

so that.] Rather, "in order that." It was God's purpose that there should be a perpetual memorial of the detection and exposure of secret crime.

9. those that attended upon her.] The notion that the word θεραπεύσαντας supports the theory of the writer's supposed connexion with the sect of the Therapeutae, is on a piece with many other attempts to force exaggerated inferences out of simple words. In Philo, Jacob is the type of the man who has trained himself in virtue by ἄσκησις.

10. the righteous.] Jacob.

fled from his brother's wrath.] Lit., "fugitive of the wrath of his brother." The allusion is to Gen. xxvii. 42. Philo also speaks of Jacob as "the fugitive" in his tract περὶ φυγάδων ('De Profugis').

dom of God, and gave him knowledge of holy things, made him rich in his travels, and multiplied the fruit of his labours.

k Gen. 31. 11 k In the covetousness of such as oppressed him she stood by him, and made him rich.

12 She defended him from his enemies, and kept him safe from l Gen. 32. 24. those that lay in wait, and l in a sore conflict she gave him the victory; that he might know that godliness is m Gen. 37. 28. & 39. 7. Acts 7. 10. stronger than all.

13 m When the righteous was sold, she forsook him not, but delivered him from sin: n she went down with him into the pit, n Gen. 39. 21. & 41. 14, 40, 41.

14 And left him not in bonds, till she brought him the sceptre of the kingdom, and ‖ power against those that oppressed him: as for them that had accused him, she shewed them to be liars, and gave him perpetual glory.

‖ Or, the power of them that ruled over him.

15 o She delivered the ‖ righteous people and blameless seed from the nation that oppressed them.

o Exod. 1. 12. & 12. 42. ‖ Or, holy.

16 p She entered into the soul of p Exod. 3. 12.

in right paths.] The context shews that the meaning is moral.

shewed him the kingdom of God.] A remarkable expression, with which we may compare John iii. 3, 5; though no doubt the immediate reference is to Jacob's dream (Gen. xxviii. 12–22).

knowledge of holy things.] Jacob's dream gave him, as it were, a glimpse of heaven.

made him rich.] εὐπόρησεν. The word is usually intransitive. It is one of the functions of Wisdom "to enrich" (vii. 11).

the fruit of his labours.] This is no doubt the true rendering of πόνους here, as in Prov. iii. 9 (LXX.). The reference is to the growth of Jacob's flocks and herds (Gen. xxx. 25–43).

11. of such as oppressed him.] Laban (Gen. xxix. 15; xxx. 27–35; xxxi. 55). The more usual construction of κατισχύω is with the genitive (as in vii. 30), with the meaning "prevail against."

12. from those that lay in wait.] A reference either to Laban's pursuit (Gen. xxxi. 23), or to some Hagadah about Esau, who is represented in far darker colours in later Jewish tradition than he is in the Bible. The narrative of Gen. xxxii. xxxiii. in no wise justifies the expression. The Talmud speaks of Esau as "the wicked" ('Giltin,' f. 56. 2; 'Soteh,' f. 13. 1). There may, however, be an allusion to the hostility of the Canaanite tribes (Gen. xxxv. 5), which was suppressed by "the terror of God."

gave him the victory.] The verb βραβεύω is rare, not occurring in the LXX., and only once in the N. T. (Col. iii. 15, where it is used intransitively). The "sore conflict" alluded to is the wrestling with the angel at Penuel (Gen. xxxii. 24–32; Hos. xii. 4).

13. the righteous.] Joseph.

delivered him from sin.] Gen. xxxix. 7–20. The Vulg. vaguely paraphrases ἐξ ἁμαρτίας by a peccatoribus.

into the pit.] The pit (λάκκον) must here be a metaphorical expression for Potiphar's prison, as in Ex. xii. 29, where the LXX. use λάκκος, and the A.V. "dungeon," for the Hebrew "house of the pit." It is true that the word might seem more applicable to the dry pit into which Joseph was let down by his brothers: but (1) it is not obvious in what sense Wisdom went down with him into that pit; (2) the next clause refers to the Egyptian prison; and (3) there seems to be an allusion to Joseph's interpretation of the dreams (Gen. xxxix. 21—xl. 23).

14. the sceptre of the kingdom.] Σκῆπτρα is the pluralis excellentiae to express, as in classic Greek poetry, the abstract sense of power. The writer may only be referring to Gen. xli. 39–45, but the expressions seem to point to the Jewish exaggeration mentioned by Philo: "Then Pharaoh appointed him successor of the kingdom, or rather, to speak the exact truth, king, leaving to himself the name of rule, but resigning to Joseph the reality of government" ('De Joseph.' § 21).

those that oppressed him.] Potiphar and his wife (Gen. xxxix. 16–20), and Joseph's brethren in his early years (Gen. xxxvii. 4–11, 20).

15. the righteous people.] Rather, "the holy people." Here the application of history passes from individuals to the whole race of Israelites. Of course it is only in a highly ideal sense that such terms as "holy nation" and "blameless seed" can be applied to a people whom the Scriptures in many passages repeatedly characterise as sensual, idolatrous, disobedient, stiffnecked, and rebellious (Deut. ix. 1–24, xxxi. 27, xxxii. 15–29; Nehem. ix. 16–35; Ezek. xx. 8–44, xxiii. 3; Amos v. 26; Acts vii. 37–43, 51–53, &c.). The idealisation is, however, maintained unbroken throughout this book, and can only be explained by the considerations that (1) Israel was a chosen people (Ex. xix. 6; Lev. xx. 24; Deut. vii. 6;

Digitized by Microsoft®

[q] Josh. 1. 1. Ps. 105. 26. Hebr. 3. 5.
[r] Exod. 5. 1. & 7. 10. & 8, & 9, & 10, & 11, & 12, & 13. Ps. 105. 27, &c.
[s] Ps. 105. 39.
Or, flame.
[t] Exod. 14. 21, 22, 29. Ps. 78. 13.

[q] the servant of the Lord, and [r] withstood dreadful kings in wonders and signs;

17 Rendered to the righteous a reward of their labours, guided them in a marvellous way, [s] and was unto them for a cover by day, and a ‖ light of stars in the night season;

18 [t] Brought them through the Red sea, and led them through much water:

19 [u] But she drowned their enemies, and cast them up out of the bottom of the deep.

[u] Exod. 14. 27, 28.

20 Therefore the righteous spoiled the ungodly, and [x] praised thy holy name, O Lord, and magnified with one accord thine hand, that fought for them.

[x] Exod. 15. 1.

21 For wisdom opened the mouth of the dumb, and made the tongues of them that cannot speak eloquent.

Is. lxii. 12, &c.), in spite of incessant backsliding; and (2) that the writer stedfastly fixes his thoughts on the true and faithful Israelites, who were representatives of "the righteous man" (John i. 47).

16. She entered into the soul.] Compare vii. 27.

of the servant of the Lord.] Moses. The word is not the common term δοῦλος, but the more honourable θεράπων, which, with reference to Ex. xiv. 31, Num. xii. 7, seems to be given in this sense exclusively to Moses (Heb. iii. 5, where alone the word occurs in the N. T.).

dreadful kings.] Here, as throughout these references, the writer may have in his mind the Jewish Hagadoth, which made Moses a military leader against Pharaoh's enemies (Jos. 'Antt.' ii. §§ 1, 2). But, on the other hand, the plural may be merely generic, just as in classic Greek the plural is used to give rhetorical force to a statement. Comp. vv. 11, 14; Ps. civ. 30, &c.

in wonders and signs.] See note on viii. 8.

17. to the righteous.] Rather, "to the holy," i.e. to the Israelites.

a reward of their labours.] Namely, the "jewels of silver and jewels of gold" (Ex. xi. 2, 3; xii. 35, 36), which might be regarded as a late payment for their long toils in building the treasure-cities of Egypt (Ex. i. 11, v. 2–14; Gen. xv. 14).

was unto them for a cover by day.] It was natural that many legendary particulars should be added by the Jews to the simple scriptural allusion to the pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night (Ex. xiii. 21, 22; xiv. 19, 24; xl. 38, &c.). The writer alludes to it again in xviii. 3 (where he makes it both a guide and "a harmless sun to entertain them honourably"), and xix. 7, where it is called "a cloud shadowing the camp." This view of it appears as early as Ps. cv. 39: "He spread a cloud for a covering." From the allusions in the passages of Exodus, it was natural for Philo to identify the pillar of cloud and fire with the Logos, as Pseudo-Solomon here identifies it with 'Wisdom' ('Quis rer. div. haer.' Opp. ii. 501). Compare Scott:

"When Israel, of the Lord beloved,
Forth from the land of bondage came,
Her fathers' God before her moved,
An awful guide, in smoke and flame.
By day along the astonished sands
The cloudy pillar guided slow;
By night Arabia's crimson sands
Returned the fiery column's glow."

a light of stars.] Lit., "a flame of stars." It is not easy to see the exact meaning of the writer in thus describing the "pillar of fire." Comp. Ps. lxxvii. 14, ὡδήγησεν αὐτοὺς ὅλην τὴν νύκτα ἐν φωτισμῷ πυρός.

18. through the Red sea.] Rhetorically amplified in xix. 7; Ps. lxxvii. 13, xxxii. 7 (in both which places the LXX. have the curious expression ὡσεὶ ἀσκόν, "like a wine-skin").

19. cast them up out of the bottom of the deep.] The Red Sea flung up the bodies of the Egyptians "from the bottomless depth." It is quite impossible to follow the Vulg., Luther, &c., in rendering it ab altitudine inferorum eduxit illos (the Israelites). The reference is to the Egyptian corpses (Ex. xiv. 30). In the Jerusalem Targum the earth and the sea reject the Egyptian corpses with equal abhorrence. Comp. Ps. lxxiv. 14. See 'Bereshith Rabba,' § 22, where Rabbi Eliezer says that in the Red Sea the Egyptians were struck with 200 plagues.

20. spoiled the ungodly.] This alludes to the very natural Jewish tradition that the dead bodies of the Egyptians supplied the Israelites with arms (Jos. 'Antt.' ii. 16, § 6), although Josephus only mentions the arms and baggage, not the corpses.

praised.] Lit., "hymned." Ex. xv. 1–21.

21. the mouth of the dumb.] The plurals "the dumb," "them that cannot speak," are poetic generalisations founded on the stammering tongue of Moses (Ex. iv. 10; vi

CHAPTER XI.

5 The Egyptians were punished, and the Israelites reserved in the same thing. 15 They were plagued by the same things wherein they sinned. 17 God could have destroyed them otherwise, 23 but he is merciful to all.

SHE prospered their works in the hand of the holy prophet.

[a] Exod. 16. 1.

2 [a] They went through the wilderness that was not inhabited, and pitched tents in places where there lay no way.

3 [b] They stood against their enemies, and were avenged of their adversaries.

[b] Exod. 17. 10, 11, 13.

4 When they were thirsty, they called upon thee, and [c] water was given them out of the flinty rock, and their thirst was quenched out of the hard stone.

[c] Exod. 17. 6. Numb. 20. 11.

5 For by what things their enemies were punished, by the same they in their need were benefited.

6 For instead of a fountain of a 12, 30), but here ideally extended to all the Israelites.

of them that cannot speak.] Lit., "of babes." Comp. Ps. viii. 2.

eloquent.] τραυάς. See note on vii. 22.

XI., XII. CONTRASTS BETWEEN ISRAEL AND EGYPT, AS FURNISHING ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE LAWS OF DIVINE PUNISHMENT.

CHAPTER XI.

God's care of Israel in the wilderness (1–3): He gave them water (4); by which element He also punished the Egyptians (5–7), dealing with them in judgment, not for fatherly admonition (8–10). The retributive misery of the Egyptians was analogous to their sins (11–16). How God might have punished them in His power (17–22); but God's power is conditioned by His love (23–26).

1. She prospered their works in the hand.] Rather, "by the hand," a common Hebraism (בְּיַד), Acts vii. 35, &c. The same phrase is used with this verb (εὐώδωσε) in LXX.: Gen. xxxix. 23; Judg. xv. 18; Ps. lxxvi. 21 (ὡδηγήσας).

the holy prophet.] Moses (Deut. xviii. 15). "By a prophet the Lord brought Israel out of Egypt, and by a prophet was he preserved" (Hos. xii. 13). Philo ('Vit. Mos.' 23) and Josephus ('Antt.' iv. 8, § 49) agree in speaking of Moses as the greatest of all the prophets. In the Talmud he is on all occasions exalted beyond measure. All his prayers were granted ('Berachoth,' f. 7. 1). He was equivalent to all Israel, since (by Gematrics) "Moses our Rabbi" = 613, as also does "Lord God of Israel" (see Hershon, 'Talmudic Treasures,' p. 322). For the epithet "holy," see 2 K. iv. 9; Lk. i. 70; 2 Pet. iii. 2; Eph. iii. 5. This first verse belongs in form to the last chapter, since Wisdom is still the subject.

2. They went through.] Διώδευσαν. The word is chosen for the sake of the paronomasia with εὐώδωσε in the last verse.

the wilderness that was not inhabited.] Rather, "an uninhabited wilderness."

pitched.] The classical verb (ἔπηξαν), used also in Heb. viii. 2.

where there lay no way.] Through these "pathless places" they were led by the cloudy and fiery pillar, and afterwards by Hobab.

3. their enemies.] Amalek (Ex. xvii.), Arad (Num. xxi.), Sihon, and Og, the Moabites, the Midianites, &c. Πολέμιοι means "enemies in war;" ἐχθροὶ enemies generally.

were avenged of.] Rather, "successfully repelled."

4. called upon thee.] This statement is due to the generalising idealism of the writer. The Book of Exodus says: "The people thirsted . . . and . . . murmured against Moses" (Ex. xvii. 3), and "were almost ready to stone him." It was Moses, not the people, who "cried unto the Lord" (Ex. xvii. 4), and he, together with the better and more faithful Israelites, are here regarded as the real representatives of the people (comp. Num. xx. 2–6).

out of the flinty rock.] The word ἀκροτόμου is borrowed from the LXX. Deut. viii. 15. It is used in the senses of "sharp" and "hard." The Vulg. renders it de petrâ altissimâ, as though the reading were ἀκροτάτου, but probably the word is to be understood in the sense of "precipitous." It occurs again in Ecclus. xl. 15, "upon a hard rock;" id. xlviii. 17; and in Philo, 'Vit. Mos.' i. 38.

their thirst was quenched.] Lit., "a healing of their thirst."

5. For by what things their enemies were punished.] This verse strikes the key-note of the topic which is touched upon in vv. 6, 7, and elaborately illustrated in chapters xvi.–xix. In this verse the Vulgate has the unimportant and wholly unauthorised addition a defectione potus sui. This passage

[d] Exod. 7. 17. perpetual running river [d] troubled with foul blood,

[e] Exod. 1. 22. ch. 18. 5. 7 For a manifest reproof of [e] that commandment, whereby the infants were slain, thou gavest unto them abundance of water by a means which they hoped not for:

[f] Exod. 7. 20. 8 Declaring by that thirst then [f] how thou hadst punished their adversaries.

9 For when they were tried, albeit but in mercy chastised, they knew how the ungodly were judged in wrath and tormented, thirsting in another manner than the just.

10 For these thou didst admonish and try, as a father: but the other, as a severe king, thou didst condemn and punish.

11 Whether they were absent or present, they were vexed alike.

12 For a double grief came upon is alluded to in the Sarum use for Baptism. See Blunt, 'Annotated Prayer-book,' p. 218.

6. troubled.] The best-supported reading is not ταραχθέντες, but ταραχθέντος, which also avoids the supposition of a change of construction in the ἔδωκας αὐτοῖς (anakoluthon). A writer so careful and polished as the author of this book is rarely contented to leave an anakoluthon in his style. Render, "Instead of a perennial fountain, their river being turbid with mire-clotted blood." Both Philo ('Vit. Mos.' 17) and Josephus ('Antt.' II. xiv. § 1) exaggerate the narrative of Exodus, and the latter says ('Antt.' III. i. § 4) that the same river was blood to the Egyptians and sweet to the Hebrews.

7. For a manifest reproof.] He here incidentally alludes to the thesis which he afterwards fully develops, "that wherewithal a man sinneth, by the same also shall he be punished" (v. 16). For the "infant-slaying ordinance," see Ex. i. 22; Heb. vii. 23. The word "infant-slaying" (νηπιοκτόνος) is a compound not found elsewhere, and probably invented by the writer (comp. τεκνοφόνος, xiv. 23). Philo says that the water of the Nile was turned into blood because the Egyptians honoured water as the primary element ('Vit. Mos.' 17). The Scriptures neither recognise this notion, nor allude to the resemblance between the punishment and the crime, but simply speak of the plagues of Egypt as signs of God's power, intended to convince the Egyptians that they must obey His commands.

8. Declaring . . . how thou hadst punished their adversaries.] The writer draws his own inferences quite independently of any scriptural warrant, and not at all in accordance with the best spirit of the scriptural writers. He gives the same fantastic explanation of the trials of the Israelites in xvi. 4.

9. in mercy chastised.] In a series of finely-balanced antitheses, which belong to the most euphuistic forms of Greek style (parisosis, paromoiosis), the writer in these verses (8–10) practically—though perhaps not intentionally—represents God as being what He is not; namely, a respecter of persons.

they knew how the ungodly were judged in wrath.] It is impossible not to see the narrowness of Jewish pride and particularism (1) in the assumption that all the trials which befell the Israelites were only the outcome of fatherly tenderness, whereas the misfortunes of the Egyptians were the result of their guilt and God's severity; and (2) in the unworthy fancy that one object of the sufferings of Israel was to shew them how much more severely their enemies had suffered. Far nobler are the thoughts of Deut. viii. 2, 3, where Moses tells the Israelites that these sufferings were meant to teach them "that man doth not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live." The writer may have founded his view on various passages of Scripture, but only by reading them apart from their context, and with the blindness of Jewish prejudice. Indeed such passages as this are scarcely consonant with the nobler views expressed at the end of the chapter (vv. 24–26).

thirsting in another manner than the just.] This clause is not found in this verse either in the original or the Vulgate, but is taken from v. 14. The conjecture that the clause has got misplaced, thus boldly adopted into the text, is, to say the least, highly ingenious; for here it is eminently appropriate, and does not seem equally so in v. 14.

10. as a father.] Deut. viii. 5; Heb. xii. 5, 6.

as a severe king.] For the word ἀπότομος see v. 20. The truth, of course, is that God equally rewards all who in every nation feel after Him and find Him (Acts x. 35; xvii. 27), and punishes Jew and Gentile alike out of His equal justice. "Yet ye say the way of the Lord is not equal. Hear now, O house of Israel; Is not my way equal? are not your ways unequal?" (Ezek. xviii. 25.) The kindness (χρηστότης) and severity (ἀποτομία) of God are contrasted in Rom. xi. 22.

11. Whether they were absent or present.] Namely, from the Israelites. How they could be grieved when they were absent from the Israelites is explained in vv. 12–14.

them, and a groaning for the remembrance of things past.

13 For when they heard by their own punishments the other to be benefited, they ‖ had some feeling of the Lord.

‖ Or, perceived.

14 For whom they rejected with scorn, when he was long before thrown out at the casting forth of the infants, him in the end, when they saw what came to pass, they admired.

15 But for the foolish devices of their wickedness, wherewith being deceived they worshipped serpents void of reason, and vile beasts, thou didst send a multitude of unreasonable beasts upon them for vengeance;

16 That they might know, that they were vexed.] ἐτρύχοντο. The verb does not occur in the Bible, but is used again in xiv. 15.

alike.] The adverb should be taken with the two participles—"alike, whether being present or absent."

12. a double grief.] They suffered both the actual punishment and the subsequent remorse and envy described in the next verse.

13. the other to be benefited.] It added poignancy to their misery to feel that it involved a continuous boon to their enemies (εὐεργετουμένους).

they had some feeling of the Lord.] "They perceived the Lord," i.e. they recognised His hand.

14. they rejected with scorn.] Lit., "they refused, jeering at him." We are in the region of rhetoric and of Hagadoth; for it is nowhere said that either Pharaoh or the Egyptians "jeered" at Moses. On the contrary, he seems to have inspired them with awe.

when he was long before thrown out.] The "when" is misleading, for it is not meant that the Egyptians mockingly rejected Moses when he was an infant in the ark of bulrushes. Render "Him whom, long ago flung forth at the exposure (of the infants), they refused with jeers." The exposure of Moses in the Nile is again alluded to at xviii. 5. The Pentateuch does not justify the expression χλευάζοντες, though it speaks of the anger of the Egyptians against Moses (Ex. vii. 23; x. 10, 11, &c.).

when they saw what came to pass.] Lit., "at the end of the consequent issues," i.e. after the deliverance from Egypt.

they admired.] The allusion is to Ex. xi. 3. If the meaning is that they admired the miracles wrought by Moses in the wilderness, the writer must be following some Jewish tradition, for there is no allusion to the fact in Scripture. Compare Acts vii. 23; Heb. xi. 24, 25. It is after this clause that we find in the original the words οὐχ ὅμοια δικαίοις διψήσαντες, which the A.V. has transferred to v. 9, where they are much more apposite. The Egyptians thirsted "unlike the just" (a litotes for "in a worse manner than the Hebrews"). The writer thinks himself authorised to make the assertion because the thirst of the Israelites was not mocked by the "miry blood" which tormented the Egyptians, and was terminated by the miracle of the stricken rock. There is no warrant in Scripture for this view.

15. for the foolish devices of their wickedness.] St. Paul seems to have had this passage in his thoughts when he wrote Rom. i. 21, ἐματαιώθησαν ἐν τοῖς διαλογισμοῖς αὐτῶν, καὶ ἐσκοτίσθη ἡ ἀσύνετος αὐτῶν καρδία. Their iniquity ἀδικία (Rom. i. 22) was the cause of their senseless imaginations. The writer has already said (i. 5) that "the holy spirit of discipline . . . will remove from senseless devices" (ἀπὸ λογισμῶν ἀσυνέτων).

they worshipped serpents void of reason, and vile beasts.] xii. 24; xv. 18, 19. Ἑρπετὰ means "reptiles" in general, all creatures that creep, e.g. crocodiles, beetles, &c. Vulg., mutos serpentes. Ancient authors (Herod. ii. 74; Clem. Alex. 'Paedag.' III. ii. 4, &c.) testify to Egyptian ophiolatry; but both words in the Vulgate are wrong, for ἄλογα means "irrational" (2 Pet. ii. 12), and ἑρπετὰ is not confined to "serpents." The poetic word rendered "beasts" (κνώδαλα) means any kind of noxious, and especially poisonous, creatures (xvii. 9). Εὐτελὴς, "cheap," "vile," occurs again at xv. 10.

thou didst send.] xvi. 3, "Thou didst send against them." Vulg., immisisti.

of unreasonable beasts.] Frogs, flies, lice, locusts, in the various plagues (xvi. 9), to which the writer in xvii. 9 adds serpents, and Josephus ('Antt.' ii. 14, § 3) unknown wild beasts.

16. that wherewithal a man sinneth . . .] In this verse the writer enunciates a remarkable moral law which is enshrined in the proverb—

> "Per quod quis peccat, per idem punitur et idem."

There is undoubtedly in many cases a hideous resemblance between crime and punishment;

Digitized by Microsoft®

& ch. 12. 23. & wherewithal a man sinneth, by the same also shall he be punished.

17 For thy Almighty hand, that made the world of matter without men suffer in a manner similar to that in which they have sinned. Sometimes the crime reproduces itself, and they become the victims of crime taught by their own bad examples. Sometimes the sin becomes itself the punishment, and in the form of destroying habits their vices, no longer pleasurable, become the instruments with which they are scourged. The engineer is "hoist with his own petard;"

and

"Even-handed justice
Commends the ingredients of the poisoned chalice
To our own lips."

The writer seems to feel something of the delight of a moral discoverer in dwelling on this characteristic of judgment. See vv. 7, 8; xii. 23; xvi. 1; xvii. 3; xviii. 6. While, however, we would give him due credit for his eloquence and insight, it must be admitted (1) that he dwells on this law of punishment with disproportionate emphasis; (2) that the law is liable to numerous exceptions. It is a still more serious objection to his method of handling the subject that he fails to develop the truth, that the resemblance of sins to their retribution is in the most striking and instructive instances due to the normal character of punishment, working not by arbitrary inflictions, but by uniform consequences. He represents the plagues of Egypt as being inflicted with express reference to their affinity to Egyptian transgressions. He is perhaps partially entitled to this opinion, though nothing is said about it in the Book of Exodus; but the retributive law which he is illustrating has a much more solemn significance when we see that it is not due to direct divine interference, but to the normal process by which the self-avenging power of sins, in their very commission, involves the germs of their own fatal consequences.

It is a further objection to his method of treatment that he strains facts into accordance with his theories. For instance, in these verses he distinctly implies, and in xii. 23, 24 expressly states, that the Egyptians were tormented with vermin because they worshipped vermin. This, however, was not true of the ancient Egyptians, who were of all nations in this respect the most scrupulously clean.

We find more than one recognition of exact Nemesis in Scripture. The famous Lex talionis (Gen. ix. 6; Ex. xxi. 24, &c.) is based upon it. Jacob the deceiver is himself deceived. "In the thing wherein they (the Egyptians) dealt proudly, God was above them," Ex. xviii. 11. Adonizedek, who had cut off the thumbs and toes of 70 kings, has his own cut off (Judg. i. 6, 7). Agag's sword has made many mothers childless, and his mother is made childless by the sword (1 Sam. xv. 23). David has sinned by treachery, adultery, and murder, and is punished by treachery, adultery, and murder. In Hab. ii. 6, by an ingenious "taunting proverb" the word for "pledges" means also "thick clay." In Rev. xvi. 5, 6 the Angel cries, "Thou art righteous, O Lord . . . because Thou hast judged thus: for they have shed the blood of saints . . . and Thou hast given them blood to drink; for they are worthy."

In other scriptural allusions the law is explained as sometimes rising from example and the sense of human equity (Matt. vii. 2, "With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again;" Matt. xxvi. 52, "They that take the sword, shall perish with the sword;" Jas. ii. 13, "He shall have judgment without mercy, who shewed no mercy"): sometimes as due to the natural development of human crimes (Gal. vi. 7, "Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he reap;" Rom. ii. 2, "We are sure that the judgment of God is according to truth").

The law is occasionally pointed out by other writers. Thus the Egyptians imagined that Cambyses died by the same dagger with which he had stabbed their Apis, and by a wound in the same spot (Herod. iii. 64). Josephus often alludes to analogous retributions, as illustrated by the death of Herod the Great ('Antt.' xvii. 6); by the misfortunes of Herod Antipas ('Antt.' xviii. 5, § 2) and of Herod Agrippa (id. xix. 8, § 2); and by the compulsory circumcision, through disease, of Apion, who had derided circumcision ('c. Ap.' ii. 13); and, on a large scale, by the final miseries of the Jews ('Prolog. ad B. J.'). Philo narrates that an Alexandrian heathen who had sneered at the splendid present which the Lord of the world had made to Abraham and Sarah of the letters a and ρ, was punished with madness ('De nomin. mutat.' § 8). He dwells with satisfaction on the horrible death of Flaccus as suitable to a persecutor ('Leg. ad Caium'). A similar theme is treated by Lactantius in 'De mortibus persecutoria.'

17. thy Almighty hand.] Interchangeable with "thy Almighty Word," xviii. 15.

that made the world of matter without form.] Rather, "even though it created the Universe (Kosmos) out of formless matter."

Digitized by Microsoft®

form, wanted not means to send among them a multitude of bears, or fierce lions,

18 Or unknown wild beasts, full of rage, newly created, breathing out either a fiery vapour, or filthy scents

The words ὕλη and ἄμορφος are both borrowed from the Platonists (Timaeus, p. 51 a). Plato does not himself indeed use the word ὕλη for "matter," but it became common among his followers; and Diogenes Laertius (iii. 41) says that Plato set forth two principles of all things, God and Matter. The conception of the eternity of matter was fixed by the aphorism of Aristotle ('Phys.' i. 4, § 9) that "nothing can be made out of nothing." At the same time Plato had already saved himself from appearing to limit the creative power of God by denying to matter all conceivable accidents and speaking of it as invisible (Vulg. ex materiâ invisâ here) and infinitely plastic (Timaeus, p. 51 a). According to Timaeus Locrius (in whom the word ὕλη in the sense of "matter" first occurs), Matter, the mother of all visible and perceptible things, is invisible, chaotic (ἄμορφον), unformed (ἀσχημάτιστον), and receptive of any shape. Plutarch also calls it colourless (Tim. Locr. 94 a). It is the passive and constituent principle of things (Diog. Laert. vii. 134). Philo adopts this terminology ('De Vict. offer.' Opp. ii. 261; 'De Mund. opif.' 2), and adds other epithets descriptive of the substance in which

"All form is formless, order orderless."[1]

"Matter" is the antithesis to "mind" (νοῦς). Aristotle uses the phrase ὑλικὸς ἀρχή ('Part. An.' i. 1, 20) and ὑλικὴ οὐσία ('Metaph.' iv. 7. 1). See Ueberweg, 'Hist. of Philos.' i. 123, 194, &c.

Now, if Philo and Pseudo-Solomon meant to teach the eternity of matter, they are so far heretical; since the teaching of the Church has ever been that "God made all things of nothing," or, at least, out of Himself.

There can be no doubt that Philo believed in the eternity of matter, because he emphatically repeats the aphorism of Aristotle ('De incorrupt. Mundi,' § 2),[2] and because he says that there are four causes of creation —the Agent (God, ὑφ' οὗ), the Instrument (the Logos, δι' οὗ), the material cause (Matter, ὕλη, ἐξ οὗ), and the final cause (the illustration of God's goodness, δι' ὅ). He nowhere distinguishes—not even in his special tract on Creation ('De Mundi opificio')—between any first creation of matter and second creation of the Kosmos,[1] but regards creation as a ceaseless act.[2]

On the other hand, commentators, both Romanist and Protestant, have been anxious to defend the orthodoxy of the writer of this book. As far as the present verse is concerned he may merely have meant to refer to Gen. i. 2, and ὕλη ἄμορφος may be only a classic and philosophical equivalent for the "without form and void" (תֹהוּ וָבֹהוּ), which the LXX. render by ἀόρατος καὶ ἀκατασκεύαστος. Out of this "vast abyss" God created the κόσμος or orderly disposition of the universe (v. 20). St. Augustine takes this to have been the writer's meaning, but it cannot be regarded as certain. Kübel ('Stud. u. Krit.' iv. 698) refers to ix. 1, xii. 9, as indicating that the writer here only alludes to the secondary creation of order out of chaos; but the references are very far from decisive.

wanted not means.] In vv. 17–23 he shews what God might have done in the exercise of His Almighty power; but he adds (23–26) that God did not adopt these means because of His love for all. With the expression οὐκ ἠπόρει, "lacked not means," comp. xii. 9; LXX. 1 Sam. xiv. 6; 2 Chron. xiv. 11.

a multitude of bears, or fierce lions.] The writer is not here thinking of any beast worship, which in some ages prevailed in some parts of Egypt (e.g. the worship of lions at Leontopolis), but is only saying that if it had been God's object to destroy them, He might have sent against them as many bears and lions as He did send flies and locusts. The passage is probably a reminiscence of Philo ('Vit. Mos.' 1, 19), who says that, since God only wished to admonish (νουθετεῖν) the Egyptians, He did not send "bears and lions and panthers," but only minute and contemptible insects. The Jews were fond of illustrating God's power to overthrow His enemies by the smallest creatures. This is the point of the famous story about the gnat which crept up the nostril of Titus and grew in his brain ('Gittin,' f. 56. 2). The Israelites are threatened with wild beasts in Lev. xxvi. 22; and "the noisome beast" is among God's four sore judgments in Ezek. xiv. 21.

[1] He calls matter the παθητὸν, and mind the δραστήριον αἴτιον. He attempts to support his unscriptural notion by some fantastic allegorising of Laban and τὰ ἄσημα in Gen. xxx. 42. See Siegfried, 'Philo,' 230, 231.

[2] ἐκ τοῦ γὰρ οὐδαμῇ ὄντος ἀμήχανόν ἐστι γενέσθαι τι. He seems to contradict himself in 'De Somn.' i. § 13.

[1] Ἐξ ἐκείνης γὰρ (ὕλης) πάντ' ἐγέννησεν ὁ θεός, οὐκ ἐφαπτόμενος αὐτός· οὐ γὰρ ἦν θέμις ἀπείρου καὶ πεφυρμένης ὕλης ψαύειν τὸν ἴδμονα καὶ μακάριον, ἀλλὰ ταῖς ἀσωμάτοις δυνάμεσιν . . . κατεχρήσατο. 'De Victim. offer.' 13. Comp. 'De Plantat.' 1; 'De Cherub.' 35; 'De Mund. opif.' 2.

[2] παύεται γὰρ οὐδέποτε ποιῶν ὁ θεός. 'Leg. Allegg.' i. 3.

Digitized by Microsoft®

of scattered smoke, or shooting horrible sparkles out of their eyes:

19 Whereof not only the harm might dispatch them at once, but also the terrible sight utterly destroy them.

20 Yea, and without these might they have fallen down with one blast, being persecuted of vengeance, and scattered abroad through the breath of thy power: but thou hast ordered all things in measure and number and weight.

21 For thou canst shew thy great strength at all times when thou wilt; and who may withstand the power of thine arm?

22 For the whole world before thee is [h] as a ‖ little grain of the balance, yea, as a drop of the morn-

[h] Isai. 40. 15.
‖ Or, little weight.

18. unknown wild beasts, full of rage, newly created.] Josephus ('Antt.' ii. 14, § 3), following some different legend, says that God did fill Egypt full of all sorts of wild beasts, of kinds that had never been seen before. Some render θυμοῦ πλήρεις "full of venom," and θυμός has this meaning in some passages of the LXX. (Deut. xxxii. 33; Ps. lvii. 4; Amos vi. 12; Heb. חֲמַת). But it is better to retain the common meaning of "rage," as in vii. 20; xvi. 5.

either.] ἤτοι. The only other place in the Bible where the word occurs is Rom. vi. 16, where also it is used in the unclassical sense of "either," followed by ἤ, "or."

or filthy scents of scattered smoke.] The better reading is λικμωμένους (Vulg., aut fumi odorem proferentes), "frothing forth" (lit., "winnowing," "scattering like chaff"), "a roar of smoke." Βρόμος, "a roaring" (fremitus), is sometimes confused with βρῶμος, "a stench," as in Joel ii. 20, ἀναβήσεται ὁ βρόμος αὐτοῦ. There is no sufficient reason for taking the word in that sense here. "A roar of smoke" is one of the Aeschylean, lyrical expressions which the writer likes. Comp. Ovid. 'Met.' vii. 114, "fumificisque locum mugitibus implent." Comp. Job xli. 18, 20; xxxix. 20.

shooting.] Lit., "lightning." Job xli. 19, "Out of his (Leviathan's) mouth go burning lamps, and sparks of fire leap out;" id. 21, "His breath kindleth coals, and a flame goeth out of his mouth."

19. but also the terrible sight.] Rather, "but even the sight (was able) to destroy, by terrifying them." The fabled basilisk was able to kill by a glance.

> "As the basilicok sleth folk > By venime of his sight."
> CHAUCER, Parson's Tale.

> "So soon kills not the basilisk with sight."
> GREENE.

> "Make me not like the sighted basilisk.
> I've looked on thousands who have sped the better
> By my regard, but killed none so."
> SHAKSPEARE, Winter's Tale, i. 2.

The basilisk is the "cockatrice" (Tsiphoni) of Is. xi. 8; Jer. viii. 17. The cockatrice is also said to kill by a glance:—

> "That bare vowel I shall poison more > Than the death-darting eye of cockatrice."
> Rom. and Jul. iii. 2.

Comp. 'Twelfth Night,' iii. 4, &c. The word is a corruption of cocodrillo, crocodile.

20. with one blast.] As Sennacherib and his host were destroyed (2 K. xix. 7).

being persecuted of vengeance.] Rather, "being chased, or pursued, by Justice." This notion of Vengeance dogging the heels of crime, like a hound upon the scent, is common in all literature. "Some men's sins are open, going before to judgment, and some they follow after" (1 Tim. v. 24); Acts xxviii. 4, "whom vengeance (ἡ δίκη) suffereth not to live."

> "Vengeance, thy fiery wing, their race pursued." through the breath of thy power.] Chap. v. 23; Job iv. 9.
> HEBER.

thou hast ordered.] Rather, "Thou orderedst" (i.e., at Creation).

in measure and number and weight.] Comp. 4 Esdr. iv. 36, 37. The true and valuable meaning of the clause is that God did not create these leviathans, and basilisks, and strange monsters, because He loves the ordered regularity of the kosmos (Job xxviii. 24–27; Is. xl. 12). In such passages we see the early conceptions of a Realm of Law. Further, God's mercy proportioned the means of punishment to the desired ends (Job xxxi. 6, "Let me be weighed in an even balance;" Is. xxviii. 17, the "line" and "plummet" of judgment). Another reason is given in vv. 23–26.

21. thou canst shew . . . at all times.] There was no immediate necessity therefore for any abnormally supernatural, intervention.

22. the whole world.] 2 Macc. viii. 18, "who at a beck can cast down . . . all the world."

as a little grain of the balance.] Lit., "a speck out of the scales." Comp. Is. xl. 15 (LXX.) ῥοπὴ ζύγου. 'Ροπὴ properly means the ing dew that falleth down upon the earth.

23 But thou hast mercy upon all; for thou canst do all things, and winkest at the sins of men, because they should amend.

24 For thou lovest all the things that are, and abhorrest nothing which thou hast made: for never wouldest thou have made any thing, if thou hadst hated it.

25 And how could any thing have endured, if it had not been thy will? or been preserved, if not called by thee?

26 But [i] thou sparest all: for they are thine, O Lord, thou lover of souls. [i] ch. 12 16.

CHAPTER XII.

2 God did not destroy those of Canaan all once. 12 If he had done so, who could controul him? 19 But by sparing them he taught us. 27 They were punished with their gods.

FOR thine incorruptible Spirit is in all things.

trembling dip, or inclination of the scales, but is here used for the tiniest grain that can cause the scales to dip if taken out or put in.

as a drop of the morning dew.] The morning dewdrop is the very type of evanescence: Hos. vi. 4; xiii. 3.

23. But thou hast mercy . . .] Ecclus. xviii. 13. God's omnipotence and man's utter feebleness are mentioned as the grounds of God's mercy, as in xii. 16, 18. From this is taken the beginning of the fine collect, "O God, who declarest Thine Almighty power, most chiefly by shewing mercy and pity."

"It is an attribute of God himself,
And earthly power doth then shew likest God's When Mercy seasons Justice."

winkest at the sins of men, because they should amend.] Lit., "overlookest men's sins for repentance," xii. 10. The same curious English phrase is used in Acts xvii. 30, which is closely parallel to this: "The times of this ignorance God winked at (ὑπεριδών), but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent (μετανοεῖν)." For the thought see Rom. ii. 4; 2 Pet. iii. 9. With the phrase compare also Ecclus. xxviii. 7, "wink at (πάριδε) ignorance;" xxx. 11, "wink not at his follies."

"But we must give each other leave, and wink at either's war."—CHAPMAN, Il. iv. 66.

"Because they should amend" is old English for "in order that."

24. For thou lovest all the things that are.] We may be grateful to the writer for the beautiful thoughts of this and the following verses without stopping to inquire how he co-ordinated them with the uncompromising severity expressed in such passages as vv. 10–13, v. 17–23, &c. He here agrees with Philo, who in many passages speaks of "goodness," i.e. "kindness," as the final cause of all creation ('De opif. Mundi,' § 6; 'De Cherub.' § 35; 'De sacrif. Abel.' § 15, &c.).

abhorrest nothing which thou hast made.] Referred to in our Collect for Ash Wednesday.

25. how could any thing have endured.] Love is the law of God's providence no less than of His creative power.

if not called by thee.] Namely, "called into being." The expression is a Hebraism, καλεῖν being used like קָרָא in the senses both of "calling" and "creating" (Rom. iv. 17).

26. thou sparest all: for they are thine.] "His tender mercy is over all his works" (Ps. cxlv. 9).

O Lord, thou lover of souls.] Δέσποτα φιλόψυχε. This is an exquisite and original expression. In classical Greek φιλόψυχος means "loving life," i.e. cowardly. (Comp. John xii. 25.) It is here used in the sense that God "loveth not the death of a sinner," i. 13. The epithet may have been suggested by Ezek. xviii. 4, "Behold all souls are mine."

CHAPTER XII.

The reason why God spares all (1). Hence He gave gradual warning punishments even to the guilty Canaanites (2–8); not from want of power, or fear of consequence, since He is Almighty (9–14), but because His power is the basis of His justice and mercy (15–18); and because He desired to teach us mercy and to inspire hope (19), and to point the contrast of the yet greater mercy which He shews to His children (20–22). Hence even the plagues of Egypt had a merciful design.

The reader can hardly fail to observe that throughout the chapter the writer seems to be on the very verge of flagrant self-contradiction. He has just uttered the most noble thoughts about the love and mercy and universal care of God for all, and he continues at intervals to touch on this thought; yet his Jewish nationality constantly leads him to express sentiments of so fierce a satisfaction respecting those whom he regards as the 2 Therefore chastenest thou them by little and little that offend, and warnest them by putting them in remembrance wherein they have offended, that leaving their wickedness they may believe on thee, O Lord.

Digitized by Microsoft®

3 For it was thy will to destroy by the hands of our fathers both those ‖ old inhabitants of thy holy land, ‖ Or. ancient.

4 Whom thou hatedst for doing most odious works of ‖ witchcrafts, ‖ Or, sorceries. and wicked sacrifices; enemies of God and Israel, as to be scarcely reconcilable with the catholicity of his higher generalisations respecting the nature of God. We see, throughout, the conflict of Hellenistic thought and Hebraic prepossessions, and the writer's apparent inconsistencies are the more excusable, because he is dealing with the nature and purposes of God as exhibited in dealings which we understand so imperfectly that the conclusions which we draw from them can only be regarded as partial and relative.

1. For thine incorruptible Spirit is in all things.] As this clause gives an explanation of the sense in which "all things are God's," it might more conveniently be added to the last chapter. The Vulg. paraphrases it, O quam bonus et suavis est, Domine, spiritus tuus in omnibus. This seems to point to a reading ἀγαθὸν (for ἄφθαρτον), which is found in the Syriac and Arabic versions, but is otherwise without authority, and gives a weaker sense. Since God's Spirit is "incorruptible," men may grieve that Spirit and desecrate its temple, but never wholly lose it. "In all things" includes "in all men." Πάντων (xi. 26) and πᾶσι in this verse are neuter, as is proved by xi. 24. The writer, in his Alexandrian fashion, no doubt regarded as practically identical the Stoic conception of an anima mundi (to which his words seem to point in i. 7; vii. 24; viii. 7), and the scriptural conception of the life of man as being dependent on the Spirit of God (Gen. vi. 3; Job xxxii. 8, xxxiv. 14; Ps. civ. 30; Eccles. xii. 7). He says, indeed, that "Wisdom," which he uses interchangeably with "the Spirit of God," cannot dwell in sinful bodies or guilty souls (i. 3–5); but even in these he supposes a certain unalterable indwelling of Divine forces.

2. Therefore.] God's mercy, and the immanence of His Spirit in all things, explain the merciful gradualness of His punishments.

chastenest thou.] ἐλέγχεις, i. 3. Vulg., corripis.

them . . . that offend.] παραπίπτοντας, vi. 9.

by little and little.] κατ' ὀλίγον (Vulg., partibus); like the classical κατὰ βραχύ. But for His mercy God might have annihilated sinners at one stroke (v. 9, xi. 20).

warnest them.] In xi. 10 the writer has said that while God warned and tested the Israelites (νουθετῶν ἐδοκίμασας) as a Father, He judged and condemned (καταδικάζων ἐξητάσας) the Egyptians as a severe king. Since he proceeds to speak of the abominations of the old Canaanites, which were in every sense much worse than those of the Egyptians, his language involves a self-contradiction. Doubtless he would have been able to offer some sort of explanation of this inconsistency, but a more careful and less rhetorical writer, even if he were constantly struggling in the opposite currents of philosophy and Judaism, would hardly have left these contradictions side by side.

wherein.] ἐν οἷς, i.e. of the things wherein.

that leaving their wickedness they may believe on thee.] The writer is not here entering into theological considerations, and it is hardly fair to say that he considers punishment as the cause of repentance and faith. He meant no more than Isaiah, when he said (xxvi. 9), "When Thy judgments are in the earth, the inhabitants of the world will learn righteousness." The "belief" of which he speaks (though expressed by πιστεύειν ἐπὶ σέ, Acts ix. 42; Rom. iv. 5) means no more than the acknowledgment of God mentioned in v. 27. Still we may agree with Grimm in the remark that the verse could hardly have been written by a Christian.

3. it was thy will to destroy.] In the Greek these words are in v. 6; the intermediate words in vv. 4, 5, 6, being parenthetical.

by the hands of our fathers.] The extermination may be attributed either to man or to God (Ex. xxiii. 33; Numb. xxxiii. 52).

those old inhabitants.] The tribes of Canaan.

of thy holy land.] We find the same expression in 2 Macc. i. 7. The name "the Holy Land" does not occur in either Testament, though we have "the Holy Mountain," "holy cities," "holy Jerusalem," &c. This is the earliest trace of the famous designation.

4. Whom thou hatedst.] The expression must of course be understood not only anthropologically, but popularly. The writer's impetuous particularism leads him into expressions which do not cohere. He here speaks of God hating the Canaanites, though he has just said (xi. 24) that God "loveth all

[a] ch. 14. 23.

5 And also [a] those merciless murderers of children, and devourers of man's flesh, and the feasts of blood,
6 With their priests out of the midst of their idolatrous crew, and the parents, [b] that killed with their own hands souls destitute of help:
7 That the land, which thou

[b] Deut. 12. 31.

things that are." Had he been writing more calmly and accurately, he would have probably tried to draw some distinction between sinners and their sins (v. 8), though in general language this is often left unnoticed (Ps. v. 6, 7, "The Lord abhorreth the bloody and deceitful man").

of witchcrafts.] φαρμακειῶν. The word φαρμακεία properly means "incantation by means of drugs" (Vulg., per medicamina), but is used by the LXX. to express all kinds of sorcery, מְכַשְּׁפִים, praestigiae (Ex. vii. 11; Isa. xlvii. 9, &c.). On the crimes of the Canaanites, see Deut. xviii. 11–14.

wicked sacrifices.] Rather, unholy (ἀνοσίους) rites of all kinds; rites which offend against the Majesty of God. Such rites formed the main part of the worship of Baalim and Asherah.

5. murderers of children.] Comp. xiv. 23. The accusative depends on "hating" (μισήσας). The allusion is to the Ammonite worship of

"Moloch, horrid king, besmeared with blood
Of human sacrifice and parents' tears;
Though, for the noise of drums and timbrels loud,
Their children's cries unheard, that passed through fire
To his grim idol."

See Lev. xx. 2; Ps. cvi. 37 ("they sacrificed their sons and their daughters unto devils"); Ezek. xvi. 20, &c. The same horrors, which have their guilty root in depraved instincts, sometimes occurred in the worship of Baal (Jer. xix. 5).

and devourers of man's flesh, and the feasts of blood.] It is impossible to be sure of the reading here. The Vatican MS., which is the best, reads καὶ σπλαγχνοφάγων ἀνθρωπίνων σαρκῶν θοίναν καὶ αἵματος, "and (hating) the banquet of entrail-devourers of human flesh, and of blood." Vulg., et comestores viscerum hominum et devoratores sanguinis. Possibly they read σπλαγχνοφάγους. The word is very rare, but occurs in Plutarch ('de Fluv.' v. 3, ὑπὸ σπλ. ἀετοῦ). Σπλάγχνα is specially used of sacrifices (see 2 Macc. vi. 7). The writer here accuses the Canaanites of cannibalism. The charge is unsupported, and is supremely improbable. Moloch-worship (Deut. xii. 31) was not cannibalistic.

6. With their priests out of the midst of their idolatrous crew.] The MSS. are here hopelessly confused, and the corruption must have sprung from the rarity of the expressions used and the difficulty of understanding them. The text. rec. has ἐκ μέσου μυσταθείας σου, and the Vulg. a medio sacramento tuo. The variations of the MSS. are within sufficiently narrow limits to shew that the true reading must have been something like this, but the σου is meaningless, and there is no such word as either μυστάθης or μυσταθεία, though Hesychius says that μυστάθης meant "a guild of augurs." It would be useless to enter into the many conjectures which have been made by the editors, because most of them are either extremely improbable or entirely untenable. The original reading may have been ἐκ μέσου μύστας θιάσου, "initiated worshippers from the mid religious rout" (Fritzsche), or ἐκ μύσους μύστας θιάσου, "initiated worshippers from the abomination of the religious rout" (Grimm). The latter reading is the more probable, because (1) μύσος is one of the rare, poetic, Aeschylean words which the writer likes; (2) the double genitive may have seemed harsh to the copyists, and may therefore have been altered; and (3) some MSS. have εκμυσουμυσταθειασου (Vatican, a sec. manu). The word θίασος originally meant a Bacchanalian choir of Moenads; and it suits the orgiastic priesthoods and votaries of the wild Phoenician nature worships. Another possible conjecture is ἐκμύσους μύστας θιάσου, "initiates of the abominable rout." The writer may have heard or invented the adjective ἐκμυσής.

that killed with their own hands.] This is the proper meaning of αὐθέντας, but the word is also used in wider and more general senses (Aesch. 'Eum.' 212; Eur. 'Andr.' 172); so that the writer may merely mean "parent-murderers of helpless souls," in the sense that they authorised the sacrifice of their children (v. 5). The priests kept these matters in their own hands. The "helplessness" of the lives thus sacrificed enhances the pity and horror of the crime. Comp. Ps. cvi. 37, 38; Jer. vii. 31.

7. the land which thou esteemedst above all other.] The Jews had many sayings in honour of Judea and Jerusalem. They thought that Jerusalem was the central point, as well as "the joy," of the whole earth. "Jerusalem is the light of the world" ('Bereshith Rabba,' § 59). "He who traverses so much as four ells in the land of Israel is sure of everlasting life" ('Kethuboth,' f. 111. 1). Its ten special excellences are extolled in 'Bava Kama,' f. 82. 1.

Digitized by Microsoft®

esteemedst above all other, might receive a worthy ‖ colony of God's children.

‖ Or, new inhabitance.

8 Nevertheless even those thou sparedst as men, and didst send [c] wasps, forerunners of thine host, to destroy them by little and little.

[c] Exod. 23. 28. Deut. 7. 20. Josh. 24. 12.

9 Not that thou wast unable to bring the ungodly under the hand of the righteous in battle, or to destroy them at once with cruel beasts, or with one rough word:

10 But executing thy judgments upon them by little and little, thou gavest them place of repentance, not being ignorant that they were a naughty generation, and that their malice was bred in them, and that their cogitation would never be changed.

11 For it was a [d] cursed seed from the beginning; neither didst thou for fear of any man give them pardon for those things wherein they sinned.

[d] Gen. 9. 25.

a worthy colony.] The word "colony" (ἀποικίαν) is not what we should expect, since the Jews regarded Palestine as their native land. The land of exile was called ἀποικία, and "the children of the captivity" are called υἱοὶ τῆς ἀποικίας, Esth. i. 11, &c. In Jer. xxix. 1, the prophet's letter to the exiles is called ἐπιστολὴν τῇ ἀποικίᾳ. Hence the marginal suggestion, "or new inhabitance" (Vulg., peregrinationem). Perhaps the writer used it by mistake for ἐποικία, "a settlement," or παροικία, "a sojourning," since the latter word is sometimes used in a spiritual sense (1 Pet. i. 17). "A holy colony" would be "worthy" of a holy land.

of God's children.] Comp. xi. 10.

8. thou sparedst as men.] The word "men" points to the weakness and moral frailty of men, whom God spares as "remembering that they are but dust," Ps. lxxviii. 39.

wasps.] Ex. xxiii. 28, "I will send hornets before thee, which shall drive out the Hittite, &c., from before thee. I will not drive them out from before thee in one year, lest the land become desolate, and the beast of the field multiply against thee. By little and little I will drive them out from before thee, until thou be increased and inherit the land." Comp. Deut. vii. 20; Josh. xxiv. 12. Philo understood the expression literally ('De proem. et poen.,' Opp. ii. 423), and there can be little doubt that it alludes to the weakening or depopulation of parts of Canaan by swarms of hornets—a circumstance by no means unprecedented in Eastern history. See Aelian, xi. 28, xvii. 35; Ammian. Marc. xxiv. 8; Bochart, 'Hieroz.' iii. 407. That hornets were common in Palestine we see from the name Zoreah (Josh. xv. 33). Those who, with St. Augustine, take "hornets" to mean "aculei timoris" ('Qu. in Exod.' ii. 93) refer to Deut. i. 44, "The Amorites . . . chased you, as bees do" (comp. Ps. cxviii. 12), and quote the analogous metaphorical use of the word gadfly (oestrus) by classical writers.

by little and little.] κατὰ βραχύ. Ex. xxiii. 30, κατὰ μικρὸν μικρόν. See note on v. 2. The reason assigned by the writer—that the Canaanites might not be destroyed at once, and so might have time for repentance—is doubtless a legitimate inference, though it is not the one assigned in Ex. xxiii. 30.

9. Not that thou wast unable.] οὐκ ἀδυνατῶν. Comp. οὐκ ἠπόρει, xi. 17.

in battle.] ἐν παρατάξει, by fighting enemies face to face, Judith i. 6. The thought of the verse is only a repetition of xi. 17–23.

at once.] ὑφ' ἕν; comp. xviii. 19. πρὸς μίαν ῥοπήν, xviii. 12.

rough.] ἀποτόμῳ. See note on v. 20, 22 (the word is a favourite one with the writer); vi. 5; xi. 10; xviii. 15.

10. thou gavest.] Rather, "Thou wert giving" (imperfect).

place of repentance.] The same phrase, which corresponds to the Latin locus poenitentiae (though not in the common sense in which those words are used), is found in Heb. xii. 17. Comp. Rom. xii. 19; Eph. iv. 27.

not being ignorant.] The writer is fond of this litotes: xviii. 19; comp. 2 Cor. ii. 11.

that they were a naughty generation.] Lit., "that their birth was evil" (comp. iii. 12, 13).

and that their malice was bred in them.] Their wickedness (κακία) was not an exotic, but indigenous. It was commonly discussed in the schools of philosophy "whether virtue was a thing innate (ἔμφυτον) or acquired (διδακτόν)." In Jas. i. 21 the word is used in the sense of "implanted" or "engrafted," which the context (v. 11) shews to be here inadmissible. To talk here of "the doctrine of original sin" is an anachronism.

11. a cursed seed from the beginning.] The allusion is to the curse of Canaan (Gen. ix. 25). It is hard to see how the writer reconciles the thought of an hereditary curse producing innate wickedness with the doctrine of God's love for all (xi. 24). Perhaps he would have distinguished between predes-

[e] Rom. 9. 20.

12 For who shall say, [e] What hast thou done? or who shall withstand thy judgment? or who shall accuse thee for the nations that perish, whom thou hast made? or who shall come to stand ‖ against thee, to be ‖ revenged for the unrighteous men?

‖ Or, in thy presence.
‖ Or, a revenger.

13 For neither is there any God but thou that [f] careth for all, to whom thou mightest shew that thy judgment is not unright.

[f] ch. 6. 7. 1 Pet. 5. 7.

14 Neither shall king or tyrant be able to set his face against thee for any whom thou hast punished.

15 Forsomuch then as thou art righteous thyself, thou orderest all things righteously: [g] thinking it not agreeable with thy power to condemn him that hath not deserved to be punished.

[g] Job 10. 2.

16 For thy power is the beginning of righteousness, and [h] because thou art the Lord of all, it maketh thee to be gracious unto all.

[h] ch. 11. 26.

17 For when men will not believe tination and prescience (xix. 1); or would have left the antinomy as irreconcilable, while at the same time he pointed out that room was left for individual amendment (v. 20), and even for individual salvation (Josh. ii. 1; Heb. xi. 31; Jas. ii. 25).

for fear of any man.] The exact nature of the fear—whether of the consequences of rebellion against God, or of man's judgments respecting God's actions—is left undefined.

pardon.] Lit., "fearlessness," "security." The meaning is not that God gave them permission to sin (ἀδ. τοῦ ἁμαρτάνειν, veniam, licentiam peccandi). The sense is not clear, but seems to be that God did not, out of fear of any one, pardon them for their offences. (Vulg., Nec timens aliquem veniam dabas peccatis illorum.)

12. For who shall say.] How can God fear any one when there are none to resist His will? xi. 21; Job ix. 12; Is. xlv. 9; Rom. ix. 20.

for the nations that perish, whom thou hast made.] This is an appeal to God's irresistible power as closing all questions, and is analogous to the lesson deduced from the potter and the clay (Jer. xix. 1–10). It must, however, be borne in mind that the argument is merely tyrannical and immoral unless it be assumed from the very idea of the nature of God, that because His power is Almighty, therefore also His mercy is infinite. The appeal, "Nay, but who art thou, O man, that disputest with God?" (Rom. ix. 20,) is valid as an appeal to trustful submission in those who know God's goodness to be unbounded, but could never be a defence for arbitrary tyranny. Here the appeal is somewhat harshly emphasised, but in the next verse the writer shews that he desires to form a real Theodicaea, and not merely to silence inquiry.

to stand against thee.] This (and not the marginal "in thy presence;" Vulg., in tuo conspectu) is the correct rendering of εἰς κατάστασίν σοι.

13. For neither is there any God but thou.] There is no other God to be an avenger of the unrighteous whom Thou destroyest; and man has no power to intervene.

to whom thou mightest shew.] Rather, "so that (in the later consecutive force of ἵνα) thou mightest shew." Were there any other God in existence, Thou mightest then have proved to such a god the righteousness of Thy dealings.

14. to set his face against thee.] Lit., "to look thee in the face" (comp. Acts xxvii. 15), and so "to resist." Ecclus. xix. 5, ἀντοφθαλμῶν ἡδοναῖς.

thou hast punished.] The Vulg. has perdidisti; and that the writer would not have shrunk from ἀπωλέσας is shewn by the ἀπολωλότων of v. 12.

15. not agreeable with thy power.] Injustice is a thing alien from God's sway (δυνάμεως), because His strength (ἰσχύς) is righteousness.

16. For thy power.] It is a pity that the A. V. here follows the Vulg. in using the same word, "power" (virtus), for δύναμις and ἰσχύς.

is the beginning of righteousness.] Rather, "the principle" or "ground" (ἀρχὴ) of righteousness. In xiv. 27, ἀρχὴ and αἰτία, "cause," are placed side by side. The writer says that God is righteous because He is strong. Josephus says ('Antt.' iv. 8, § 14) that God's strength is righteousness (τοῦ Θεοῦ ἰσχύς ἐστι τὸ δίκαιον). Comp. xi. 23. The thought that lies at the basis of such remarks may be that man's injustice is partly due to his feebleness and selfishness, and God being omnipotent has none of that bias to do wrong which springs from weakness.

because thou art the Lord of all.] This is expressed in the original with beautiful energy: "Thy lordship over all makes Thee spare all."

17. when men will not believe.] ἀπιστού-

Digitized by Microsoft®

‖ Or, perfect

that thou art of a ‖ full power, thou shewest thy strength, and among them that know it thou makest their boldness manifest.

18 But thou, mastering thy power, judgest with equity, and orderest us with great favour: for thou mayest use power when thou wilt.

19 But by such works hast thou taught thy people that the just man should be merciful, and hast made thy children to be of a good hope that thou givest repentance for sins.

[i] Rom. 9. 22.

20 For if [i] thou didst punish the enemies of thy children, and the condemned to death, with such deliberation, giving them time and place, whereby they might be delivered from their malice:

21 With how great circumspection didst thou judge thine own sons, unto whose fathers thou hast sworn, and made covenants of good promises?

22 Therefore, whereas thou dost chasten us, thou scourgest our enemies a thousand times more, to the intent that, when we judge, we should carefully think of thy good-μενος. Lit., "being disbelieved in." Ex. v. 2, Pharaoh said, "Who is the Lord?" Comp. 2 Kings xviii. 30–37.

among them that know it.] ἐν τοῖς εἰδόσι. The Vulg. has οὐκ εἰδόσι (qui te nesciunt), following the Alexandrian MS. If with other MSS. and with St. Augustine (qui sciunt) we adopt the reading translated by the A. V., the allusion is to those who know God's will but do it not.

18. But thou.] The word "but" (which is omitted by some MSS.) points to the contrast between God's conduct and that of the bold tyrants to whom the writer has been alluding.

mastering thy power.] A fine epigrammatic expression. God is a δεσπότης (v. 16, xi. 26), but He "despotises over His own strength," so that it shall never be exercised unjustly. The Vulg., followed by St. Augustine, takes δεσπόζων as a substantive, and renders the words by Dominator virtutis; but this is a much inferior sense.

with equity.] ἐν ἐπιεικείᾳ, in mildness and reasonableness.

19. that the just man should be merciful.] Rather, "a lover of mankind." The lesson of mercy is in this chapter historically based on the single circumstance that the plague of hornets was sent on the Canaanites before they fell victims to the exterminating wars of Israel. The writer seems to intimate a justification of the relentless severity practised by the Hebrews (v. 3), on the ground that the milder initial judgments of God produced no repentance. The word φιλάνθρωπον (see i. 6) implies cosmopolitan love for the race of man, and Grätz supposes (but with little probability) that it was meant as a defence against the charge that Jews hated all nations but themselves (Matt. v. 43; "odium generis humani," Tac. 'Hist.' v. 5).

thy children.] The writer constantly seems to fall back into the self-satisfied prejudice (see Lk. iii. 8) which made the Jews speak as if all mankind were created for their sake. Thus in Midrash 'Rabbah Esther' we read that nine-tenths of Wisdom and the Law are in Israel; and passages of extravagant self-exaltation may be found in 'Bava Bathra,' f. 10. 2. Not only are Israelites regarded as "the dearly beloved" (Jer. xii. 7), but all Gentiles are no better than "asses" ('Berachoth,' f. 25. 2). But perhaps this chapter in its wordiness, its particularism, its antinomies, and its indistinctness, is—in spite of some beautiful thoughts and fine expressions—one of the least satisfactory parts of the book.

20. condemned to death.] ὀφειλομένους θανάτῳ. Vulg., debitos morti, to whom death was due.

with such deliberation.] The A.V., like the Vulg., takes no notice of the words καὶ δεήσεως, which are omitted in the Alex. and other MSS. Some MSS. have καὶ διέσωσας, and some MSS. of the Vulg. et liberasti; but this reading is against the context. Δεήσεως gives no tolerable sense, for it cannot mean either "pity" or "condescension." One MS. reads διέσεως, "letting through" or "forbearance," and this is very probably the true reading. If so, the rarity of the word, especially in this sense, may have led to its alteration and omission.

and place.] I.e. opportunity.

21. covenants of good promises.] Comp. 2 Pet. i. 4, "greatest and precious promises."

22. thou scourgest.] The contrast of μαστιγοῖς with παιδεύων (comp. Prov. iii. 11), when nationally applied, can only be regarded as a misapprehension of God's impartial love for all whom He has made.

a thousand times more.] ἐν μυριότητι, "in myriadness." This expression does not occur elsewhere.

when we judge.] Viz., our fellow-men.

ness, and when we ourselves are judged, we should look for mercy.

23 Wherefore, whereas men have lived dissolutely and unrighteously, [k]thou hast tormented them with their own [||]abominations.

24 [l]For they went astray very far in the ways of error, and held them for gods, which even among the beasts of their enemies were despised, being deceived, as children of no understanding.

25 Therefore unto them, as to children without the use of reason, thou didst send a judgment to mock them.

26 But they that would not be reformed by that correction, wherein he dallied with them, shall feel a judgment worthy of God.

27 For, look, for what things they grudged, when they were punished, that is, for them whom they thought to be gods; [now] being punished in them, when they saw it, they acknowledged him to be the true God, whom before they denied to know; and therefore came extreme damnation upon them.

[k] ch. 11. 16. & 16. 1.
[||] Or, abominable idols.
[l] ch. 11. 15. Rom. 1. 23.

CHAPTER XIII.

2 They were not excused that worshipped any of God's works. 19 But most wretched are they that worship the works of men's hands.

when we . . . are judged.] Viz., by Thee.

23–27. A retrogression to the case of the Egyptians, and the reason why they were punished.

23. Wherefore.] Since our enemies are punished ten thousandfold more severely than we.

whereas men have lived.] Rather, "those unrighteous also who lived."

dissolutely.] Lit., "in folly of life." See i. 3, iii. 12, x. 8; Rom. i. 21.

with their own abominations.] "By means of the abhorred things which they worshipped." He is now referring to the Egyptian animal-worship. Βδελύγματα is one of the words used by the LXX. for גִּלּוּלִים and other terms of disgust which the Jews gave to heathen idols (1 Sam. xv. 2; 1 K. xxi. 26; Ezek. xxx. 13, &c.). "Against all the gods of Egypt I will execute judgment" (Ex. xii. 12).

24. very far in the ways of error.] μακρότερον. Grimm considers this to be an hyperbole: "They wandered farther than the ways of error." Either rendering is tenable.

which even among the beasts of their enemies were despised.] Serpents, crocodiles, monkeys, beetles, &c. The 16th satire of Juvenal is one continuous strain of scorn against Egyptian worship.

being deceived, as children of no understanding.] Rom. i. 19–25. The adverb δίκην, "like," occurs here alone in the Bible or Apocrypha.

25. to mock them.] Childish follies were chastised with childish punishment. The words παισὶν—ἐμπαιγμὸν παιγνίοις are chosen for the sake of the paronomasia.

26. by that correction, wherein he dallied with them.] Two words in the original—παιγνίοις ἐπιτιμήσεως, "with sportive correction;" Vulg., ludibriis et increpationibus. The writer means that the first plagues of Egypt were but child's play compared with the later ones.

27. they grudged.] Rather, "they were indignant." The meaning of this somewhat awkwardly expressed sentence is, "For being punished in those things (wild beasts, &c.) which they deemed to be gods, in their case, wherein they were indignant while suffering, they recognised the true God, seeing Him of whom they used to deny that they knew Him." In other words, it was the punishment inflicted on their animal-gods which made them most indignant amid their sufferings, and yet it was that very punishment which forced on them the conviction of the true God.

acknowledged him to be the true God.] Ex. viii. 8, 28; ix. 27; x. 7, &c.

whom before they denied to know.] Comp. xvi. 16; Ex. v. 2.

extreme damnation.] Rather "the extreme of their condemnation," i.e. the last and severest plagues, and destruction of their king and host in the Red Sea (1 Thess. ii. 16, ἔφθασε δὲ ἐπ' αὐτοὺς ἡ ὀργὴ εἰς τέλος).

came . . . upon them.] xvi. 4; Luke xxi. 26; Jas. v. 1, &c.

CHAPTER XIII.

The folly of idolatry; whether it consist in a worship of God's works (1–9), or of the works of men's hands (10–19).

The writer is not unnaturally led to this digression concerning idolatry, because he has touched on the revolting worship both of SURELY vain are all men by nature, who are ignorant of God, and [a] could not out of the good things that are seen know him that is: neither by considering the works did they acknowledge the workmaster;

[a] Rom. 1. 19, 20.

2 [b] But deemed either fire, or wind, or the swift air, or the circle of the stars, or the violent water, or the lights of heaven, to be the gods which govern the world.

[b] Deut. 4. 19. & 17. 3.

3 With whose beauty if they being delighted took them to be gods; let the Canaanites (xii. 3–6) and of the Egyptians (xi. 15; xii. 27).

The Jews during the course of their history had been thrown into contact with various forms of idolatry. The noblest and most innocent form assumed by false worship was the Persian worship of the sun; the coarsest and most brutal was the demon-worship of the Canaanites. The Egyptians partly worshipped natural powers and partly images. The Greeks and Romans worshipped images, not as being divine things, but as the symbols of deities who were originally personifications of the forces of nature. The writer here divides idolaters into two classes: 1. Nature-worshippers; 2. Idol-worshippers; and, like Philo ('De decal.' §§ 12–15; 'De monarch.' i. §§ 1–3), he also alludes to animal-worship under a separate head (xii. 24; xv. 18, 19).

1. vain.] Rather, "foolish;" ματαιόφρονες, 3 Macc. vi. 11. The folly of idolatry is touched upon in 2 K. xvii. 15; Rom. i. 21. Comp. θεὸν μάταιον, xv. 8; ἀπὸ τούτων τῶν ματαίων, Acts xiv. 15.

by nature.] Man's folly is not solely the result of bad teaching and extraneous influences. It is not only adventitious but innate. See note on xii. 10.

who are ignorant of God.] Lit., "to whom ignorance of God belonged." "The world even by its wisdom knew not God," 1 Cor. i. 21.

could not.] Lit., "had not strength."

out of the good things that are seen.] St. Paul argues that He who is invisible was yet seen by means of His works, and would have been seen by the heathen, but for a blindness partly voluntary and partly penal (Rom. i. 20–23; Acts xiv. 15–17).

him that is.] The Eternal "I am"—'Ο ὤν —the Absolute Being, who alone can say, "I am, and there is none besides me" (Ex. iii. 14).

neither . . . did they acknowledge.] ἐπέγνωσαν, "they did not further know." They did not look through nature up to nature's God.

the workmaster.] Heb. xi. 10, "the artificer." See note on vii. 21.

2. either fire.] The writer, if, as we have conjectured, he lived after the days of Caligula, is very probably thinking of passages in which Philo identifies Grecian worship with a worship of the four elements (earth, air, fire, water); the sun, moon, planets, and stars. Thus fire was worshipped under the name of Hephaestus; air under the names of Hera, Aeolus, &c.; water as Poseidon, &c.; the sun as Apollo; the moon as Artemis; the earth as Demeter, &c. The worship of the sun was prominent at On (Heliopolis) in Egypt, and in Palestine at Beth-shemesh (House of the Sun).

the swift air.] Like Spenser's "the flitting skies" (Deane).

the circle of the stars.] The starry vault of heaven which appears to revolve round the earth (Vulg., gyrum stellarum).

the violent water.] The stormy sea and rushing streams.

the lights of heaven.] Aeschylus (Agam. 6) calls them λαμπρούς δυνάστας ἐμπρέποντας αἰθέρι.

("Bright potentates set proudly in the sky.")

The words φωστῆρες τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, luminaria coeli, occur in LXX. Gen. i. 14 (comp. Phil. ii. 15, ὡς φωστῆρες ἐν κόσμῳ).

to be the gods which govern the world.] The word πρυτάνεις κόσμου might be taken also in the sense of Gen. i. 16, "the sun to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night" (LXX. εἰς ἀρχὰς τῆς ἡμέρας κ. τ. λ.), but they are rightly regarded here as being in apposition to θεούς. The Greeks worshipped the sun and moon under the names of Apollo and Artemis; the Shemites under the names of Baal and Ashtoreth; the Egyptians as Isis and Osiris.

3. With whose beauty.] This reference to the beauty of the external world shews, as Gfrörer says (Philo, ii. 212), the trace of Hellenistic influences. The word καλλονή occurs in the LXX. (Ps. xlvi. 4; lxxviii. 7), but not in this sense or connexion. Neither κάλλος nor καλλονή occurs in the N. T. What impressed the Hebrew mind was not so much the beauty as the wonder and the power of creation (Job xxxvi.–xli.). It is only after contact with the Hellenic mind that we find in Jewish writers such passages as Ecclus. xliii. 9–11: "The beauty of heaven, the glory of the stars, an ornament giving light . . . Look upon the rainbow . . . very beautiful it is in the brightness thereof."

Cyril ('Adv. Julian.') quotes Plato as saying them know how much better the Lord of them is: for the first author of beauty hath created them.

4 But if they were astonished at their power and virtue, let them understand by them, how much mightier he is that made them.

5 For by the greatness and beauty of the creatures proportionably the maker of them is seen. Rom. 1. 20.

6 But yet for this they are the less to be blamed: for they peradventure err, seeking God, and desirous to find him.

that we ought "from the beauty of things seen to mount up to the beauty of God;" and Plutarch ('Plac. Philos.' 3) tells us that from the beauty of the creature the Stoics inferred the moral beauty of the Divine character. Even among the Greeks, however, the sense of beauty in nature is rare and late. It appears markedly in the description of Colonos by Sophocles, but Plato has to apologise for the poetical description in 'Phaedrus' as due to the eccentric idiosyncrasy of Socrates. On this whole subject, see the admirable chapters in Humboldt's 'Cosmos.' In modern times few have developed the argument here touched upon, but it has been finely set forth by the late Canon Mozley in his Sermon on Nature ('Univ. Sermons,' p. 138). He says: "Nature has two great revelations,—that of use and that of beauty . . . The glory of nature in reality resides in the mind of man . . . It is obvious that the beauty of nature is necessary for the perfection of praise; and that the praise of the Creator must be essentially weakened without it." "But," he adds, "no man can get a religion out of the beauty of nature. The outer world, when idolised, spoiled men for the inward, and in anger they fell back upon a Manichean God who was lovely in nature and unjust in man."

them.] ταῦτα, "these things;" not without that shade of contempt or depreciation often involved in the use of this demonstrative. The writer would teach the heathen "to climb by these sunbeams to the Father of Lights."

the first author.] γενεσιάρχης (Vulg. generator). The word does not occur elsewhere in the LXX., the Apocrypha, or the N. T. Even in late Greek, the word used to express this meaning is γενάρχης, which is used by Philo and by Plutarch.

the first author of beauty hath created them.] "The cypher (of beauty in the universe)," says Canon Mozley, "is not unintelligible; it lets out something. The Great Spirit, speaking by dumb representation to other spirits, intimates and signifies to them something about Himself; for if nature is symbolical, what it is symbolical about must be its author."

4. But if they were astonished.] Lit. "being amazed" (understand "they thought them to be gods").

at their power and virtue.] Here the author reverts to the notion about the universe, which is mainly dwelt upon in the O. T. The word rendered "virtue" is ἐνέργειαν, "their active efficiency."

let them understand.] This verb (νοεῖν) is often used of the perception or apprehension of God: Rom. i. 20, τὰ γὰρ ἀόρατα αὐτοῦ ἀπὸ κτίσεως κόσμου νοούμενα καθορᾶται. Comp. Heb. xi. 3.

how much mightier.] Lactantius ('Instt.' ii. 3, § 5) ends a similar argument with the words "quanto major quantoque mirabilior qui illa fecit ex nihilo."

5. by the greatness and beauty of the creatures.] This is the fundamental argument developed in Job xxxvii.–xli.

proportionably.] ἀναλόγως; Vulg., cognoscibiliter. The adverb does not occur in the Bible (though we have ἀναλογία, Rom. xii. 6). It means "conformably," "relatively," "according to a due ratio" (ἀνὰ λόγον).

the maker of them.] ὁ γενεσιουργός. The word is found once or twice in late Greek, but not in the LXX. or N. T.

is seen.] The verb θεωρέω is used especially of mental, spiritual, and adoring vision (Rom. i. 20). "Theoria is the worship of heaven" (Ruskin).

6. But yet for this they are the less to be blamed.] Although they ought to have looked from created things to the Creator, yet (ὅμως) with reference to these aberrations (the worship of the great forces of nature) the blame is small. Of all forms of idolatry that of the Persians—sun-worship and fire-worship—is the least reprehensible.

for this.] The words (ἐπὶ τούτοις) might also be rendered "in the case of these worshippers."

they peradventure err.] An excuse may, perhaps (τάχα, Rom. v. 7; Philem. 15), be made for their error. The "perhaps" implies a charitable doubt: if it be admissible to suppose that any can go astray who really are "seekers after God," then a charitable allowance may be made for these.

seeking God.] In their search for God, even in their wish to find Him, perhaps they themselves follow some mistaken path. It is possible to translate the whole clause in a very

Digitized by Microsoft

[d] Rom. 1. 21.
[‖] Or, seek.

7 For being [d] conversant in his works they [‖] search him diligently, and believe their sight: because the things are beautiful that are seen.

8 Howbeit neither are they to be pardoned.

9 For if they were able to know so much, that they could aim at the world; how did they not sooner find out the Lord thereof?

10 But miserable are they, and in [e] dead things is their hope, who called them gods, [f] which are the works of men's hands, gold and silver, to shew art in, and resemblances of beasts, or different sense, by making ὀλίγη μέμψις refer "to the case of the nature-worshippers," and αὐτοὶ to the seekers of true wisdom. The rendering would then be, "But yet for this (or, in their case) there is little blame to them, for even they perchance err who (really) seek God, and wish to find Him." If this had been the author's meaning, he could hardly have failed to write οἱ ζητοῦντες. Almost every commentator (except Grimm and De Wette) has followed the Vulg. and the A. V. in understanding the passage as I have explained it. It may well be doubted whether the writer would have admitted that the lovers of true wisdom were liable to error in matters so important: on the other hand, the search of the heathen after God was a blind and groping search which often failed (Acts xvii. 27, ζητεῖν τὸν θεὸν εἰ ἄρα γε ψηλαφήσειαν αὐτὸν καὶ εὕροιεν).

[e] ver. 18. ch. 15. 17.
[f] Ps. 115. 4. & 135. 15.

7. being conversant in his works.] They confine their attention too much to the things seen; but while they are thorough (διερευνῶσι) in their physical researches, they content themselves with external phenomena instead of looking beyond them (Heb. xi. 3).

8. Howbeit neither are they to be pardoned.] Lit., "Yet again" (in spite of the excuses which may be made for them) "not even these" (much less the grosser idolaters of whom he proceeds to speak) "are pardonable." Even these milder offenders are still, as St. Paul says, ἀναπολόγητοι (Rom. i. 20). For πάλιν δέ, see xvi. 23; 1 Cor. xii. 21.

9. that they could aim at the world.] This rendering hardly explains itself. The "that" (ἵνα) is here not telic ("in order that"), but consecutive ("so as to"). The verb "to aim at" (στοχάζεσθαι), which in classical Greek always takes a genitive, is here followed by an accusative, and means "to explain," "successfully to guess at." Αἰῶνα means the created world regarded in its temporal duration (Vulg., saeculum). The meaning then is that "if they possessed sufficient intellectual power to enable them to infer the meaning of phenomena, how was it that they failed yet more speedily to draw the final inference?"

sooner.] The deduction of the final inference—that God is greater than all His works—required no such lengthened toil as the study of science. He implies, therefore, that theirs was a moral failure or deficiency.

10. But miserable are they.] He now turns from the folly of nature-worship to the deeper baseness and wretchedness of image-worship. The line of thought followed in this passage (xiii. 10–xiv. 8) is found in many passages of Scripture (Deut. iv. 28; Ps. cxv. 4–8, cxxxv. 15–18; Jer. ii. 26–28). It is this form of idolatry which is overwhelmed with so fierce a storm of sarcasm and indignation in the later chapters of Isaiah (xl.–xlvi.). See, too, Jer. ii. x.; Ps. cxv. cxxxv., &c. The writer, in spite of the literary elaboration of his style, is incomparably less eloquent and forcible than the older prophet. When the same theme was handled by the Christian Apologists, as by Arnobius ('Adv. Gentes'), it was necessary to deal with the defence of images, which consisted in regarding them as mere visible symbols of deities, and not as being themselves divine.

in dead things.] Comp. xv. 17. The Jews had many terms of contempt for heathen idols. They called them "filth" (shikkuts), "shame" (bosheth), "horrors" (miphetseth), but especially "nothing" (aven) and "lies" (elilim).

the works of men's hands.] LXX. Ps. cxiii. 12, cxxxv. 15.

to shew art in.] Lit., "an elaboration of art." The word ἐμμελέτημα is only found once, in the Anthology. Acts xvii. 29, "graven by art (χαράγματι τέχνης) and man's device."

resemblances.] The word (ἀπεικάσματα) occurs in Plato, 'Crat.' 402 D, but not in the Bible.

of beasts.] ζώων, "of animals" or "living creatures." This was the original meaning of the word "beast," as in Gower—

> "That ilke ymage bare liknesse > Of man and of none other beste."
> Confess. Amant. i.

Beast-worship was specially prevalent in Egypt.

> "The brutish gods of Nile as fast—> Isis, and Orus, and the dog Anubis—haste."
> MILTON, Ode on Christ's Nativity.

a stone good for nothing, the work of an ancient hand.

f Isai. 44. 13, &c. Jer. 10. 3, &c.

11 f Now a ‖ carpenter that felleth timber, after he hath sawn down a tree meet for the purpose, and taken off all the bark skilfully round about, and hath wrought it handsomely, and made a vessel thereof fit for the service of man's life;

‖ Or, timber-wright.

12 And after spending the ‖ refuse of his work to dress his meat, hath filled himself;

‖ Or, chips.

13 And taking the very refuse among those which served to no use, being a crooked piece of wood, and full of knots, hath carved it diligently, when he had nothing else to do, and formed it by the skill of his understanding, and fashioned it to the image of a man;

a stone good for nothing.] Several such "useless stones," like the διοπετὲς ἄγαλμα of Ephesus (Acts xix. 35), the fabled Ancile of Numa, the Trojan Palladium, the Tauric Artemis, the Pessinuntian Cybele, &c., were widely worshipped by the ancients. The stone in the Kaaba at Mecca, probably an ancient aërolite, has been an immemorial object of worship in Arabia.

the work of an ancient hand.] It is not impossible that the "hand" of ancient sculptors may have been used to give even to aërolites some nearer semblance of the human form. The more hideous and antique an image was, the more highly was it venerated, just as in the Church of Rome the miracle-working Madonnas were rarely, if ever, fine works of art, but usually brown and ugly Byzantine pictures. But even to "the work of an ancient hand," such as a statue of Phidias or Praxiteles, a theocratic Jew would have given the name of "a useless stone." When Pope Adrian VI. was shewn the glorious sculptures in the Vatican, he sternly remarked, Sunt idola antiquorum.

11. Now a carpenter that felleth timber.] Lit., "But even if some wood-cutting artisan." The τις is scornful—any common workman. So Archias makes Priapus say that he was οἷόν κεν ἐρημαίῃσιν ἐπ' ἀκταῖς ξέσσειαν μογερῶν νίέες ἰχθυβόλων.

The heathen not only worshipped idols of gold, silver, and stone, but even paltry wooden images made of odd pieces of timber. In this and the following verses (11–16) the writer follows Isaiah (xliv. 9–20), skilfully indeed, but in very inferior style, and with none of the prophet's white heat of passionate scorn.

after he hath sawn down.] ἐκπρίσας, "after sawing down one tree out of a number."

a tree meet for the purpose.] Lit., "a swiftly-moved" (vii. 22), i.e. a handy, serviceable tree.

a vessel . . . fit for the service of man's life.] Lit., "a useful vessel for the service of life." The emphatic position of χρήσιμον shews that he is contrasting the useful article of furniture with the worse than useless idol.

12. the refuse.] ἀποβλήματα, "the chips and shavings."

hath filled himself.] See chap. v. 7. The carpenter leisurely eats his dinner before setting about making his idols. The whole picture is borrowed from Is. xliv. 14–17, to which nothing is added but sonorous language.

13. the very refuse among those.] Not content with choosing as the material for his god the refuse of his fuel, he picks out the most refuse piece of that refuse.

which served to no use.] The "which" agrees with "refuse." The irony is here exaggerated, and weakened by exaggeration.

full of knots.] With the knots grown into it, i.e. a gnarled lump. No possible reason can be assigned why the artisan should purposely choose the most refuse and amorphous fragments to make into idols. They might do for the coarse garden scarecrows—Priapus, &c.—but not for divinities which were treated with any real veneration. There may, however, be an allusion to such objects of worship as the famous image (Acts xix. 35) of Artemis at Ephesus, which, according to Pausanias and later authorities, was of olive-wood painted vermilion.

when he had nothing else to do.] Lit., "in the diligence of his idleness;" a contemptuous oxymoron.

"Stipes acernus eram properanti falce dolatus." PROPERT. iv. 2. 59.

by the skill of his understanding.] For συνέσεως some MSS. read ἀνέσεως, "by the skill of his relaxation." He only gives his idle moments to so trivial a task as the carving of a god. Compare the well-known lines of Horace—

"Olim truncus eram ficulnus, inutile lignum,
Cum faber incertus scamnum faceretne Priapum Maluit esse Deum: Deus inde ego."
HOR. Sat. i. 8. 1.

14. like some vile beast.] So Seneca says, "Numina vocant, quae si spiritu accepto

14 Or made it like some vile beast, laying it over with vermilion, and with paint colouring it red, and covering every spot therein ;

[h] Isai. 46. 7.

15 And [h] when he had made a convenient room for it, set it in a wall, and made it fast with iron :

16 For he provided for it that it might not fall, knowing that it was unable to help itself; for it is an image, and hath need of help :

[i] Isai. 44. 17, 19.

17 [i] Then maketh he prayer for his goods, for his wife and children, and is not ashamed to speak to that which hath no life.

[k] ver. 10.

18 For health he calleth upon that which is weak : for life prayeth to that [k] which is dead : for aid humbly beseecheth [‖] that which hath least means to help : and for a good journey he asketh of that which cannot set a foot forward :

[‖] Gr. that hath no experience at all.

19 And for gaining and getting, and for good success of his hands, asketh ability to do of him, that is most unable to do any thing.

CHAPTER XIV.

1 Though men do not pray to their ships, 5 yet are they saved rather by them than by their idols. 8 Idols are accursed, and so are the makers of them. 14 The beginning of idolatry, 23 and the effects thereof. 30 God will punish them that swear falsely by their idols.

AGAIN, one preparing himself to sail, and about to pass through the raging waves, calleth upon a piece of wood more rotten than the [‖] vessel that carrieth him.

[‖] Or, ship.

subito occurrerent, monstra haberentur" (ap. August. 'Civ. Dei,' vi. 10). Εὐτελεῖ, "cheap" (x. 4, xi. 15).

laying it over.] Lit., "smearing it."

with vermilion.] Bacchus, Hermes, and Pan were sometimes painted red. So Virgil describes Pan as "Sanguineis ebuli guttis minioque rubentem."

Ecl. x. 26.

"At ruber hortorum decus et tutela Priapus."
OVID, Fast. i. 415.

Comp. Sil. Ital. xiii. 332. See note on v. 13.

15. a convenient room for it.] Rather, "a hut worthy of itself." The οἴκημα was an aedicula, or little shrine.

"Stabat in exiguâ ligneus aede Deus."
TIBULL. i. 10. 19.

16. that it might not fall.] Even the trembling of images was deemed ominous. It was regarded as portentous when they fell, as Dagon did, "and shamed his worshippers." The famous Artemis of Ephesus had artificial arms added to it in later times, which were supported by golden rods.

hath need of help.] The idea of the verse is borrowed from the mention of "silver chains" in Is. xl. 19, and the expression "he fasteneth it with nails, so that it shall not be moved" (Is. xli. 7). During the siege of Tyre by Alexander, the Tyrians bound their image of Melcarth to the altar by chains of gold.

18. For health.] This and the next verse are a continuous contrast of opposite expressions. They furnish a fine specimen of rhetorical oxymoron. See Hooker, 'Eccl. Pol.' i. viii. 11.

that which cannot set a foot forward.] "Feet have they, but they walk not" (Ps. cxv. 7). The word βάσει is used contemptuously—"that which cannot even use its pedestal!" Compare the scorn expressed by Elijah against Baal, "Cry aloud, for he is a god; either . . . he is pursuing, or he is on a journey" (1 K. xviii. 27).

19. ability to do.] The adjective εὐδρανὴς (from δραίνω) is only found in grammarians. The substantive εὐδράνεια, "furtherance," occurs nowhere else.

The Jews themselves fell more or less into all the kinds of idolatry mentioned in this chapter—namely, nature-worship (Baalim, Asherah, Ashteroth); beast-worship (the calves, &c.); and image-worship (2 K. xviii. 4, &c.).

CHAPTER XIV.

Proof of the folly of worshipping idols continued, and illustrated by the idolatry of seafarers (1, 2). Digression on God's providence as shewn in the care of righteous voyagers (3–7). Idols and idolaters are cursed, and shall be punished (8–10). The mischief of idolatry (12–14), which originated (i.) in grief for the dead (15); (ii.) in flattery towards rulers (16, 17); and (iii.) in the complaisance of artists (18–21). And this idolatry led to ruinous immorality (21–31).

1. raging waves.] So Jude 13, κύματα ἄγρια θαλάσσης. The proper meaning of ἄγριος is "rustic," "wild," and so "fierce."

a piece of wood.] An idol either at the prow or at the stern of vessels. This παράση-

2 For verily desire of gain devised
‖ Or, vessel, or, ship. ‖ that, and the workman built it by his skill.

3 But thy providence, O Father,
[a] Exod. 14. 22. governeth it: for thou [a] hast made a way in the sea, and a safe path in the waves;

4 Shewing that thou canst save from all danger: yea, though a man went to sea without art.

5 Nevertheless thou wouldest not that the works of thy wisdom should be idle, and therefore do men commit their lives to a small piece of wood, and passing the rough sea in a weak vessel are saved.

μον often represented the Dioscuri, Castor and Pollux (Acts xxviii. 11). Thus the Phoenicians placed on the prows of their triremes the pigmy images of the Pataeci (Herod. iii. 37). The custom of ancient sailors to fly to the images of their gods in a storm is mentioned both in the Bible (Jon. i. 5, "Then the mariners were afraid, and cried every man unto his god") and in classical writers. Compare Shakspeare's

"All lost! to prayers, to prayers! All lost!"
The Tempest, i. 5.

more rotten.] σαθρότερον. The word is used in the secondary sense of "more worthless," as is clear from the explanation in the next verse.

2. devised that.] I.e. the vessel. It can at least be said of the ship (i.) that it was invented in the interests of commerce; (ii.) that it is a work of "wisdom;" and (iii.) that the fact of its safe use illustrates the providence of God. For the idol, on the other hand, not a word can be said.

by his skill.] Lit., "by his wisdom." Wisdom is here used in its lowest sense of human art and intelligence. For "Wisdom" in its highest sense is identified with the Spirit of God; and artists like Bezaleel are said in Scripture to be inspired (Ex. xxxi. 1–6; xxxv. 31). The artist Hiram is described as being "filled with wisdom and understanding" (1 K. vii. 14). Some good MSS. read τεχνῖτις σοφία, as in vii. 22; but the expression would be less suitable to a work of human skill. The shipbuilder, working for laudable objects, is guided by σοφία; but the idol-maker has nothing better than ἐμπειρία, "experience," "practice," or "empiric skill" (xiii. 13).

3. But thy providence, O Father, governeth it.] The δέ involves a contrast. The ship is a work of consummate human skill, yet it would be useless without the care of God's providence. The word πρόνοια, in this sense, is borrowed from the Stoic philosophers, and this verse is interesting as marking its first appearance in Jewish literature (see xvii. 2). In the New Testament it is only used in the sense of forethought, purpose, intention (Acts xxiv. 2; Rom. xiii. 14). Plato first used the word to express what the Latins meant by "Providentia," and our "Divine Providence," though it is used almost in this technical meaning by Herodotus (iii. 108). We find it again in xvii. 2, and frequently in Philo, who wrote three books on Providence, now only extant in an Armenian translation (Euseb. 'H. E.' ii. 18; Dähne, 'Alex. Rel. Ph.' i. 385). Josephus also often uses the word ('B. J.' iii. 8, § 7, &c.). But though the word is borrowed from philosophy, the thought is common in the O. T. (Ps. cxlv. 9), and even with express reference to "those who go down to the sea in ships" (Ps. cvii. 23–31). From the expression here used comes the beginning of our collect, "O God, whose never-failing providence ordereth all things both in heaven and earth."

in the sea.] Rather, "even in the sea." Since God "turned the sea into dry land, to make a way for the children of Israel to pass over" (Ps. lxxvi. 20, &c.), He could clearly save those who sailed in deep waters.

4. yea, though a man.] The word ἵνα should be supplied from the best MSS.: "in order that, even without skilled knowledge, one may embark." The reference is to Noah, who was saved without any knowledge of navigation. Ἐπιβαίνειν is the technical word for "to go on board a ship," as in Acts xxi. 2. Some MSS. of the Vulg. read sine rate, "without a ship;" and Coverdale has "Yee though a man went to the see without shippe." But "sine rate" seems to be a mere clerical error for "sine arte," though it might seem to be sanctioned both by the allusion to the passage of the Red Sea in v. 3 and by v. 5. Possibly the translators took τέχνη as abstract for concrete, to mean "a work of art," i.e. a vessel.

5. that the works of thy wisdom should be idle.] The oxymoron ἀργὰ . . . ἔργα is quite in accordance with the taste of the writer. The reference must be to the desirability of commerce as diffusing the works of God.

their lives.] ψυχάς. Comp. xii. 6.

to a small piece of wood.] Chap. x. 4. Diogenes Laertius records the well-known remark of Anacharsis, that men on board ship were only four fingers' breadth removed from death. Comp. Hor. 'Od.' i. 2, 9:

[b] Gen. 6. 4. & 7. 18, 21, 22.

6 [b] For in the old time also, when the proud giants perished, the hope of the world governed by thy hand escaped in a weak vessel, and left to all ages a seed of generation.

7 For blessed is the wood whereby righteousness cometh.

[c] Ps. 115. 8. Bar. 6. 4.

8 But [c] that which is made with hands is cursed, as well it, as he that made it: he, because he made it; and it, because, being corruptible, it was called god.

[d] Ps. 5. 5.

9 [d] For the ungodly and his ungodliness are both alike hateful unto God.

10 For that which is made shall be punished together with him that made it.

"Illi robur et aes triplex Circa pectus erat, qui fragilem truci Commisit pelago ratem."

The prayer of the Breton mariners is, "Save us, O God! Thine ocean is so large, and our little boats so small."

in a weak vessel.] Σχεδία properly means "a raft."

are saved.] Lit., "were saved." A gnomic aorist, expressive of a normal result, but here appropriate as referring to the first discoverers of navigation.

6. in the old time also.] Lit., "from" (or "in") "the beginning." The temporal gen. ἀρχῆς is used absolutely, as in νυκτός, ἡμέρας, &c. Vulg., ab initio.

when the proud giants perished.] Gen. vi. 4, 17. Comp. 3 Macc. ii. 4, "Thou didst destroy in former times those who did iniquity, among whom were also giants, who trusted in their strength and boldness, bringing upon them a measureless flood." As the genealogy of nations in Gen. x. gives no account of the origin of the Rephaim and other primeval races of Palestine, the Rabbis invented the story that Og had saved himself from the Deluge by wading beside the ark.

the hope of the world.] Noah and his family; the abstract for the concrete, as in Virg. 'Aen.' xii. 168, "Ascanius, magnae spes altera Romae."

governed.] Lit., "steered." Our "govern" is derived from the Latin guberno (κυβερνάω), "I steer."

to all ages.] αἰῶνι; Vulg., saeculo. To the world of mankind.

7. the wood whereby righteousness cometh.] It was most natural that the Fathers should apply this verse directly or mystically to the cross, which is often called ξύλον in the N. T. (Acts v. 30; Gal. iii. 13; 1 Pet. ii. 24, &c. Comp. עץ, Esther v. 14). The reference was more likely to strike them from the fact that they read ἐβασίλευσεν ἀπὸ τοῦ ξύλου in Ps. xcvi. 10, and quoted the words as a prophecy of the Cross (Justin Mart. 'Dial. c. Tryph.' p. 298; Aug. 'Enarrat.' in loc.; Tert. 'c. Marc.' iii. 19). Grätz ('Gesch. d. Juden,' iii. 495), following this view, looks on the verse as a Christian interpolation. There is, however, no proof that the writer was thinking specifically of anything but the ark, in which was saved "Noah, a preacher of righteousness" (2 Pet. ii. 5).

8. that which is made with hands is cursed.] The expression is not very accurate, for a ship is as much "made with hands" as an idol. The writer here uses it exclusively of an idol (Vulg., per manus autem, quod fit idolum), because in the LXX. the word χειροποιητὰ is used for Gentile gods (Elohim, Is. xxi. 9; and Elilim, Is. ii. 18). Comp. Judith viii. 17, οἱ προσκυνοῦσι θεοῖς χειροποιητοῖς. The curious dislike to any inanimate thing because it has been sometimes abused to bad purposes, is common in all ages. One court of the Ephetae at Athens (τὸ ἐπὶ Πρυτανείῳ), "by a strange custom, somewhat analogous to the imposition of a deodand," passed sentence on the instruments of a murder when the perpetrator was undiscovered. John Knox, when a slave in the galleys, contemptuously flung an image of the Virgin into the sea, and called it a "pented bredd." The feeling of the ancient Greeks and of enlightened Christians does not approve of wanton insults to idols so long as they are objects of sincere reverence; but the feeling of the Jews on the subject after the Exile became almost fanatically intense, and they would scarcely ever name a heathen deity without some title of scorn.

being corruptible, it was called god.] Comp. vi. 19, 20. God is ἄφθαρτος: Rom. i. 23; 1 Tim. i. 17.

9. his ungodliness.] The idol is therefore hateful to God as the concrete result of man's impiety, as well as the idolater (Deut. xxvii. 15).

10. shall be punished.] The writer, in regarding the material idols as capable of "punishment," only follows the views of the Pagans, who sometimes scourged their idols or bound them with chains. The images of the saints have often been similarly treated by offended worshippers in Roman Catholic countries. M. Renan in his 'Souvenirs' tells us with what unceremonious rudeness, and [e] See Isai. 46. 1. Jer. 46. 25. & 49. 3.

[‖] Or, to, or, by.
[f] Jer. 10. 8. Hab. 2. 18.
[‖] Gr. scandals.
[‖] Or, trap.
[g] ver. 27.

11 Therefore [e] even [‖] upon the idols of the Gentiles shall there be a visitation: because in the creature of God they are become an abomination, and [f] [‖] stumblingblocks to the souls of men, and a [‖] snare to the feet of the unwise.

12 For [g] the devising of idols was the beginning of spiritual fornication, and the invention of them the corruption of life.

13 For neither were they from the beginning, neither shall they be for ever.

14 For by the vain glory of men they entered into the world, and therefore shall they come shortly to an end.

15 For a father afflicted with untimely mourning, when he hath made an image of his child soon taken away, now honoured him as a god, which was then a dead man, and delivered to those that were under him ceremonies and sacrifices.

even threats, the Bretons treat their saints in remote country districts.

11. even upon the idols.] Jer. x. 15, "They are vanity, and the work of errors; in the time of their visitation they shall perish;" xlvi. 25, "Behold, I will punish the Amon of No [Thebes], and Pharaoh, and Egypt, with their gods." Is. xxx. 32; xxxi. 7; xlvi. 1, 2. Ex. xii. 12, "Against all the gods of Egypt will I execute judgment." To a certain extent the idol is identified with the demon whom it was held to represent (Ps. xcvi. 5; 1 Cor. x. 20).

a visitation.] See note on ii. 20.

in the creature of God.] Their worship involved the perverted use of created things.

an abomination.] Comp. xii. 23. As the strongest word of disgust which they could find in Greek, the LXX. use the word βδέλυγμα to render the insulting terms which the Jews applied to idols, such as גִּלּוּלִים, Dî stercoracei.

stumbling-blocks . . . a snare.] Comp. Josh. xxiii. 13; 1 Tim. iii. 7, &c.

12. of spiritual fornication.] This metaphor for idolatry is universal in Scripture: Deut. xxxi. 16; Hos. ii. 3–5, v. 3. Suidas, πορνεία, ἡ εἰδωλολατρεία.

the corruption of life.] Spiritually and even physically: 2 Pet. i. 4; ii. 19. See Is. ii. 18; Jer. l. 2.

13. were they.] The nominative to ἦν is τὰ χειροποίητα understood.

14. by the vain-glory of men.] He illustrates this verse in the following passage (15–21), and shews that this human vain-glory exhibited itself in extravagant estimation of the dead (15); in the ambition of kings and the flattery of subjects (16, 17); and in the interested skill of artists (18–21). The word κενοδοξία occurs in the Apocrypha (4 Macc. ii. 15) and N. T. (Phil. ii. 3), but not in the LXX. "Vain-glorious" (κενόδοξοι) is found in Gal. v. 26.

they entered.] The nominative "idols" is understood. The Alex. MS. by a mistake reads θάνατος εἰσῆλθεν, which is a reminiscence of ii. 24, and does not agree with the following αὐτῶν.

shall they come shortly to an end.] Lit., "a swift end was devised for them" (by God). The word ἐπενοήθη is a reference to God's devising in contrast to the vain ἐπίνοια of man (v. 12). The exact meaning of σύντομον is not clear. It might imply the shortness of all human history compared with the Divine Eternity; or the writer may have thought that the Messianic kingdom was close at hand, and that then all idols would be abolished.

15. with untimely mourning.] Vulg., acerbo luctu. The grief may by hypallage be called "untimely" because the child's death is premature; or because the grief is unseasonably prolonged.

when he hath made an image of his child.] The Pagans themselves admitted to a certain extent that the views of Euhemerus—who tried to shew that the gods were deified kings and heroes—were true. Cicero ('De Nat. Deor.' i. 42), Justin Martyr, Lactantius, and other Fathers develop the same thought. There can be but little doubt that the Teraphim of Laban were images of deceased ancestors; and a great part of Confucianism consists in reverence for dead forefathers.

honoured him as a god.] According to Jewish tradition, Serug (Gen. xi. 20) was the first of his line who fell into this kind of idolatry. The Lares of the Romans also were departed ancestors. The worship of children was rarer, but it is recorded of a certain Spartan named Diophantus; and even Cicero planned a temple to his daughter Tullia. Nero claimed divine honours for the child who had been born to him by Poppaea. Egypt at a later epoch grew familiar with the worship of the youth Antinous, which was introduced by Hadrian.

ceremonies.] Lit., "mysteries."

sacrifices.] τελετάς, as in xii. 4.

Digitized by Microsoft®

‖ Gr. in time.

16 Thus ‖ in process of time an ungodly custom grown strong was kept as a law, and graven images were worshipped by the commandments of

‖ Or, tyrants.

‖ kings.

‖ Or, in sight.

17 Whom men could not honour ‖ in presence, because they dwelt far off, they took the counterfeit of his visage from far, and made an express image of a king whom they honoured, to the end that by this their forwardness they might flatter him that was absent, as if he were present.

18 Also the singular diligence of the artificer did help to set forward the ignorant to more superstition.

19 For he, peradventure willing to please one in authority, forced all his skill to make the resemblance ‖ of the best fashion.

‖ Gr. to the better

20 And so the multitude, allured by the grace of the work, took him now for a god, which a little before was but honoured as a man.

21 And this was an occasion to deceive the world: for men, serving graven images.] τὰ γλυπτά. See xv. 13. It is a frequent rendering of Hebrew words for "idols" in the LXX.: Deut. vii. 5; Ps. cv. 34, 36; Is. xlvi. 1, &c.

16. Thus.] Rather, Then.

were worshipped.] Lit., "were continuously worshipped"—an imperfect, in contrast with the general establishment of a custom referred to by the previous aorist.

by the commandments of kings.] Bauermeister and others refer this clause to the next verse. But the next verse refers to voluntary flattery, not to image-worship enjoined as a tyrannous command. The mention of "tyrants" serves, however, as a skilful introduction to the subject of the following paragraph. The apotheosis of Roman Emperors became almost a matter of course, and Augustus was scarcely able to prevent the worship of himself while living. He could only insist that temples to himself should always be associated also with temples to the goddess Roma. For full information on this subject see Boissier, 'La Religion Romaine,' i. 122–209. The example of worshipping kings was set in Egypt in the days of the Pharaohs, and was largely adopted by the Ptolemies. A sketch of the origin of hero-worship and emperor-worship is given by Canon Westcott in his edition of the Epistles of St. John, pp. 255–267.

17. in presence.] Since men who lived at a distance could not actually see their kings, they were induced by flattery to make images of them. There is a play of words between ἐν ὄψει, "visibly," and ὄψιν, "visage."

18. singular diligence.] Vulg., eximia diligentia. φιλοτιμία means rather "the eager ambition."

the ignorant.] Rather, "even the ignorant," i.e. even those who did not know whom the statues represented, or how they originally came to be worshipped. He is here passing from flattery to admiration of artistic skill as another source of idolatry.

to more superstition.] Rather, "to intensified service" of the image. Θρησκεία means "outward service;" "religion" in the old sense of the word, as in Col. ii. 18, Jas. i. 27, and in Milton's forced all his skill . . .] Lit., "By his skill forced the resemblance to something more beautiful;" i.e. did his utmost skilfully to flatter and idealise the likeness. The idols to which the writer is now alluding are not cheap wooden idols carved out of refuse clumps, but marble or chryselephantine statues, like the Zeus and Athena of Phidias, and the huge statues of deified Roman emperors. Philo also ('De Monarch.' i. 3) dwells on the abuse of art to furnish an additional incentive to idolatry.

"Gay religions, full of pomp and gold."

19. peradventure.] The word (τάχα) is omitted by the Vulg. Grimm prefers to render it "quickly," but it seems to mean that the artist toiled on the chance of pleasing the tyrant, or at any rate that this may have been one of his motives.

20. took him now for a god.] Σέβασμα means "an object of worship" (Acts xvii. 25; 2 Thess. ii. 4). If the writer is thinking of any of the colossal statues of emperors, like that of Augustus at Ancyra, the word σέβασμα would recall the name "Augustus,"—a name of religious veneration (ὄνομα βλασφημίας, Rev. xiii. 1), which was peculiarly displeasing to Jewish ears. It was to avert the very danger here alluded to—the danger of aesthetic admiration passing into idolatry—that all sculpture (except that of the fourfold cherubic symbol, which was tacitly excepted) was forbidden to the Israelites.

21. And this.] In classic Greek τοῦτο means "the following fact;" ἐκεῖνο, "the fact just mentioned." In later Greek the distinction is often neglected. It is therefore uncertain whether the writer means the τοῦτο to be defined by the following clause—"This, namely: the fact that men, &c.;" or whether either calamity or tyranny, did ascribe unto stones and stocks the incommunicable ‖ name.

Digitized by Microsoft®

‖ Or, of God.

22 Moreover this was not enough for them, that they erred in the knowledge of God; but whereas they lived in the great war of ignorance, those so great plagues called they peace.

23 For whilst they [h] slew their children in sacrifices, or used secret ceremonies, or made revellings of strange rites;

[h] Deut. 18. 10. Jer. 7. 9. & 19. 4. ch. 12. 5, 6.

24 They kept neither lives nor marriages any longer undefiled: but either one slew another traitorously, or grieved him by adultery.

25 [i] So that there reigned in all

[i] Rom. 1. 29, &c.

he means τοῦτο to mean "this thing," i.e. the idolatry of which he has been speaking. In that case the following ὅτι means "because" or "for," as in the A. V.

was an occasion to aeceive the world.] Lit., "became to the world (τῷ βίῳ, Vulg. mundo; lit. "to life," comp. x. 8) for an ambush." That heathenism in its popular forms exercised a deadly and polluting influence cannot be questioned, since it is an inevitable inference from the actual condition of heathen society as preserved and portrayed for us in literature and the remains of art. See Neander, 'Church History,' Introd. i. pp. 6–47; Gieseler, 'Church History,' Introd. i. §§ 9–14; and above all Döllinger, 'The Jew and the Gentile,' which serves as an overwhelmingly powerful demonstration that there is nothing exaggerated in the awful indictment brought by St. Paul (Rom. i. 21–32) against the heathendom of his own day. The Apostle paints the evils here alluded to with yet more terrible vividness. Even the heathen, from Plato downwards, deplored the corrupting influence of the popular mythologies. Many of the Fathers (Tertullian, Lactantius, Arnobius, &c.) dilate on this topic with crushing force.

serving either calamity or tyranny.] The participle δουλεύοντες is joined by syllepsis both to συμφορᾷ and τυραννίδι—"being slaves either of accident or of tyranny." The "accident" means an early bereavement, like that mentioned in v. 15; the "tyranny" alludes to v. 16.

the incommunicable name.] The name "Jehovah," which most Jews did not even know how to utter, either substituting for it the name "Elohim," or pronouncing it "Jehovah" with the vowel-points of Adonai or Elohim. Hence the true pronunciation of Jehovah (perhaps Yahveh) is to this day uncertain. It is the name called Shem Hammephorash, "the Ineffable Tetragrammaton." Even the Jews only heard it pronounced by the High Priest once in the year, in his final benediction on the day of Atonement. The sin of the heathen consisted in giving the name of the ONE God to many gods. "I am the Lord; that is my name; and my glory will I not give to another, neither my praise to graven images" (Is. xlii. 8).

22. war of ignorance.] All the miserable struggles and conflicts, arising from ignorance of God, which are described in the next verses.

plagues.] Lit., "evils."

called they peace.] They said, "Peace, Peace, when there was no peace" (Jer. vi. 14). Compare the celebrated remark of Tacitus, 'Agric.' xxx., "Solitudinem faciunt, pacem appellant."

23. slew their children in sacrifices.] This applied to Baal-worship and Moloch-worship. See xii. 5. Τεκνοφόνος is like νηπιοκτόνος, a word found in this book alone.

secret ceremonies.] These, like the Bacchanalia and Thesmophoria, and the orgiastic cults of the priests of Cybele, Isis, &c., were often mysteries of wickedness, belonging to "the crypts of shame."

or made revellings of strange rites.] Rather, "frantic revels of alien institutions." Perhaps "made" in the A. V. is a misprint for "mad," as (I see) has also occurred to Arnald. Ἐξάλλων is best taken as one word. Ἔξαλλος occurs in the LXX. 2 Sam. vi. 14; Esth. iii. 8. The wild mantic character of many of the Asiatic and African cults formed their most powerful element of attraction. St. Paul (Rom. xiii. 13) and St. Peter (1 Pet. iv. 3) join κώμοι (Lat. comessationes) with other abominations; and in 2 Macc. vi. 4, "riot and revelling" are accompanied with horrible acts of sacrilege.

24. slew another traitorously.] The best commentary on the whole verse is the account of the Bacchanalian mysteries introduced into Rome (Liv. xxxix. 8). The pretence of mystic rites was mixed up with the infamous designs of secret societies, in which not only "stupra," but also "venena intestinaeque caedes" played a large part, while amid the roar of drums and timbrels detection was rendered difficult.

25, 26. The catalogue of crimes here alluded to is also found in Rom. i. 21–31; Gal. v. 19–21; 1 Tim. i. 9, &c. It needs no special men ‖ without exception blood, manslaughter, theft, and dissimulation, corruption, unfaithfulness, tumults, perjury, ‖ r, confusedly.

Digitized by Microsoft®

26 Disquieting of good men, forgetfulness of good turns, defiling of souls, changing of ‖ kind, disorder in marriages, adultery, and shameless uncleanness.

‖ Or, sex.

27 [k] For the worshipping of idols ‖ not to be named is the beginning, the cause, and the end, of all evil.

[k] Rom. 1. 25, 26.
‖ Gr. nameless.
Exod. 23. 13.

28 For either they are mad when they be merry, or prophesy lies, or live unjustly, or else lightly forswear themselves.

29 For insomuch as their trust is in idols, which have no life; though they swear falsely, yet they look not to be hurt.

30 Howbeit for both causes shall they be justly punished: both because they thought not well of God, ‖ giving heed unto idols, and also unjustly swore in deceit, despising holiness.

‖ Or, devoted.

31 For it is not the power of them by whom they swear: but it is the just vengeance of sinners, that punisheth always the offence of the ungodly.

CHAPTER XV.

1 We do acknowledge the true God. 7 The folly of idolmakers, 14 and of the enemies of God's people; 15 because, besides the idols of the Gentiles, 18 they worshipped vile beasts.

comment, because the facts are notorious to all readers of classical literature.

"Non ragioniam di lor, ma guarda e passa."

25. in all men.] This would not have been a true charge, and the best reading is not πάντας but πάντα (Vulg., omnia). Blood and murder, theft and treachery, &c., confusedly prevailed in all things.

blood, manslaughter.] Lit., "blood and murder." Either the latter word is taken generally to mean any kind of murder, or the two words are an hendiadys for "murderous bloodshed."

26. Disquieting of good men.] This is described in ii. 10–20.

disorder in marriages.] The prevalence of divorce was specially shameful in the Imperial epoch, so that women, says Seneca, reckoned their years by their discarded husbands.

27. of idols not to be named.] Marg., "nameless." Vulg., infandorum. Many of the Jews, taking Ex. xxiii. 13, Deut. xii. 3, literally, held it to be a crime even to mention the name of idols (Ps. xvi. 4), and therefore spoke of them by all sorts of insulting paronomasiae and other terms of derision (Beelzebub, &c.). This seems to be a better way of understanding the word than Grimm's "unreal gods." The phrases about idols which are "nothing in the world" (1 Cor. viii. 4), and "which by nature are no gods" (Gal. iv. 8) and "men of no name" (Job xxx. 8), are different.

28. For either.] The following clauses are an attempt to prove the somewhat too sweeping assertion of the last verse. He says that frantic revelry, falsity, injustice, and perjury spring directly from idolatry. It would be more true to say that they spring from the degeneracy of human nature, which was not only unchecked by idolatry, but moulded it into subservience with depraved instincts.

they are mad when they be merry.] Comp. Eccles. ii. 2; Job i. 5. The allusion is to the wild, dissolute abandonment of due self-control in the religious banquets or ordinary carousals of the heathen.

prophesy lies.] An allusion to the oracles.

> "The oracles are dumb:
> No voice or hideous hum > Runs through the arched roof in words deceiving."—MILTON.

"Oracula, partim falsa" (Cic. 'De Div.' ii. 56).

29. For.] He offers an explanation of his remark that idolatry fosters perjury. Idols inspired no fear. Martial alludes to the notion that Jews were careless of perjuring themselves if they only swore by an idol. The Jews regarded the punishment of perjury as being inevitable if they swore falsely by the name of God (Ezek. xvii. 18, 19).

to be hurt.] Lit., "to be injured;" but ἀδικέω in later Greek acquires the sense of βλάπτω (Lk. x. 19). The ancients regarded an unpunished perjury as a reflection against the justice of the gods. (See Aristoph. 'Nub.' 399, εἴπερ βάλλει τοὺς ἐπιόρκους πῶς οὐχὶ Σίμων' ἐνέπρησεν;)

30. shall they be justly punished.] Lit., "just things shall come upon them." Their idolatry leads them to expect impunity in perjury, but they shall be punished for the idolatry as well as for the false oaths. Instead of impunity they shall have double vengeance.

31. the just vengeance.] God's justice shall punish, not their dead idols, but themselves.

Digitized by Microsoft®

BUT thou, O God, art gracious and true, longsuffering, and in mercy ordering all things.

2 For if we sin, we are thine, knowing thy power: but we will not sin, knowing that we are counted thine.

3 For to know thee is perfect righteousness: yea, to know thy power is the root of immortality.

4 For neither did the mischievous invention of men deceive us, nor an image spotted with divers colours, the painter's fruitless labour;

CHAPTER XV.

God's goodness to the Hebrews because of their exemption from idolatry (1–5). The folly and wickedness of idolatry (6). Special denunciation of those who made gods of clay (7–13), and of the eclectic idolatry of the enemies of Israel who tolerated the worship of dead things (14–17). The consummate shamefulness of beast-worship (18, 19).

1. But thou, O God.] Rather, "But thou, our God." The A. V. omits the ἡμων on which depends the main emphasis of the verse. God's vengeance on heathen sinners (xiv. 30, 31) is contrasted with His love for Israel.

gracious.] The same adjective, χρηστὸς, "kind," is applied in the N. T. to God (Lk. vi. 35; Rom. ii. 4) and to Christ (χρηστότης, Eph. ii. 7). In Rom. xi. 22, the χρηστότης of God towards the righteous is contrasted with His severity (ἀποτομία, comp. v. 11) towards sinners. The same word is used of God's goodness by the LXX. in Ps. xxiv. 9, xxxiii. 8, &c. See Ex. xxxiv. 6.

true.] ἀληθὴς, a very God; real; not merely verax, but veritas. (Vulg., verus.)

ordering.] διοικῶν. See viii. 1, 14; xii. 18. The word is not common in the LXX. (Lam. iv. 4), and does not occur in the N. T.

2. For if we sin.] Rather, "For even if we sin." For the thought, see xii. 21, 22; Rom. iii. 3. The "faithfulness" of God to His people remains unshaken by the faithlessness of some of them. 1 John ii. 2: "And if any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, and He is the propitiation for our sins."

we are thine.] σοί ἐσμεν. A similar dependence on God is expressed by ἔν σοι. Comp. Acts xvii. 28.

knowing thy power.] This is a somewhat Oriental way of expressing the reason for obedience to God. Taken alone, it might seem to imply that might is right, and that fear is the basis of obedience. It is clear, however, from the following verse that the writer did not mean his words to be understood in this sense, but that he saw in God's omnipotence a pledge of His absolute righteousness.

that we are counted thine.] Lit., "We have been reckoned to thee." We have been set down as Thy possessions.

3. For to know thee is perfect righteousness.] Comp. John xvii. 3, "This is life eternal, that they might know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom Thou hast sent." It is, of course, assumed that this knowledge of God carries with it the desire for and effort after holiness. The writer at the very outset has stated (i. 1–11) that wisdom is incompatible with moral vileness. The word for "perfect" is ὁλόκληρος; Vulg., consummata. Comp. Jas. i. 4; 1 Thess. v. 23.

the root of immortality.] Death comes from sin (i. 12–16); a holy fear, by restraining us from sin, makes us capable of wisdom (i. 4, 5); and wisdom is immortality (i. 15; iii. 4; iv. 1; viii. 18). Neither ἀθάνατος nor ἀθανασία occur in the LXX., though the substantive is used by Aquila in Ps. xlviii. 15 (see Schleusner, s. v.). In the Apocrypha the words only occur in this book and in Ecclus. xvii. 24; xix. 17. In the N. T. ἀθάνατος does not occur, but St. Paul uses ἀθανασία in 1 Cor. xv. 53, 54; 1 Tim. vi. 16: and ἀφθαρσία expresses the same conception in 1 Cor. xv.; Eph. vi. 24; 2 Tim. i. 10, &c. For the metaphor, "root of immortality," see 1 Tim. vi. 10; Ecclus. i. 20, "The root of wisdom is to fear the Lord."

4. mischievous.] κακότεχνος. See i. 4.

deceive us.] Art did not lead us astray into idolatry. The assertion is contrary to the entire tenor of Old Test. history, but probably the writer is only thinking of the era after the return from the Exile, or of those faithful and ideal Israelites who never bowed the knee to Baal. During the Babylonish Captivity the Jews were cured of material idolatry, but they rapidly fell into the idolatry of formalism and letter-worship.

nor.] Rather, "nor even" (οὐδέ). The writer implies that there was a special and subtle charm in coloured idols.

an image.] Not εἰκὼν, but εἶδος (Lat. species), perhaps implying the beauty of the idol.

spotted.] Vulg., sculpta. The word σπιλωθὲν cannot properly bear either of these meanings. Idols were not "spotted," but "painted." The word refers to the various colours employed. The verbs μολύνω, μιαίνω,

Digitized by Microsoft®

)r, rneth a broach the)lish.

5 The sight whereof ‖enticeth fools to lust after it, and so they desire the form of a dead image, that hath no breath.

6 Both they that make them, they that desire them, and they that worship them, are lovers of evil things, and are worthy to have such things to trust upon.

7 For the [a] potter, tempering soft earth, fashioneth every vessel with much labour for our service: yea, of [a] Rom. 9. 21.

and here apparently σπιλόω, are used like the Latin maculo and our "stain," in the sense of "smear" or "paint." Comp. Jas. iii. 6. The expression is here contemptuous. The verb belongs to later Greek, and the Attic word for a "stain" is not σπῖλος, but κηλίς. (Comp. xiii. 14; Lobeck, 'Phrynichus,' p. 28.)

the painter's fruitless labour.] The painting of idols was an art more highly developed in Egypt than in any other country. Σκιαγράφος, here used generally, properly means "a perspective painter," "one who paints lights and shadows"—an art first practised by the painter Apollodorus. The painter's skill is "fruitless," because it is, in the writer's view, cursed and doomed to destruction. His feelings towards the most incomparable statue of Pagan worship would have been like those of Pope Adrian VI. He regarded them solely as idola. We find throughout the passage the Jewish hatred of heathen σεβάσματα (Acts xvii. 23) transferred to the arts of painting and sculpture, which were chiefly devoted to their production. It is in this matter that we see the most marked contrast between Hebraism and Hellenism. The antithesis is sharply seen in M. Renan's remarks on the preaching of St. Paul at Athens.

5. whereof.] I.e., of these painted images.

enticeth fools to lust after it.] Marg., "turneth a reproach (reading ὄνειδος) to the foolish." Vulg., insensato dat concupiscentiam. Lit., "comes to longing to a fool," i.e. when an infatuated worshipper gazes on a beautiful statue, his admiration ends in (comes to, cedit in) a desire after it. The meaning is defined in the next clause, "and he yearns for the unbreathing beauty of a dead image." Ὄρεξις means "appetency" or "vehement desire" (xiv. 2; Ecclus. xix. 20). In the N. T. it occurs only (and exactly in this sense) in Rom. i. 27. The writer is alluding to the insensate passion of such ἄφρονες as Pygmalion, who fell in love with the statue of the Cyprian Venus, and the youth mentioned by Posidippus, who insanely loved the statue of the Cnidian Venus (Arnob. 'adv. Natt.' vi. 22). Lucian alludes to similar aberrations, and the like story is told of a French maiden who pined away for the Apollo Belvedere, as being "Too fair to worship, too divine to love."

The elaboration of the writer's style here betrays itself by such (imperfect) iambic rhythms as ὧν ὕψις ἄφρονι εἰς ὄρεξιν ἔρχεται,

and ποθεῖ τε νεκρᾶς εἰκόνος,

and κακῶν ἐράσται.

We find a similar phenomenon in Heb. xii. 13, 14; Jas. i. 17.

6. Both they that make them.] The instance of guilty infatuation mentioned in the last verse prepares the way for this denunciation.

lovers of evil things.] The word ἐραστὴς is here used in its worst sense. The same reproach is more mildly indicated in the ἀφιλάγαθοι (Theophylact, ἐχθροὶ παντὸς ἀγαθοῦ) of 2 Tim. iii. 3. The thought is also expressed by St. Paul in Rom. i. 32.

worthy to have such things to trust upon.] They are worthy of such vain and vile hopes as those inspired by a passion for dead statues.

7. For the potter.] Rather, "For, indeed, a potter" (καὶ γάρ, etenim). The "potter"—here contemptuously used to include a sculptor in clay—is chosen as a special illustration of the vanity and vileness of the makers and worshippers of idols. In xiii. 10–16 he has spoken of gods of gold, silver, and wood, and has held up the carpenter to contempt who fashions a gnarled and refuse clump of wood into a god. His denunciation of the "potter" and his clay goods in this and the following verses (7–13) is far more fierce, and there is something curious in the vehemence with which the makers of these particular images are overwhelmed with scorn and abhorrence. They are charged with peculiar futility (8), with dishonesty (9), with worthlessness (10), with godlessness (11), with folly and greed (12), and with conscious hypocrisy (13). This concentration of hatred against this class of idol-makers perhaps arises from their being a large community in Egypt; from the seductive beauty which could be given by their skill to dead images; and from the writer's strange assumption that the makers of painted clay idols must be more consciously insincere than the makers of wooden idols.

tempering soft earth.] The choice of words, "kneading friable clay," seems to be intended to excite contempt from the first.

with much labour.] Vulg., laboriose, re-

Digitized by Microsoft®

the same clay he maketh both the vessels that serve for clean uses, and likewise also all such as serve to the contrary: but what is the use of either sort, the potter himself is the judge.

8 And employing his labours lewdly, he maketh a vain god of the same clay, even he which a little before was made of earth himself, and within a little while after returneth to the same, out of the which he was taken, when his [b] life which was lent him shall be demanded.

9 Notwithstanding his care is, not that he shall [‖] have much labour, nor that his life is short: but striveth to excel goldsmiths and silversmiths, and endeavoureth to do like the workers in brass, and counteth it his glory to make counterfeit things.

10 His heart is ashes, his hope is more vile than earth, and his life of less value than clay:

11 Forasmuch as he knew not his Maker, and him that inspired into him an active soul, and [c] breathed in a living spirit.

[b] Luke 12. 20.

[‖] Or, be sick, or, die.

[c] Gen. 2. 7.

garding ἐπίμοχθον as an adverb. Another way of taking it is "working troublesome earth into softness," regarding ἀπαλήν as a proleptic adjective.

for clean uses.] Rom. ix. 21.

the potter.] Not, as before, κεραμεύς, but πηλουργός, "clay-worker."

8. employing his labours lewdly.] Rather, "with misdirected toil." The word κακόμοχθος, "ill-labouring," occurs here only.

was made of earth.] Gen. ii. 7.

returneth to the same.] Gen. iii. 19.

when his life which was lent him shall be demanded.] Lit., "on being demanded for the debt of his life." Life is a debt due to God: all men are, as it were, under short reprieve of a capital sentence passed upon our race.

"Vitaque mancipio nulli datur, omnibus usu."

The same verb (ἀπαιτηθείς) occurs in Luke xii. 20. "This night they require (ἀπαιτοῦσι) thy life of thee." "Repetitur anima, non interimitur" (Ambros. 'De bono mortis,' 10). Plutarch also calls life "a debt" (χρέος).

9. his care is, not that he shall have much labour.] Rather, "it is an anxiety to him, not that he is about to die." Κάμνειν means first "to be weary;" then "to fall sick," "to die." (Καμών, "dead," iv. 16.)

short.] βραχυτελής, "swiftly-ending," formed on the analogy of εὐτελής, occurs here only.

striveth to excel.] The potter emulates or matches his art against goldsmiths, &c., by gilding his clay idols, when he ought to be bearing in mind that he shall himself soon return to the clay of which he is made.

endeavoureth to do like.] "Imitates."

counterfeit things.] In the Egyptian tombs have been found many scarabaei and idols made of clay, but gilded, bronzed, and covered with a vitrified coating. Images of this kind excited the anger of the writer from their attempt to deceive the eye. They are not only idols, but base shams, and yet the artist of them glories in the things for which he ought to blush. The writer seems to assume that the idol-maker is, in every sense of the word, a cheat, who laughs in his sleeve at his own dupes. We can, however, hardly suppose that these imitations were sold as genuine. See Wilkinson, 'Anc. Egypt.' ii. 148.

10. His heart is ashes.] This fine expression is borrowed from the LXX. Is. xliv. 20, "He feedeth on (Heb. followeth after) ashes" (LXX. γνῶθι ὅτι σποδὸς ἡ καρδία αὐτῶν), because "there is a lie in his right hand." This quotation proves that the Book of Wisdom is later than the LXX. Compare—

> "No heart have you, or such > As fancies, like to vermin in the nut,
> Have fretted all to dust and bitterness."
> TENNYSON, The Princess.

> "There's many a white hand holds an urn > With lovers' hearts to dust consumed."
> ANON.

his hope is more vile than earth.] Such a man "has no hope," since he is "without God in the world" (Eph. ii. 12). St. Paul says of the heathen generally that "they have no hope." "More vile;" lit., "cheaper."

of less value.] Lit., "more dishonoured;" but as τιμὴ sometimes means "price," so ἄτιμος may mean "valueless."

11. Forasmuch as he knew not.] It is assumed that the ignorance is wilful; that "they would not have God in their knowledge," Rom. i. 28.

inspired into him.] Gen. ii. 7, LXX.

a living spirit.] The term is a mere variation for "active soul." The writer only recognises a twofold, not a tripartite nature of man—namely, body and soul: see notes on

Digitized by Microsoft®

12 But they counted our life a Gr. life. pastime, and our ‖ time here a market for gain: for, say they, we must be getting every way, though it be by evil means.

‖ Or, so. 13 ‖ For this man, that of earthly matter maketh brickle vessels and graven images, knoweth himself to offend above all others.

14 And all the enemies of thy people, that hold them in subjection, are most foolish, and are more miserable than very babes.

15 For they counted all the idols of the heathen to be gods: [d] which [d] Ps. 115 neither have the use of eyes to see, 5, 6, 7. & 135. 16, 17 nor noses to draw ‖ breath, nor ears ‖ Or, air.
to hear, nor fingers of hands to

i. 4; viii. 19; ix. 15. Here, and in xvi. 14, "soul" and "spirit" are used to express the same thing; as they also are in vv. 8, 16 of this chapter. The adj. ζωτικὸν is rare, but is used by Plato and by Philo ('Quod det. pot.' Opp. i. 207). The fact that the spirit is imbreathed by God (Gen. ii. 7) does not militate against the pre-existence of souls, which the writer has already implied. (See note on viii. 20.)

12. they counted our life a pastime.] The writer thinks that it is to treat life as a mere jest when a man made of clay by God, and by Him inspired with the breath of life, makes his own gods out of dead clay, which cannot breathe. A fine old gem represents Prometheus making a man of clay, while Athena, who holds a butterfly over the skull, inspires it with life. Ζωὴ is the animal life—the "vita, quâ vivimus;" βίος is the character of our life—"vita, quam vivimus."

a pastime.] The serious Jew thought it disgraceful to treat life as a mere sport. What would he have said of the miserable epitaph selected by Gay for his tomb in Westminster Abbey?

"Life is a jest, and all things shew it;
I thought so once, and now I know it."

Παίγνιον. LXX. Hab. i. 10.

a market for gain.] Πανηγυρισμὸς means the celebration of a πανήγυρις, or public market. Lat., mercatus. Diogenes Laertius says that Pythagoras compared life to a Paneguris. Comp. Cic. 'Tusc. Disp.' v. 3.

"What is man
If the chief use and market of his time Be but to sleep and feed? A beast, no more!"
SHAKSPEARE.

These idolaters, like the worldly men reproved by St. James (iv. 17), acted as though life were meant for no other purpose than to buy and sell and get gain.

every way.] ὅθεν δή. Vulg., undecumque. "From any source whatever."

though it be by evil means.] "Even should it be from crime."

"Lucri bonus est odor ex re Qualibet."
JUV. Sat. xiv. 204 (SUET. Vesp. 23).

"Non quare et unde; quid habeas tantum rogant."—SENEC. Ep. 115.

"Rem facias rem Si possis recte; si non quocunque modo rem."
HOR. Ep. i. 65.

The "potter," apart from his greed and cheating, is supposed to be well aware that his gods are shams, really as well as commercially. He does not himself believe in them (xiv. 29), but knows them to be vanities (Acts xiv. 15).

13. For.] The verse gives the reason for charging the potter with avaricious hypocrisy.

brickle.] εὔθραυστα, a late Greek word. "Brickle" is the older form of "brittle."

"The altar on the which this image staid,
Was, oh great pity! built of brickle clay."
SPENSER, Ruins of Time.

graven images.] Vulg., sculptilia. "Idols" in general. See note on xiv. 15.

14. And all.] Rather, "but all." The hypocritical and dishonest potter is the worst, but all the idolatrous enemies of God's people are utterly foolish.

that hold them in subjection.] The special reference may be to the Egyptians or Romans. The writer is never particularly careful about the verisimilitude of his pseudonymic style. No enemies lorded it over Israel in Solomon's day.

15. all.] Rather, "even all." Not content with their own national idols, they were eclectic, and tolerated the cult of all other idols. The remark especially applies to the Romans of the imperial epoch, who made room for all kinds of foreign idolatries—even for semi-deos canes, like Anubis—in Rome (Lucan, 'Pharsal.' viii. 83). The allusion cannot, however, be regarded as decisive, for Alexander the Great was no less tolerant, and, according to Arrian ('Exped. Alex.' iii. 1), built temples to the gods of Egypt. Paganism has often been praised, and favourably contrasted with Christianity, because of its tolerance; but this tolerance rose only from politic limitations, and the lack of depth and intensity among Polytheists. Wherever a new religion clashed with popular custom or handle; and as for their feet, they are slow to go.

16 For man made them, and he that borrowed his own spirit fashioned them: but no man can make a god like unto himself.

17 For being mortal, he worketh e ch. 13. 10, 18. e a dead thing with wicked hands: for he himself is better than the things which he worshippeth: whereas he lived once, but they never.

18 Yea, they worshipped those beasts also that are most hateful: for being compared together, some are worse than others.

19 Neither are they beautiful, so much as to be desired in respect of beasts: but they went without the praise of God and his blessing.

CHAPTER XVI.

2 God gave strange meat to his people, to stir up their appetite, and vile beasts to their enemies, to take it from them. 5 He stung with his serpents, 12 but soon healed them by his word only. 17 The creatures altered their nature to pleasure God's people, and to offend their enemies.

civil order, Pagans became the most ruthless persecutors.

the use of eyes, &c.] Ps. cxv. 4-7; cxxxv. 15–17.

16. he that borrowed his own spirit.] He whose own life is, as has been already said, in debt (v. 8). Eccles. viii. 8, "There is no man that hath power over the Spirit to retain the Spirit."

but no man.] Rather, "for no man." A second reason is here given for the worthlessness of idols. 1. Man seeing that his own life is "borrowed," cannot give them life. 2. He cannot even make them like himself, seeing that he is alive and they are dead: much less can he make them like God. The living workman is incomparably superior to his own dead work: how much superior must God be who gave the workman life! It will be seen that the writer does not even deign to notice the plea for idolatry founded on the purely symbolic character of the idols. See Philo, 'De Decal.' 14.

18. they worshipped.] Rather, "they worship." In these two verses he again touches on animal-worship, which serves as a transition to the concluding section of the book.

that are most hateful.] Such as serpents, crocodiles, reptiles, which the Egyptians worshipped (xii. 24), as well as the lion, the kite, the ibis (Philo, 'De Vit. contempl.' i.; Opp. ii. 472).

some are worse than others.] The A. V. here adopts the reading ἔνια, "some," which has no MS. authority, but is a conjecture of Junius. The reading ἄνοια gives no sense. By reading ἀνοίᾳ we might render it, "For in senselessness, being compared together, they (these beasts) are worse than others." Grimm, arguing that the serpent cannot be called "senseless" (Gen. iii. 1), suggests the reading ἀνίᾳ, "in malignity," unless ἀνοίᾳ be taken in something of the same sense, "in fury" (comp. Luke vi. 11).

19. so much as to be desired in respect of beasts.] This rendering is somewhat obscure. The meaning is, "Nor do these (most hateful creatures) chance to be beautiful, so that, in comparison even with other animals, men should yearn towards them." Their hideousness extinguishes the excuse that there is in them any special charm which might have led to idolatry. For the meaning of ἐν ὄψει, comp. vii. 9, ἐν ὄψει αὐτῆς, "in respect of her." The meaning of ὡς ἐν ζώων ὄψει might, however, be "as far as the appearance of animals is concerned."

they went without the praise of God and his blessing.] An allusion to God's pronouncing all things very good (Gen. i. 21, 22, 25), a blessing from which the writer supposes the serpent and reptiles in general to be exempted (Gen. iii. 14), though in reality the serpent was only cursed after the Fall.

XVI.–XIX. — Contrast between the Fortunes of the Israelites and Egyptians in the Days of the Exodus.

The animal-worshippers were punished by means of animals, which paralysed even the sense of hunger, while quails were granted to the Israelites (1–4). The Israelites were indeed bitten by serpents, but only for a short time, and were speedily saved,—partly as a warning to themselves, and partly to convince the Egyptians, who perished by the bites of contemptible insects (5–14). The Egyptians were punished by fire, which prevailed over water to destroy their food, and yet did not burn up the creatures which plagued them (15–20); whereas for the Israelites the ice-like manna resisted flame, and, when melted by the morning sunbeam, only served to remind them of the care of Providence and the duty of prayer (21–29).

In these chapters the writer reverts to thoughts on which he has touched in xi. 5–16, but from which he diverged to speak of the punishment of the Canaanites (xii.), and of the guilt and folly of idolatry (xiii., xiv.,

Digitized by Microsoft®

[a] ch. 12. 23.

[b] Numb. 21. 6. ch. 11. 15, 16.

THEREFORE [a] by the like were they punished worthily, and by the multitude of beasts [b] tormented.

2 Instead of which punishment, dealing graciously with thine own people, thou preparedst for them meat of a strange taste, even [c] quails to stir up their appetite: [c] Numb. 11. 31.

3 To the end that they, desiring food, might for the ugly sight of the beasts sent among them loathe even that, which they must needs desire; but these, suffering penury for a short xv.). In the three elaborate chapters which follow, he mainly aims at the illustration of two religious lessons which he deduces from Scripture-history: viz. 1. That the Israelites were blessed by the same things wherewith their enemies were punished (xi. 5; xviii. 8); and 2. That "wherewithal a man sinneth, by the same also shall he be punished" (xi. 16). Both principles, as treated by the writer, have only a partial and one-sided truth. The first is supported, not by Scripture, but only by distorted and exaggerated inferences from special passages of Scripture, which must be counterbalanced by other passages of a different tone; the second, though only cursorily noticed in Scripture, rests indeed on a basis of experience, but is illustrated by the most fantastic analogies. In the method of treatment we at once feel that we are in the region of fancy, of Jewish particularism, and of Rabbinic Hagadoth. In these chapters, in spite of a certain kind of eloquence, the writer is, on the whole, at his worst. He has flashes of lofty thought, and a copious outpouring of eloquent verbiage; but, here more than ever, we realise the depth of the chasm which separates the canonical books of Scripture from even the best of the Apocryphal writings.

CHAPTER XVI.

1–14. The worshippers of beasts and the children of God; their contrasted fortunes—as regards hunger and thirst.

1. Therefore.] Because of this worship of hateful animals (xv. 18, 19).

by the like.] See notes on xi. 5, 15, 16.

worthily.] As they deserved.

by the multitude.] Rather, "by a multitude."

of beasts.] κνωδάλων (not, as before, θηρίων). Κνώδαλον was properly used of a "sea monster." See xi. 16.

2. dealing graciously with thine own people.] This is a direct contradiction of Scripture, which always represents the giving of the quails as a punishment sent in anger (Ex. xvi. 1–13; Num. xi. 10–35), and issuing in the great plague of Kibroth Hattaavah (Deut. ix. 22; Ps. lxxviii. 27–31).

meat of a strange taste.] xix. 12. The writer is either giving the reins to his fancy, or following some Jewish legend.

even quails.] The word used for "quails" is ὀρτυγομήτρα, as in the LXX. (Heb. שְׂלָו; Ex. xvi. 13; Num. xi. 31, &c.) The Latins used the name King-quail (Roi des Cailles, Re di Quaghe, Wachtel-König) for the larger and darker species, which is supposed to be indicated (Plin. 'H. N.' x. 23; Arist. 'Hist. Animal.' viii. 12. See Rosenmüller, 'Schol.' on Ex. l. c., and Bochart, 'Hierozoicon,' P. II., lib. i. c. 14). Properly speaking, the ortygometra seems to mean the land-rail (Crex Rallus), which precedes the quail in its migrations. Hesychius says, Ὀρτυγομήτρα, ὄρτυξ ὑπερμεγέθης.

to stir up their appetite.] This would have been a motive most unworthy to be ascribed to God, and as alien from anything in Scripture as the Rabbinic notion of the Messianic Age in which Jews are to be fed with the flesh of Leviathan and the bird Bar Juchne. The translation, however, is not quite correct. The words mean "to content (εἰς) the eagerness of their appetency," i.e. to furnish them with delicacies, while the Egyptians were forced to loathe their food even amid the cravings of hunger (v. 3).

3. they.] The Egyptians. God gives quails to the Israelites to meet the desire (ἐπιθυμία) of their daintiness; but when the Egyptians desire (ἐπιθυμοῦντες) even ordinary food, their necessary craving is robbed of gratification by their disgust at the loathsome creatures which were sent to punish them.

the ugly sight.] εἰδέχθειαν. The substantive is peculiar to this author, though εἰδεχθής, "hideous," is found in Polybius, and later Greek writers.

of the beasts sent among them.] Lit., "of things sent against them."

loathe even that which they must needs desire.] Lit., "turn away from even the necessary craving;" i.e. forego the satisfaction of their hunger out of sheer disgust. An exaggerated allusion to the fact that the plague of frogs invaded even the ovens and kneading-troughs of the Egyptians (Ex. viii. 3).

suffering penury.] Rather, "lacking" (food).

space, might be made partakers of a strange taste.

4 For it was requisite, that upon them exercising tyranny should come penury, which they could not avoid: but to these it should only be shewed how their enemies were tormented.

5 For when the horrible fierceness of beasts came upon ‖ these, and they perished with the [d] stings of crooked serpents, thy wrath endured not for ever:

6 But they were troubled for a small season, that they might be admonished, having [e] a sign of salvation, to put them in remembrance of the commandment of thy law.

7 For he that turned himself toward it was not saved by the thing that he saw, but by thee, that art the Saviour of all.

8 And in this thou madest thine enemies confess, that it is thou who deliverest from all evil:

9 For [f] them the bitings of grasshoppers and flies killed, neither was

‖ Or, thy people.
[d] Numb. 21. 6. 1 Cor. 10. 9.
[e] Numb. 21. 9.
[f] Exod. 8. 24. & 10. 4. Rev. 9. 3 &c.

of a strange taste.] As far as the writer's language is concerned, he seems to imply that the hunger of the Israelites in the desert was mainly intended to enhance their enjoyment of the quails. Even if we make allowance for incautious expressions, behind which probably lay a worthier meaning, all that he says about the quails is very different from what is said in the Pentateuch.

4. penury which they could not avoid.] "Inexorable want."

but to these.] The Israelites.

it should only be shewed how their enemies were tormented.] Their hunger in the desert, so soon removed and so exquisitely gratified, only served (the writer says) to shew them how severe were the torments of their enemies. Ἐβασανίζοντο; lit., "were being tormented." This might imply that the two events were contemporaneous, but the writer rather seems to mean that the Plagues of Egypt had not been entirely removed, and were still tormenting the Egyptians after the Exodus. Nothing but the pride and ruthlessness which so often mark the allusions of Jews to their enemies, can explain the unworthy conception that God meant to teach the Israelites to congratulate themselves by gloating over the agony of their former oppressors. The author is here at his worst and lowest point of crude particularism. "Ici," says Reuss, "la chose est positivement travestie."

5–14. The different objects with which God sent the fiery serpents against the Israelites, and the insect-plagues upon the Egyptians.

5. of beasts.] The fiery serpents. Num. xxi. 6.

upon these.] The Israelites.

they perished.] "They were being destroyed."

crooked serpents.] A phrase borrowed from the LXX. Is. xxvii. 1.

for ever.] Lit., "to the end." This accounts for the previous imperfect, διεφθείροντο. Comp. xviii. 21, "but the wrath endured not long" (ἐπὶ πολύ); and xix. 1, where it is said that wrath did come on the ungodly unto the end (μεχρὶ τέλους). In 1 Thess. ii. 16, St. Paul says that the wrath had come (ἔφθασεν) on the Jews to the uttermost (εἰς τέλος).

6. that they might be admonished.] xi. 10. It is assumed throughout that the Egyptians were too far gone for admonition, and needed unmitigated punishment.

a sign of salvation.] The brazen serpent, Num. xxi. 8.

to put them in remembrance.] That this was the object of the brazen serpent is not stated by Moses; but the author means the εἰς ἀνάμνησιν to apply to the whole event, and not only to the means by which the Israelites were saved (see v. 11). Philo, as usual, allegorises, and treats the brazen serpent as an image of sober-mindedness (σωφροσύνη) and endurance (καρτερία). 'De agric.' § 22; 'Legg. Allegg.' ii. 20.

7. was not saved by the thing that he saw.] The writer wished to obviate the error of supposing that the brazen serpent had any magical influence, or that it had any of the intrinsic power which had led the Jews to offer incense to it in the days of Hezekiah. To Pseudo-Solomon as to Hezekiah, it was in itself merely Nehushtan, "a piece of brass."

the Saviour of all.] Without the most absolute self-contradiction, the writer cannot mean to express any final triumph of Universal Mercy. The phrase must mean "the source of all salvation."

8. madest . . . confess.] Lit., "didst persuade." Here, as in xi. 13, he assumes that the Egyptians were aware of all that happened to the Israelites. Scripture makes no allusion to the subject, unless we can stretch Num. xiv. 13 to imply something of the kind.

9. For them.] The Egyptians.

the bitings of grasshoppers and flies killed.

there found any remedy for their life: for they were worthy to be punished by such.

10 But thy sons not the very teeth of venomous dragons overcame: for thy mercy was ever by them, and healed them.

‖ Gr. stung.

11 For they were ‖pricked, that they should remember thy words; and were quickly saved, that not falling into deep forgetfulness, they might be ‖continually mindful of thy goodness.

‖ Or, never drawn from.

12 For it was neither herb, nor mollifying plaister, that restored them to health: but thy word, O Lord, which healeth all things.

13 For thou hast power of life and death: thou [g] leadest to the gates of hell, and bringest up again.

[g] Deut. 32. 39. 1 Sam. 2. 6. Ps. 105. Tobit 13. 2.

14 A man indeed killeth through his malice: and the spirit, when it is gone forth, returneth not; neither the soul received up cometh again.

15 But it is not possible to escape thine hand.

16 [h] For the ungodly, [i] that denied to know thee, were scourged by the strength of thine arm: with strange rains, hails, and showers, were they persecuted, that they could not avoid, and through fire were they consumed.

[h] Exod. 9 23. [i] Exod. 5 2.

17 For, which is most to be won-

This is an exaggerated inference from "this death" in Ex. x. 17. Comp. Jos. 'Antt.' II. xiv. § 3; Philo, 'Vit. Mos.' i. 19.

they were worthy.] They deserved to be so punished. It may be so; but this language of exultation over the torments of enemies does not waken our sympathy.

by such.] The word "such things" is often contemptuous. Comp. John viii. 5, "Moses commanded in the law that such" (τὰς τοιαύτας, "such as she") "should be stoned." "Such" (lit. "these things," ταῦτα) "were some of you," 1 Cor. vi. 11.

> "And never shall in friendship's grasp > The hand of such as Marmion clasp."
> SCOTT.

10. was ever by them.] Rather, "came forth to meet them" (ἀντιπαρῆλθε).

11. they were pricked.] By the poison-fangs of the fiery serpents. The verb ἐγκεντρίζειν properly means "to engraft" (Rom. xi. 17, &c.), and is here used incorrectly for ἐγκεντροῦν.

thy words.] Rather, "thy oracles" (λογίων). The diminutive perhaps came, as Grimm suggests, from the brevity of the ancient oracles. The term is applied to Scripture in Acts viii. 38.

quickly.] ὀξέως has this meaning at iii. 18; or we might suppose that it here meant "sharply," "by a sharp remedy."

forgetfulness.] Namely, of God's law.

continually mindful of.] Lit., "undistracted from," i.e. indissolubly attached to. Compare the use of ἀπερισπάστως, 1 Cor. vii. 35; περιεσπᾶτο, Lk. x. 40.

12. thy word.] To give Logos the Philonian and semi-personal sense here is a perversion against which warning has to be given almost as often as the word Logos occurs. Compare vv. 7, 10, 26.

13. For thou hast power.] This is the reason why nothing but God's word could have healed them.

thou leadest to the gates of hell.] That is, to the verge of death (Ps. xlix. 16). Comp. 3 Macc. v. 51.

bringest up again.] God can both slay and restore to life; whereas, as the next verse says, man can only kill.

14. the spirit.] The meaning is much the same whether the writer here means "the breath" or "the living principle." But that the latter is here meant is shewn by the contrast with ψυχὴ as in xv. 11.

neither the soul received up cometh again.] The true reading is ψυχὴν παραληφθεῖσαν, "nor does he deliver the soul received (into the unseen world)."

15–29. The different ways in which the element of fire was employed by God in the case of the Egyptians and of the Israelites.

15. But . . . thine hand.] The substance of this and the previous verse is repeated in Tobit xiii. i. 2: "Blessed be God . . . for he leads down to Hades . . . and he brings up from the great destruction, and there is nothing which shall escape his hand."

16. that denied to know thee.] The Egyptians (xii. 27).

with strange rains, hails, and showers.] "Strange" (as in v. 3) because they were abnormal in character and violence. Ὑετὸς is more continuous rain than ὄμβρος. In these verses (16–19) the Mosaic narrative of Ex. ix. 22–25 is almost grotesquely distorted and exaggerated.

that they could not avoid.] Lit., "inexorable," i.e. inevitable, as in v. 4.

dered at, [k] the fire had more force in the water, that quencheth all things: for the world [l] fighteth for the righteous.

18 For some time the flame was mitigated, that it might not burn up the beasts that were sent against the ungodly; but themselves might see and perceive that they were persecuted with the judgment of God.

19 And at another time it burneth even in the midst of water above the power of fire, that it might destroy the fruits of an unjust land.

20 [m] Instead whereof thou feddest thine own people with angels' food, and didst send them from heaven bread prepared without their labour, able to content every man's delight, and agreeing to every taste.

[k] ch. 19. 20.

[l] Judg. 5. 20. See ver. 24.

[m] Exod. 16. 14. Numb. 11. 7. Ps. 78. 25. John 6. 31

17. For which is most to be wondered at.] These three verses are an expansion of "fire mingled with the hail" in Ex. ix. 24, which is rendered in the LXX. ἦν . . . τὸ πῦρ φλογίζον ἐν τῇ χαλάζῃ. The phenomenon intended to be described by the Hebrew expression (which literally means "there was fire taking-hold-of-itself — conglomerated — in the midst of the hail") is the electric phenomenon known as St. Elmo's fire — balls of fire which, as sometimes happens in violent storms, fell amid the hailstorm. Such, at least, is the explanation of אֵשׁ מִתְלַקַּחַת given by Gesenius and De Wette. In itself the phenomenon is natural, not miraculous; i.e. it must be reckoned among normal and recurrent phenomena, since the mixture of hail and lightning is one of the commonest results of electrical disturbance. God made use of the ordinary laws of nature in a special manner. Moses gives no sanction for the comments of the writer, which are more than mere poetic expressions, like those of Aeschylus (Ag. 631):

> συνώμοσαν γὰρ ὄντες ἔχθιστοι τὸ πρίν
> πῦρ καὶ θάλασσα καὶ τὰ πίστ' ἐδειξάτην.

Or Milton's:

> "The clouds
> From many a horrid rift abortive poured > Fierce rain with lightning mixed, water with fire
> In ruin reconciled."—Par. Reg. iv. 410.

the world fighteth for the righteous.] See v. 24 and v. 17.

18. that it might not burn up the beasts.] The writer speaks as though the plagues of locusts, flies, lice, and storm were all contemporaneous. There is no scriptural warrant for his remarks. In Ex. viii. 13, 31, we are expressly told that the frogs and flies had died before the hail came. Yet the meaning of the writer is clear, for in xix. 21 he grotesquely asserts that the frogs, flies, &c., lived and walked uninjured in the flames. He cannot therefore be here referring to the frogs being found in the Egyptian ovens (Ex. viii. 3).

might see and perceive.] βλέποντες ἴδωσιν. When used together, βλέπω refers to physical sight, and ὁρῶ to mental insight.

they were persecuted.] Lit., "they are being driven" (ἐλαύνονται). The word is often used of divine judgments.

19. in the midst of water.] The writer heaps miracles on miracles: the rain did not quench the fire, the fire did not burn the insect-swarms. "Miracula non sunt multiplicanda praeter necessitatem." above the power of fire.] It is supposed to be supernatural fire, as in xix. 20. Philo has the same notion in 'Vit. Mos.' i. 20. Both writers are following the Jewish Hagadists; but what Pseudo-Solomon here says does not well accord with the wiser remarks which he has made in xi. 17–26.

the fruits.] γεννήματα, all the products of the soil. Comp. v. 22 and Ps. cv. 35.

20. Instead whereof.] Instead of this destruction of food by hail and fire.

thou feddest.] ἐψωμίσας. The verb here governs two accusatives. It properly means "I dole" (1 Cor. xiii. 3), but is used by the LXX. in Num. xi. 4, 18; Deut. viii. 3, &c., to describe the supply of manna. It is applicable to the gift of manna, which was small, like grains of coriander seed (Num. xi. 16); "a small round thing, as small as the hoar-frost on the ground" (Ex. xvi. 14).

angels' food.] Comp. LXX. Ps. lxxviii. 25. In the Hebrew the phrase thus rendered is לֶחֶם אַבִּירִים, "bread of the mighty," i.e. of "angels, that excel in strength" (Ps. ciii. 20). Being "bread from heaven" (Ps. cv. 40; Ex. xvi. 4), it is called "ambrosial food" in xix. 21, and "spiritual food" in 1 Cor. x. 3.

prepared without their labour.] It is better to join the adverb ἀκοπιάτως with the verb, "Thou sentest them unweariedly." The manna does not seem to have been eaten as it was found, but was baked and made into cakes (Num. xi. 8).

able to content every man's delight.] Vulg., omne delectamentum in se habentem (perhaps reading ἴσχοντα). If ἰσχύοντα πᾶσαν ἡδονὴν means "mastering every pleasure," the 21 For thy [n] ‖ sustenance declared thy sweetness unto thy children, and serving to the appetite of the eater, ‖ tempered itself to every man's liking.

22 [o] But snow and ice endured the fire, and melted not, that they might know that fire burning in the hail, and sparkling in the rain, did destroy the fruits of the enemies.

23 But this again did even forget his own strength, that the righteous might be nourished.

24 For [p] the creature that serveth thee, who art the Maker, increaseth his strength against the unrighteous

[n] Judg. 6. 4.
‖ Or, manna.
‖ Or, was tempered.
[o] ch. 19. 21.
[p] ch. 19. 6

construction is very unusual; for when ἰσχύω is used in this active sense, it is generally followed by πρός, ἐπί, or ὑπέρ (LXX. Ps. xii. 5; 1 Macc. x. 49, &c.). But it is harsh to make πᾶσαν ἡδονήν an "accusative of the nearer meaning," and to render the words "strong as regards every pleasure."

agreeing to every taste.] The Mosaic narrative says that the manna tasted like honey-cakes (Ex. xvi. 31), or like fresh oil (Num. xi. 8). Here and in the next verse the writer follows the Jewish legends, which said that the manna tasted to each eater like grapes, or figs, or whatever else he desired. The later Jewish Rabbis said similarly that the flesh of leviathan in the days of the Messiah would suit every palate.

21. For thy sustenance.] The manna is here called "God's hypostasis;" for the conjectures ὑπόσταξις, "gently-dropping dew" (Naunius), or ἀπόσταξις, "dropping from heaven" (Grabe),—though they might be supposed to refer to Ex. xvi. 4, Num. xi. 9, where the manna is said to have fallen with the dew,—are untenable. What then is the meaning of the ambiguous word ὑπόστασις in this passage? Luther and others make it mean "confidence;" but though the word has the meaning of "confidence" in 2 Cor. ix. 4, xi. 17, Heb. xi. 1, yet ὑπόστασίς σου could hardly mean "trust in thee." Grimm makes it mean "thy substance," not as equivalent to "thou" or to "God," but to the power of God working in the manna. It is more simple and natural to follow the A.V. in giving to the word its ordinary sense of substance, and explaining it to mean "the thing sent by thee."

thy sweetness.] The metaphor is the same as in 1 Pet. ii. 3, "if ye tasted that the Lord is gracious;" Ps. xxxiv. 8, "O taste and see that the Lord is good."

serving.] The participle is masculine, because it refers back to ἄρτος, not to ὑπόστασις.

of the eater.] τοῦ προσφερομένου. In later Greek, προσφέρεσθαι, like the vulgar term "to set to," means "to take food" (Judith xii. 9). The Vulg. renders it uniuscujusque, which would rather be the classic τοῦ τυχόντος.

22. But snow and ice endured the fire.] The expression is fantastic. By "snow and ice" are meant nothing but the manna, which Moses only compares to the hoar-frost (LXX., πάγος; Ex. xvi. 14), from its size and colour. In Num. xi. 7 we are told that "the colour thereof was as the colour of bdellium," which the LXX. render by εἶδος κρυστάλλου. On this very slender and insecure foundation the writer assumes in this verse, not that the manna glittered like snow, but that it was a kind of ice or snow. This perversion enables him to contrast the ice and snow which was delicious food to the Israelites with the hail which plagued the Egyptians. It also gives him an excuse for introducing several more miraculous elements into the narrative of the Pentateuch. Except in a certain mastery of sonorous and effective language, the writer does not appear at his best in this passage.

melted not.] With the exception noted at v. 27. The "fire" here alluded to is not, however, the sunlight, but the fire which the Israelites used for cooking. Out of the fact that the manna looked like hoar-frost, and was baked by the Israelites into cakes (Ex. xvi. 23; Num. xi. 8), the writer gets the miracle that ice did not melt in the fire, and that this was intended to teach the people that the fire which was miraculously ruinous to the Egyptians was miraculously beneficent to themselves.

"Quodcunque ostendis mihi sic, incredulus odi."

burning in the hail.] See v. 17. "Cette antithèse résume toute la tirade, et renchérit encore sur ses paradoxes" (Reuss).

23. But this again.] The A. V. refers τοῦτο to πῦρ. It is, however, better to put only a comma at the end of the last verse, and render "and (that they might know) this further fact, that the fire had even forgotten its proper power in order that the just might be nourished." The γνῶσιν is followed first by ὅτι (v. 22), and then by the acc. and infinitive.

24. For the creature.] That is, "the created thing," as in v. 17.

the Maker.] ὁ ποιήσας is not "the Creator" for their punishment, and abateth his strength for the benefit of such as put their trust in thee.

25 Therefore even then was it altered into all ‖ fashions, and was obedient to thy grace, that nourisheth all things, according to the desire ‖ of them that had need:

26 That thy children, O Lord, whom thou lovest, might know, that [q] it is not the growing of fruits that nourisheth man: but that it is thy word, which preserveth them that put their trust in thee.

27 For that which was not destroyed of the fire, [r] being warmed with a little sunbeam, soon melted away:

28 That it might be known, that [s] we must prevent the sun to give thee thanks, and at the dayspring pray unto thee.

29 For the hope of the unthankful shall melt away as the winter's hoar frost, and shall run away as unprofitable water.

‖ Or, things.

‖ Or, of them that prayed.

[q] Deut. 8. 3. Matt. 4. 4.

[r] Exod. 16. 21.

[s] Ps. 88. 13.

CHAPTER XVII.

1 Why the Egyptians were punished with darkness. 4 The terrors of that darkness. 11 The terrors of an ill conscience.

absolutely. The clause means "the created thing, serving Thee, who didst create it."

25. Therefore.] In accordance with the law just mentioned, viz. that created things increase and relax their force as they are needed to perform God's behests.

even then.] Then, as at other times.

was it altered.] μεταλλενομένη. There is the same apparent mistake as to the proper meaning of the word (which is "being dug"), as we have already observed at iv. 12. The writer seems to have confused μεταλλεύω, "I mine," with μεταλλάσσω, "I change."

26. not.] "Not so much." It is a Hebrew idiom to negative altogether the inferior alternative, so that often in Scripture οὐκ . . . ἀλλὰ mean non tam . . . quam.

the growing of fruits.] Rather, "the kinds of fruits," i. 14.

thy word.] Deut. viii. 3: "He . . . fed thee with manna, that thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know; that He might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live." Comp. Matt. iv. 4. In the N. T. the truth is deepened and spiritualised. The manna provided for the Israelites was a proof that God can support man by other than ordinary methods, by the utterance of His word; but for the children of the New Dispensation it symbolises the truth that the physical life is but a passing shadow in comparison with that eternal life, that life of the soul, which only comes from Him who is the Word of God.

27. For.] This is the proof that it is not the nature of things which supports man, but God's work which modifies their nature to His purpose.

that which was not destroyed of the fire.] The manna, v. 22. The force of the fire was weakened; the force of the sunbeam increased, as is indicated in v. 24.

melted away.] Ex. xvi. 21.

28. must prevent the sun.] "Prevent" is used in its old sense of "anticipate" (prévenir), as in Ps. cxix. 147; 1 Thess. iv. 15.

to give thee thanks.] A beautiful precept, founded on somewhat precarious exegesis. Had this been the intention of the facts mentioned by Moses, he would have hardly failed to point the lesson.

at the dayspring.] This is almost certainly the right rendering of πρὸς ἀνατολὴν φωτός. The words might of course mean "towards the dawn;" but to give them this meaning here would be entirely to dissever them from the context, which has no special reference. The vanishing of the manna at daybreak could not conceivably point the lesson that people ought to face the sun when they make their morning prayer. Hence it is a most unwarrantable inference of Eichhorn, Gfrörer, Zeller, &c., that this verse shews the writer to have been one of the Therapeutae, who adopted the Persian practice of praying towards the rising sun. (Philo, 'Vit. contempl.' Opp. ii. 475; Jos. 'B. J.' ii. 8, § 5.) All Jews regarded it as a duty to begin the day with prayer, and especially with the repeating of the Shemâ: "Hear, O Israel! the Lord our God is one God" (Ps. v. 3, lvii. 8; 'Berakhoth,' i. 2).

29. the hope of the unthankful.] Chap. v. 14, 15.

CHAPTER XVII.

The writer has contrasted the destinies of the Egyptians and Israelites, (i.) as regards hunger and thirst (xvi. 1–14); (ii.) as regards the element of fire. (iii.) He now draws out a third contrast—as regards light and darkness. (See Buddeus's 'Institt. theol. dogm.' v. 145.)

FOR great are thy judgments, and cannot be expressed: therefore ‖ unnurtured souls have erred.

2 For when unrighteous men thought to oppress the holy nation; [a] they being shut up ‖ in their houses, the prisoners of darkness, and fettered with the bonds of a long night, lay [there] ‖ exiled from the eternal providence.

3 For while they supposed to lie hid in their secret sins, they were scattered ‖ under a dark vail of forgetfulness, being horribly astonished, and troubled with [strange] ‖ apparitions.

4 For neither might the corner that held them keep them from fear: but noises [as of waters] falling down sounded about them, and sad visions

‖ Or, souls that will not be reformed.

[a] Exod. 10. 22.

‖ Or, under their roofs.

‖ Or. fugitives.

‖ Or, in

‖ Or, sights.

1. great are thy judgments.] The punishments inflicted by divine retribution (Ps. cxix. 75) are terrible.

cannot be expressed.] δυσδιήγητοι. The word, which does not occur elsewhere, means, not that they are "too great for utterance," but that they are mysterious, insoluble, difficult to explain. God's "thoughts are very deep" (Ps. xcii. 5); His "judgments unsearchable and past finding out" (Rom. xi. 33).

therefore.] From inability to unravel the secrets of the Divine Providence.

unnurtured souls.] Souls that have not been trained to recognise religious truths. Vulg., indisciplinatae.

have erred.] Rather, "erred." There is a specific allusion to the error of the Egyptians in persecuting the chosen people.

2. unrighteous men.] ἄνομοι. The Egyptians, who were "without the Law," and who acted in opposition to a law which they might have recognised.

the holy nation.] Rather, "a holy nation."

the prisoners of darkness.] Compare the almost Aeschylean expression of St. Peter (2 Pet. ii. 14), σειραῖς ζόφου ταρταρώσας.

of a long night.] The plague of darkness lasted for three days.

lay.] An expression of helplessness, with an allusion to Ex. x. 23, "neither rose any from his place." Philo, no less than the writer, expands the narrative of Moses, and says that, "flung down in their beds, the Egyptians did not dare to rise, or, if forced to rise, could only grope their way along the walls like blind men" ('Vit. Mos.' i. 21).

exiled from the eternal providence.] Outlaws from God; fugitives (i.e. banished from the merciful care) of the eternal foresight. On the word πρόνοια, see xiv. 3. Tennyson has employed this very fine expression:

"She, mouldering with the dull earth's mouldering sod, Inwrapt tenfold in slothful shame,
Lay there exiled from Eternal God, Lost to her place and name."
Palace of Art.

3. while they supposed to lie hid.] Comp. Ps. x. 11; Is. xxix. 15; Job xxiv. 14. The darkness which they regarded as the veil of their secret orgies (xiv. 23) became their worst punishment. The English construction "supposed to lie hid" is rare. The Geneva version has, "while they thought to be hid."

they were scattered.] ἐσκορπίσθησαν. The expression is a strange one, and not very suitable to the Egyptians huddling in their own houses during the plague of darkness; but there is not sufficient authority for the reading ἐσκοτίσθησαν, "they were darkened."

of forgetfulness.] Being banished from God's care (v. 2), it seemed as though they were altogether obliterated from existence, and plunged already in the world of darkness and death.

with apparitions.] The reading of the Vatican MS. is φαντάσμασιν. The better-supported reading is ἰνδάλμασιν, a rare and late word, rendered "sights" in the margin. It is omitted altogether by the Vulgate (cum admiratione nimiâ perturbati). Ἴνδαλμα means much the same as εἴδωλον, "a shadowy image." See LXX. Jer. l. 39. The writer perhaps supposed that the "evil angels" whom God sent among the Egyptians (Ps. lxxviii. 49) assumed these spectral forms.

4. the corner that held them.] Kleuk and others interpret this to imply that the Egyptians hid themselves in their pyramids and catacombs; but μυχὸς clearly means the inner chambers of their own houses, from which they could not stir (v. 2).

noises [as of waters] falling down.] In all that follows the writer gives the reins to his own imagination. The phrase "noises dashing down upon them" (comp. v. 18) is a bold one, but there can be little doubt that καταράσσοντες, not ἐκταράσσοντες, is the true reading. It is possible the writer understood καταράσσω—which is used of the rush of water (comp. the name Araxes), and which occurs in LXX. Hos. vii. 6 (Ps. lxxxviii. 3; ci. 10)—in the sense of κατὰ τάρασσω. In several instances he uses words in strange, and sometimes apparently in mistaken senses.

sounded about them.] Literally, "boasted appeared unto them with heavy countenances.

5 No power of the fire might give them light: neither could the bright flames of the stars endure to lighten that horrible night.

6 Only there appeared unto them a fire kindled of itself, very dreadful: for being much terrified, they thought the things which they saw to be worse than the sight they saw not.

7 [b] As for the illusions of art magick, they were put down, and round them" (περιεκόμπουν). The word does not occur elsewhere.

[b] Exod. 7. 12. & 8. 7. 19. & 9. 11.

sad visions . . . with heavy countenances.] Lit., "phantoms downcast with unsmiling faces." The words κατηφῆ ("dejected," "gazing downwards") and ἀμειδήτοις ("unsmiling") are highly poetical. Neither word occurs in the LXX. or N. T. By these "phantoms" the writer probably meant that the terrors of the Egyptians took objective form in ghostly spectres which gleamed dimly through the darkness.

5. No power of the fire might give them light.] This notion seems to be borrowed from Philo, who, after attributing the darkness to some unnaturally complete eclipse, or some dense agglomeration of clouds, adds that "the light of necessary domestic fire was partly quenched by the dominant surge of storm, and partly obscured by the depth of the darkness" ('Vit. Mos.' i. 21). Abn Ezra also, commenting on the fact that it was "a darkness that might be felt," says that no flame or light would burn in it, and gives this as a reason why "they saw not one another," Ex. xi. 23. Josephus says that the darkness was so thick that men died from inability to breathe it, and "were afraid lest they should be swallowed up by the cloud."

neither could the bright flames of the stars endure.] The notion seems to be that the stars turned away from the sight, and could not tolerate it, as the sun was said to have turned in disgust from the feast of Thyestes; or else that the supernatural darkness "strangled" their light. Josephus also ('Antt.' ii. 14, § 5) calls the darkness φέγγους ἄμοιρον.

that horrible night.] στυγνὴν, properly "frowning," and then, metaphorically, gloomy and menacing. Comp. Matt. xvi. 3.

6. Only there appeared unto them.] The fire of earth and the stars of heaven gave no light; yet the Egyptians had a light which made the darkness visible, partly in the glimmering spectres which flitted around them (v. 4), and partly in a supernatural globe of flame, which "kept gleaming through the darkness" to them (διεφαίνετο).

a fire kindled of itself, very dreadful.] Lit., "a spontaneous pyre, full of dreadfulness." Πυρὰ properly means "a pyre," but in late Greek is sometimes used for "a flame," or "mass of fire" (2 Macc. i. 22; Judith vii. 5). It is called "spontaneous" or "self-kindled," because it had no ostensible cause.

being much terrified.] There are various ways of rendering and explaining this clause. The A. V. makes τῆς . . . ὄψεως a genitive governed by χείρω. It might also be taken as a genitive absolute (Grimm), or as a genitive governed by ἐκδειματούμενοι, as in the Vulgate version. The rhythm of the writer seems to point to the latter construction: "but being utterly terrified by the sight which they saw not." "The sight which they saw not" is a sort of oxymoron, and apparently means the wandering self-enkindled flame. It does not, however, mean that this flame-globe had no existence except in the terrified imaginations of the Egyptians, but that they only saw its flashes and coruscations here and there, not the fire itself. Throughout the chapter the writer becomes obscure from want of simplicity and over-elaboration of style. His literary effects are produced, not by the unifying touch of genuine imagination, which concentrates a living picture into one word or one line, but by aggregation of vague separate details. On the other hand, it may perhaps be said that there is a sense of horror inspired by the very vagueness of the things described.

they thought the things which they saw to be worse.] Either "worse than they really were;" or, "worse than they would have done if the vision of wandering flame could have been more distinctly gazed upon." The form of expression is too obscure to be understood with certainty. The meaning apparently is that the Egyptians were so affrighted that they took the gleams and flashes which they saw flitting about through the darkness to be more portentous because of their lurid indistinctness; and thus were utterly terrified by the flame from which those flashes proceeded, but which they could not see. Another explanation is, that in their terror at the invisible objects, they took natural objects (τὰ βλεπόμενα) to be worse than they were. Shakspeare says—

> "Or in the night, imagining some fear, > How easy is a bush supposed a bear."

7. As for the illusions of art magick, they were put down.] The meaning is that the

Digitized by Microsoft®

their vaunting in wisdom was reproved with disgrace.

8 For they, that promised to drive away terrors and troubles from a sick soul, were sick themselves of fear, worthy to be laughed at.

9 For though no terrible thing did fear them; yet being scared with beasts that passed by, and hissing of serpents, 10 They died for fear, ‖ denying that they saw the air, which could of no side be avoided.

‖ Or, refusing to look upon.

11 For wickedness, condemned by her own witness, is very timorous, and being pressed with con-old "mockeries" and "lying miracles" were laid low by the failure of the Egyptian magicians either to produce or to get rid of these ghastly spectres. "And the magicians did so with their enchantments . . . but could not" (Ex. viii. 18).

was reproved.] Lit., "and ignominious was the rebuke of their vaunting about their science." The braggart science of the sorcerers shamefully failed to meet the test.

8. they that promised.] The names of two of the Egyptian sorcerers, Jannes and Jambres, are traditionally preserved in 2 Tim. iii. 8.

from a sick soul.] Comp. 1 Tim. vi. 4, "doting (lit. sick, νοσῶν) about questions."

"Canst thou not minister to a mind diseased?"

The total failure of the "magicians" to relieve the troubled spirit of an earlier Pharaoh is recorded in Gen. xli. 8.

were sick themselves of fear, worthy to be laughed at.] Ἐυλαβείαν ("anxiety," Heb. v. 7) is a cognate accusative after ἐνόσουν. The emphatically repeated οὗτοι is contemptuous. Since the magicians failed in the plague of lice, the writer naturally assumes that they failed still more hopelessly during the plague of darkness.

9. though no terrible thing did fear them.] "Fear" is here used in its earlier sense of "frighten," as in Shakspeare's

> "Tush! tush! fear boys with bugs."
> Timon of Athens.

yet.] Even if there was no perturbing sight to terrify them—i.e. even when no aërial spectre was shining luridly through the thick darkness—they were alarmed by deadly creatures.

being scared.] This seems to be a rendering of ἐκπεφοβημένοι. The more emphatic and unusual word ἐκσεσοβημένοι (which is probably the true reading) means "being harried, or scared from place to place." Ἐκσοβέω means, "I scare away a bird by saying, σοῦ σοῦ (shoo! shoo!)." It is here highly picturesque, as representing the Egyptians rushing through the strange midnight from the serpents and other creatures that hissed around them.

with beasts that passed by.] Lit., "with the passing-by of monsters" (κνωδάλων; see xi. 15).

hissing of serpents.] The serpents that crawled about and hissed in the darkness are created solely by the writer's imagination.

10. They died for fear.] Lit., "They were perishing in tremor." The phrase must not be taken literally, but merely means that "their hearts failed them for fear" (Lk. xxi. 26).

denying that they saw.] This, in classical Greek, would be ἀρνούμενοι μὴ προσιδεῖν. The marginal rendering is "refusing (even) to look upon." For this sense of ἀρνεῖσθαι, see Heb. xi. 24.

the air, which could of no side be avoided.] They would not even lift their eyes to the all-surrounding, inevitable (μηδαμόθεν φευκτὸν, "ambient and inevitable") air. Ἀὴρ is used by Homer for dark mist; and might here be rendered "mirk," were it not that the accompanying epithet seems to imply "the common, universal air," as in vii. 3.

11. For wickedness.] In a brief digression (11–13) he touches upon the terrors which spring from a guilty conscience.

is very timorous.] If the reading δειλὸν γὰρ ἰδίως πονηρία μαρτυρεῖ καταδικαζομένη be correct, it can only mean, "For wickedness, a thing innately timorous, bears witness to its own condemnation." (Vulg., Cum sit enim timida nequitia dat testimonium condemnationis.) For the construction δειλὸν πονηρία, compare vii. 24, σοφία . . . κινητικώτερον. But the simpler reading, followed by the A. V. and fairly well supported, is ἰδίῳ . . . μάρτυρι: "For wickedness, being condemned by its own witness, is a timorous thing." In either case, the thought is the same as in Tennyson's lines—

> "He that wrongs his friend > Wrongs himself more; and ever bears about
> A silent court of justice in his breast,
> Himself the judge and jury, and himself
> The prisoner at the bar, ever condemned;
> And that drags down his life."
> Sea Dreams.

Quinctilian quotes the proverb Conscientia mille testes.

being pressed.] The verb συνέχεσθαι ex-

Digitized by Microsoft®

science, always forecasteth grievous things.

12 For fear is nothing else but a betraying of the succours which reason offereth.

13 And the expectation from within, being less, counteth the ignorance more than the cause which bringeth the torment.

14 But they sleeping the same presses the strangling anguish of intense grief, or pain, or fear (Lk. viii. 27, xii. 50; Acts xviii. 5, xxviii. 8).

with conscience.] τῇ συνειδήσει. This verse is remarkable as the earliest passage in which the word συνείδησις (conscientia), which is found in Euripides, 'Orest.' 396, occurs in the cycle of sacred writings to express "the principle in man by which he approves or disapproves of his heart, temper, and actions" (Bp. Butler). The Hebrews knew the thing and expressed it by "heart" or "spirit" (comp. 1 John iii. 19–21); but it is the glory of Greek thought to have invented the word, which frequently occurs in the N. T. (John viii. 9; Acts xxvii. 1; 2 Cor. i. 12, &c.), but not in the LXX. except in Eccles. x. 20, and that in a different sense, to represent the Hebrew מְזִמָּה, "thought." The word first occurs in sayings attributed to Periander and Bias ('ap. Stob.' p. 192, 21). See Cremer, 'Lexicon,' p. 233 (E. Tr.), and Hofmann, 'Die Lehre vom Gewissen.'

always forecasteth grievous things.] Προσείληφε can hardly have this meaning (Vulg., praesumit), which belongs rather to προείληφε. Προσλαμβάνειν means "to assume besides," and the verb may here imply the multiplied and exaggerated terrors of a guilty conscience. "Wickedness . . . being pressed by conscience hath ever added to the sum of grievous miseries." In order to save souls from "the death that cannot die," they are often made to feel

> "A vague spiritual fear,
> Like to some doubtful noise of creaking doors,
> Heard by the watcher in a haunted house,
> That keeps the rust of murder on the walls."

12. a betraying of the succours which reason offereth.] This curious definition of fear is probably taken from some Greek philosopher. It belongs to the Stoic notion of "apathy" and "independence." The wise and good man, the writer implies, cannot fear, because he stands superior to the influences which cause fear. Reason dominates over the sources of terror. The philosophers, followed by Clemens of Alexandria, define fear as "an unreasonable avoidance of evils." So Lucretius says—

> "Felix qui potuit rerum cognoscere causas > Quique metus omnes et inexorabile fatum > Subjecit pedibus, strepitumque Acherontis avari."

The sentiment is common in Milton—

> "These thoughts may startle well, but not astound
> The virtuous mind, which ever walks attended > By a strong siding champion, Conscience."
> Comus.

> "Tanto vogl' io che vi sia manifesto
> Pur che mia coscïenza non mi garra > Che alla fortuna, come vuol, son presto."
> DANTE, Inf. xv. 93.

13. the expectation from within.] This verse in our A. V. is very obscure. The meaning is, "And (in the case of fearful and guilty men) the expectation from within (of the succours derived from reason) being worsted (ἥττων οὖσα), reckons the ignorance (of those succours) as worse than the cause which brings the torment;" or "makes the ignorance of the cause of the torment seem greater." In other words, "The loss of reasonable hope intensifies the dread of ill-understood calamities." After προσδοκία we must understand τῶν βοηθημάτων, and it must be closely joined with οὖσα ἥττων, so as to mean "the defeated expectation of the succours of reason," i.e. the fact that all hope of such succours has sunk into despair. Ἥττων often has this sense of "worsted in conflict," but it might also mean "being less than it should be." Τῆς . . . αἰτίας may be governed either by πλείονα or by ἄγνοιαν. If it be governed by πλείονα, we must understand τῶν βοηθημάτων after ἄγνοιαν. In any case the sentence is deficient in clearness of expression, but means much the same as omne ignotum pro magnifico. Fear, when deprived of the aid of reason, reckons its ignorant helplessness to be a worse calamity than that which causes its immediate trouble. It is "over-exquisite to forecast the shadow of uncertain evils." "Les malheurs des malheurs sont ceux qui n'arrivent jamais." The general meaning then is that fear, when abandoned by reason,

> "apprehends
> More than cool reason ever comprehends."

There is a paronomasia in the use of the words προδοσία, προσδοκία.

14. sleeping the same sleep.] Unless the word ὕπνον be here used metaphorically for a period of enforced rest and quiet, the meaning must be that they all slept during the three days' darkness, but it was a sleep disturbed by horrid dreams and portents and phantoms.

Digitized by Microsoft®

sleep that night, ‖ which was indeed intolerable, and which came upon them out of the bottoms of inevitable hell,

‖ Or, wherein they could do nothing.

15 Were partly vexed with monstrous apparitions, and partly fainted, their heart failing them: for a sudden fear, and not looked for, came upon them.

16 So then whosoever there fell down was straitly kept, shut up in a prison without iron bars.

17 For whether he were husbandman, or shepherd, or a labourer in the ‖ field, he was overtaken, and endured that necessity, which could not be avoided: for they were all bound with one chain of darkness.

‖ Or, desert.

18 Whether it were a whistling wind, or a melodious noise of birds among the spreading branches, or a pleasing fall of water running violently,

19 Or a ‖ terrible sound of stones

‖ Or, hideous.

that night, which was indeed intolerable.] Lit., "during that really impossible (or powerless) night." Our A. V. understands ἀδύνατον to mean either "intolerable" (understanding the word τλῆναι, "impossible to endure"), or (marg.) "wherein they could do nothing." The Vulg. renders it "impotentem," and perhaps the word implies that the night was in itself powerless, but derived its terrors from the prodigies with which it was accompanied; and again, "that really impossible night" may mean that it was a night purely miraculous, and beyond the sphere of ordinary possibility.

out of the bottoms of inevitable hell.] The darkness was not natural; it was a hell-born darkness; it came from the abysses of the grave. The word rendered "inevitable" is again ἀδυνάτος. It is omitted by the Vulgate, and we cannot follow Grotius and others, who from a single MS. adopt the reading ἀδύτου, "from the inmost shrine of the recesses of Hades" (Vulg., ab altissimis inferis). We can only conjecture the exact meaning of the writer in calling Hades "impossible" as well as "the night." Grimm supposes that he is alluding to his former remark, οὔτε ᾄδου βασίλειον ἐπὶ γῆς (i. 14). Possibly he meant to imply that neither "night" nor "Hades" were real entities.

15. Were vexed.] Lit., "were driven;" but the verb has the same sense as in xvi. 18.

fainted, their heart failing them.] Lit., "were paralysed by the betrayal (or treachery) of their soul." The imperfects are due to the writer's desire to be graphic (πρὸ ὀμμάτων ποιεῖν).

came upon them.] Lit., "was poured upon them."

16. So then.] The A. V. does not translate the word οὕτως "thus," i.e. in the consternation just described. Οὕτως, like the Latin sic, may also mean "just as they were" (John iv. 6).

whosoever there fell down . . .] Rather, "whosoever it was, there sinking to the earth, was kept under guard, shut up into an iron-less prison."

without iron bars.] "A prison, but not of iron." The expression resembles one of the numerous oxymora used by Aeschylus (ἄπτεροι πελειάδες, πέδαι ἀχάλκευτοι, &c.). The same figure of speech is found in Isaiah xxix. 9, "drunken, but not with wine." The reverse of the conception is that > "Strong walls do not a prison make, > Nor iron bars a cage."

The soul of a prisoner may be in perfect freedom; the soul of one who is free may be hopelessly imprisoned.

17. labourer in the field.] Lit., "labourer of the toils in the waste," i.e. labourer in lonely and open places.

which could not be avoided.] δυσάλυκτον, "difficult to avoid," used by meiosis for "impossible to avoid."

chain.] ἁλύσει, coupling-chain.

of darkness.] Comp. 2 Pet. ii. 4, 17.

18. a whistling wind.] There was not a single sound of nature which did not increase their alarm, even if it were naturally pleasant (Lev. xxvi. 36; Ps. liii. 5).

melodious noise of birds.] It is difficult to say whether the writer supposes that these birds sang in the darkness, like the nightingales, or whether he regards the darkness as purely subjective. All was dark to the Egyptians, but to all others the darkness was as clear as the day, and the breeze blew and the birds sang. If this be his conception, it is an exaggeration of the remark that "all the children of Israel had light in their dwellings" (Ex. x. 23).

spreading.] ἀμφιλαφεῖς, a highly poetic word, though also used in prose. (Herod. iv. 172; Plato, 'Phaedr.' 230 B.)

a pleasing fall.] Lit., "a rhythm."

19. terrible.] Ἀπηνὴς means properly "cruel."

cast down, or a running that could not be seen of skipping beasts, or a roaring voice of most savage wild beasts, or a rebounding echo from the hollow mountains; these things made them to swoon for fear.

20 For the whole world shined with clear light, and none were hindered in their labour:

21 Over them only was spread an heavy night, an image of [c] that darkness which should afterward receive them: but yet were they unto themselves more grievous than the darkness.

[c] Matt. 8. 12. & 22. 31. & 25. 30. 2 Pet. 2. 17. Jude 13.

CHAPTER XVIII.

4 Why Egypt was punished with darkness, 5 and with the death of their children. 18 They themselves saw the cause thereof. 20 God also plagued his own people. 21 By what means that plague was stayed.

NEVERTHELESS thy saints had a very great [a] light, whose voice they hearing, and not seeing their shape, because they also had not suffered the same things, they counted them happy.

[a] Exod. 10. 23.

2 But for that they did not hurt them now, of whom they had been wronged before, they thanked them, that could not be seen.] They felt the motion of the beasts as they rushed by (v. 9), but could not see them (v. 6, τῆς μὴ θεωρουμένης ὄψεως).

a rebounding echo.] Lit., "an echo reverberating from the hollowness of the mountains." An echo from the mountains must have seemed an extraordinary thing in Egypt.

made them to swoon.] παρέλυσε (comp. v. 15).

20. the whole world.] The writer in his own fashion again expands Ex. x. 23. The elaboration of style is marked by the metrical forms ἀνεμποδιστοῖς, συνείχετ' ἔργοις, λαμπρῷ κατελάμπετο φωτί.

and none were hindered in their labour.] Lit., "and it (the whole world) was busily occupied in unimpeded works." For this meaning of συνείχετο see Acts xviii. 5.

21. was spread.] Lit., "had been spread" (ἐπετέτατο).

receive them.] Lit., "to receive in turn" or "in succession." The darkness alluded to is "the outer darkness" (Matt. viii. 12) which awaits guilty souls.

"Forth John's soul flared into the dark." BROWNING.

unto themselves more grievous than the darkness.] So Jeremiah threatens Pashur that his name should be no more Pashur, but Magor Missabib, "terror on every side." "Behold, I will make thee a terror to thyself, and to all thy friends" (Jer. xx. 3, 4).

CHAPTER XVIII.

The contrast between the Egyptians and Israelites as regards light and darkness continued (1–4). Fourth contrast between the two nations, as regards the life and death of children (5–19). The Israelites did indeed suffer from death in the desert, but were speedily delivered (20–25).

1. thy saints.] See note on x. 15.

had a very great light.] In the land of Goshen (Ex. x. 23).

whose voice.] The cheerful sounds of life going on among the Israelites.

they.] The Egyptians. The Vulgate here follows some other reading, or else goes strangely astray, and is followed by many commentators.

and.] Rather, "but."

not seeing their shape.] It seems clear from the general tenor of the contrast that the writer conceives of the Egyptian darkness as affecting them only, while in the very same regions which to the Egyptians were dark the Israelites moved in light (see xvii. 18, 20).

because they also had not suffered the same things, they counted them happy.] The clause conveys no clear meaning, and has consequently been interpreted in many different ways. If the reading οὖν be correct, it seems to mean that "the Egyptians congratulated the Israelites because they (the Israelites) had suffered." This gives no intelligible sense; nor is the sense improved by giving to ὅτι the sense of "whatever;" or by distorting ἐμακάριζον to mean "they deemed it a happy thing." The A.V. follows the reading of the Alexandrian MS., which has οὐ for οὖν. The clause may then be intended to express the thought that the Egyptians regarded the Israelites as blessed in their exemption from the plague of darkness—which is perhaps the best that we can make of it.

2. of whom they had been wronged.] Lit., "They (the Egyptians) thank the Israelites, because, having been previously injured (by them), they (the Israelites) do not hurt them." Εὐχαριστοῦσι and βλάπτουσι are historic pre-and besought them pardon for that they had been enemies.

[b] Exod. 13. 21. & 14. 24. Ps. 78. 14. & 105. 39.

3 [b] Instead whereof thou gavest them a burning pillar of fire, both to be a guide of the unknown journey, and an harmless sun to entertain them honourably.

4 For they were worthy to be deprived of light, and imprisoned in darkness, who had kept thy sons shut up, by whom the ‖ uncorrupt light of the law was to be given unto the world.

‖ Or, incorruptible.

5 [c] And when they had determined to slay the babes of the saints, [d] one child being cast forth, and sents, only used for past tenses to make the style more graphic; but perhaps ηὐχαρίστουν, the reading of the Alex. MS., may have been altered into the present tense because of the βλάπτουσι. The meaning is that the Egyptians thanked the Israelites for not avenging themselves for past injuries by taking advantage of the present helplessness of their enemies.

[c] Exod. 1. 16.
[d] Exod. 2 3. 5.

besought them pardon for that they had been enemies.] This is the correct rendering of a clause which has been misunderstood to mean "besought them the favour that they would depart" (as though it were a reference to Ex. x. 24. Comp. xix. 2).

3. Instead whereof.] In place of the horrible darkness and anguish which have been described.

thou gavest them.] "Thou didst provide for the Israelites."

an harmless sun to entertain them honourably.] Rather, "a harmless sun of their glorious pilgrimage" (Ex. xiii. 21, xiv. 24; Ps. lxxvii. 14). The φιλοτίμου ξενιτείας might also be taken as a genitive after ἀβλαβῆ, "a sun that harmed not their glorious pilgrimage;" but the other construction is simpler. Φιλότιμος is used in the sense of "honourable" in Aesch. 'Eum.' 98, where he speaks of the Erinyes as "great and glorious (φιλότιμοι) children of Night." Ξενιτεία is a rare word, and properly means "foreign service."

The fiery pillar is called "a harmless sun," because it was not a sun that "smote them by day" (Ps. cxxi. 6).

> "By day along the astonished lands
> The cloudy pillar glided slow;
> By night Arabia's crimson sands
> Returned the fiery column's glow."
>
> SCOTT.

4. they.] The Egyptians.

the uncorrupt light.] ἄφθαρτον, "immortal," "incorruptible." Tobit regards even the ceremonial law as "an everlasting decree" (Tob. i. 6). "This is the book of the commandments of God, and the law that endureth for ever" (Baruch iv. 1). The metaphor of "light" is constantly applied in a spiritual sense: Is. ii. 5; Ps. cxix. 105; Eph. v. 8, &c.

of the law.] "The law" is used as in Ps. cxix. to express true religion, the revealed relation between God and man.

unto the world.] See note on iv. 2; xiv. 6. Natural light was given to the nation which was to be to the world the source of spiritual light; those who had striven to imprison that nation in darkness were punished with darkness. Thus the passage furnishes a fresh illustration of the writer's favourite thesis respecting the relation of "like to like," between sin and retribution (xi. 16). Here, as in the song of Simeon (Lk. ii. 32), we find the distinct conception that ultimately "the law" was not to be confined to the Jew only, but was to be "a light to lighten the Gentiles" (comp. xiv. 13). It is strange that the scribes of our Lord's day, and the people under their teaching, should so completely have lost sight of the old prophecies of the universal conversion of the heathen (Is. ii. 1–5, xxvii. 13; Micah iv. 1–13). Comp. Tobit xiii. 11, "A clear light shall shine to all the ends of the earth;" id. xiv. 6, "And all the nations which are in the whole earth will turn and fear God truly, and will forsake their idols." Probably these Apocryphal writers, no less than Philo, supposed, however, that the Jews would retain their theocratic supremacy (Philo, 'De Abraham.' 19), and that the whole world would adopt their ceremonial usages.

5. to slay the babes.] Ex. i. 15–22. At this point (to v. 19) begins the parallel between the fate of the children of the Egyptians and of the Israelites, which furnishes yet another illustration of the truth "that wherewithal a man sins, by the same also shall he be punished" (xi. 16).

one child.] Ex. ii. 9. The rescue of one babe of the Israelites involved the destruction of a multitude of the children of the Egyptians (Ex. xii. 29). Josephus mentions the legend that Pharaoh was induced to attempt the destruction of the children of the Israelites by a warning prophecy ('Antt.' ii. 9). Compare the policy and motives of Herod the Great (Matt. ii. 1–18). The Book of Exodus does not mention how many children of the Israelites perished by exposure or drowning, but hardly warrants the writer's saved, to reprove them, [e] thou tookest away the multitude of their children, and [f] destroyedst them altogether in a mighty water.

6 [g] Of that night were our fathers certified afore, that assuredly knowing unto what oaths they had given credence, they might afterwards be of good cheer.

7 So of thy people was accepted both the salvation of the righteous, and destruction of the enemies.

8 For wherewith thou didst punish our adversaries, by the same thou didst glorify us, whom thou hadst called.

9 [h] For the righteous children of good men did sacrifice secretly, and with one consent made ‖ a holy law, that the saints should be like partakers of the same good and evil, the fathers now singing out the songs of praise.

10 But on the other side there

[e] Exod. 12. 29.
[f] Exod. 14. 24, &c.
[g] Exod. 11. 4.
[h] Exod. 12. 21—28.
‖ Or, a covenant of God, or league: See Ps. 50. 5.

implication that Moses was the only child in whose case Pharaoh's decree was carried out.

altogether.] ὁμοθυμαδόν. The proper meaning of the word is "unanimously," but it is used in the sense "one and all:" v. 12; Job xvi. 10 (LXX.); 3 Macc. iv. 4, &c.

in a mighty water.] σφοδρῷ, "violent," "rushing." The water of the Nile, in which they strove to drown the children of the Israelites, had been the instrument of their sin; and the water of the Red Sea, as well as the blood-corrupted water of the Nile (xi. 6), was the instrument of their punishment (x. 19; xix. 4–7).

6. that night.] In which the Egyptian firstborn were slain.

certified afore.] Ex. xi. 4–11; xii. 21–29.

they might afterwards be of good cheer.] These seven words represent the one word ἐπευθυμήσωσι, "they might be gladdened thereby," i.e. by the oaths on which it was thus shewn that they might rely. The "oaths" were those which promised to them the inheritance of Canaan: Ex. xiii. 5–16; xxxii. 13; xxxiii. 1, &c.

7. was accepted.] The A.V. follows the Vulg. "suscepta est;" but προσεδέχθη rather means "was expected." They had been forewarned respecting it.

8. wherewith.] ᾧ. This is the reading of the Vatican MS., and is an obvious correction of ὡς, the reading of the Sinaitic and Alexandrine MSS. By the slaying of the firstborn God freed the Israelites and summoned them to be His own people.

whom thou hadst called.] Lit., "calling us to thyself." This call is illustrated in v. 9, and the punishment of the Egyptians in v. 10.

9. the righteous children of good men.] Rather, "the holy (ὅσιοι) sons of good things." The writer has often called the Israelites ὅσιοι (vv. 1, 5, 10, 17, &c.) and δίκαιοι (x. 20; xi. 14; xii. 9, &c.), but nowhere ἀγαθοί. It is better, therefore (with Grimm, Kleuk, &c.), to take ἀγαθῶν as neuter. Comp. "children of destruction," John xvii. 12. It is true that in this idiom τέκνα is generally used, not παῖδες; but perhaps the phrase παῖδες ἀγαθῶν might be used, just as we have υἱοὶ διαβόλου. Schleusner understands it to mean "the heirs of God's fatherly goodness."

did sacrifice secretly.] An allusion to the Passover, which is called θυσία in Ex. xii. 27. Comp. Heb. xi. 28. The expression "secretly" can only mean "in their own houses," Ex. xii. 46.

a holy law.] Lit., "the law of holiness" (ὁσιότητος), unless with the Vatican and Alexandrian MSS. we read θειότητος, "the law of (i.e. which emanated from) Divinity." The law is that of the Passover, which established a new relation between God and His people.

that the saints.] It is better to take τοὺς ἁγίους with αἴνους. The subject of μεταλῆψεσθαι is involved in ὅσιοι παῖδες ἀγαθῶν.

partakers of the same good and evil.] That henceforth all the sons of Israel should be bound together in all prosperity and adversity. This solidarity in good and evil fortune was indicated by the sweet sauce (caroseth) and the bitter herbs at the Paschal feast.

the fathers now singing out the songs of praise.] The A.V. here follows the reading of ℵ B, προαναμελπόντων. The reading of A, προαναμέλποντες, yields a better sense—"singing beforehand" (i.e. before the Paschal feast), or perhaps merely "singing forth already the holy praises of the fathers." The word ἤδη refers to the notion that even at this first Passover the Israelites observed the custom which afterwards prevailed, of beginning the feast with songs of praise (the Hallel), 2 Chron. xxx. 21; xxxv. 15. Πατέρων αἴνους may mean either "praises of the fathers," i.e. songs in honour of the Patriarchs, or "songs of praise of the fathers," i.e. songs which had come down from the days of the fathers. The statement is en-sounded an ill according cry of the enemies, and a lamentable noise was carried abroad for children that were bewailed.

Digitized by Microsoft®

[f] Exod. 11. 5. & 12. 29.

11 [f] The master and the servant were punished after one manner; and like as the king, so suffered the common person.

12 So they all together had innumerable dead with one kind of death; neither were the living sufficient to bury them: for in one moment the noblest offspring of them was destroyed.

13 For whereas they would not believe any thing by reason of the enchantments; upon the destruction of the firstborn, they acknowledged this people to be the sons of God.

14 For while all things were in quiet silence, and that night was in the midst of her swift course,

15 Thine Almighty word leaped down from heaven out of thy royal throne, as a fierce man of war into the midst of a land of destruction, tirely devoid of historical, and perhaps even of traditional, foundation. It is meant to provide a strong antithesis to the wail of the Egyptians described in the next verse, by contrasting "praises of fathers" with "wails for children."

10. ill-according.] ἀσύμφωνος. The wail of the bereaved (Ex. xi. 6) mingled discordantly with the songs of the triumphant.

11. The master and the servant.] Ex. xii. 29. The Targum of Jonathan explains "the captive in the dungeon" to mean subject kings, kept in prison by Pharaoh, who were punished by God for rejoicing over the miseries of the Israelites.

12. all together.] As in v. 5.

with one kind of death.] Lit., "in one name of death."

sufficient to bury them.] An exaggeration for which there is no authority, but the writer may mean to imply that the occurrence of so many deaths at once rendered impossible the pompous ceremonies involved in the Egyptian notion of "burying" (comp. xix. 3). There is probably an allusion to the fact that the Egyptians had their thoughts turned from the pursuit of the Israelites because they "were burying their firstborn" (Num. xxxiii. 4). Similar Hagadistic additions are found in Philo ('Vit. Mos.' i. 24) and in the Targum of Jonathan.

in one moment.] πρὸς μίαν ῥοπήν, "at one trembling of the scale."

the noblest offspring.] Lit., "the more honourable birth," i.e. the firstborn; "the chief of all their strength" (Ps. cv. 36).

13. they would not believe anything.] This, again, goes beyond, and even contradicts, the statement of Moses (Ex. viii. 19).

enchantments.] Φαρμακία properly means magic wrought by means of drugs, roots, &c., but became a general word for all sorceries (Rev. ix. 21).

to be the sons of God.] Rather, if the reading be correct, "to be a son of God," which is an exaggerated reference to Ex. xii. 31. God had said to Moses, "Israel is my son, even my firstborn" (Ex. iv. 22; comp. Hos. xi. 1; supra, ii. 13), but the Egyptians had never acknowledged this. The Venetian MS. omits υἱὸν altogether, and the Vulg. has spoponderunt populum Dei esse.

14. in the midst of her swift course.] Lit., "was midway in her own swiftness" (Ex. xii. 29).

15. Thine Almighty word.] This is one of the passages (comp. ix. 1; xvi. 12) in which the writer approaches most nearly to the all but personal Logos which plays so prominent a part in the writings of Philo. Yet, like the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, the author of this book never definitely and demonstrably adopts (or anticipates, as the case may be) Philo's views about the Logos. Here the Word delivers the Israelites, as Wisdom is said to do in x. 15; but the delivery is wrought by the infliction of vengeance. Indeed the language of these verses seems to be suggested by 1 Chron. xxi. 16, "David . . . saw the Angel of the Lord stand between the earth and the heaven, having a drawn sword in his hand." It need hardly be said that the Angel of the Plague has no affinity with the Philonian Logos, but rather with "the punisher" (v. 22) and the destroyer (v. 25). It seems probable therefore that the expressions of the writer are mainly founded upon scriptural passages, such as Hos. vi. 5 (LXX.), ἀπέκτεινα αὐτοὺς ἐν ῥήματι στόματός μου (comp. Rev. i. 16). Jer. xxiii. 29, "Is not my word like as a fire? saith the Lord; and like a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces?" Ps. cxlvii. 15, "His word runneth very swiftly;" v. 18, "He sendeth out his word and melteth them," &c.

16 And brought thine unfeigned commandment as a sharp sword, and standing up filled all things with death; and it touched the heaven, but it stood upon the earth.

‖ Or, imaginations.

17 Then suddenly ‖ visions of horrible dreams troubled them sore, and terrors came upon them unlooked for.

18 And one thrown here, and another there, half dead, shewed the cause of his death.

19 For the dreams that troubled them did foreshew this, lest they should perish, and not know why they were afflicted.

20 Yea, the tasting of death touched the righteous also, and there was a destruction of the [k] multitude in the wilderness: but the wrath endured not long.

[k] Numb 16. 46, &c.

21 For then the blameless man made haste, and stood forth to defend them; and bringing the shield of his out of thy royal throne.] Chap. ix. 4. Lit., "out of thy royal thrones." The plural, as in Dan. vii. 9, is only the pluralis excellentiae, though Christians in their early controversies with the Jews sometimes argued from the term as an indication of a Trinity in the Unity.

fierce.] v. 20.

as a fierce man of war.] Lit., "a fierce warrior." The A.V. has changed the metaphor into a simile. "The Lord is a man of war" (Ex. xv. 3).

of a land of destruction.] "Of the doomed land." Comp. ἄνδρα ὀλέθριον, "a doomed man" (1 K. xx. 42).

16. as a sharp sword.] Lit., "bearing a sharp sword, Thine unfeigned commandment." ἀνυπόκριτον (v. 18). This is one of the passages in which the Epistle to the Hebrews resembles this book (Heb. iv. 12).

standing up.] Taking its stand on earth.

all things.] τὰ πάντα. "The length and breadth of Egypt."

it touched the heaven.] So Homer says of Discord:

οὐρανῷ ἐστήριξε κάρη καὶ ἐπὶ χθονὶ βαίνει.
Il. iv. 443.

and Virgil of Fame:

"Ingrediturque solo et caput inter nubila condit."—Æn. iv. 177.

it stood.] Βεβήκει (for ἐβεβ.) is used in the sense of an imperfect.

upon the earth.] Those commentators who take "the all-sovereign word" in this passage for the hypostatised Logos, see in this verse a sort of unconscious prophecy of the Incarnate Christ. But the purpose of Christ's Incarnation was mercy, not vengeance.

17. suddenly.] Lit., "immediately." As soon as God's Almighty word leapt to earth.

visions.] "Phantasies."

18. thrown.] Flung down and half-slain by terror.

shewed.] Lit., "was manifesting," i.e. told to others.

the cause of his death.] Lit., "on what account he was dying."

19. did foreshew this.] Their dreams were meant to reveal to them the reason why they were thus suffered to perish.

20. the tasting of death.] Lit., "the experience of death;" comp. v. 25. This and the following verses (20–25) are meant to obviate the objection that in the wilderness, and on more than one occasion, the Israelites perished by thousands. The writer has already been compelled to allude to this in speaking of the fiery serpents (xvi. 6; comp. xii. 21). The entire insufficiency of his answer to the objection, not to say the positively sophistical manipulation of the history, might have led him to more just views as to the impartial goodness and justice of God. There was historically no generic difference between the retributive disasters which fell on Israel and in Egypt; nor was there historically any difference in their duration. Indeed, the Egyptian plagues only occupied a few months, whereas the miserable and penal wanderings in the wilderness continued for forty years, until the whole generation of these "righteous" had perished.

a destruction.] θραῦσις, "a breaking." The word is borrowed from the LXX. Num. xvi. 49.

endured not long.] Nevertheless, 14,700 perished in this single plague; more probably, by far, than died in all the Egyptian plagues put together. It is impossible not to see that the writer, from his national narrowness, is distorting sacred history to illustrate his own foregone conclusions.

21. the blameless man.] Aaron (Num. xvi. 46–50). It is not meant that Aaron was "blameless" altogether, which would be a flagrant contradiction of the Mosaic narrative, but only that he was guiltless of the sin for which the plague was the retribution, proper ministry, even prayer, and the propitiation of incense, set himself against the wrath, and so brought the calamity to an end, declaring that he was thy servant.

Digitized by Microsoft®

22 So he overcame the destroyer, not with strength of body, nor force of arms, but with a word subdued he him that punished, alleging the oaths and covenants made with the fathers.

23 For when the dead were now fallen down by heaps one upon another, standing between, he stayed the wrath, and ‖ parted the way to the living.

‖ Or, cut off.

24 [l] For in the long garment was the whole world, and in the four rows of the stones was the glory of the fathers graven, and thy Majesty upon the diadem of his head.

[l] Exod. 28. 6, 9, 36.

25 Unto these the destroyer gave and was therefore enabled to fulfil towards the sufferers his high-priestly functions.

stood forth to defend them.] Lit., "fought for them." So prayer is represented as a wrestling (Gen. xxxii. 24; Rom. xv. 30).

the shield.] Rather, "the weapon." Comp. 2 Cor. x. 4.

the propitiation of incense.] An atoning efficacy was always attached by the Jews to the burning of incense (Lev. xvi. 12, 13; Ex. xxx. 1–10). The Rabbis said that the smoke of incense atoned for slanders spoken in secret.

against the wrath.] τῷ θυμῷ. Θυμὸς is inward anger; ὀργὴ its outward expression.

thy servant.] Θεράπων is a far more respectful term than δοῦλος, and is specially applied to Moses (Heb. iii. 5).

22. overcame the destroyer.] The A. V. follows the weakly-supported reading ὀλοθρεύοντα (v. 25). The reading of the MSS. is is ὄχλον (Vulg., Vicit autem turbas). There may be an allusion to some Jewish tradition, or possibly only to the murmuring of the people before the plague broke out (Num. xvi. 41). The context, however, almost compels us either to give to ὄχλον some general sense like "confusion," "perturbation," "hanc tragicam calamitatem" (Strigel); or to suppose that ὄχλον is a clerical error for χόλον, "wrath" (comp. ἀντέστη τῷ θυμῷ, v. 21, and ἀνέκοψε τὴν ὀργήν, v. 23). In 4 Macc. vii. 11, we have a similar passage, "Our father Aaron, armed with the censer, running forward, prevailed over the fiery angel by means of the ἐθνοπλήκτου πυρός."

with a word.] Rather, "with word," by the power of his speech.

alleging.] Lit., "reminding of" (Ex. xxxii. 13).

the oaths.] See v. 6; xii. 21.

23. by heaps.] σωρηδὸν, a late word, used also by Philo ('Vit. Mos.' i. 17; 'De conf. ling.' 6).

standing between.] Num. xvi. 48.

stayed the wrath.] ἀνέκοψε. Lit., "struck back."

parted the way.] Cut off (διέσχισε) the path, so that the destroyer could not get at the living.

24. For in the long garment was the whole world.] The intervention of Aaron was more effectual because of the symbolic importance of his high-priestly robes. The πόδηρες ἔνδυμα was the High Priest's "robe of the ephod" (meil). It can only be so called on the assumption that it was a vestis talaris, which reached to the ankles. The word is used by the LXX. to describe the High Priest's robe in Ex. xxviii. 4; Zech. iii. 4 (comp. Rev. i. 13); and by Josephus ('B. J.' v. 5, § 7). But it seems much more likely that the word πόδηρες applies accurately not to the "robe of the ephod," but to the ephod itself, which was of white, and was seen coming below the blue meil, which only reached to the knees. It was of blue, and on its hem was a ring of golden bells, and of pomegranates woven in blue and purple and scarlet (Ex. xxviii. 31–35). The symbolic significance of the robe, as representing the whole universe, is also explained by Philo ('De Monarch.' ii. 5; 'Vit. Mos.' iii. 14; and in other treatises: 'De profug.' 20; 'De migr. Abraham.' 18, πεποικιλμένη ἔκ τε τῶν νοητῶν καὶ αἰσθητῶν δυνάμεων). Josephus ('Antt.' iii. 7, § 7) repeats the same notions, as also does Clemens Alexandrinus ('Strom.' v. 6). It is very doubtful whether these explanations of the symbolism are correct.

in the four rows of the stones.] Lit., "and the glories of the fathers on the graving of the four-rowed stone." For λίθου we find λίθων in A and C. If that be the true reading, τὸ τετράστυχον must be regarded as a substantive—"the tetrastych," which the LXX. and Josephus call the oracle (τὸ λογεῖον, Ex. xxviii. 15; Jos. 'Antt.' iii. 7, § 5). Josephus regards it as an emblem of the four elements. The allusion is to the names of the Twelve Tribes carved on the precious stones of the High Priest's breastplate (cosḥen), which many precariously identify with the place, and was afraid of them: for it was enough that they only tasted of the wrath.

CHAPTER XIX.

1 Why God shewed no mercy to the Egyptians, 5 and how wonderfully he dealt with his people. 14 The Egyptians were worse than the Sodomites. 18 The wonderful agreement of the creatures to serve God's people.

AS for the ungodly, wrath came upon them without mercy unto the end: for he knew before what they would do;

2 How that having given them leave to depart, and sent them hastily away, [a] they would repent and pursue them.

[a] Exod. 14. 5, &c.

3 For whilst they were yet mourn-

Urim and Thummim (Ex. xxviii. 17–21; comp. Ecclus. xlv. 11).

the glory of the fathers.] The names of the Patriarchs which recalled their glories.

thy Majesty.] The words "Holy to Jehovah" (קדיש ליהוה) were engraved on the High Priest's golden frontlet (Ex. xxviii. 36), as a condensation of "the whole end and complete sum of revealed religion."

25. Unto these.] The writer seems to give to the "golden robes" of the High Priest—and especially to the robe of the ephod, the pectoral, and the mitre—the power of amulets. The cast-off garments of the High Priest were used by the Jews to cure various diseases. Probably, however, the real conception of the writer is deeper. He implies that by the robe as a symbol of the universe, and by His name on the mitre-plate, God, as the Lord of life and death, is reminded of His love to the creatures whom He has made (xvi. 13); and that the names of the fathers on the graven gems remind him of the oath which He sware unto Abraham, and the covenant which He made with Isaac (v. 22). And this is the meaning implied by Ex. xxviii. 38.

the destroyer.] The LXX. use this word, ὁ ὀλοθρεύων, to render the Hebrew מַשְׁחִית (Ex. xii. 23: comp. Heb. xi. 28; 1 Cor. x. 10). He is here the Angel of the Pestilence. But it is clear that he is meant to be an evil angel, or he would not have feared the holy garments.

for it was enough that they only tasted of the wrath.] Lit., "for the mere experience of the wrath was sufficient." Had it not been enough that they should merely have trial (as it were) of what the effects of God's wrath could be, the High Priest's robes would not have been sufficient to terrify the destroyer. In the narrative of Moses (Num. xvi. 46–50) not a word is said either of Aaron's apparel or of his prayer; but the incense in his censer was a type of prayer. It cannot, however, be denied that the writer sees the equal and impartial retributions of sacred history through the medium of a Jewish prejudice which leads him to give an unscriptural colouring to plain facts. For this plague was by no means an isolated punishment, and in point of fact the carcases of the whole generation of rescued Israelites fell in the wilderness because of their sins, the only survivors being Joshua and Caleb. The writer's residence in Egypt, his daily eye-witness of strange and degrading forms of idolatry, and the persecutions inflicted on his people by their Egyptian neighbours, made him delight to invent or to expand these contrasts of mercy and judgment.

CHAPTER XIX.

FIFTH CONTRAST BETWEEN THE FORTUNES OF THE ISRAELITES AND EGYPTIANS. THE LESSON TAUGHT BY THE PASSAGE OF THE RED SEA.

1. As for the ungodly.] The Egyptians.

came upon them.] ἐπέστη. The verb is used of violent and sudden calamities.

unto the end.] Involving their final overthrow. The punishments which chastised the Israelites in the wilderness were οὐ μέχρι τέλους. So note on xvi. 5.

he.] God. The nominative is involved in the word θυμὸς, which means the wrath of God.

what they would do.] Lit., "even their future things."

2. having given them leave.] This is a translation of ἐπιτρέψαντες, the reading of A. (Vulg., quum ipsi permisissent.) This verb, however, is usually followed by the infinitive in Hellenistic Greek. The reading of ℵ B, &c., is ἐπιστρέψαντες, which must then bear the sense of ἐπιστρεψάμενοι, "having thought of" or "provided for their absence."

to depart.] The best-supported reading is ἀπεῖναι, not ἀπιέναι. It means "that they should depart and be absent."

sent them . . . away.] Προπέμπειν means "to conduct honourably on a journey" (Tit. iii. 13; 3 John 6). The allusion may certainly be to the presents which the Egyptians pressed upon the acceptance of the Israelites at their departure (Ex. xi. 2, 3; xii. 35, 36). There is a similar passage in Philo, 'Vit. Mos.' i. 24.

ing and making lamentation at the graves of the dead, they added another foolish device, and pursued them as fugitives, whom they had ‖ intreated to be gone.

‖ Or, cast out by intreaty.

4 For the destiny, whereof they were worthy, drew them unto this end, and made them forget the things that had already happened, that they might fulfil the punishment which was wanting to their torments:

5 [b] And that thy people might pass a wonderful way: but they might find a strange death.

[b] Exod. 14. 28, 29.

6 For [c] the whole creature in his proper kind was fashioned again anew, serving the peculiar commandments that were given unto them, that thy children might be kept without hurt:

[c] See ch. 16. 24, 25.

7 As namely, a cloud shadowing the camp; and where water stood before, dry land appeared; and out they would repent.] The αὐτοὶ is emphatic —they, the very same persons, would entirely change their minds.

3. whilst they were yet mourning.] The original is more emphatic, "For having their mourning still on hand;" i.e. before they had ceased to be occupied with the mourning for their lost firstborn.

they added another foolish device.] Lit., "they dragged down on themselves another device of madness." The sudden change of motive which induced the Egyptians to pursue the Israelites is only a matter of conjecture; but it is very probable that the early movements of the Israelites appeared to betray ignorance of the route (Ex. xiv. 3). The Targum of Jonathan says that Pharaoh relied on the aid of the idol Baal-Zephon (Ex. xiv. 2). More probably they thought that the nation had entered a sort of cul de sac between the mountains and the sea, where they could be overwhelmed with advantage.

whom they had intreated to be gone.] Lit., "whom, entreating, they cast forth" (Ex. xii. 33, 39—where the LXX. use the urgent word ἐκβάλλειν).

4. the destiny whereof they were worthy.] "The deserved necessity—a premerited destiny—was dragging them to this end." This is another way of expressing, in accordance with the phrases of Greek philosophy, the obstinate and penal blindness which Moses describes by saying that "the Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart" (Gen. vii. 3, &c.). The writer makes no attempt to coordinate the conflicting truths of God's absolute foreknowledge and man's unfettered free will. The antinomies involved in such questions are insoluble, but happily they are of no practical importance for the guidance of human action. To the Jews, however, the problems of predestination and free will presented themselves more often in the national than in the individual aspect; and when the ruin of another nation tended to the blessing of Israel, the sense of national, and much more of individual pity, was modified, if not obliterated, by patriotic gratitude. The Jew had so intense a conviction that his people was the firstborn of Jehovah that it was hardly possible for him to keep steadily in view the impartial love of God (see v. 5).

which was wanting to their torments.] Comp. 2 Macc. vi. 14. Their guilt required a certain amount of retribution which had not yet been exhausted by their previous plagues.

5. wonderful.] παράδοξον, "contrary to expectation," i.e. abnormal.

a strange death.] ξένον, as in xvi. 2.

6. For the whole creature.] The verse is a comment on the epithets παράδοξον, ξένον. "Creature," rather "creation" (κτίσις). Comp. v. 17.

anew.] The word ἄνωθεν may also mean "from above" (John iii. 31; Jas. i. 17, &c.), but here the two meanings involve the same thing; for "the whole creation" could only have been "remoulded" by God's direct action. The pleonasm, "again anew," is frequent with πάλιν (comp. πάλιν ἐκ δευτέρου, Matt. xxvi. 42).

the peculiar commandments.] For ἰδίαις we find σαῖς in ℵ A, but this is probably a correction of the difficilior lectio. The meaning is that in the passage of the Red Sea the elements obeyed "the special injunctions laid on them," instead of following their normal course. Some of their powers were intensified, and some reduced to abeyance.

7. As namely, a cloud.] These words are nominatives to the verb ἐθεωρήθη.

shadowing the camp.] LXX. Num. ix. 18, 22. "He spread a cloud for a covering" (Ps. cv. 39).

a green field.] This notion of "a grass-bearing plain" in the middle of the Red Sea was still further exaggerated in the legendary literature of the Jews. Gutmann quotes a Passover prayer which speaks of springs of sweet water, fruit-laden trees, and incense-breathing odours in the path through the of the Red sea a way without impediment; and out of the violent stream a green field:

8 Wherethrough all the people went that were defended with thy hand, seeing thy marvellous strange wonders.

9 For they went at large like horses, and leaped like lambs, praising thee, O Lord, who hadst delivered them.

10 For they were yet mindful of the things that were done while they sojourned in the strange land, how ‖ Or, lice. the ground brought forth ‖ flies instead of cattle, and how the river cast up a multitude of frogs instead of fishes.

11 But [d] afterwards they saw a new generation of fowls, when, being led with their appetite, they asked delicate meats. [d] Exod. 16. 13. Numb. 11. 31.

12 For quails came up unto them from the sea for their ‖ contentment. ‖ Or, comfort.

13 And punishments came upon the sinners not without former signs by the force of thunders: for they suffered justly according to their own wickedness, insomuch as they used a more hard and hateful behaviour toward strangers.

14 For the Sodomites did not re-divided waters. Philo and Josephus abstain from these exaggerations ('Vit. Mos.' iii. 34; Jos. 'Antt.' ii. 16).

9. went at large.] ἐνεμέθησαν, "they roamed the pastures." Some editors conjecture a reading ἐχρεμέτισαν, "they neighed." The metaphor is probably suggested by Is. lxiii. 13, "that led them through the deep as an horse in the wilderness."

leaped like lambs.] Ps. cxiv. 6; Mal. iv. 2.

who hadst delivered them.] Ex. xv. 1–19. The better reading is τὸν ῥύομενον (ℵ B) αὐτούς, "their deliverer" (not ῥυσάμενον, A, C).

10. while they sojourned in the strange land.] Ἐν τῇ παροικίᾳ αὐτῶν, Acts xiii. 17.

flies.] In the LXX. Ex. viii. 18, σκνῖφα is an acc. singular. The word is here used generically, like ὁ βάτραχος, Ex. viii. 6; ἄκρις, Ex. x. 12. Σκνὶψ is any small biting insect, and represents the collective word כִּנִּם.

cast up.] ἐξηρεύξατο. Vulg., eructavit, "vomited forth."

instead of fishes.] Vulg., pro piscibus. But ἀντὶ ἐνύδρων means "instead of things which live in water;" and since frogs live in water, the antithesis of the writer is somewhat halting.

11. a new generation of fowls.] There was nothing "new" about the quails, which, to this day, may be killed by hundreds in their annual migrations.

they asked.] We have already seen that the writer takes a peculiar view of the sending of the quails (xvi. 1–3). He turns the sensual murmurings of the Israelites (Num. xi. 4–23) into a prayer (ᾐτήσαντο), and seems to represent the quails as a special luxury given to the people in sign of God's approval. The scriptural view of the incident is very widely different (Num. xi. 31–35; Ps. lxxviii. 26–28); but the writer, perhaps, relied on the brief allusion in Ps. cv. 40.

12. from the sea.] Num. xi. 31. If the writer interpreted the words "from the sea" as furnishing any support to his theory of the reversal of the ordinary course of nature for the sustenance of Israel, he was in error. The phrase merely points to the direction taken by the quails in their migration. Ὀρτυγομήτρα: see xvi. 1. This reversion to facts of which he has already explained the significance, shews that the writer has exhausted his originality, and has nothing left to say which he has not said already.

13. And punishments came.] The vv. 13–17 are a digression in which the writer compares the punishment of the Sodomites and the Egyptians. He quite unwarrantably represents the latter as much worse than the former.

the sinners.] The host of Pharaoh, which was overwhelmed in the Red Sea.

by the force of thunders.] This was the Jewish tradition: Ps. lxxvii. 15–20; Jos. 'Antt.' ii. 16, § 3. It is implied in Ex. xiv. 24.

a more hard and hateful behaviour toward strangers.] χαλεπωτέραν μισοξενίαν; Vulg., detestabiliorum inhospitalitatem. The comparative means "a harder exclusiveness" than that of the Sodomites or any previous offenders.

14. For the Sodomites.] Lit., "For they:" the writer in his usual euphuistic manner (comp. chap. x.) suppresses the name. Nothing is gained by this literary method, except that it proves to us that he is addressing Jews, who alone would have understood these anonymous allusions.

did not receive.] οὐκ ἐδέχοντο. Rejected from their hospitality; "were not for receiving."

ceive those, whom they knew not when they came: but these brought friends into bondage, that had well deserved of them.

15 And not only so, but peradventure some respect shall be had of those, because they used strangers not friendly:

16 But these very grievously afflicted them, whom they had received with feastings, and were already made partakers of the same laws with them.

17 Therefore even with blindness were these stricken, as [e] those were at the doors of the righteous man: when, being compassed about with horrible great darkness, every one sought the passage of his own doors.

18 For the elements were changed [‖] in themselves by a kind of harmony, whom they knew not.] The A. V. renders ἀγνοοῦντας as though it were ἀγνοουμένους or ἀγνῶτας (Vulg. ignotos). The word seems to mean "strangers, who knew not where they were." The allusion is to the Angels who came to Lot in human form.

[e] Gen. 19. 11.

‖ Gr. by themselves.

friends . . . that had well deserved of them.] Lit., "stranger-benefactors." The Sodomites were less guilty in this respect than the Egyptians, who had received the greatest benefits from Joseph and the Israelites. It should be remembered that the dynasty which had first befriended the Patriarchs had been conquered and expelled.

15. And not only so.] They not only enslaved their strange benefactors, but (as he adds in the next verse), after having received them with feastings, they grievously afflicted them.

but.] The verse is strangely expressed, and has been explained in many different ways. It seems best to refer it in a quasi-parenthetical sense to the Sodomites.

some respect shall be had of those (of the men of Sodom).] If this view be correct, ἐπισκοπή, "visitation," is perhaps used in a good sense, as in ii. 20. The men of Sodom shall receive some consideration from the fact that those whom they rejected came to them as entire strangers, not as known benefactors. It is strange that he should not so much as touch on the horrible aggravation which made the sin of the Sodomites infinitely worse than mere want of hospitality.

because they used strangers not friendly.] Rather, "because they received unkindly the alien visitors." The emphasis is on ἀλλοτρίους. The men of Sodom did not add gross ingratitude to their inhospitality, but they added far deadlier crimes.

16. whom they had received with feastings.] Gen. xlvii. 1–12. The Egyptians "afflicted with terrible labours those who had already participated in the same rights as themselves." Both the men of Sodom and the Egyptians were punished with darkness, but the Egyptians much more severely, because of their worse guilt. The treatment of the historical circumstances is once more fanciful, not to say sophistical.

17. with blindness.] ἀορασίᾳ. The word is borrowed from the LXX. Gen. xix. 11; 2 Kings vi. 18.

at the doors of the righteous man.] Lot (x. 6; Gen. xix. 11).

with horrible darkness.] The strange epithet ἀχανεῖ is rendered by the Vulg. subitaneis (tenebris). The word means "yawning" (the ἀ being intensive). Another meaning which has been assigned to it is "speechless," i.e. reducing to speechlessness; but these "factitive epithets" ("Rugosum piper et pallentis grana cuminis," Pers.) are chiefly confined to poetry.

18. For the elements.] The writer here reverts from his digression to the thesis that the elements changed their usual nature at the Exodus (xix. 6)—a point which he has already illustrated. The meaning of this difficult verse seems to be: "For the elements being interchanged throughout themselves—as in a psaltery notes change the name of the measure—are always permanent in sound." The obscurity seems to arise from the confusion of the comparison with the thing to which it is compared. The last word ἤχῳ, "in sound," applies only to the notes of the psaltery, but is loosely attached to στοιχεῖα. The meaning then seems to be this—just as in a psaltery the notes may be various, and may change the name given to the tune, but still always remain notes, whether they be weak or strong, high or low, sudden or lingering; so the elements of creation may seem to change their normal action, but never change their essential nature. The writer is not thinking of a harmony unaffected by variations and discords, but of things which always retain their essence under all diversities of operation. Water and fire still continued to be water and fire, though they seemed to alter and almost interchange their natures. The phrase δι' ἑαυτῶν (A. V. "in themselves;" marg. "by themselves") cannot here mean "by their own action," but must mean "throughout themselves" (durch einander, Grimm), i.e. throughout their whole like as in a psaltery notes change the name of the tune, and yet are always sounds; which may well be perceived by the sight of the things that have been done.

19 For earthly things were turned into watery, and the things, that before swam in the water, now went upon the ground.

20 f The fire had power in the water, forgetting his own virtue: and the water forgat his own quenching nature.

21 On the other side, the flames wasted not the flesh of the corruptible living things, though they walked therein; g neither melted they the icy kind of heavenly meat, that was of nature apt to melt.

22 For in all things, O Lord, thou didst magnify thy people, and glorify them, neither didst thou lightly regard them: but didst assist them in every time and place.

f ch. 16. 17.

g ch. 16. 22.

extent they became for the time mutually interchangeable.

in a psaltery.] The word "psaltery" became known to the Jews in the Graeco-Syrian epoch (Dan. iii. 7).

yet are always sounds.] This rendering confuses everything, for μένοντα can only agree with στοιχεῖα, and yet is made to agree with φθόγγοι. The ἤχῳ is an awkward and needless addition of the writer. It has no meaning as referred to στοιχεῖα. What he means is that, in a psaltery, whatever the time or pitch, the φθόγγοι are always φθόγγοι; and in creation, however abnormal the special manifestation of the elements, they always remain elements. The ancients, like the moderns, were fond of these musical comparisons.

of the things that have been done.] The incidents of the Exodus.

19. earthly things were turned into watery.] It is hard to say what the writer specially meant by this remark. If he is alluding to the "frogs" (v. 10), they were rather water-creatures, which, as Philo says, became for the nonce land-creatures ('Vit. Mos.' i. 18). In these three verses (19–21) the writer does not even confine himself to Jewish legends, but lets his fancy run riot in the most arbitrary antitheses.

20. The fire had power in the water.] Chap. xvi. 17–25.

forgetting.] The reading of A, C is ἐπιλελησμένον, which may be a gloss. The meaning is that fire exceeded its own natural power in the midst of water.

21. On the other side.] Ἀνάπαλιν. Vulg., e contrario.

though they walked therein.] This transformation of the locusts, frogs, flies, &c., into creatures with the power of the fabled salamander seems to have pleased the writer, for he has already dwelt upon it (xvi. 18). It involves two perversions of history equally extravagant: one that all the plagues were simultaneously continued, the other that miracles were innumerably multiplied.

neither melted they.] The A. V. here follows the Vulg., nec dissolvebant; which seems to point (as Nannius conjectured) to an ancient reading, οὐδὲ ἔτηκον. If τηκτὸν be retained, we must understand ἦν. A substance which was icy, and so easily dissolvable, was undissolvable.

the icy kind of heavenly meat.] The manna. See on xvi. 22. Heavenly; lit., "ambrosial." By reverting to what he has already dwelt upon, the writer is able to illustrate his thesis that the elements changed their normal operations; and he thus ends in a blaze of futile paradoxes.

22. in every time and place.] The book appears to end abruptly, but doubtless this recognition of God's continual help was meant to close the whole subject. There is, therefore, no ground for regarding the book as a fragment. The writer has now fully developed the views which he most prominently desired to teach: the love of God for His people; the punishment of the wicked; the guilt and folly of idolatry; the analogy between sin and retribution; the nature of wisdom; the rewards and blessings of those who follow Wisdom, and the ruin of those who reject her. As he is writing in the person of Solomon, he might indeed have continued his historical illustrations through the period of the Judges and the early monarchy; but that epoch gave no such room for poetical and Hagadistic developments, and perhaps—being a period of almost continual backsliding—furnished problems with which it would have been difficult for the writer to deal in such a manner as to vaunt the supereminent "righteousness" of Israel.

LONDON: PRINTED BY WILLIAM CLOWES AND SONS, LIMITED, STAMFORD STREET AND CHARING CROSS.

Digitized by Microsoft®

Bible. O.T. Apocrypha. English. Authorized. 1888

THE

ACCORDING TO THE AUTHORIZED VERSION (A.D. 1611).

WITH AN EXPLANATORY AND CRITICAL

Commentary

AND

A Revision of the Translation,

BY CLERGY OF THE ANGLICAN CHURCH.

EDITED

BY HENRY WACE, D.D.,

PREBENDARY OF ST. PAUL'S; PRINCIPAL OF KING'S COLLEGE, LONDON; PREACHER OF LINCOLN'S INN; HONORARY CHAPLAIN TO THE QUEEN; CHAPLAIN TO THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY.

IN TWO VOLUMES.—VOL. II.

LONDON:
JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET.
1888.

[All rights are reserved.]

Digitized by Microsoft®

LONDON:
PRINTED BY WILLIAM CLOWES AND SONS, LIMITED, STAMFORD STREET AND CHARING CROSS.

CONTENTS OF VOL. II.

ECCLESIASTICUS.

INTRODUCTION AND COMMENTARY BY THE REV. A. EDERSHEIM, M.A., D.D., GRINFIELD LECTURER ON THE SEPTUAGINT IN THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD.

	PAGE
§ I. Importance of the Book; its Author	1
§ II. Date of the original Work and of its Translation into Greek	4
§ III. Ecclesiasticus, the "Wisdom" Writings of the Old Testament, and Jewish Hellenistic Literature	9
§ IV. The Writer and his Book: its Philosophy, Theology, and Ethics; Comparison with the New Testament and with Philo	12
§ V. Language, Title, and Arrangement of the original Work	18
§ VI. References to the Book of Proverbs and in the Epistle of St. James	20
§ VII. The Greek Version of Ecclesiasticus	23
§ VIII. The Syriac Version and the "Vetus Latina"	26
§ IX. Other Ancient Versions	32
§ X. Authority of Ecclesiasticus in the Synagogue and in the Church	33
§ XI. Literature of the Subject	35

COMMENTARY AND CRITICAL NOTES, pp. 37–239.

BARUCH.

INTRODUCTION AND COMMENTARY BY THE VEN. E. H. GIFFORD, D.D., ARCHDEACON OF LONDON AND CANON OF ST. PAUL'S.

	PAGE
§ I. Contents and Division	241
§ II. The reputed Author	242
§ III. The alleged Place and Time of Writing	244
§ IV. Relation to the Canonical Books of the Old Testament	248
§ V. Original Language	248
§ VI. Probable Date	250
§ VII. Text	251
§ VIII. Place in Canon	252
Appendix: The Titles of God in Baruch	253

COMMENTARY AND CRITICAL NOTES, pp. 254–286.

Digitized by Microsoft®

THE EPISTLE OF JEREMY.

INTRODUCTION AND COMMENTARY BY THE VEN. E. H. GIFFORD, D.D., ARCHDEACON OF LONDON AND CANON OF ST. PAUL'S.

PAGE

§ I. Contents 287
§ II. The supposed Author. . 287
§ III. The original Language . 288
§ IV. Object of the Epistle . 290
§ V. Approximate Date . . 290
§ VI. Text 291
§ VII. Place in Canon . . . 291

COMMENTARY AND CRITICAL NOTES, pp. 292–303.

THE SONG OF THE THREE HOLY CHILDREN.

INTRODUCTION AND COMMENTARY BY THE REV. C. J. BALL, M.A., CHAPLAIN OF LINCOLN'S INN.

PAGE

Introduction 305

COMMENTARY AND CRITICAL NOTES, pp. 310–322.

THE HISTORY OF SUSANNA.

INTRODUCTION AND COMMENTARY BY THE REV. C. J. BALL, M.A., CHAPLAIN OF LINCOLN'S INN.

PAGE

Introduction 323

COMMENTARY AND CRITICAL NOTES, pp. 332–343.

BEL AND THE DRAGON.

INTRODUCTION AND COMMENTARY BY THE REV. C. J. BALL, M.A., CHAPLAIN OF LINCOLN'S INN.

PAGE

Introduction 344

COMMENTARY AND CRITICAL NOTES, pp. 351–360.

Digitized by Microsoft®

THE PRAYER OF MANASSES.

INTRODUCTION AND COMMENTARY BY THE REV C. J. BALL, M.A., CHAPLAIN OF LINCOLN'S INN.

PAGE
INTRODUCTION 361

COMMENTARY AND CRITICAL NOTES, pp. 366–371.

I. MACCABEES.

INTRODUCTION AND COMMENTARY BY THE REV. G. RAWLINSON, M.A., CANON OF CANTERBURY, AND CAMDEN PROFESSOR OF ANCIENT HISTORY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD.

PAGE
§ I. SUBJECT OF THE BOOK AND ITS DIVISIONS . . . 373
§ II. STYLE AND DICTION . . 373
§ III. AUTHENTICITY OF THE NARRATIVE 374
§ IV. UNITY OF THE WORK . . 376
§ V. ORIGINAL LANGUAGE AND AUTHOR 376
§ VI. DATE OF COMPOSITION . 378
§ VII. SOURCES OF THE WORK . 378
§ VIII. RELIGIOUS TONE AND CHARACTER 380

COMMENTARY AND CRITICAL NOTES, pp. 382–537.

II. MACCABEES.

INTRODUCTION AND COMMENTARY BY THE REV. G. RAWLINSON, M.A., CANON OF CANTERBURY, AND CAMDEN PROFESSOR OF ANCIENT HISTORY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD.

PAGE
§ I. PLAN OF THE WORK, AND ITS DIVISIONS 539
§ II. STYLE AND DICTION . . 540
§ III. HISTORICAL VALUE OF THE BOOK 540
§ IV. SOURCES OF THE BOOK . . 542
§ V. TREATMENT OF HIS MAIN SOURCE BY THE WRITER . 543
§ VI. DATE OF COMPOSITION, AND AUTHOR 544
§ VII. RELIGIOUS TONE OF THE BOOK 544

COMMENTARY AND CRITICAL NOTES, pp. 547–648.

Digitized by Microsoft®

ECCLESIASTICUS.

INTRODUCTION.

	PAGE
§ I. Importance of the Book; its Author	1
§ II. Date of the original Work and of its Translation into Greek	4
§ III. Ecclesiasticus, the "Wisdom" Writings of the Old Testament, and Jewish Hellenistic Literature	9
§ IV. The Writer and his Book: its Philosophy, Theology, and Ethics; Comparison with the New Testament and with Philo	12
§ V. Language, Title, and Arrangement of the original Work	18
§ VI. References to the Book of Proverbs and in the Epistle of St. James	20
§ VII. The Greek Version of Ecclesiasticus	23
§ VIII. The Syriac Version and the "Vetus Latina"	26
§ IX. Other Ancient Versions	32
§ X. Authority of Ecclesiasticus in the Synagogue and in the Church	33
§ XI. Literature of the Subject	35

§ I. Importance of the Book; its Author.

AMONG the Jewish sacred writings outside the Old Testament perhaps the most interesting, in many respects, is that commonly known as 'The Wisdom of Jesus, the Son of Sirach,' or Ecclesiasticus.[1] It cannot indeed be ranked, like the books of the Maccabees, among the sources of history, though here also it contains indications too often overlooked. But its chief importance lies in this, that it exhibits Jewish thought and religion at a period otherwise almost unknown; that it connects the traditions of the past with questions of the future; and that, while embodying both, it marks the transition from the one to the other.

The permanent and almost universal interest of the book is to some extent indicated even by the circumstance that it has in a sense furnished the substratum as well as some of the verses for two of the best known hymns of the Church. The Jubilee-Rhythm of St. Bernard of Clairvaux[1] is, even in its wording, the Christian application to Personified Wisdom of part of Ecclus. xxiv. (see the notes). And the Te Deum of Rinckart[2] (about 1648), "Now thank we all our God," is taken from Ecclus. l. 22–24. But, far beyond this, the special claims of Ecclesiasticus may be thus briefly summed up: It is the oldest known Apocryphon;[3] it

[1] On these designations, see more in the quel.

[1] Partially translated in 'Hymns Ancient and Modern,' Nos. 178 (also partly 177): "Jesu, the very thought of Thee;" and in its entirety by the present writer, in a small collection chiefly of Ancient Latin Hymns.

[2] The well-known German hymn, "Nun danket alle Gott," translated in 'Hymns Ancient and Modern,' No. 379.

[3] On the contention that Ecclesiasticus is older than our canonical Daniel, so confidently made by many Jewish and Christian writers (down to Schürer, 'Gesch. d. Jüd. Volkes,' vol. ii. p. 615), this is not the place to enter. Perhaps the note on Ecclus. xxi. 27 may here be helpful. Comp. (besides the foreign writers in defence of the canonicity of Daniel) Pusey, 'Lect. on Daniel,' pp. 303, &c.; and, for some aspects of the question, 'Prophecy and History' (the Warburton Lectures), pp. 291–296. But the date there assigned (p. 294) to the 'Book of Wisdom' is probably too early.

Digitized by Microsoft®

unquestionably originated in Palestine, and was written in Hebrew;[1] and it presents a new phase of Judaism. Historically it may be regarded as a continuation and development of those parts of the Old Testament which are known as the "Wisdom-writings." And yet it represents a new stage. We miss the higher tone and the spiritual elements of the canonical "Wisdom-writings." On the other hand, we are in the presence of new questions originating from contact with a wider world; and we find them answered in a manner which in one direction would lead up to Jewish Alexandrian theology, while the book itself is still purely Palestinian. From one aspect therefore it may be described as Palestinian theosophy before Alexandrian Hellenism. From another aspect it represents an orthodox, but moderate and cold, Judaism—before there were either Pharisees or Sadducees; before these two directions assumed separate form under the combined influence of political circumstances and theological controversies. In short, it contains as yet undistinguished and mostly in germ all the elements developed in the later history of Jewish religious thinking. But beyond all this, the book throws welcome light on the period in which it was written. If we would know what a cultured, liberal, and yet genuine Jew had thought and felt in view of the great questions of the day; if we would gain insight into the state of public opinion, morals, society, and even of manners at that period—we find the materials for it in the book Ecclesiasticus. Lastly, the unique position among the Apocrypha which this book has always occupied, alike in the Synagogue and the Church, constitutes yet another of its distinguishing claims.

But for the critical student Ecclesiasticus must always possess a peculiar interest and importance. This, in the first place, because the Greek translation in which it has come down is both historically and in point of time connected with the LXX. Version of the Old Testament, and hence necessarily reflects light upon it. But, besides, the Greek is not the only direct translation of the work from its Hebrew original. As will be shewn in the sequel, the Syriac Version of Ecclesiasticus, as well as the Greek, was made directly from the Hebrew. Thus we possess two independent versions of the work, controlling each other, by comparison of which the real text of the Hebrew original can often be ascertained. For in many passages in which the two versions differ, we have only to retranslate into Hebrew to perceive how these differences arose by some simple and obvious misreading, or else misunderstanding of a Hebrew word by the one or the other translator. In such cases it is not difficult to judge which of them rightly apprehended the meaning of the original. In other cases the comparison suggests that there must have been intentional alterations: in the Greek probably chiefly due to the Hellenising spirit of the translator, and in the Syriac to later redactors. But the comparison also throws light on some points in regard to the letter of the text which are full of interest. Thus we conclude that a Greek variant represents the better, if indeed not the corrected, reading, when it accords not only with the other version, but with what we judge to have been the underlying Hebrew original. And this in turn reflects light on the various Codices. Lastly, as regards the wider general question of the variations which a Hebrew text may be supposed to have undergone, the student has in Ecclesiasticus the opportunity of comparing, so to speak, three different recensions of a Hebrew text, dating from widely different periods and coming from distant countries: in the Greek, the Syriac, and—including the Talmudic quotations from Sirach—the Aramaic versions of our book.

Concerning the AUTHOR of the work just described, we possess unfortunately only very scanty biographical details. In Ecclus. l. 27, when subscribing his name according to ancient custom, he designates himself as "Jesus the son of Sirach[1] [in the Vat., Seirach; in the Sin.,

[1] According to some (though erroneously), in Chaldee or Aramaic. We do not mean that this is the only apocryphal book which originated in Palestine or was written in Hebrew, but that in regard to Ecclesiasticus this has never been called in question.

[1] So not only the Alex., but the import MS. 248 [Fritzsche]. The Syr. omits what Seirak'[1]], the Jerusalemite" [from Jerusalem]. The addition "Eleazar" [after "Sirach"] in the Alex., Vat., and Sin., and "of Eleazar" in some MSS., is spurious, and probably connected with the legend of his descent from the High-priest, to which reference will be immediately made. The Hebrew name of our writer was יֵשׁוּעַ (Jeshua — abbreviated from Jehoshua), בֶּן סִירָא (or בֵּר), "the son of Sira." It is by the latter designation (without the addition of "Jesus") that he is quoted in Talmudic writings.[2] In Walton's edition of the Syriac Version, the (evidently spurious) superscription to Ecclus. indeed runs: "The book of Jesus the son of Simeon Asiro: that book is called the Wisdom of the Son of Asiro." But the word "Asiro"—which has been generally rendered vinctus, "bound"—is probably only a corruption of Sira (the name of "Simeon" being introduced either as that of the High-priest of chapter l., or from the legend that our writer had been a High-priest). The Arabic Version, which commonly follows the Syr., has only the name: "Jesus the son of Sirach" (we take not any note of other additions in the Arab. superscription). And in Lagarde's 'Libri Vet. Test. Apocr. Syriace' (1861) the Syriac title as corrected from Cod. 12,142 in the Brit. Mus. (6th cent.) reads: 'Wisdom of the Son of Sira.' The Hebrew Sira is represented by the Greek form Sirach or Seirach, which corresponds (as to the χ) with the reading ἀκελδαμάχ for חֲקַל דְּמָא. The name itself (Sira) does not otherwise occur in Rabbinic literature. It is generally translated "a coat of mail" or "a cuirass." But it may have only a designative meaning, and in that case perhaps be best translated by "a thorn" or "hedge of thorns."[1]

Of the outward circumstances of Ben Sira little is known. Omitting entirely groundless speculations,[2] he has been identified by some with Jesus, or (as he Grecianised his name) Jason, the son of the High-priest Simon II., who by bribery displaced his brother Onias III. from the pontifical office. But evidently one of such infamous memory in Jewish annals could not have been the writer of our book. The notion that he was by descent a priest (Linde, Zunz) finds already expression in Cod. Sin[i]. Ecclus. l. 27. Such passages in regard to the priesthood as in Ecclus. vii. 29–31, and the not unfrequent allusions to sacrificial worship throughout the book, do not indeed seem sufficient to warrant such an inference. On the other hand, the disproportionate length at which he dilates in ch. xlv. on the high-priesthood of Aaron (and his descendants), while only a few verses are devoted to Moses, the great hero of Jewish tradition, seems of more significance in this respect than critics, from Eichhorn[3] downwards, have assigned to it.[4] Any definite conclusion on this point is, however, impossible. And the idea of the priestly descent of our author may have originated in the notions anciently entertained about the occupations and qualifications of the priesthood, and in ignorance of what the Greek are clauses b and c of ch. l. 27 (viz.: "Jesus the son of Sirach of Jerusalem . . . who out of his heart poured forth wisdom"); the Vet. Lat. has: Jesus filius Sirach Jerosolymita.

[1] Possibly to this may be due the later Rabbinic miswriting סירח or סירך (Wolfius, u. s., p. 255) and סירוק (Jost, 'Gesch. d. Judenth.' i. p. 311).

[2] Later Jewish notices about Ben Sira are entirely without value. For particulars—most of them uncritical—the reader may refer to Wolfius, 'Bibl. Hebr.,' i. pp. 255–263. The story about Ben Sira being the son of Jeremiah occurs in the so-called 'Alphabet of Ben Sira'—of which more in the sequel. For the Constantinople edition of it (1519), see Buxtorf, 'Bibl. Rabb.' p. 324; other editions in Wolfius, u. s., and Zunz, 'Gottesd. Vortr.' p. 105, note b. The reader who is curious to know the unsavoury story there related about the birth of Ben Sira will find it in Bartolocci, 'Biblioth. Rabb.' i. 684–687. But I cannot help suspecting that the writer of the story had somehow mixed up בן סירא with בן סטדא, and that it is only another edition of the blasphemous references to the mother of Jesus.

[1] Since the name does not otherwise occur, may it not be an allegorical designation rather than a proper name? From that point of view comp. Eccles. xii. 11 a.

[2] For some Jewish suggestions, see Herzfeld, 'Gesch. d. Volkes Isr.' iii. p. 74. For the notion of the older writers (Corn. à Lapide, Calmet, Goldhagen) that Ben Sira was one of the seventy-two translators (LXX.), see Welte, 'Spez. Einl. in d. deuteronkan. B.' p. 225.

[3] Eichhorn, 'Einl. in d. apokr. Schr. d. A. T.' pp. 31, 32.

[4] It is surely a somewhat strong assertion by Schürer (u. s. p. 594) that this opinion is völlig grundlos.

constituted the learned and thinking class in Israel. In any case the assertion of Syncellus ('Chronogr.' ed. Dindorf, i. p. 525), that the Siracide succeeded Simon II. (as thirteenth High-priest) and held the pontificate for six years, is historically untenable. It may have arisen from a misunderstanding of a passage in the 'Chronicon' of Eusebius (Schürer, u. s., p. 594). Not less groundless is the inference (by Grotius) from ch. xxxviii. 1–15, that Ben Sira was a physician (see special introd. to ch. xxxviii.). But whatever his occupation, it could not have been any handicraft nor yet agriculture (comp., for example, xxxviii. 25–30). On the other hand, it is certain that he was one of the Jewish sages of his time, and that his eminence and fame in this respect procured his advancement to the prominent public positions which he occupied (see, for example, xxxviii. 24, 33; xxxix. 1–5). Another and a very remarkable feature in his history is that he not only travelled much, but regarded this as part of the necessary education of a "sage," and that, while his views were enlarged, his religious convictions were only strengthened by what he learned and observed in foreign countries (xxxiv. 11; xxxix. 1–4). We mark in passing that foreign travel would scarcely have been the advice of a pious or even patriotic Jew in, or immediately before, the time of Antiochus Epiphanes (that is, during the pontificate of the sons of Simon II.). In any case it would be in direct opposition to the later exclusive views of the Pharisaic sages. All this seems to imply that our writer belonged to an earlier period in Jewish history. Indeed, we might almost doubt whether the younger Siracide would have reproduced these views if his translation had been made during the pontificate of the sons of Simon II.

It only remains to add that during these journeys Ben Sira appears to have incurred great personal danger (xxxiv. 12). It is probably to his deliverance from these perils that he refers in his hymn of praise (li. 1–12). In all likelihood his travels had extended both to Syria and to Egypt. In the latter country especially he would see and learn much that would leave its impress upon his mind. And the political relations of the two countries in regard to Palestine would account for the calumnies, intrigues, and perils to which a prominent and influential Jerusalemite might be exposed in those days.[1]

§ II. Date of the original Work and of its Translation into Greek.

Although the general spirit of Ecclesiasticus and some of the special views expressed in it form important elements in regard to the question of its date, it seems better to consider it in the first place on independent historical grounds. There are few subjects on which directly contrary opinions have been asserted with more confidence; few also on which (as it seems to us) absolute assurance on either side is less warranted.

The book itself furnishes two dates which might seem to fix the time both of its original composition and of its translation into Greek by the grandson of the author. The first of these is in Ecclus. l. 1, where the writer describes—apparently from personal observation—"Simon the high priest, the son of Onias;" leaving, however, the impression (lines b and c) that at the time of his writing Simon was no longer alive. The second date is in the Prologue to the translation by the younger Siracide, in which he states the time of his arrival in Egypt as "in the eight and thirtieth year under king Euergetes." But, as it happens, there were two High-priests, each of them "Simon, the son of Onias"—viz. Simon I., surnamed the Just, the son of Onias I., who according to the common reckoning flourished about 310–291 B.C.; and Simon II., son of Onias II., about 219–199 B.C.[2] And as there were

[1] See below, § II.

[2] These are the generally accepted dates. But considerable uncertainty prevails (see Ewald, 'Geseh. d. V. Isr.' iv. p. 351). Ewald's dates are: Onias I. died 310 B.C.; Simon I. died 291; Eleazar died 276; Manasseh died 250; Onias II. died 219; Simon II. died 199; Onias III. deposed in favour of his brother Jason, and he again in that of Menelaos. Herzfeld (u. s. pp. 185–189) gives the following dates:—Onias I. died 300; Simon I. died 287; Eleazar died 267; Manasseh died 240; Onias II. died two High-priests of the name "Simon, son of Onias," so there were two Ptolemies who bore the epithet Euergetes, viz. Ptolemy III. or Euergetes I. (247–222 B.C.) and Ptolemy VII., Physkon, entitled Euergetes II.—but surnamed by his subjects Kakergetes—who, after having been co-regent with his brother for twenty-five years (from 170 to 145 B.C.), occupied the throne alone from 145 to 116 B.C. The question therefore is, which of these two Simons was the High-priest of Ecclus. l., and which of the two Euergetes is referred to in the Prologue of the Greek translator?[1]

At the outset we have to dismiss a consideration which, either avowedly[2] or perhaps unconsciously, has influenced critics. In the Prologue of the younger Siracide the usual arrangement of the Old Testament into the Law, the Prophets, and the Hagiographa is supposed to be indicated in the expression "the Law, the Prophets, and the other books of the fathers." It is argued that this implies the closing of the O. T. Canon and the completion of the LXX. Version, which again, according to certain critics, could not have been so early as in the reign of Euergetes I. Even if these premisses were correct, it would be vicious reasoning to determine an unknown quantity (who was the Euergetes of the Prologue?) by another equally unknown (the close of the Canon or the completion of the LXX.). But in our view the passage in the Prologue, above referred to, so far from presupposing an arrangement of the O. T. into Law, Prophets, and Hagiographa, really gave rise to this tripartition. Not only is there not any earlier indication of it, but it is not supported by the arrangement in the LXX. Besides, the Prologue gives not any indication what these "other books of the fathers" were, nor yet whether or not they included all our present Hagiographa. And Ecclesiasticus itself, while it makes reference to the Law and the Prophets (the historical books, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor Prophets), for reasons presumably good and valid (whatever they were) contains no mention of Mordecai or Daniel, nor even of Ezra. This, although there are unquestionable references not only to Nehemiah, but also in the text (see the notes, passim) to the Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and probably Job. We dismiss therefore this preliminary à priori argument, and ask ourselves:

1. Was the Euergetes of the Prologue the first or second of that name? The arguments here turn on the meaning of the words used by the younger Siracide. Those who hold that Euergetes I. is referred to in the Prologue regard the Greek words ἐν τῷ ὀγδόῳ καὶ τριακοστῷ ἔτει ἐπὶ τοῦ Εὐεργέτου as meaning "in the eight and thirtieth year" of the writer, not of the reign of Euergetes. This necessarily, since Euergetes I. did not reign thirty-eight years. On the other hand, those who contend for Euergetes II. maintain that the expression can only mean the thirty-eighth year of the reign of Euergetes; and although Euergetes II. was not sole occupant of the throne for such a period of time, yet his reign must (according to Porphyrius in Euseb. Chron.) be reckoned from the time of his co-regency with his brother. As regards the true meaning of the Greek words quoted, writers are hopelessly at issue. So great an authority as Professor Westcott maintains that the meaning of the words "can only be, that the translator 'in his thirty-eighth year' came to Egypt during the reign of Euergetes," and he stigmatises the other translation as "absolutely at variance with the grammatical structure of the sentence" (Smith's 'Dict. of the Bible,' i. p. 479, note). On the other hand, those who contend for Euergetes II. equally strenuously maintain the 226—which makes the accession of Simon II. seven years earlier, or in 226. This is not the place to discuss these differences. Indeed, the exact chronology of the priestly succession offers no little difficulty. Happily it does not affect the present argument.

[1] We only note in passing the statement of Mr. Stanton ('The Jewish and the Christian Messiah,' p. 111), that Ecclesiasticus "may have been written any time between the High-priesthood of Simon son of Onias and the Maccabean rising." Is this really so? and to which of the two High-priests of the name of Simon does Mr. Stanton refer in this brief dismissal of a question of such importance?

[2] So, on the one side, Winer ('Bibl. Real-Wörterb.' i. p. 555) and others, even Fritzsche, p. xvi.; and, on the other side—we suspect—writers such as Böhl ('Forsch. n. e. Volksb.' pp. 35, &c.).

Digitized by Microsoft®

other rendering.[1] But it must be admitted (Winer, u. s.) that the words mean in the first place something different from "in the thirty-eighth year of Euergetes." Similarly, Böhl (u. s., p. 36) argues, adducing the testimony of Bernhardy ('Grundriss d. griech. Lit.' i. 502, 519) in favour of the structure of the sentences and generally of the style of the Prologue, that so able a writer would not have expressed such a meaning in so "ungreek" a manner. Winer holds that, according to common usage, he would have had to write: ἐν . . . ἔτει τῷ ἐπὶ τ. E. The defenders of the other translation point, indeed, to certain parallel or similar expressions — the latter in the Apocr. (1 Macc. xiii. 22; xiv. 27); the former in the LXX. (Hagg. i. 1, ii. 1; Zech. i. 7, vii. 1). But alike Winer and Böhl deny the conclusiveness even of the latter instances as at least admitting of exceptions. On the whole, therefore, the impartial student will probably judge that the argument i favour of either the one or the other translation cannot be considered conclusive.[2] In any case the main question as to the date of the original work is left open.

2. Of much greater importance than the other is the inquiry whether the Simon son of Onias of Ecclus. l. 1, and in the Syriac version also of l. 23, was Simon I. or Simon II. The Syriac presents in this chapter several important variants. Thus in v. 25—which, however, we regard as a later interpolation—instead of "mountain of Samaria" the Syr. rightly has גבל, which, just as גבלה in the Samarit. version of the Pent., is the rendering for Seir [Edom]. This the Vet. Lat. follows [against all the Greek MSS] by translating: in monte Seir. [For some other variants see the introd. to the ch. and the notes.] Again, while in v. 28 the Greek reminds us of the sentiment in Rev. i. 3, the Syr. translates: "Happy the man who meditates on these things, learns, knoweth, and doeth them." Lastly, v. 29 [30] is rendered in the Syr.: "Exaltedness is of the religion of God: it is exalted above all things. Behold it, my son, and do not forsake it." In all these instances we believe the Syriac to represent the Hebrew original more accurately than does the Greek text. This disposes us to receive favourably the Syriac version of v. 23: "And let there be peace among them, and let it be established with Simon the Just[1] and his seed, as the days of heaven." If this rendering be correct, it follows that the Hebrew original had expressly designated this High-priest Simon as the same who was surnamed "the Just."

But apart from this, there cannot, we believe, be any reasonable doubt that the Simon whom both tradition[2] and Josephus designate "the Just"[3] was Simon I. Josephus indeed twice expressly tells us that Simon I. "was called ὁ δίκαιος," and explains that this designation was given him "because both of his piety towards God and his kind disposition towards those of his own nation." And when Jewish tradition gives to a High-priest Simon exactly the same title—הַצַּדִּיק—and is never weary of speaking of his piety, glory, and miraculous Divine attestation[4]—it would seem a perversion of history not to identify the Simon I., the Just, of Josephus with the Simon, the Tsaddiq, of the Mishnah.[5] This con-

[1] Schürer (u. s. p. 595) puts it thus absolutely: "Mit dem 38. Jahre meint er natürlich nicht sein eigenes Lebensjahr."

[2] In view of this we have not thought it necessary to discuss at length the argument on which Böhl so strongly insists—but which seems very doubtful—that the reign of Euergetes II., having been marked by persecution and exile of the learned, would not have been a suitable period for the publication of the translation of the younger Siracide. But there is absolute evidence of literary activity among the Hellenists in that reign.

[1] Grätz ('Gesch. d. Juden,' ii. p. 235, note) ingeniously, and as I believe rightly, argues that the right reading in the Syr. must be שמעון חסיה, Simon the Just, and not חסדה.

[2] In Abh. i. 2; Par. iii. 5.

[3] 'Antiq.' xii. 2, 5; xii. 4, 1.

[4] The reader who is curious to know the Jewish traditions about Simon the Righteous is referred, among others, to Otto, 'Histor. doctor. Mishnic.;' Derenbourg, 'Hist. de la Palest.' pp. 47, &c.; and Grätz, u. s., ii. pp. 255, &c.

[5] It was surely an ill-considered statement on the part of Dean Stanley ('Hist. of the Jewish Church,' iii. p. 247) that M. Derenbourg has conclusively established "that Simon the Just was Simon II." Derenbourg asserts it, but does not make any attempt to "establish" what it would be beyond the power of any man to prove. A late writer on the subject (Hamburger, 'Real-Encykl.' Abth. ii. p. 1116) cuts the knot clusion is confirmed by the circumstance that the Mishnah describes this Simon as "of the remainders of the great synagogue," which had long passed away when Simon II. succeeded to the pontificate. In general, the terms in which tradition speaks of Simon the Just could not have been applied to Simon II., nor yet to the circumstances and relations of his time. They seem intended to convey that with Simon the Just one great period of Jewish history—that of spiritual glory, peace, and Divine attestation—had come to an end. All this could be said in regard to the pontificate of Simon I.; it would have no meaning in regard to that of Simon II.[1]

In these circumstances it would seem inexplicable that the writer of Ecclus. l. should have omitted from his catalogue of worthies Simon I.—the last of the great synagogue, the great priest-hero of Jewish tradition, "the Just" one of Josephus—and introduced in his stead such a figure as Simon II. Of the latter Jewish tradition does not say anything,[2] nor yet have we any other record of him—at least of a favourable character. For as the account in 3 Macc. ii. is universally admitted to be fabulous, the only references to Simon II. which we possess are those in Jos. 'Antt.' xii. 4, 10 and 11. These, as we shall immediately see, reflect anything but favourably on his political administration. Such a man could not have been described as in Ecclus. l. But this is not all. In Ecclus. l. 2–4 we have mention of certain great undertakings by Simon, notably of his restoration of the fortifications of Jerusalem. But for this there was absolutely no occasion during the pontificate of Simon II., the circumstances of the time rather implying the contrary. On the other hand, there was urgent need for it under the pontificate of Simon I., after the taking and dismantling by Ptolemy I. of the fortified cities of Palestine, inclusive no doubt of Jerusalem.[1]

It is indeed argued in favour of Simon II. that Ecclesiasticus contains not unfrequent allusions to sufferings and persecutions of Israel, and that it displays in this respect, rather than religiously, a feeling of great bitterness towards the Gentiles and their rulers (comp. chaps. xxxv., xxxvi.; see the special introductions to these chapters). And, since the time of Simon I. was one of peace to Israel—although in view of the wars of Ptolemy I. this is doubtful—while (which is also open to contention) the times were much more troubled during the administration of Simon II., it has been urged that these references point to the pontificate of the latter. But there is a twofold mistake here. The sufferings alluded to are apparently rather of the past and threatening the future, than in the present, which seems quiet and prosperous (comp. xlv. 26; l. 22–24). Further, it is apparently forgotten that although Ecclus. l. implies that the writer had himself seen Simon, it also conveys that he was no longer alive. Hence the references to the condition of Israel apply not to the time of Simon—be it the first, or the second—but to that of their successors. This opens a line of argument which has hitherto been overlooked. Before adverting to it, we must make a final reference to two points in Ecclus. l. which seem strongly in favour of its application to Simon I. The first is the manner in which the Samaritans are spoken of (l. 25, 26). This can easily be accounted for by events in the time of Simon I., but not in that of Simon II. Secondly, in Ecclus. l. 5, the High-priest is described in his "outgoing from the house of the Veil" [marg. A. V.—ἐν ἐξόδῳ οἴκου καταπετάσματος[2]],—unquestionably, the most Holy Place. But as the High-priest entered it only on the day of atonement, this part of the description must be of him on that most solemn festival. But it deserves special notice that the Jewish legends about by the strange assertion that both Simon I. and Simon II. bore the designation "the Just." (See also the Jewish traditions about Simon the Just in Hamburger, u. s.)

[1] The Syr. Version has in l. 1: "Chief among his brethren and the crown of his people Simeon, the son of Nathanya."

[2] I am aware that those who plead for Simon II. invest him with a history, taken partly from Ecclus. l.—thereby begging the whole question—and partly from what tradition ascribes to Simon the Just, who, as we have shewn, was Simon I.

[1] See Grätz, u. s., p. 230.

[2] The expression does not occur anywhere else, either in the LXX. or the Apocrypha.

Digitized by Google

Simon I., the Just, are chiefly connected with the day of atonement. Thus we read that during the (forty) years of his pontificate the lot which designated the goat for Jehovah (Lev. xvi. 8, 9) always fell to his right hand; that during the same period the scarlet strip by which the goat for Azazel was designated always turned to white, indicating that Israel's sins were forgiven (Is. i. 18) [Jer. Yoma, 43*c*; Yom. 39*a*]; and lastly, that during his whole pontificate, as he entered and left the most Holy Place he was accompanied by a venerable figure arrayed in white, but that in the last year that figure had entered indeed with him but not accompanied him as he left the sanctuary (Jer. Yoma, 42*c*; Yom. 39*b*). Nor was that apparition ever seen before or afterwards.

Whatever value may be attached to this coincidence of Jewish legend concerning Simon I. with the description in Ecclus. of his appearance on the day of atonement, a historical line of argument, hitherto strangely overlooked, leads up to the same conclusion. As already stated, the exact date of the composition of Ecclesiasticus was not during the pontificate of Simon—whether I. or II.—but in that of one of his successors. But in Ecclus. xlv. 25 we find this curious notice, that the pontifical succession, like the royal, was to be from father to son. The notice is so abruptly introduced, and so uncalled for, that we regard it as an allusion to some historical occurrence in the near past. Now we know that while Simon II. was succeeded by his son Onias III., Simon I. was not followed by his son Onias II., but by his two brothers, Eleazar and Manasseh, and only after them by the already aged Onias II. We believe that the allusion in Ecclus. xlv. 22 is to this: that the older Siracide wrote at the accession of Onias II., and that he addressed to him the words of congratulation and hope that follow in Ecclus. xlv. 26. If this be so, and the older Siracide was a friend of Onias II. and supporter of his policy, it would also account for the great dangers to which, according to ch. li., he had been exposed from the calumnies of enemies. For at that time Palestine was divided between allegiance to the king of Egypt—the de facto suzerain—and intrigues with the ruler of Syria. We know that Onias II. refused to pay the yearly tribute to the king of Egypt. Josephus ('Ant.' xii. 4. 1) imputes this to avarice, but there can be little doubt that the High-priest was actuated by political motives. If the Siracide was an influential member of the same party, we can easily understand what dangers may have threatened him on his arrival in Egypt.

To these some subsidiary arguments may be added. As it seems to us, such language as in Ecclus. xlv. 26 might indeed be addressed to Onias II., the son of Simon I., who was the undisputed civil head of his people till the popular appointment of Joseph, the son of Tobias, in 230 B.C. ('Ant.' xii. 4. 2, 3).[1] But it would not have been suitable in regard to Onias III., the son of Simon II. Nor could sentiments such as those in that verse have been expressed in the time of Onias III., while they might have deep significance in regard to the political position and aims of Onias II. Lastly, the whole tone of the book is quite different from what we should have expected, if it had been written in the days of Onias III. For then the Grecian counter-Reformation had already made terrible progress in the land, assumed a hostile attitude, and led to the formation of the party of the Chasidim. In those circumstances the writer of Ecclesiasticus, who displays a spirit of liberal tolerance which seems in sympathy with much in foreign thought, while yet remaining faithful to Judaism, must have taken a more decided part with the one side or the other. At any rate he could not have absolutely ignored their existence. Thus the spirit and tone of the book also point to the period preceding the great struggle between Grecianism and Judaism as that of the composition of Ecclesiasticus—that is, to the time of Onias II., not that of Onias III.

For these reasons the probability in favour of the identity of the Simon of Ecclus. l. with Simon I., the Just, seems to us so strong as almost to amount to a demonstration. In that case—if, what is not by any means certain, the Greek translator was the grandson of the older Siracide—it would follow that the Euergetes of the Prologue was the first, not the second, of that name. From the extracts preserved by Eusebius ('Praep. Evang.' ix.) from the Jewish historian Demetrius,[1] who flourished at that time, we infer that this period was one of considerable Jewish literary activity. Here we have to note what is at least a remarkable coincidence. If in the Prologue to his Greek translation the younger Siracide seems to refer to the interest in such studies which he found awakened in Hellenist, if not in wider circles, we have in the work of Demetrius evidence of its existence in the reign of Euergetes I.[2] On the other hand, if in the same Prologue the Siracide speaks of the difficulties of reproducing in a translation what was originally written in Hebrew, Josephus in referring to this very work of Demetrius excuses the occurrence of "lesser mistakes" in it on the ground of want of knowledge of Hebrew ('c. Ap.' i. 23). This twofold coincidence seems to throw some fresh light on the Prologue to our Greek Ecclesiasticus, and so far to confirm the view which, on the whole, we regard as the most likely—that the original work was translated into Greek in the reign of Euergetes I.

[1] Although we found no argument upon it, it is significant that in Ecclus. xlv. 24 the High-priest is still described as προστάτης [in Sin.[2] we have λαοῦ instead of the common reading λαῷ]. But in 'Ant.' xiv. 4. 3 this is the very designation given to Joseph, the son of Tobias. Comp. the significant use of the term in 3 Esdras ii. 11.

At the same time it is quite open to argue that, while the elder Siracide referred in ch. l. to Simon I., his younger descendant may have translated the work into Greek in the reign of Euergetes II. He speaks of the older Siracide as his πάππος; and although the term primarily means "grandfather," it is also used to denote a more remote ancestor (Arist. 'Pol.' iii. 2. 1; Dion. H. iv. 47—apud Liddell and Scott). At any rate, some writers of authority have adopted this view.[1]

§ III. Ecclesiasticus, the "Wisdom" Writings of the Old Testament, and Jewish Hellenistic Literature.

As previously stated, Ecclesiasticus affords glimpses of the intellectual history of a period over which otherwise profound darkness would rest. We might designate this as the formative stage in the history of a new period in Jewish religious thinking. The results of the past and the beginnings of a future development were still in juxtaposition—not amalgamated, but as yet not separated, nor were their further sequences in view. Alike the close of the old and the beginnings of the new are side by side in Ecclesiasticus. The former reaches back to the early times of Israel's glory; the latter points forward to that direction which was to find its home and centre, not in Palestine, but in Alexandria.

In the reign of king David, the Hebrew state had attained its definite and final stage. But with it also its exclusive national character may be said to have ceased. The outcome of the past period had been internal consolidation and external isolation. But under the rule of king Solomon, Israel for the first time came into close friendly contact with other nations, partly owing to the personal disposition of that monarch, partly from the new circumstances of the country, its growing wealth, and its commerce. But friendly intercourse between nations cannot be confined to the interchange of civilities or of wares: it means the interchange of ideas. There is not any barrier that can effectually arrest the progress of thinking, nor any quarantine that can prevent the spread of ideas. To encounter thought is to recognise it, and to recognise is at least partly to make it

[1] Eusebius has preserved five fragments of his work, extracted from a work 'On the Jews' by Alexander Polyhistor (a heathen). The longest of these excerpts is in 'Praep. Evang.' ix. 21, ed. Gaisford, ii. pp. 378, &c. Generally comp. Freudenthal, 'Hellenist. Studien.'

[2] The date of the work of Demetrius has, in our view, been conclusively established by Freudenthal (u. s., pp. 57–63), and it is surprising that his arguments should have been ignored by Schürer ('Gesch. d. Jüd. V.' ii. p. 731).

[1] If we were asked to suggest a date for the composition of Ecclesiasticus, we might conjecture that the original work was written about 235 B.C., or earlier, but before the promotion of Joseph the son of Tobias in 230. If at that time the older Siracide was nearly 70 years old, his grandson, who translated it into Greek, might certainly have been in his thirty-eighth year under Euergetes I.

Digitized by Microsoft®

our own. King Solomon completed indeed the work of David and the religious institutions of Israel by the building of the Temple. Yet by the side of this he had not only to tolerate, but to give facilities for foreign rites. This, not merely owing to external circumstances, but—so to speak—from an inward necessity. With Solomon began a new phase in Jewish thinking. It was still deeply religious—but it was thinking, in this sense that men were no longer content, nor even able, to settle the great problems of thought by merely external authority, but felt that they must grapple with them individually—nay, even with that fundamental question of all: that of external authority. This was the commencement of the so-called (Chokhmah) Wisdom-literature of Israel. The wisest of kings began it; he was himself the first Jewish Chakham, or sage. The Hebrew sage differs from the Gentile philosopher [1] in that he does not search out for himself the highest problems of thinking, nor yet seek to attain their solution by means of metaphysical speculation. These problems are already there, set before him; and they are solved in Divine Revelation. His object, therefore, is to verify rather than to discover—to conciliate the teachings of Divine Revelation, which he implicitly accepts, with the difficulties suggested either by his experience of life (empirical difficulties) or by his own thinking (speculative difficulties). And the conciliation of these difficulties with Revelation constitutes Wisdom. Thus (subjective) Wisdom in man busies itself with (objective) Wisdom in, or rather with, God, which is the mode of God's manifestation of Himself—perhaps, more correctly, the mode in which His self-manifestation presents itself to our thinking. That manifestation is twofold. As regards man, it is exhibited in God's dealings with him; and as regards the higher (abstract) problems, antecedent to and irrespective of man, it is connected with the ways of God. Thus the problems which engage Wisdom in man—those of human life and the higher abstract questions—correspond to the twofold aspect of Wisdom in God. Hence the topics which occupy Hebrew Wisdom-literature are both subjective and objective in their character. From the first of these aspects they are practical, and connected with the ordinary questions of human life; from the second of them, they are speculative, and consist in seeking to apprehend the ways of God. Thus the seeming confusion in the Wisdom-writings, due to the close juxtaposition and apparent mixture of precepts for the conduct of life with higher speculative questions, is only outward, and resolves itself into a higher unity. The two are only the different aspects, or the different kinds, of the great problem which Wisdom (in God) sets before us in His manifestations, and which Wisdom (in man) has to solve by faith and obedience. Closely connected with all this is the form and manner in which Hebrew Wisdom expresses itself. It speaks not in the language of metaphysical speculation, but in Proverbs, in Parables, and even by paradoxes. The latter, because absolute faith cares not to smooth away seeming contrarieties; nay, would rather encounter them directly. The former, because the Eastern mind delights in such form of expression. But this is not all. For to the devout Hebrew, whose God rules on earth as in heaven, things on earth are ever the counterpart of things in heaven. Heaven and earth are part of one kingdom. He sees God reflected in Nature and in all things around, and he hears His voice in the streets and in the busy commerce of men. But there may be a still deeper reason for it. To the believing Hebrew the final solution of all difficulties (whether empirical or speculative) is in Revelation, and "Wisdom" consists, not in the discovery of truth, but only in its vindication: on the one hand, in the conciliation of seeming difficulties; and, on the other, in the placing of man's life and thinking on a line with the Will and the Ways of God. In this view all is Parable and all Proverbs: the solution of every speculative difficulty is in a Parable (1 Cor. xiii. 12 a); while that of every practical difficulty becomes and ought to be a Proverb in the people's mouth.

Solomon was, so far as we know, the originator of this parabolic, proverbial philosophy of religion among the Hebrews —or, at any rate, it gathered around the name of the Wise King. Whatever portions of the Book of Proverbs may be of his personal authorship, even the fact that other or later sayings gathered around this nucleus and name is of deep significance. In this truest sense the whole book is Solomonic. The same may be said of Ecclesiastes—a work thoroughly one in plan and contents. Assuming at the outset the standpoint of seeming indifferentism and epicurean self-enjoyment, the writer proceeds to discuss the great theological problem how to conciliate what seems either chance or fate with the personal Rule of God, till he gradually rises to the consciousness of a personal moral responsibility as the practical, if not speculative, solution of all. Although the book is undoubtedly much later than Solomon, it is (for the reasons above stated) not only truly Solomonic, but perhaps it may even have been intended to present in a concrete form the problems presented by the life as well as in the thinking of the wise king. Nay, its opening text (v. 2), "Vanity of vanities, all is vanity," may even be directly Solomonic, or else set forth a summary of what after-ages regarded as the Solomonic problem.

[1] Compare also generally J. Fr. Bruch, 'Die Weisheits-Lehre der Hebräer.'

It will readily be perceived how closely the book Ecclesiasticus is connected with this ancient Chokhmah-literature, not only in form but in substance. In truth, it is a continuation of it: for, that road once entered, standstill or abandonment would be no longer possible. By the side of the purely legal and even of the prophetic teaching of Scripture, this would now become a distinctive phase in Hebrew religious thinking. Nor should we forget that alike the predictions of the final ingathering of all nations and the commencement of Chokhmah-literature were historically connected with a closer contact with the empires of the world. Even the prophetic comments on sacrificial worship—their protest against the merely ex opere operato view of it—might here acquire a new significance and meaning. As an illustration of the manner in which the later Chakhamim understood or developed such sayings, we would point to Ecclus. xxxiv. and xxxv., which gain in significance from their connexion with the reference in ch. xxxiv. 9–11 to what the writer had seen and learned in foreign countries. Similarly a special Chokhmah meaning might be attached not only to the numerous prophecies that foretold the conversion of the Gentiles, but even to the prophetic addresses to them and to the implied recognition that, despite the present state of rebellion, the earth and all nations were the Lord's. This may explain how, in the description of a sage (Ecclus. xxxix. 1–3), an understanding of prophecy is conjoined with knowledge of the wisdom of the ancients, of parables, and of proverbs; while, on the other hand, in Ecclus. xxiv. Zion and Israel are indeed stated to be the special dwelling-place of "Wisdom," where she has her fixed abode, but her presence is also recognised among all nations (v. 6).

It scarcely needs to be stated that the full and final development of this must be sought, not in Palestine, but among the Greek-thinking and Greek-speaking "dispersion" of the West, of which Alexdria was the intellectual capital. But in Ecclesiasticus we have, in a sense, a prehellenistic Grecianism. It is still strictly Palestinian, not Alexandrian, and it does not treat the simple language of Scripture as if it consisted of allegories, representing so many formulæ for abstract ideas. But for all this it is, if not Grecianised Judaism, yet a Judaism influenced by Grecian thought. Thus it appears that the first origin of what is called Jewish Hellenism has to be traced to Palestine, not to Alexandria, and was only fully developed there under favouring circumstances. And these circumstances were analogous to those which first called forth Hebrew Chokhmah-literature.

Considering the condition of the small, intellectually almost contemptible, remnant which returned from the Babylonian exile, and the state of those who remained behind, it seems a strange historical assumption to regard this age as one of the most fruitful thinking or of great literary activity. The awakening and new progress of thought are organically connected with the general life of a people: they are always in line with stirring events in the history of the world or of a nation. Such wakening came with the conquests of Alexander the Great and the founding of the Macedonian world-empire. It was not only that Israel was now brought into direct contact with Grecianism, nor yet that it felt the electric shock which passed through the ancient world, nor even that from its subjection to the Macedonian conqueror and his successors it constantly experienced Grecian influences. But there was a chain of purely Greek cities within the land of Palestine itself, as well as around its borders. The constant and close intercourse resulting from it, must have led to the gradual introduction of Grecian ideas. These would appear in the first instance, so to speak, in a friendly form—and only afterwards become a hostile power with which war for life or death must be waged. In each case outward events must have corresponded with this state of feeling. The period of outward peace and of the friendly influence of Grecianism terminated soon after Simon I.—who is accordingly designated as the last link in the "great synagogue." The period of open and bitter hostility to Judaism, alike politically and religiously, began immediately after, if not under, Simon II. This brings us back to our former conclusions about the date of Ecclesiasticus. As the last outrunner of Palestinian Chokhmah-literature, it belongs to the former, not to the latter, period. It marks a time of transition when by the side of the old, as then understood, we discover all the germs of a future development. In respect of the latter we might almost characterise it as alike Pharisaic before the Pharisees, Sadducean before the Sadducees, and Hellenistic before Hellenism. And yet it is not eclectic—only preparatory. It could not have belonged to a period when Grecianism had become a hostile power in Church and State, and evoked a reaction that led to the formation of the nationalist party and finally issued in the Maccabean rising. The nationalist party was known by the title Chasidim, "the pious" (1 Macc. ii. 42, vii. 13; 2 Macc. xiv. 6). That name was undoubtedly derived from the description of the Chasidim, "the pious," in the Psalms (Ps. xxx. 4; xxxi. 23; xxxvii. 28). We conjecture that this movement included also a protest against and a separation from the whole Chokhmah-direction of the period immediately preceding, which might be regarded as having been fraught with terrible consequences to Israel. If the one party had spoken of Chokhmah and appealed to Solomon, the other party would now go a step further back and appeal to David and the Psalter, and to the Chasidim of which they wished and professed to be the representatives.

We cannot here follow the further development of their history. But we submit that what has been stated sufficiently answers the question, often and learnedly discussed, as to the relation between Ecclesiasticus and distinctively Alexandrian views. Gfrörer ('Philo u. d. Alex. Theos.' ii. pp. 21–52) calls our author an Eclectic, and supposes that certain parts of his book (notably ch. xxiv.) were derived from an Alexandrian work. That there is a close relationship between Ecclesiasticus and Alexandrianism cannot indeed be doubted—and this not only in ch. xxiv. but in some of the other instances adduced by Gfrörer (comp. the special introd. to ch. xliv.). But their relation is other than that scholar supposed. Ecclesiasticus is not dependent on Alexandrian teaching, but the latter had its roots in the direction represented by our book. On the other hand, Dähne ('Gesch. Darstell. d. jüd. Alex. Relig. Phil.' ii. pp. 144, &c.) rightly calls attention to the genuine Palestinian character of our book as a whole. But he is mistaken in attributing the Alexandrian elements in it entirely to alterations introduced in the Greek Version by the younger Siracide, and to interpolations. Such undoubtedly there are, and of a very marked character. But they are not of such wide sweep as is supposed by Dähne, and the hypothesis as a whole is forbidden by the Syriac Version, which was made directly from the Hebrew original.

§ IV. The Writer and his Book: its Philosophy, Theology, and Ethics; Comparison with the New Testament and with Philo.

Before making a closer survey of the book, it may be convenient to refer to some of its general characteristics. We have already seen that the circumstances of the time and the religious standpoint occupied in Ecclesiasticus throw light on each other. The same may be said in regard to the social and moral relations reflected in Ecclesiasticus. If the allusions in it are sometimes coarse, if its tone is the reverse of high, and if the references to sexual and other excesses are both frequent and unpleasant, this is due to the state of matters at the time. Again, bearing in mind that the main subject of the book is Wisdom, the treatment may seem fitful, from the frequent and sudden transitions to apparently wholly different and even trivial topics connected with the rules of daily life. This has already been partly accounted for by the view which the writer took of "Wisdom." Besides, such transitions—often abrupt—from one subject to another are characteristic of Eastern writing. So to speak, they give emphasis to the discussion of the graver questions. Nor is the treatment of "Wisdom" so fitful as might seem at first sight. For "Wisdom" is the subject treated of in the beginning of the book (ch. i.), in the middle of it (ch. xxiv.), and especially at the close (chaps. xxxiii.–xliii.). Indeed, this latter portion reads almost like a separate treatise on the great problems of Wisdom (see the special introductions to these chapters). And even the abruptness of the transitions is more apparent than real. This also is characteristic of Eastern thinking, which moves in the succession of time, as one thing suggests another, rather than in that of logical order, where one topic is evolved from the other.[1]

That the writer of Ecclesiasticus was a man of high culture, fully acquainted with the sacred literature of Israel, is not only stated in the Prologue, but appears from almost every part of the book. Moreover, we infer even from such allusions as in xxiv. 28, xxxiii. 16, xxxix. 1, 2, that he was familiar with the thoughts—perhaps the writings—of others in Israel whose mental direction and studies were kindred to his own. And here we also recall that he had travelled abroad for the enlargement of his knowledge, and profited by what he had seen and learned (xxxiv. 10, 11; xxxix. 4). Again, although his dogmatic horizon was bounded, and his views defective, even erroneous, Ben Sira cannot be charged with scepticism. Thoroughly liberal in his conception of Judaism, he was yet an earnest believer in it. Deeply touching is the account which he gives (li. 15–22) of his inner experience. In early life he had in earnest prayer, both private and in the Temple, sought for that Wisdom which—like Solomon of old, or, to quote a lower instance, like Philo—he regarded as the highest aim of life. And he was resolved to pursue it to his last day. By the guidance of that Wisdom he had walked from his youth in the right way, ever following the good. In earnest moral observance of the Law he had stretched out his hands towards heaven, deeply mourning any aberrations due to ignorance, and ever aiming after purity. And even the success which had come to him in life he attributed to this pursuit, and thanked God not only for it, but still more for the gift of that Wisdom through which he had attained it, in a life not untroubled by sorrow and beset by dangers. Best of all, he had inward peace and joy. Higher experience than this we cannot expect on the part of the writer of Ecclesiasticus. He was not an inspired man, and, personally, he stands as far below the prophets of old as his own ideal standard falls short of that of the New Testament. Still on every page of his book God is first and foremost: His fear, His Law, and the right and true. Sometimes his praise of the great Creator is almost sublime (as in ch. xxxix. 13–25), while his prayers are fervent and lofty in tone. In general, the one great aim which he sets before himself in his book is to vindicate the ways of God with man. As a believing Israelite, he throughout recognises the leadings of God with His people of old; and he has unshaken faith in the fulfilment of the promises to Israel. Lastly, the main practical object of his work is to warn and instruct others (comp. the Prologue; xxxix. 32; l. 27, 28; li., closing stanza).

From another point of view—that of mental difficulties—we have to emphasise that the speculations of Ben Sira never issue in doubt. He seeks to answer questions, rather than to solve doubts (xxxix. 16–21). In truth, such do not exist for him. For in God is all Wisdom: and he sees it exhibited equally in creation, in Providence, in history, and in Revelation. Hence he severely condemns, as afterwards Philo, those Jews who, in their spurious enlightenment, would neglect the observance of the Mosaic Law or the ancestral rites. For in his view the Law is the highest exhibition of Wisdom (xxiv.); and its observance the first of duties (comp. i. 26; vi. 37; xiv. 11; xix. 20; xxxv. 1–11).

[1] Yet although this is prevalently, it is not uniformly, the case in our book.

We proceed to give a brief summary of the philosophical and theological teaching in Ecclesiasticus.

1. The theme of the book is, as previously stated, Wisdom. For the fullest exposition of the writer's views, we here turn to chapters i., xxiv., and to the section beginning with chapter xxxiv. All wisdom comes from God, with Whom it ever is (see generally ch. i.). It transcends the comprehension of man. Wisdom is the firstborn of His creatures: rather, it is the mould and the archetype for all the works and ways of God. And yet in His goodness He has manifested His Wisdom — and that to all men. Understanding of Wisdom and the fear of the Lord coincide—the one is the speculative, the other the practical, aspect of Wisdom. Hence Wisdom is also true happiness. In ch. xxiv. Wisdom is represented as created "from the beginning," "before the world"—as coming forth "from the mouth of the Most High," and as the creative, or at least formative, agent. This seems to mean that Wisdom, immanent in God, became outwardly manifest when God created all things: that it was alike the creative word and the creative thought. It need scarcely be said that in all this there was not any idea of a hypostatisation of Wisdom or presenting it as a Person. The writer did not even think of it as separate from God. Ecclesiasticus marks indeed an advance in this respect on the teaching of the Book of Proverbs; but it still falls far short of that of Philo. The latter proceeded on the idea that God was an abstraction, and that He could not be in direct contact with anything concrete — least of all with matter.[1] Again, manifestly there is absolutely a gulf between such speculations—whether in Ecclesiasticus or of Philo—and the teaching of the New Testament. On another and kindred point we mark the same difference. According to Ecclesiasticus, Wisdom, as the active principle in creation, was poured out upon the earth, and in measure imparted to all nations (i. 9, 10, 15; xxiv. 3–7). But it was concentrated in the revealed Law of God, and became permanently resident in Israel. Here we have the second fundamental principle afterwards developed by Philo. In the New Testament all this is quite otherwise set forth. There the Logos is shewn to be a Person, Who became Incarnate; and in the Logos God is the Father of all men, who are to attain to Him not through abstract Wisdom but through the mediation of the Personal Logos—that is, by grace. Lastly, in the final section of Ecclus., Wisdom, as previously presented, is vindicated against all speculative difficulties. Similarly, in the practical parts of the book, Wisdom is vindicated in its practical aspect, the object being to shew that the ordinances and directions of Wisdom are not only right, but good, and such as lead to prosperity.

2. We have seen that Wisdom is immanent in God. It is the sum of all His qualities, and hence of all His manifestations. It follows almost logically that in the strict sense God must be incomprehensible to man. In truth, this was a necessary position in the theology of Ecclesiasticus. Philo arrived at the same conclusion, though by a different process. In his system this was the outcome of philosophical ideas about the Being of God and His absolute separateness, as well as from his views concerning the material world. In Ecclesiasticus the incomprehensibleness of God is, more biblically, traced back to His supremeness.[2] The two ideas are presented

[1] See the article PHILO in Smith and Wace's 'Dict. of Chr. Biogr.' vol. iv.

[2] No doubt can attach to this that the Siracide firmly held the strict Personality of God. If in xliii. 27 God is thus described, "He is the All" (καὶ συντέλεια λόγων Τὸ πᾶν ἐστιν αὐτός), we have no hesitation in regarding this as a bold later addition by the younger Siracide (see in Ecclus. in a whole series of passages, notably in xviii. 2–7, xlii. 17, &c.; but especially in xxxix. 16–21, and in the last stanza of ch. xliii.[1] If God is incomprehensible and supreme, it also follows that He is omniscient, almighty, and irresistible. This brings us to the two great problems which our writer seeks to solve in the third section of his book. But the Son of Sirach only states the facts; he does little to explain them. How are we to account for the difference in the outward lot which, apparently without any cause, befalls men: nay, more, for the moral difference in their dispositions, the diverse shaping of their spiritual history, and their end? Ben Sira's answer is simply Predestinarianism. But in such case what may be distinguished as the natural and the moral qualities in the Deity are apparently in antagonism. The writer of Ecclesiastes had also faced this problem. But he turned from it, almost with a shrug of the shoulders, in view of the indifference and smallness of earthly things. But if he attempted not any solution of the difficulty from its objective aspect — rather admitted it — he sought to transfer the whole question into the region of personal moral responsibility. The writer of Ecclesiasticus seems disposed to follow his predecessor, but he attempts a little philosophy of his own on the subject—although with small success. St. Paul also had to face this great problem. He knew the awful facts, and perceived their "antinomies" of reason and theology. But he viewed them in the surrounding and transforming light of the infinite love of God in Christ. And in this solution the Christian heart can thankfully acquiesce (comp. Rom. xi. 32–36).

But the older Siracide was simply a Predestinarian (comp. here such statements as xvi. 26; xxiii. 20; xxxiii. 10–13; xxxix. 20, 21). The same may be said of Philo.[2] But Ben Sira laboriously tries to make a way through the maze to this as his final conclusion (in ch. xxxix., last stanza, vv. 32, &c.), that "all the works of the Lord are good." The reasoning by which this result is reached commences in ch. xxxiii., and is carried on to the end of chapter xliii., although with interruptions or rather intercalations caused by things suggested by the way. We add that here we catch glimpses of Aristotelian philosophy, and, for that matter, of Zoroastrianism,[1] in the idea, broached by our writer, of an essential Dualism of contraries: one thing being set against the other—good against evil, life against death, and so on (see ch. xxxiii. 7–15). Yet with all this he escapes falling into fatalism by emphasising (as in Ecclesiastes) the absolute freedom of the will and personal responsibility (comp. here especially xv. 14–20; and such sentences as xvii. 6).

The Son of Sirach seems to feel more certain and satisfied when he shifts the ground of his argument to the moral properties of God: His justice and mercy. God is not only the Maker of all things: He is also the Ruler. Hence ultimately good will certainly follow upon right-doing. And although the righteous may suffer—since suffering is the common lot—yet their sorrows are not like those of the wicked, and they have also both immediate and final consolation under them. We cannot here enter into further details, but we mark that our author traces this quality of Justice in God's dealings not only with individuals, but with nations, and especially in God's ways with Israel. Alike the fulfilment of the promises to them and the destruction of the heathen ultimately resolve themselves into the exercise of Justice. By the side of this quality—as its complement and, in a sense, its other aspect—Ben Sira places that of Mercy.[2] This mercy extends to introd. to ch. xliii.). In the Syr. the whole section from v. 11 is wanting. The Vet. Lat. solves the difficulty by rendering: ipse est in omnibus.

[1] Ch. xvi. 20, 21 refers to something very different. See the notes. As to ch. xliii., see also the previous note.

[2] See the article in Smith and Wace's 'Dict.' previously referred to.

[1] Comp. Bruch, u. s. pp. 301, 302.

[2] Merguet (u. s. p. 11) notes the following terms for it: ἔλεος (this mostly), ἐλεημοσύνη, ἐξιλασμός. But there is not any mention of the free outgoing of Divine Love. The latter is only evoked in return for our love of Wisdom; comp. iv. 14. The solitary reading χάρις in i. 13, quoted by Merguet, is extremely doubtful, and in any case could only mean "favour." In xxiv. 16 it stands for "grace" or beauty.

Digitized by Google

"all flesh," but is specially shewn to the poor, afflicted, and needy, and yet more particularly to the prayerful, the believing, the penitent, and the merciful.

3. Little need be said about the Cosmology, the Angelology, or even the Anthropology of our book. As regards the former, the world is not represented as an emanation from God, but as His creation. At the same time we find, as in ch. xvi. 26, 27, expressions about the order and rule in the Kosmos, which afterwards acquired a special meaning in the system of Philo, although it is very doubtful whether anything of the kind was in the mind of Ben Sira (see notes). Belief in Angels seems implied in Ecclesiasticus (xvii. 17—see the note about the Jewish tradition on the subject; xlviii. 21; and possibly, though doubtfully, xlv. 2). But it seems to be a subject on which our author is reluctant to enlarge. Even this is indicative of Ben Sira's standpoint, since developed Angelology is characteristic of post-exilian theology. He is still more chary in his reference to Satan (xxi. 27). On the other hand, if in xxxix. 28, &c., he may seem to identify such "messengers of God" with punitive agencies in nature, we must bear in mind that, in later Jewish theology also, the Angels are sometimes represented (alike as regards their names and agency) as personifications of powers, or of Divine dispensations. There is not any ground for supposing that the Son of Sirach believed in the doctrine of the fall of man through the sin of our first parents —or rather, in original sin in the New Testament sense. He traces, indeed, the beginning (ἀρχὴ ἁμαρτίας), but not the origin of our sin to Eve (xxv. 24; see specially the note on that verse), and he attributes to her the universal prevalence of death. But this is very different from tracing to this source moral guilt or native depravity. On the "after death" the views of the Siracide are very unsatisfactory. As regards the body, so far from cherishing the hope of a Resurrection we have such dreary pictures as in ch. x. 11; xxxviii. 21–23; xl. 1, 11; xli. 1–4. What becomes of the spirit in Hades, seems scarcely clear to our writer (xiv. 12). Probably he thought of it as in eternal sleep. There man is in dark, eternal rest, whence he can never return (xxii. 11; xxx. 17; xxxviii. 23). Thither no pleasure enters (xiv. 16). Hence we should enjoy all that we may in this life (xiv. 14–17). Nay, not even the praise of God rises from this dark abode (xvii. 27, 28). Man is "no more" —he lies in "eternal sleep" (xlvi. 19; comp. a somewhat similar mode of expression in Jer. li. (in Sept. xxviii.) 39). The reward or punishment of a man after this life consists in the permanence, or else the loss, of his possessions, in his children, and in a good or evil reputation (for example, xi. 28; xxi. 4; xxiii. 24–27; xxxix. 9; xl. 15, 16; xli. 5–13; xlvi. 11, 12). Forgiveness of sins may indeed be looked for from the mercy of God (ii. 18; xvi. 11, &c.; xvii. 24, 29); but this is chiefly dependent on almsgiving and prayer (iii. 30; xvii. 25; xxix. 12; xl. 17). Repentance is frequently enjoined (v. 7; xvii. 26; xviii. 21). Of free forgiveness and the love of God to sinners there is not a word. There are, indeed, passages which seem to imply that some at least of the dead are not for ever unconscious — such as the references to Enoch, Samuel, and Elijah (xliv. 16; xlvi. 20; xlviii. 9–11; xlix. 14). But on closer study it will appear how little even these references to the great biblical heroes and events imply.

4. Ethics.—The ethical teaching of Ecclesiasticus is even more unsatisfactory and disappointing than its dogmatics. If evidence were required of the need of the personal indwelling of the Holy Ghost or of His transforming power, we should find it in the code of morals laid down in this book by one of the most distinguished Chakhamim of the post-exilian period. Without entering into a detailed analysis, we may briefly indicate the favourable and the unfavourable aspect of Ecclesiasticus in this respect. In the former we include the constant and prominent references to God and the ever-recurring admonitions to fear and obedience of Him. Closely connected with this is the essential distinction made throughout the book between the righteous and the sinner. As in the view of our author Wisdom in its objective aspect is fully presented in the revealed Law of God, so in its subjective aspect it coincides with the fear of the Lord. Hence also the pious is throughout represented as the wise, and the sinner as the fool (and vice versâ also).[1] On the other hand, if Ben Sira so frequently and emphatically insists that God will certainly requite the righteous and the sinner, we have to bear in mind that the requital which he expects is of and in this world. Similarly, if he enjoins observance of the rites and worship of Israel, it is too often rather because they are ancestral, than because of their absolute and intrinsic importance; because they are Israel's rather than because they are God's. Of any deeper understanding of the spiritual or the typical import of sacrifices or the other institutions of the Old Testament we cannot discern a trace. On the contrary, almsgiving and prayer—and that as an opus operatum—seem to constitute in the view of our author the substance of religion, although (as already explained) he insists on strict and even joyous observance of the ordinances of the sanctuary. Very characteristic and generally instructive in all these respects is the first stanza of ch. xxxv. Most curious and interesting are the extensive, evidently Christian, alterations introduced in this chapter in the Syriac Version.

In this sense it occurs several times, as also in that of "favour," "thanks," "praise." In the sense of bountifulness, or the bestowal of gifts, it only occurs in xl. 17—and there as on the part of man, not of God.

Even a cursory perusal of the book shews that the general moral tone of the writer is not at any time lofty. Often it is decidedly low, and his allusions become coarsely realistic. But, apart from this, we feel throughout that moral questions are placed on a low level and viewed in a wrong light. Ben Sira seems to be always arguing that after all religion is that which profits best: alike as regards man and God. And in the latter respect we have besides to bear in mind that even the return which he expects from God is mainly, if not exclusively, earthly, and consists of prosperity, a good posterity, and an excellent reputation. The spiritual and the eternal are not in his view. From another aspect also the book may be described as a most unpleasant mixture of selfishness and Eastern world-wisdom with religiousness. And the religion which it commends is very jejune, while the wisdom of which it boasts often resolves itself into high-sounding platitudes. The model-man of Ben Sira seems to be always thinking of himself—what men will say of him or how a thing will affect him either in life or when he comes to die. When we come upon any expression of distinctively Jewish faith, it impresses us rather as a mixture of religious respectability with something very like superstition. Even the sublime idea of the absolute supremacy of God leads him, at the thought of sorrow, not to believing submission nor the recognition of what is higher, but if not to a species of fatalism yet to a kind of indifferentism. Lastly, although the writer as a keen observer of men, and having ample knowledge of the world, often gives utterance to shrewd sayings which, alas! have their application to all ages, they are mostly of the kind best described by the term "worldly-wise." On the whole, the ethics of Ecclesiasticus are neither pleasant nor profitable reading.

5. Eschatology.—On this subject little need be said in addition to our previous remarks. We have seen that the Siracide had apparently not any distinct faith in another and higher life after death. How he combined with this belief in the spiritual part of man or even in a personal God, it is not for us to determine. To the doctrine of the resurrection of the body and the final judgment there

[1] Characteristic are the designations of Wisdom and the Wise, marking the different aspects of his conception. They are: σοφία, παιδεία, πανουργία, σύνεσις (and διάνοια συνέσεως), ἐπιστήμη, and θεοσέβεια. Corresponding to these are the terms in which he speaks of the σοφός, or the εὑρὼν σοφίαν, as: συνετός, ἐπιστήμων, νοήμων, φρόνιμος, πεπλανημένος, πολύπειρος; he is ἀνὴρ βουλῆς, μακρόθυμος, πιστός, εὐσεβής, φοβούμενος κύριον, ζητῶν νόμον, ταπεινός, ἐλαττούμενος καρδίᾳ, even ἀγαθός (Merguet, u. s.). The designations of the fool and sinner Merguet groups under four classes: (a) μωρός, ἄφρων, ἀσύνετος, ἀνόητος, ἀπαίδευτος, ἀκάρδιος; (b) ἀσεβής, καταλιπὼν τ. κυρ., παραβαίνων ἐντολάς, ἄνομος, ἄδικος, ἐχθρός, ἀλλότριος; (c) ἁμαρτωλός, πλανώμενος, κακὰ ἐργαζόμενος, πονηρευόμενος; (d) κακός, ψυχὴ πονηρά, ὑπερήφανος, δόλιος, σπαταλός, λοίδορος, and ἀναιδής.

Digitized by Microsoft®

is not any allusion in Ecclesiasticus. Nor yet do we find any trace of expectancy of a personal Messiah. But apparently Ben Sira did look for what may be called a (Messianic) "kingdom"—although without a king. It is not easy, however, to form any clear conception of what he associated with that happy period. He certainly regarded it as the fulfilment of the prophetic promises to Israel. He frequently refers to judgments that were to come upon the Gentile nations; and he anticipates the gathering of all Israel, their liberation, and even their triumph—the latter being preceded by the advent of Elijah. Yet, after all, these statements only give rise to questions to which there is no answer in our book. The following are important passages in regard to the eschatology of Ecclus.: xxxv. 18, 19; xxxvi. 1–17; xxxvii. 25 b; xliv. 21, 22; xlvii. 11; xlviii. 10, 11, 24. Generally comp. the introduction to ch. xlviii. But we cannot close without calling attention to xliv. 21, 22. The reference there is to the special (Messianic) blessing promised to Abraham (in Gen. xxii. 18) and afterwards continued to Isaac. It is the contention of most modern critics that the Hebrew of these verses should not be rendered (as in the LXX.): "in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed," but that the correct translation is: "with thy seed shall all the nations of the earth bless themselves." It is instructive to find that, in opposition to the confident assertions of these critics, the younger Siracide (who presumably knew Hebrew) adopted the first translation, probably quoting from the LXX.

§ V. Language, Title, and Arrangement of the Original Work.

The work of the Son of Sirach was originally written in Hebrew, and not, as some critics have supposed, in the later Aramaic dialect. Jerome had still seen a copy of the Hebrew original (Hebraicum reperi[1]). The quotations from the work in Talmudic writings (see § X.) are, with three exceptions, in Hebrew,[2] and they are chiefly made by Palestinian authorities. But the Hebrew is that of a later age.[1] The work seems, however, at an early period to have been translated into Aramaean—probably in Babylon—and to have been elaborated with additions, not always worthy of the original composition, into a book from which quotations are made by Babylonian Rabbis.[2] If any doubt could still be entertained that the work was originally written in Hebrew, it would be removed by a comparison with the Syriac translation (see § VIII.). And we know that Hebrew was at that time, and long afterwards, the language used by the learned and in the schools.

In Hebrew the book had borne the title משלים, Proverbs (in Aram. מתלין). Jerome (u. s.) expressly states that it was entitled 'Parabolae' ("non Ecclesiasticum, ut apud Latinos, sed Parabolas praenotatum"). Yet it would be a mistake to suppose that the original Greek title in the MSS., Σοφία Ἰησοῦ υἱοῦ Σιράχ, 'The Wisdom of Jesus Son of Sirach,' originated in the Church. Even the Solomonic books (Prov. and Eccles.) were designated by the Jews as ספרי חכמה, the Books of Wisdom,[3] and we know that the Book of Sirach and apocryphal 'Wisdom' were ranked with them. The account of Melito of Sardis (Eusebius, 'Hist. Eccl.' iv. 26), which adds to the title 'Proverbs of Solomon' the words ἡ καὶ Σοφία, seems derived from a Jewish source.[4] Similarly, in MS. 12,142 (Brit. Mus.), the Syriac title of the book—evidently taken from a Hebrew source—is 'Wisdom of the Son of Sira.'[5] Even the designation of our book as ἡ πανάρετος σοφία (or more briefly: ἡ πανάρετος[6]), which first appears in Eusebius,[7]

[1] 'Praefat. in vers. libr. Salom.'

[2] Comp. Zunz, 'Gottesd. Vortr.' p. 104.

[1] Comp. Zunz, u. s., note b, and the instances given by Delitzsch, 'Gesch. d. jüd. Poesie,' p. 205, note 2.

[2] For the evidence see Zunz, u. s., pp. 104, 105.

[3] Tosephoth to Babh. B., 14 b.

[4] Comp. Nowack, 'Sprüche Sal.' p. x.

[5] See Lagarde, 'Libri Vet. Test. Apocr. Syriace.'

[6] Jerome (l. s. l.): "Fertur et πανάρετος Jesu filii Sirach liber." Cassiodorus ('Div. Lect.' i. 5) explains: "propter excellentiam virtutum suarum παράνετον appellat, i.e. virtutum omnium capacem."

[7] Chron. (ed. Schoene) ii. 122; 'Demonstr. Evang.' (ed. Gaisford), viii. 2, 71. The designamay have had a Hebrew equivalent, just as the same designation seems to have been given to the Solomonic Book of Proverbs.[1] The common Latin designation (since Cyprian) 'Ecclesiasticus' (or 'Ecclesiasticus Sirach') could scarcely have been introduced to distinguish our book from Ecclesiastes, but probably meant "Church-(ecclesiastical) book." It obtained that name from its frequent use by the early Church, especially in the instruction of catechumens.[2]

It is the opinion of many critics that our book contains much which is not the writer's own, and was derived from other "sages." But this view cannot be accepted without important qualifications. Eichhorn,[3] who calls Ecclesiasticus "a rhapsody," supports the contention that Ben Sira had partly collected from previous writers, by referring to what he regards as repetitions in the book, or as contradictions in its different parts, and also to utterances which he considers unworthy of the Siracide and belonging to an earlier and ruder age. But, in his view, our author had mostly not literally reproduced such sayings of others, but recast them in his own language. Bretschneider[4] generally repeats and further develops the views of Eichhorn, though scarcely in a manner to command assent. For our own part, we have failed to discover any repetitions in the strict sense of the term; and still more any contradictions. For it must be remembered that the recurrence of the same idea in different connexions is not necessarily a mere repetition. Lastly, even such a statement as that in xxxiii. 16 does not necessarily imply that our author had incorporated the sayings of others. It might only have been intended to indicate (what we otherwise know) that there had been Chakhamim before Ben Sira, whose sentences and sayings had passed into popular parlance. But, when considered in connexion with the general arrangement of the book, it acquires a more definite meaning than this. At the same time we must respectfully but entirely dissent from the ingenious hypothesis of Ewald,[1] that the work embodies two previous collections of Proverbs: the first (chaps. i.–xvi. 21) dating from the 4th century B.C.; the second (xvi. 22–xxxvi. 22) dating from the 3rd cent. B.C.; and that only the third and last portion of Ecclesiasticus is the work of Ben Sira himself.[2]

With his usual perspicacity Eichhorn inferred that as 'Wisdom' formed the subject-matter of the book, its division into parts would be indicated by a fresh introduction of that theme.[3] This canon is undoubtedly correct. But further than this we are not able to agree with that great critic. Although every attempt at arrangement can only be matter of suggestion, we venture to propose the following. The theme of the book is Wisdom, and its fresh introduction marks the beginning of every part. The work consists of five Parts—like the Law and the Psalter. Part I. comprises chaps. i.–xxiii.; Part II., chaps. xxiv.–xxxii.; Part III., chaps. xxxiii.–xliii.; Part IV., chaps. xliv.–l. 21; lastly, Part. V., l. 22–li.

Part I., chaps. i.–xxiii. Wisdom is introduced, ch. i. 1–10. Throughout this Part Wisdom is presented in its practical aspect. The Part consists of four sections, of which three admit of further subdivision. Section A (chaps. i.–vi.). Subdivisions:—1st, chaps. i.–iii.: Wisdom as the fear and service of God (in the widest sense), or practical Wisdom in its relation to God. 2nd subdivision:—chaps. iv.–vi.: practical Wisdom in relation to ourselves—the section closing with a eulogy of Wisdom (vi. 18–end). Section B (chaps. vii.–xiv.). Subdivition does not yet occur in the quotations by Clement and Origen: comp. Schürer, u. s. p. 596.

[1] Comp. Nowack, u. s.

[2] Herbst-Welte, 'Einleit.' p. 204.

[3] u. s., pp. 42–55.

[4] 'Liber Siracidae, Graece,' pp. 25–32.

[1] 'Gesch. d. V. Isr.' iv. pp. 342–347. Comp. 'Jahrb. d. Bibl. Wiss.' iii. pp. 125, &c.

[2] Ewald thinks that the work had in its original form been much larger, but suffered from abbreviations and transpositions. He even attempts to restore it to its original form.

[3] The objections of Bretschneider (u. s., pp. 20, &c.) are very superficial. Eichhorn arranges the work into three books: Book I., chaps. i.–xxiii. (in two sections: chaps. i.–ix.; x.–xxiii.); Book II., chaps. xxiv.–xlii. 14; Book III., chaps. xlii. 15–l. 24; the whole being concluded by the subscription and a grand eulogy. Eichhorn supposes that it was composed (collected?) at different periods of the author's life.

Digitized by Google

sions :—1st, practical Wisdom as regards our relations to others : chaps. vii.–ix. 2nd subdivision : practical Wisdom specially in relation to those in high places, in rule, and government—chap. x. 3rd subdivision : in relation to the more lowly—chap. xi. 4th subdivision : practical Wisdom in our mode of doing good — chap. xii. 5th subdivision : practical Wisdom in intercourse with the world — chap. xiii. 6th subdivision : with reference to property—chap. xiv. 7th subdivision : in regard to our moral bearing. Section C. The problems and difficulties of Wisdom in its practical aspect : chaps. xvi.–xviii. Section D might be entitled "Rules of life," viz. : 1st, Man towards man, chaps. xix., xx. ; 2ndly, in regard to sin, chaps. xxi., xxii. —the whole Part closing with a grand prayer, chap. xxiii.

Part II. opens again with the praise of Wisdom (chap. xxiv.). The Part comprises chaps. xxiv.–xxxii., including, however, parts of chap. xxxiii. But those chapters cannot well be arranged into groups, like those in Part I., although we can trace a distinct connexion between them, as shewn in the special introductions. We regard this Part as embodying previous sayings of sages or popular Proverbs. But the whole has been put into orderly arrangement and connexion by the Son of Sirach. Its character, as chiefly if not wholly a compilation, appears from the somewhat loose manner in which various subjects are joined together ; from the peculiar —often antithetic or else grouped—arrangement of the sayings ; and, lastly, from chap. xxxiii. 16, which seems intended to indicate the nature of this Part as a whole.

Part III., chap. xxxiii.–xliii. Chap. xxxiii., however, partly belongs to the previous Part and generally forms a transition to what follows. It may be described as a discussion of the great speculative problems of Wisdom (see previous remarks and special introductions).

Part IV. historically illustrates Wisdom by the praise of the Wise (chaps. xliv.–l. 21), while Part V. contains the conclusion of the book (chap. l. 22–li.).

We need scarcely add that these five Parts, although distinct, are welded by the writer into a continuous and consecutive work. In form it is poetic and rhythmic; but its didactic portions are often extremely prosaic in tone. Here the writer generally speaks in the character of a "father" to his "son." In regard to the use of rhetorical figures, illustrations and the like, the book may, however, favourably compare with similar productions. The arrangement of the chapters in stanzas, the progression of thought, and the parallelism not only in the members of each verse but sometimes between the stanzas, are generally indicated with sufficient clearness. We have also marked a numerical arrangement in the verses and stanzas which may have been a form of later Hebrew compositions of this kind.

§ VI. References to the Book of Proverbs and in the Epistle of St. James.

1. The Proverbs of Solomon. — As might have been expected, the older Siracide had throughout taken the Proverbs of Solomon as the model for his work. And this, alike in respect of form and substance. As regards the former, whatever may be thought on the question whether or not Hebrew biblical poetry was metrical,[1] it is universally admitted that it was marked by a parallelism of members. The latter has been arranged[2] into antithetic parallelisms, in which the first and second members—lines a and b—are in antithesis ; synthetic, or rather progressive, in which the second member marks a progression, though in the same direction ; synonymic, or rather continuative, when the second member only continues the first ; parabolic, where one member illustrates the other ; and lastly, consecutive, in which one member expresses the logical sequence of the other. These various kinds of parallelism

[1] Comp. Saalschitz, 'Form d. hebr. Poes.;' Delitzsch, u. s.; Ewald, 'Die poet. Bücher d. A. Test.;' but especially Bickell, 'Carmina Vet. Test.' (pp. 219–234 : "de re metr. Hebr.").

[2] Comp. here generally C. Seligmann, 'd. Buch d. Weish. J. Sir.' But we have not adopted his precise designation of the various kinds of parallelism in Hebrew poetry.

may be illustrated by an example of each kind in Ecclesiasticus, to which is added in brackets a similar instance from the Book of Proverbs: (a) Antithetic Parallelisms: Ecclus. xiii. 3 [Prov. x. 5]; (b) progressive: Ecclus. vi. 13 [Prov. xxii. 1]; (c) continuative: Ecclus. vi. 33 [Prov. xxii. 24]; (d) illustrative: Ecclus. xviii. 10 [Prov. x. 26]; (e) consecutive: Ecclus. xxv. 3 [Prov. xxvi. 5].[1] The first of these five classes of parallelism occurs the most rarely; the last is the most frequent in Ecclesiasticus. To these remarks about the form of our book we have to add that, as regards the outward arrangement of the subject and the mostly well-marked structure of stanzas, we observe distinct progress in comparison with the Book of Proverbs.

Passing from the form to the contents of the book, a similar correspondence exists between Ecclesiasticus and the Book of Proverbs. Thus Ecclus. i. 4 may be compared with Prov. viii. 22; i. 14 with Prov. i. 7, and ix. 10; Ecclus. iii. 13 with Prov. xxiii. 22; iii. 26 with Prov. xxviii. 14; iv. 5 with Prov. xxviii. 27; iv. 12, &c. with Prov. iv. 7, &c.; vii. 11 with Prov. xvii. 5; ix. 6 with Prov. xxix. 3; x. 25 with Prov. xvii. 2; x. 27 with Prov. xii. 9; xi. 8 with Prov. xviii. 13; xii. 9 with Prov. xix. 4; xii. 16 with Prov. xxvi. 24, &c.; xiii. 25 with Prov. xv. 13; xiv. 13 with Prov. iii. 27, &c.; xx. 1 with Prov. xxvii. 5; xxi. 10 with Prov. xiv. 12; xxi. 17 with Prov. xxiii. 12; xxii. 3 with Prov. xvii. 21; xxii. 7 with Prov. xxvii. 22; xxii. 15 with Prov. xxvii. 3; xxiv. 1 with Prov. viii. 1; xxiv. 3 with Prov. ii. 6; xxiv. 5 with Prov. viii. 27; xxv. 16 with Prov. xxi. 19; xxvii. 5 with Prov. xxvii. 21; xxvii. 22 with Prov. vi. 12, 13; xxvii. 25 with Prov. xxvi. 27; xxviii. 8 with Prov. xv. 18; xxviii. 10 with Prov. xxvi. 20, 21; xxx. 1 with Prov. xiii. 24; xxxi. 23 with Prov. xxii. 9; xxxiv. 21 with Prov. xxii. 22; xxxvii. 18 with Prov. xvii. 22 and xviii. 21; xli. 11 with Prov. x. 7.[2]

Other instances might be adduced. For these, as well as for parallelisms with the Psalter, the Book of Job, and especially with Ecclesiastes,[1] we must refer to the notes on the various chapters.

2. The Epistle of St. James. — In general, the critical student of the New Testament[2] will find in Ecclesiasticus much to interest him as regards the usage of words. At least one illustrative instance may here be adduced. The word κατανύσσειν, which in classical Greek[3] is not used for any painful affection, occurs in the New Testament only in Acts ii. 37 ("pricked in their heart"). It is used in the same sense in the LXX. Psalms, where its unquestionable meaning in Ps. cviii. (Heb. cix.) 16 must rule its use in Ps. iv. 5; xxix. (xxx.) 13; xxxiv. (xxxv.) 15. The word evidently bears the same meaning in LXX. Gen. xxxiv. 7 and in 3 (1) Kings xx. 27. Theodotion uses it in the same sense in Prov. xvii. 22, where the LXX. have λυπηρός. [In LXX. Is. xlvii. 5 and Dan. x. 9, 15 it may be used in a sense derived from its primary meaning. Perhaps LXX. Lev. x. 3 indicates the connexion between the two.] But the meaning of the word κατανύσσειν is fully established by its uniform use in Ecclus. (xii. 12; xiv. 1; xx. 21; xlvii. 20).

If the usage of the word κατανύσσειν seems to point to a special connexion between the LXX. Psalms and Ecclesiasticus, this is still more evident in regard to a word of such frequent use in the New Testament as εὐδοκία, but which only occurs in the LXX. Psalms, although frequently in Ecclesiasticus. Nor is this the only instance of correspondence between these two books; and the question may at least be suggested, whether it does not reflect on the date of the version of the Psalter (or part of it) relatively to our Greek Ecclesiasticus, since biblical terms of recent introduction would probably be in favour with a theological writer.

[1] Seligmann, u. s., p. 32; Bruch, u. s., p. 273; Delitzsch, art. Sprüche in Herzog's 'Real-Encykl.'

[2] Comp. Seligmann, u. s., pp. 21–29.

[1] Many of these have been collected by Dr. H. H. Wright in his 'Comment. on Eccles.' The objection of Seligmann that, in the passages quoted, Ecclus. agrees with Eccles. only in such cases in which Eccles. itself agrees with Prov. does not always hold good. Seligmann himself admits that there is not any other parallel to Ecclus. xviii. 22 than in Eccles. v. 3. Frequent references to Eccles. will be pointed out in the course of this commentary.

[2] As regards the LXX., see further on.

[3] Never in this exact form, and not in any form in pre-Christian Greek writers.

Digitized by Microsoft®

We have little doubt that there are passages in various parts of the New Testament in which either the sentiment or its mode of expression carries us back to Ecclesiasticus.[1] The instances are more numerous than those mentioned by Eichhorn,[2] nor can they be wholly explained either by unconscious identity of thinking or by popularly current sayings.[3] Two facts should here be kept in view. The frequent references to Ben Sira in Talmudic writings shew how popular (for one reason or another) the work had become in Jewish circles. On the other hand, we have seen that many of its views appear afterwards in a developed form in Philo. On these and other grounds we naturally infer that the book enjoyed if not equal yet similar popularity in Alexandria, the birthplace of its translation, and among the Hellenists generally. We here instinctively turn, on the one hand, to the Epistle to the Hebrews as the portion of the New Testament specially Hellenistic in its mode of expression and form of reasoning; and, on the other, to the Epistle of St. James, which is so Judaic in its language, allusions, and mould of thought that we can in many places find exact Rabbinic parallels to it. Both these books contain perhaps not exactly references to Ecclesiasticus, but they indicate familiarity with it. This holds specially true in regard to the Epistle of St. James. An illustrative instance from each of these writings may here be adduced. In Ecclus. xxv. 23 the words "relaxed hands and palsied knees" (χεῖρες παρειμέναι καὶ γόνατα παραλελυμένα) are taken from LXX. Is. xxxv. 3. But there the word is not παρειμέναι but ἀνειμέναι, while in Heb. xii. 12 the wording is exactly that of Ecclus.[4] Much more remarkable is the parallelism offered by St. James v. 3. There the word κατιόω is used, which does not occur in any other place in the N. T., nor yet in the LXX. But it does occur in Ecclus. xii. 11—and means not "to rust," but "to tarnish" (see note on xii. 11). Nor is this all. The word used for "rust" in St. James v. 3 is ἰός, which does not occur in that signification elsewhere in the N. T. But it does occur as a verb in Ecclus. xii. 10 (and again in xxix. 10—see the note there). Lastly, beyond any merely verbal correspondence, we have the remarkable fact that Ecclus. xii. 10 and xxix. 10, on the one hand, and, on the other, St. James v. 3, are the only biblical passages in which the figure of rust as affecting unused silver and gold occurs. In view of all this it cannot be doubted that both the simile and the expression of it in the Epistle of St. James were derived from Ecclus.

We conclude by collating some from the many parallels between our book and the Epistle of St. James.[1] Thus St. Jas. i. 2–4 may be compared with Ecclus. i. 23, and especially with Ecclus. ii. 1–5; St. Jas. i. 5 with Ecclus. li. 13: and with regard to the expectation of the direct bestowal of wisdom by God, comp. Ecclus. i. 26; iv. 11; vi. 37; xliii. 33 (also the expression ὀνειδιζόντος in St. James with ὀνειδιεῖ in Ecclus. xviii. 18: comp. also xx. 15; xxix. 28; xxxi. 31; xli. 22). Again, St. Jas. i. 6–8 should be compared with Ecclus. i. 28; ii. 16; vii. 10; xxxv. 16–21. [Mark here the correspondence between δίψυχος in St. Jas. i. 8 and μὴ ὀλιγοψυχήσῃς in Ecclus. vii. 10—and still more the remarkable similarity of figure between St. Jas. i. 6 and Ecclus. xxxiii. 2 b.] Again, St. Jas. i. 9–11 should be compared (in the choice of the words also) with Ecclus. i. 30; iii. 18; xxxi. 5–9—noting specially the remarkable similarity of figure between St. Jas. i. 10, 11 and Ecclus. vi. 2, 3. Again, St. Jas. i. 12 may be compared with Ecclus. vi. 28–31; or St. Jas. i. 13, 14 with Ecclus. xv. 11, &c. It would not be difficult, were this the place for it, to continue this comparison almost from chapter to chapter in the Epistle of St. James.[2] But if the result is to prove beyond doubt the familiarity of St. James with a book which at the time was evi-

[1] But the list given by Bretschneider (u. s., pp. 709–722) is altogether fanciful.

[2] Eichhorn, u. s., pp. 77, 78.

[3] Comp. an account of the literature of the subject—especially of parallelisms in the Epistle of St. James—in Boon, 'Dissert. exeg. theol. de Jac. Epist. cum Sirac. libr. conven.' pp. 2–11.

[4] For other instances as regards the Epistle to the Hebrews, we refer to the notes.

[1] The passages are selected from Boon, u. s.

[2] This has been done by Boon, u. s.

dently in wide circulation, it exhibits with even greater clearness the immense spiritual difference between the standpoint occupied in Ecclesiasticus and that in the Epistle of St. James.

§ VII. The Greek Version of Ecclesiasticus.

As unquestionably the oldest, the most important, and on the whole by far the most trustworthy rendering of the Hebrew original, the Greek version of Ben Sira deservedly holds the first place. The translator was, as he informs us in the Prologue, the grandson (or further descendant) of the author, and he executed his literary task in Egypt — at a time, as we infer, propitious for such undertakings. Beyond these scanty particulars and an uncertain chronological notice, we possess not any information about the translator. He pleads that he had used all diligence in his work, but also modestly excuses himself for any shortcomings or mistakes on the ground of the difficulty of exact translation from the Hebrew (see Prologue, and the notes on it). It must be admitted that he has ably performed his task, despite not unfrequent mistakes, due either to misreading or to misunderstanding of the original Hebrew. But besides these involuntary mistakes of ignorance, as we may term them, it cannot be doubted that the younger Siracide also allowed himself to make alterations of the original text. Such changes might be introduced (a) for apologetic reasons—the translator wishing to meet or anticipate objections, or to conciliate prejudice; or (b) when he felt not in agreement with the views of his grandfather; (c) from a desire to express those views more clearly (as he thought), or else (d) more forcibly—whether more realistically or more euphemistically; (e) by way of glosses; but chiefly (f) when he wished to introduce, instead of his grandfather's, his own Hellenistic views, thereby giving them the weight of the great Palestinian authority of the older Siracide. This charge may seem very serious, and in a sense it is so. But it must be remembered that the views of the ancients and their practice widely differed in this respect from ours, and we must extend to them a greatly enlarged measure of that literary licence which some seem to claim for themselves even in our own days. Indeed, while carefully guarding ourselves against the favourite but unwarranted general assumption of spuriousness, we may venture the opinion that probably few ancient religious writings have entirely escaped "redactions"—not to speak of interpolations. As regards Ecclesiasticus, the evidence of it comes to us from a comparison of the Greek with the Syriac text. Whenever we meet a distinctly Hellenistic sentiment in the Greek text, for which, on comparison, we find in the Syriac an ordinary Jewish sentiment, we suspect an alteration by the younger Siracide. Such modifications chiefly occur in passages specially treating of "Wisdom," but we also find them in others. To enumerate all the instances would require more space than this paragraph, and we must refer the reader to the commentary itself. But one or two examples will, at least, illustrate our meaning. In Ecclus. i. 3, 4, the Greek text has: "Who can trace out . . . and wisdom. Wisdom was created before all things, and intelligence of understanding from Aeon." This sounds distinctly Hellenistic. The Syr. omits "and wisdom" at the close of v. 3, and renders v. 4: "More abundant than all these is wisdom, and stronger is faith." For our next illustration we naturally turn to Ecclus. xxiv. Here the alterations, as compared with the Syr., are so numerous and so important that we must refer to the notes on that chapter. A specially interesting instance of this occurs in v. 31 (see the note on it). For our last illustration we select Ecclus. xliii. It requires but slight knowledge to recognise the pronounced Hellenism of such a verse as Ecclus. xliii. 27. But the whole stanza which begins with that verse contains Hellenistic elements, nor would it be difficult to discern traces of them in the two preceding stanzas. We are not surprised that v. 27 is not found in the Syriac Version. But it is certainly remarkable that in the Syriac the whole text after v. 12 is wanting, and it raises the suspicion that it had somehow been tampered with, perhaps by a later hand.

Apart from these objections, we are bound to say that the Greek of the text (especially in the Prologue) is fairly good, although the translation is slavishly literal and contains many Hebraisms. These might mislead the reader, and if literally rendered would seriously mar a translation into English.[1] The latter occasionally offers considerable difficulties—not only in the Prologue, but in other passages. What might be termed our Authorized English Version follows the text of the Complutensian Polyglot (1514–1517). It has been retained in the body of this work. But in the notes the needed alterations have been made, both in accordance with the better readings and to reproduce the text with the utmost literality compatible with the proper exhibition of its meaning. Where the Syriac Version seemed more accurately to represent the Hebrew original, this has generally been indicated, although it must be borne in mind that the present is a commentary on the Greek Version of the work of Ben Sira. The corrupt state of our present Greek text has long been subject of complaint. It appears even from a comparison of the various Codices. Some at least of the alterations seem to point to later Christian emendation.

Of the various manuscripts the first and most important is the Codex Vaticanus, 1209 (apud Holmes, II.). It forms the basis of the Sixtine (or common) edition ('Vet. Test. juxta Sept. ex auctoritate Sixti V. Pont. Max.' ed. Romae, 1587). The professedly correct edition of the Vatican text by Mai (5 vols. Romae, 1857) is unsatisfactory. Far more trustworthy in this respect is the recent edition by Vercellone and Cozza (6 vols. Rome, 1868–1881). On the basis of it Nestle has added, as an appendix to the 6th edition of Tischendorf's edition of the LXX., a collation of the Vatican and the Sinaitic Codd. [S^1, S^2], which has also been separately published. The Vat. Cod. is regarded by Tischendorf as dating from the 4th century. (2) Codex Sinaiticus, discovered by Tischendorf in 1859, and dated by him as of the 4th century. The MS. is now in the St. Petersburg Library, and has been published in 4 vols., St. Petersburg, 1862. It is designated by X in Fritzsche's edition. (3) The Codex Alexandrinus (marked III. apud Holmes et Fritzsche), now in the British Museum, and supposed to date from the 5th century. It was edited (in 4 vols. fol., Ox. 1707–1720) by J. E. Grabe,—vols. i. (1707) and iv. (1709) during his lifetime; vols. ii. (1719) and iii. (1720) after his death, by Fr. Lee. Where the Alex. text was defective it is supplemented from the Sixtine edition or from other MSS., indicating this by smaller type, and similarly any conjectural emendations, marking in the latter case the Alex. reading in the margin in ordinary type. Unfortunately this is not uniformly done. (Other edition in 8 vols. 8vo, Oxon.; and corrected by Fr. Field, Oxon. 1859.) The beautiful edition by J. J. Breitinger (Tig. 1730–1732, 4 tom. 4to) follows the text of Grabe, and gives at the bottom the Sixt. and other readings, adding critical dissertations. Lastly, it has been reprinted in a facsimile edition of the original by H. H. Baber (London, 1816–1821, 3 tom. folio, with Proleg. and notes, 1828); and finally reproduced in autotype facsimile (vol. i., 1881; ii. and iii., 1883; iv., 1879).[1]

Next in order we have to mention the splendid edition by Holmes and Parsons (Ox. 1798–1827, 5 tom. folio), containing the Sixtine text, but adding what to the present time is the most complete collection of variants. (The Apocr. are in vol. v.) For these a number of Codd.—of which several are, however, defective—come into account for Ecclesiasticus. They are: Codd. 23 of the 9th cent., in the Libr. Ven.; 55 of the 12th cent.—being Cod. Vat. 1, once belonging to Queen Christina of Sweden; 68 (often defective), from the library of St. Mark, Venice, of the age of other good Codd.; 70, Cod.

[1] So for example the rendering by λόγος of דבר in its common later meaning of "a thing" or "a matter," as in Eccles. Similarly חן in the sense of beauty is rendered by χάρις, as in Ecclus. xxiv. 16. Thus also in other instances, of which at least the more obvious have been pointed out by Eichhorn, Bretschneider, and other writers.

[1] Comp. also the Introd. to the Cambridge edition of the Sept., by Dr. Swete, 1887.

Bibl. Monast. S. Annae, Augustae Vindelic.; 106, Cod. Ferrariensis, e Codd. Bibl. Carmel. at Ferrara, 14th cent.; 155; 157; 248, Cod. Vat. 346, about the 14th cent., containing Prov., Eccles., Cant., Job, Wisd., Sir., Esdr., Tob., Jud., and Esth.; 253, Vat., 14th cent.; 254, Vat., 13th cent.; 296 and 307, Cod. Bibl. Elect. Monach., olim 276, nunc 129; 308, Cod. Palat. Vindob. — the latter belonging to Lucian's recension of the Greek text (Field, 'Origen. Hexapl.' Prol., p. lxxxviii.).

The Codices just enumerated were used by O. F. Fritzsche in his Commentary on Ecclus. ('Kurzgef. exeg. Handb. zu d. Apokr. d. A. Test.' 5te Lief. 1860), and in his critical edition of the 'Libri Apocr. Vet. Test.' (Lips. 1871). The latter work—although very valuable—is open to objection, not only in regard to the text, as proposed to be restored, but also because Fritzsche gives only a selection of the variants, and especially because he omits all reference to the Syriac Version, the importance of which he unaccountably fails to recognise. Besides these Codd., Fritzsche also made use of the fragments of the Cod. Ephraemi, which he marks by the letter C, and of the Cod. August., collated by D. Hoeschel, which he marks H. The palimpsest fragments of the books of Wisdom and Sirach, which Tischendorf brought from the East to St. Petersburg, and which he dates as from the 6th or 7th cent., have not yet been collated.

The first impression made by the great work of Holmes and Parsons is the wish that the collation of Codd. were made complete; the next, that the vast mass of materials could be reduced to order by grouping Codd. into families, and, if possible, determining their relation to the recensions of Origen, Lucian, and Hesychius. This has been already partly accomplished by the labours of F. Field, Cornill ('d. d. Buch T. Proph. Ezech.'), but especially those of Lagarde. But so far as Ecclesiasticus is concerned, the most interesting and important of these Codices is that marked 248, which is followed in the Complutensian Polyglot (Co.). It—or, more accurately, its archetype—may be described as chief of a class, to which 23, 253, H, and partly 106 and 55, belong. It is apparently the work of one hand. A comparison with Clement of Alexandria shews that the text of 248 was known and used by him, and hence that it must date not later than the beginning of the 2nd century.[1] Another interest of the text of 248 lies in its frequent agreement with the Vetus Latina (see next §), but especially with the Syriac Version—and therefore with the original Hebrew text, from which the latter was made. It deserves special notice that 248 does not contain the undoubtedly genuine Prologue by the younger Siracide, in place of which an evidently later redactor has added the spurious Prologue (also incorporated in Co. and thence in the English Version) found in the Synopsis, falsely ascribed to Athanasius (Op., ed. Bened., ii. p. 173).[2] We further mark that of all MSS. only 248 (and after it Co.) preserves the right order of the chapters after ch. xxx. (see notes), which is inverted in all the other Codices. In this it agrees with the Syriac Version (which is followed by the Arab.) and with the Vet. Lat.—the latter a noteworthy fact as regards that version. When from these two important preliminary points we proceed to an examination of the text of 248, we are struck not only with the frequency but with the remarkable character of its correspondence with the Syriac Version. Nor is it perhaps less instructive to find that in many instances 248 does not agree with the Syriac. As a curious instance of this we would point, among many others, to Ecclus. xxx. 25 (see the notes). A detailed comparison of the readings in 248 (which are given in full by Fritzsche) with the Syr. would be necessary fully to exhibit the state of the case. But some illustrative instances will be given when treating of the Syriac and the Latin versions. Three theories might here be suggested, of which at least two seem on examination wholly untenable. The first is that 248 may represent an independent Greek translation from the Hebrew. But in that case the differences from our other Greek MSS. would be much wider reaching and more complete; in fact, 248 would be essentially different from them. Nor yet would we expect to find in it any of the Hellenistic alterations of the younger Siracide. But as a matter of fact we find—to choose a notorious example—that in Ecclus. i. 4, 5, Cod. 248 (as well as the Latin Version) has a spurious addition, evidently from a later Christian redactor. And so in other characteristic instances. The second theory would be that the text underlying 248 had been corrected from the Hebrew original. But this also we have to reject, partly on the grounds above stated, and for this additional reason, that 248 leaves the impression of corrections, not from a first but from a second source. The third explanation which may be offered is that the text of 248 was corrected from the Syriac Version. In its present condition the MS. has undoubtedly been revised and redacted, apparently by a Christian hand. In evidence of this we find not only the spurious Preface, but also such spurious additions as that previously mentioned at the end of i. 4, which from its insertion in Co. appears as v. 5 in our Authorized English Version, where the λόγος of God seems plainly to refer to Christ. [This addition in 248 (and Co.) occurs also in the dependent Codd. H, 23, 55, 70—slightly different and evidently corrupt in 106 and 253.] The inference (for further support of which we must refer to the commentary) would seem to be, that 248 represents an old text which had originally been emended from the Syriac, and was afterwards revised, expurgated, and added to by a later, probably Christian, hand, and in accordance with the then textus receptus. Or does the text of 248 stand in any connexion with those that underlie the recension of Lucian? According to Hug, that text was emended from the Peshittho; but according to modern, although not unchallenged, opinion, from the Hebrew.

[1] We have examined 56 quotations by Clement from Ecclus. In by far the largest number of them he quotes freely, i.e. not exactly according to any known text. But in five instances his quotations markedly correspond with the text of 248.

[2] The real author of this spurious Prologue is not known, but it probably dates from the 4th or 5th cent.

Passing from the important question of the manuscripts, it only remains to add that the Greek text affords frequent evidence of the use of the LXX.; and that not only as regards the Pentateuch, but the historical and prophetic books, the Psalms, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes. In truth, the meaning of many expressions in Ecclus. can best be ascertained by a reference to the LXX. For detailed evidence we must once more refer to the body of the commentary. Occasional deviations from the wording of the LXX. should not be always set down to ignorance of its text. They may have been due either to quotation from memory, or they may be another reading, or else attempted improvements, such as it has been (and probably still is) the fashion of making upon the A. V.

On the other hand, it is very curious to find in LXX. Prov. xxvi. 11 an interpolation from Ecclus. iv. 21. Conversely, we have in the Syriac version of Ecclus. xxvii. 20 (21) an interpolation from Prov. vi. 5. Possibly these may have been originally marginal glosses which afterwards crept into the text. The same may be said of the inscriptions (or summaries of contents) which occasionally appear in the Greek text.

§ VIII. The Syriac Version and the "Vetus Latina."

We approach now one of the most important questions for the proper understanding of Ecclesiasticus. Till comparatively lately the almost unanimous opinion of critics has been that the Syriac translation had been made from the Greek Version. So far as we know, the learned Bendtsen ('Spec. exercit. crit. in Vet. T. libr. Apocr.' pp. 16, 29) stood alone in the opinion that the Syriac was derived directly from the Hebrew original. And, if we credit the statement of Jerome that he had seen the Hebrew original, there is not anything à priori incredible or even improbable in such a supposition.[1] But the decision of the question must necessarily depend on a detailed examination of the Syriac Version itself. Scholars in every way most competent for this task have of late pronounced unhesitatingly in favour of the view that the Syriac Version has been made from the Hebrew original. If the mere authority of names were here to prevail, we might appeal to such writers as Geiger (in an article in the 'Z. D. M. G.' vol. xii. pp. 536–543), Horowitz ('D. Buch Jesus Sirach,' 1865), Nöldeke ('Alttest. Lit.' p. 168, though he regards the Hebrew MS. used as very corrupt), Seligmann ('D. Buch d. Weish. Jes. Sir.' 1883), Professor Bickell ('Alphab. Lied Jes. Sir.'), and especially Lagarde ('Symmicta,' p. 88; 'Mittheil.' 1884; and his edition of the Apocr. in Syr., in which for this reason he gives the first place to Sirach). But hitherto the authority, or rather the contradiction, of Fritzsche (u. s., xxiv., xxv.)—unsupported though it be by any detailed criticism—seems to have prevailed with those who treated the questions against the deliberately expressed views of Syriac scholars. The latest writer on the subject has even ventured on the brief but categorical sentence, that "the book [Ecclus.] has been preserved to us only in the Greek translation."[1] On the other hand, it must be admitted that while those Syriac scholars who hold the opposite view have adduced certain passages in confirmation of it, they have not submitted the whole book to a detailed examination with a view to the final settlement of the controversy. This has been attempted in the present commentary, with the result, it is hoped, of not only proving the derivation of the Syriac Version from the original Hebrew text, but also of obtaining through the Syriac in many passages a more correct view of what the original text had really contained.

[1] The presumption in favour of a direct translation from the Hebrew seems to us greatly strengthened by the very able — although not on all points unassailable — dissertation of J. Perles on the age and authorship of the Peshittho ('Meletemata Peshitthoniana,' 1859).

As the argument here is not only direct —from certain passages—but cumulative, we must refer for the full evidence to the commentary itself, in which the comparison of the two versions is carried on. Within the compass of this section it is only possible to give a statement of some of the results arrived at, accompanied by illustrative instances.

Reference has already been made to the absence of the Prologue from the Syriac Version. Possibly this might be accounted for on the supposition that the writer had wished to give himself the appearance of having translated directly from the Hebrew. Not so the preservation of the right order of the text after ch. xxx. But these are only preliminary points. The evidence that the Syriac was translated from the Hebrew lies in this, that in many passages in which the Syr. and the Greek versions strangely and otherwise unaccountably differ, these differences can be traced back, and are due to one or other of these three grounds: (1) that the two translators had attached a different meaning to a Hebrew word which was capable of being rendered both ways; or (2) that they had vocalised (pointed) differently; or (3) that by a not uncommon mistake of similar letters they had read a word differently. Each of these explanations of the differences between the Greek and the Syriac leads to the inevitable conclusion that both translations had been made directly from the Hebrew original. As a well-known instance of the first kind, we may mention Ecclus. xxiv. 27, where the Greek has "as the light," and the Syriac "as the Nile." The Hebrew had no doubt כְּאוֹר, which the Greek understood "as the light," while the Syr., after the analogy of Am. viii. 8, rendered it as = כְּאֹר, "as the Nile." As instances of the second kind (that of different vocalisation), the following two may serve. In Ecclus. iv. 15 the Greek renders: "he who shall give ear to her [wisdom] shall judge nations;" the Syr., "shall judge truth"—the Greek having pointed the Hebrew אמת : אֻמּוֹת (Gen. xxv. 16), the Syr. (no doubt rightly) אֱמֶת. Similarly in Ecclus. x. 15, 16, the Greek has: "The Lord hath plucked up the roots of nations," and again: "Lands of nations the Lord overthrew," where in both cases the Syr. has, instead of "nations," "the proud"—rightly (at least in v. 15), as the context shews. It

[1] Schürer, 'Gesch. d. Jüd. Volkes' (the 2nd edition of his 'Neutest. Zeitg.'), ii. p. 595. He expresses himself even more strongly in the art. Apokrypha, in Herzog's 'Real-Encykl.' (vol. i. pp. 493, 494).

Digitized by Microsoft®

has been suggested that the original had גַּיִם, while the Greek pointed גֹּם. But we would suggest as more likely, that the original had נאים, which the Greek by an easy mistake in the ancient mode of making letters read גיים. It deserves attention that 248 corrects after the Syr. in v. 15, but not in v. 16—and the Vet. Lat. follows in both cases. [Was the Greek right in v. 16—or were 248 and Vet. Lat. influenced by a special (Christian?) motive?] As instances of the third kind (that of the confusion of similar letters or else the transposition of letters) we may quote Ecclus. xlviii. 23, where (as through a similar mistake in other places) the Greek translates: "In his days the sun went backward," while the Syr. has: "by his means (his hand) the sun went back"—the one having read בימיו, the other בידיו (a rendering which neither 248 nor the Vet. Lat. adopts). Again, in Ecclus. xlix. 9 the Greek has, "He remembered the enemies in storm" [see for this the note on the passage], while the Syriac read "Job" instead of "enemies"—no doubt wrongly—and accordingly altered the whole verse, which this misreading had rendered unintelligible. Here the Syriac translator had evidently transposed the letters, reading אִיּוֹב (Job) instead of אוֹיֵב (an enemy), as the Greek correctly read it. We mark that 248 has not the mistake of the Syriac, thus furnishing another evidence that when the two agree, the Syr. has not borrowed from 248.

These instances might suffice. But that they may not seem exceptional—perhaps even accidental—we select some others from among the large number indicated in the commentary, and adding the readings of 248 and the Vet. Lat.

Ecclus. xiv. 9 b. The Greek has: "wicked injustice drieth up the soul;" the Syr., "he that usurps what is his neighbour's"—the latter having evidently wrongly vocalised רֵעַ instead of רַע: 248 does not follow the reading of the Syr. The Vet. Lat. paraphrases.

Ecclus. xiv. 10. Greek, "An evil eye is envious over bread;" Syr., "multiplieth bread." There is here evidently some misreading of the Hebrew, although we do not venture on a definite suggestion: 248 does not follow the Syr., but the Vet. Lat., although paraphrastic, may preserve some trace of the Syr. rendering in its et non satiabitur pane (or does it attempt to mediate between the Greek and the Syr.?).

Ecclus. xiv. 27 b. Greek, "and he dwelleth in her glory;" Syr., "in her chambers," misreading חֶדֶר for חָדָר: 248 and Vet. Lat. do not follow the Syriac.

Or to pass over some chapters:—

Ecclus. xix. 5 (see the corrected translation in the notes). Greek, "he that hateth babbling;" Syr., "he that repeateth a thing"—the Greek misread שֹׂנֵא for שֹׁנֶה.

Ecclus. xix. 7. Greek, "and thou shalt fare never the worse;" Syr., "and no one shall revile thee." The Greek took the root of the word to be חָסַר, while the Syr. (as we believe, rightly) derived it from חָסַד, in the Piel, "to revile" (as in Prov. xxv. 10): 248 and Vet. Lat. do not follow the Syr. [For the suggested reading of the original, see the note on that verse.]

Ecclus. xxi. 8 (see the notes). The Greek seems to have read חֹרֶף, "winter;" the Syr. rightly, חֹרֶב, "desolation:" 248 (also 106) follows the Syr., but not Vet. Lat.

Ecclus. xxi. 18 (see notes). The Greek, בַּיִת מְשֻׁמָּד, "a house destroyed;" the Syr., בֵּית מְשׁוּמָר, "a prison:" 248 and the Vet. Lat. do not follow the Syr.

It could not serve any purpose to continue this comparison of the two versions. In the commentary it has been carried on from chapter to chapter. And we feel that the force of the evidence in favour of the direct translation of the Syriac text from the Hebrew cannot be fully appreciated by any number of isolated instances, while it becomes irresistible when the two versions are continuously compared.

Our further remarks must be brief. Although on a comparison of the differences between the Greek and Syriac translations, where such differences depend on the different rendering of words, we are disposed so often to give the preference to the Syriac, this is not by any means uniformly the case. Instances have already been given in which the Greek translation seems correct and the Syriac wrong. Again, we notice in the latter occasionally a displacement of lines, as in Ecclus. xxiv. 25, 26. Sometimes it might almost appear, although this is very doubtful, as if there were indication of a later revision of the Syriac by the Greek [as in Ecclus. xxiii. 27].[1] That the Syriac had undergone some later redaction seems suggested even by the circumstance that in the Arabic Version, which was evidently made from the Syriac, there are differences and notably omissions as compared with the Syriac (comp., for example, those in chaps. xxvii. and xxviii.). Sometimes we meet in the Syriac what may be regarded as apologetic (or emendatory) alterations, as in Ecclus. xxv. 7 (see the notes). To say that the Syriac Version is, as compared with the Greek, often and largely paraphrastic, is only to express what might otherwise have been expected. For the Syriac bears the character of a Targum and was certainly intended in great measure as an ecclesiasticus, or Church-book, for homiletical and catechetical purposes. One very important point still remains to be added. If Perles (u. s.) has arrived on critical grounds at the conclusion that the Peshittho Version of the New Testament was made by Jewish Christians, our investigations have led us to the same inference as regards Ecclesiasticus. We infer the Jewish origin of the translation from the occasional occurrence of expressions in Rabbinic usage. The evidence of the Christian character of the version—although necessarily inferential—is found throughout the whole book. But we may here specially refer to such passages as Ecclus. xxiv. 5, 9, xxvii. 17, and also to chaps. xxxv., xlvi., xlvii., xlviii. (see on these the commentary). Very significant also in this respect seems to us such an alteration as the substitution in vii. 31 of panem oblationum et primitias manuum for lines c and d. [The additions in the Vet. Lat. are still more curious.] On the same ground we account for the omission in the Syriac of Ecclus. xlv. 9–14, containing descriptive details of the Aaronic priesthood. Besides these passages—which might be considerably increased — we would (here following Bretschneider) call attention to the remarkable substitution in the Syr. for the text in the Greek in Ecclus. i. after v. 20 to the end; to xi. 12, xiv. 16; and to xvii. 27, 28.

It only remains to add that our knowledge of the Syriac text has been rectified since we possess it not only in Walton's Polyglot, but in the critical edition of Lagarde (1861), which has the corrections from MSS. in the British Museum. Jeh. Löw Ben-Seebh has published a Syriac text in Hebrew letters, with a Hebrew and German translation and a brief Hebrew commentary (Breslau, 1798; in new and improved edition, Vienna, 1807; ib. 1818; ib. 1828—the Hebrew version metrically rendered into German by M. E. Stern, Vienna, 1844[1]). But its usefulness is marred by the great liberties taken, not only in the Hebrew version, but with the Syriac text, in the way of omissions, transpositions, &c.

The Vetus Latina.—This is reproduced in our ordinary editions of the Vulgate [most handy as a critical edition, with different readings, is that by Heyse and Tischendorf, Lips. 1873]. All the variants from four MSS. are given by Sabatier ('Bibl. Sacr. Lat. versiones,' ii., Reimis, 1743). Jerome tells us expressly that he had left the text of the Vetus Latina untouched (calamo temperavi) in the (apocryphal) Wisdom of Solomon and in Ecclesiasticus ('Præfat. in edit. libr. Salom. juxta Sept. interpr.' [ed. Vallarsi, x. 436]).

If the Syriac Version may be described as a Targum or a paraphrastic "Church-book," this designation applies with even much greater force to the Latin translation

[1] Bretschneider (u. s., p. 701) adduces a few instances from which he erroneously infers that the Syr. translation was made from the Greek. They consist of instances in which, in his view, the Syriac rendering is accounted for by a slight alteration in the Greek. Although of no interest or value, they may, for completeness' sake, here find a place: i. 8, θησαυρούς for θρόνου; vii. 23, γάμησον for κάμψον; xi. 30, θηρεύθεισα for θηρευτής; xii. 11, κακιῶν αὐτόν for κατίωσε; xxii. 23, ποιῆσαι for κτῆσαι; or again, v. 3, ἀδικοῦμενος for ἐκδικῶν; ix. 2, ἐπιστῆναι for ἐπιβῆναι; l. 5, λαοῦ for ναοῦ. We only add that in all these cases 248 has the ordinary reading. The instances quoted by Bretschneider only prove the weakness of his case.

[1] See Fürst, 'Biblioth. Jud.' i. p. 105.

Digitized by Microsoft®

of Ecclesiasticus. Indeed, the student is bewildered amidst what seem redactions, interpolations, uncritical additions (some probably originally in the margin), alterations and paraphrases. In its present form the version leaves the impression that the main body of the text had been derived from the Greek. Yet this appearance may in some respects be deceptive. At any rate, we perceive a stratum which cannot be accounted for by any arbitrary alteration nor yet by derivation from any known Greek Codex. We have already observed that, like the Syriac and 248, the Latin preserves the right order of the chapters after ch. xxx. Likewise, it has been noticed that the Latin often has the same readings or emendations as 248. If these have been made from the Syriac [or else from the same sources], the suggestion would lie near that this stratum in the Vet. Lat. had been derived from the Syriac. It may indeed be suggested that it is traceable to other Codices or to sources which underlay the recension of Lucian. The latter view is supported by so great an authority as Ceriani (see the excellent Epilegomena to L. Van Ess's ed. of the LXX., 1887, p. 12). But here we may be said to be still partly on conjectural ground. And in any case the recension of Lucian brings us to Antioch. We can scarcely suppose that this stratum was taken from the text of 248 [nor from that group], since the Vet. Lat. so often leaves aside 248. If the translation had been made from that text, we would have expected more constant conformity to it. Not so, if emendations were here and there selected from the Syriac, nor even if the still remanent stratum represents an original use of the Syriac by the translator. There is, however, another supposition possible, viz. that this nucleus represents either a translation from the original Hebrew, or emendations from it. We confess that this does not seem likely to us—among other reasons, for this, that we can scarcely bring ourselves to believe that a translator who had access to the original would have produced such a version. The case would be otherwise if the translator was indebted to a not unfrequently paraphrastic version from the original. There he might more readily make selections, or a later redactor might even have struck out some of these selections. But the whole question is one of peculiar difficulty, and complicated by our uncertainty about the country and circumstances in which the Vetus Latina originated, and its relation to one of the three recensions of the LXX. What therefore we offer must be considered in the form of modest suggestion.

The conjecture that the Latin Version was derived from a Hebrew original—although from a Codex different from that used by the Greek translator—was first broached by Cornelius à Lapide ('Comment. in Ecclus.' p. 20). It was next mooted by the learned Sabatier (u. s. t. ii. p. 390), although without any attempt at proof. This deficiency was sought to be supplied by E. G. Bengel in the 7th vol. of Eichhorn's 'Allgem. Biblioth. d. bibl. Litter.,' 1796, pp. 832–864. The essay, as even its dimensions shew, is extremely slight, and the attempted investigation extends only over small portions at the beginning and in the middle of the book Ecclesiasticus. Bengel regards the Vetus Latina as dating "from the first centuries of Christianity."[1] He claims not certainty but probability for his theory that the Latin translation had been made with the aid of a Jew, or else by a Jewish Christian (as we have suggested in regard to the Syriac). The translator had rendered from the Hebrew, with aid from the Greek Version — the latter, either from special reasons, or this dependence was due to a glossator or to a later copyist. But, indeed, the use of the Greek in the rendering of the Vetus Latina seems beyond question. If detailed proof were required, even the passages adduced by Welte ('Einleit.' u. s., p. 215) would suffice for the purpose. As a Roman Catholic writer, he pleads for the great trustworthiness of the Vetus Lat.

[1] According to Cornill ('d. Buch d. Proph. Ez.' p. 26) the Vet. Lat. was used by Tertullian, indeed was in general use in Northern Africa. But so far as Ecclesiasticus is concerned, we cannot discover any trace of it in the seven passages in which, according to the Index in the ed. Oehler, Tertullian is supposed to refer to our book. Indeed, in only two of these passages ('de exhort. castitatis,' ii., and 'de monogam.' xiv.) is there any reference to Ecclus. (xv. 18)—and even there it seems to me doubtful, and certainly is not literally taken from the Vet. Lat.

But even he is obliged to admit that the translator had corrected his work by the Greek text.

But to return. Bengel begins by criticising certain passages in the Latin Version which are supposed to afford evidence of having been derived from the Greek text, with the view of shewing that such is not always the case. But as in some of these the Vet. Lat. accords with the Syr. —and presumably the Hebrew—while in others it only displays a curious ignorance of Greek (and is this not also characteristic?), it seems needless here to discuss them. In direct proof of the connexion between the Vet. Lat. and the Hebrew Bengel adduces a number of passages from Ecclus. i. and xxxiv. Most of these are, however, beside the point, as will appear from the following examination of the first six:—

Ecclus. i. 1, "et cum illo fuit semper et est ante aevum."—The words italicised are neither in the Syr. nor in 248. But they are apparently only a Christian gloss.

Ecclus. i. 2, "profundum abyssi."—The word italicised is not in 248, but is found in the Syr.

Ecclus. i. 3 in Vet. Lat. This seems a Christian gloss—perhaps it is an adaptation from the Syr. of i. 4.

Ecclus. i. 6 a. Here also there seems a Christian gloss in the Vet. Lat. So also in 7 b.

Ecclus. i. 7 a, b; i. 8. To both these passages in the Vet. Lat. the previous stricture applies.

Welte (u. s., p. 216), who seems on the whole inclined to regard the Vet. Lat. as primarily derived from the Hebrew original, selects from the essay of Bengel the following four passages as presumably in his view the best instances adduced:—Ecclus. i. 17: Greek ἐπιθυμημάτων, Vet. Lat. a thesauris—apparently a confusion between מטעמים and מטמנים [the latter word is actually used in the Talmud—Sanh. 100 b—in a quotation of Ecclus. xlii. 9, 10]. But the Vet. Lat. has here only the same rendering as the Syriac. Ecclus. i. 26: Greek ἐντολάς, Vet. Lat. justitiam, Hebrew (possibly) מישפט. But this instance does not really prove anything, and the slight alteration in the Vet. Lat. might even be due to anti-Judaistic motives. The next passage quoted is Ecclus. i. 29 a, where the Greek, misreading בְּפִי for בְּפָנַי, translates ἐν στόμασιν ἀνθρώπων, while the Vet. Lat. has in conspectu hominum. This, however, only once more sends us back to the Syriac, where we find the right rendering. Besides, 253 actually corrects: ἐνώπιον. The last instance adduced is Ecclus. i. 29 b, where the Greek has πρόσεχε, "and in thy lips take heed," reading תַּיְשִׂכִּיל (as in Prov. xvi. 23), while the Vetus Lat. has et non scandalizeris, reading אל תִּכָּשֵׁל, taking the אל from the previous clause. But 248 has substantially the same emendation (μὴ πρόσεχε).

These and similar instances are manifestly insufficient to establish the hypothesis of Bengel. We now proceed to select at least a few instances which in our view support the suggestion that the Vet. Lat. was somehow dependent on the Syriac.

Ecclus. xxv. 9. Greek, "he that has found prudence;" the Syr.—by a wrong reading and then wrong Syr. punctuation: that has obtained "mercy." Without that wrong punctuation the misreading would have been "a friend" (the original misreading being רעה for דעה). The Vet. Lat. follows this misreading, but not the mispunctuation (which may be of later date), and renders amicum verum. Neither 248 nor any other MS. follows the Syr. and Vet. Lat., which here also differ from the Hebrew.

Ecclus. xxv. 12 [A. V.] is a Christian interpolation. It was certainly not in the Hebrew original, and is only found in H, 248, and Co. But it occurs in the Syr. and in the Vetus Latina.

Ecclus. xxvi. 3. This is very curious, as shewing the dependence of the Vet. Lat. alike on the Greek and on the Syriac. The Greek has: "it shall be given in the portion of them that fear the Lord." The Syr. rightly renders: "to the man who feareth the Lord." The Hebrew had בחיק, "into the bosom" = "to the man," as in the Syr., while the Greek misread בחלק, "in the portion." Then the Syr. adds the gloss—evidently not from the Hebrew—"in return for good works." The Vet. Lat. takes from the Greek the first part, "in parte timentium Deum dabitur viro"—the latter word apparently from the Syr.; and it also adds from the Syriac, pro factis bonis. 248 has not this gloss, nor any other MS., nor was it in the Hebrew.

Mr. Margoliouth, although not agreeing with our views on this subject, points to the following passage as a most remarkable instance of accord between the Vet. Lat. and the Syr. To exhibit its full force we give the passage in the three versions.

Ecclus. xx. 14, Greek: "The gift of one [who is] senseless shall not profit thee, for in his view [literally, his eye] instead of one many" [see notes].

Syriac, v. 13: "Donum insipientis inestimabile est apud ipsum, quoniam oculi ejus ad compensationem septuplo majorem [seportandam] positi sunt." v. 14: "Parum dat et multum exprobrat, et aperiens os suum male loquitur et blaterat."

Vet. Lat., v. 14: "Datus insipientis non erit utilis tibi oculi enim illius [so far the three versions agree] septemplices sunt." v. 15: "Exigua dabit et multa improperabit et apertio oris illius inflammatio est."

The agreement here between the Vet. Lat. and the Syriac [marked by italics] is not less striking than their difference from the Greek.

There are also what appear to us other, perhaps minor, indications of a connection between the Vet. Lat. and the Syr. Thus it seems to mark alike the Christian character of the Syriac Version and its relationship with the Vet. Lat., that in Ecclus. xxxvi. 2 both these versions omit the word "all" from the sentence: "Send thy fear upon all the nations." If that word had not been in the Hebrew original, it is scarcely likely that the Hellenising Greek translator would have inserted it. And the word occurs in 248 and in all other MSS.; although 248—like the Vet. Lat.—adds after "nations" the Christian gloss, "who do not seek Thee" (Vet. Lat., exquisierunt), for which the Syr. has, "who have not known Thee." But, indeed, there are many traces of such Christian alterations in the Syr., but especially in the Vet. Lat., and their study is very interesting (compare, for example, the opening verses of chaps. xxiv. and xxxv., and the closing verses of the latter—such as xxxv. 25 in the Vet. Lat.). One of the most curious instances in which the Vet. Lat. follows the Syr. [against all the Greek MSS.], and in which both these versions have a marked Christian alteration, is xxv. 15 [see the note]. But the tracing of such indications is apt to become subjective, gaining force by their cumulation. It had therefore best be conjoined with a careful study of the text. This is not the place to continue the comparison of the two versions, but we may invite the consideration of such passages as, for example, Ecclus. xxv. 9, 12; xxvi. 3, 18; xxvii. 3; xxviii. 24, 25; xxix. 7. We add as an instance of the corrupt state of the text of the Vetus Latina that in Ecclus. xxv. 17, where the Vat. reading has "like sackcloth" and the Alex. "like a bear," the Vet. Lat. (v. 24) inserts both: "tamquam ursus, et quasi saccum ostendet"—evidently trying to make sense out of the two ("ursus" and then "quasi saccum ostendet"). Possibly one of these renderings may have crept in from the margin (see note on the verse). Similarly in xxv. 18 (Vet. Lat. 25) the Vet. Lat. combines the Greek with the Syriac reading, slightly altering the latter (see note on the verse). Instances of doublets and possibly triplets will be found in other places, especially in the earlier chapters.

§ IX. Other Ancient Versions.[1]

The Armenian, Æthiopic, Syro-Hexaplar, Coptic, and Palæoslavonic versions are all derived from the Greek.

1. The Armenian Version is published

[1] The notice of the versions enumerated in this paragraph is from the pen of Mr. D. S. Margoliouth, Fellow and Tutor of New College, Oxford. To the same scholar are also due the philological and critical parts of the notes from ch. xxxi. onwards; the introductions to these latter chapters, and the exegetical notes on them, being by Dr. Edersheim, who however holds himself also responsible for every part. Besides, the aid and co-operation of Mr. Margoliouth throughout this commentary—more particularly in the comparison of the Syriac text—are also here gratefully acknowledged. Some of his special suggestions are indicated in the places where they occur.

Digitized By Microsoft®

in the Venetian edition of the Armenian Bible, but in a fragmentary condition, having a lacuna from xxxv. 19–xxxviii. 14 (inclusive), and breaking off at xlii. 24; besides omitting minor portions, such as the whole of ch. viii., and single verses, e.g. xx. 15, 24 b. Like the rest of the Armenian version of the Bible, it is minutely faithful and exhibits occasionally a very unusual knowledge of the Greek language. The text followed resembles that of the Alexandrian MS. The most important variants which it affords will be found quoted in xl. 6 and xli. 17.

2. The Æthiopic Version exists only in MSS., of which eleven are in the British Museum, and several in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris. A short account of a copy at Tübingen was given by Ewald in the first volume of the 'Zeitschrift der Morgenländischen Gesellschaft.' The translation is ignorant and paraphrastic; in a few passages it shews signs of contamination with the Syriac (viii. 5, xxii. 15, xxxviii. 30, &c.).

3. The Syro-Hexaplaris is published in the magnificent seventh volume of Ceriani's 'Anecdota Sacra et Profana.' On this version generally, see the 'Bible Dictionary,' s. v. Versions. The text which it follows agrees minutely with that of MS. 253 in most places; but it also shews readings peculiar to 248. The translator would seem to have consulted the Peshittho in the interpretation of difficult words (e.g. iv. 30, φανταστικοπῶν, xxxiv. 21, xlv. 23).

4. The Coptic Version (in the Sahidic dialect) exists in a unique MS. of the 6th century at Turin, and has been published by Lagarde in his 'Aegyptiaca' (Göttingen, 1884). The MS. (which has suffered by age) was previously used by Peyron for his Lexicon. The text which it follows resembles that of the Sin., with several omissions and a few additions: in a very few cases it offers certain corrections of the Greek. A fragment of a Memphitic Version (chap. ii. 1–9) was published by Lagarde in 'Orientalia,' pt. i. (Gött., 1880).

5. The Palæoslavonic Version (published in the Slavonic Bibles) follows a text similar to that of the Complutensian edition, but with only a portion of the additions.

A copy of the Arabic Version corrected from the Greek is preserved in the Medicean library at Florence. The reviser has added a translation of the Prologue, in which he curiously makes the grandson state that he has translated the book into Syriac. A compendium of the Arabic Version is preserved in the Bodleian Library, but in an imperfect state.

The Scholia of Barhebraeus, to which reference is occasionally made, are taken from the Bodleian MS.

§ X. Authority of Ecclesiasticus in the Synagogue and in the Church.

The high authority in which our book was held in the ancient Jewish synagogue —whether on account of its age or its embodiment of universally received popular sayings—appears even from the frequency with which it is quoted in Talmudic writings. Zunz ('Gottesd. Vortr.,' pp. 101–103) enumerates no less than forty such citations—anonymous or expressly in the name of Sirach. Some of these cannot, however, be identified either in our present Greek or Syriac text, although some conjectural attempts have been made by Horowitz (u. s.).[1] What seems the earliest Mishnic reference to the words of the Siracide (Ecclus. ix. 9) reaches up to early Maccabean days (José, the son of Jochanan, Abh. i. 5).[2]

[1] For these quotations (mostly given in the present Commentary) see, besides Zunz (u. s.), Delitzsch ('Gesch. d. jüd. Poesie,' pp. 20, &c., 204, &c.); Dukes ('Rabbin. Blumenl.' pp. 67, &c.); Schuhl ('Sent. du Talmud,' passim); Fritzsche (u. s., p. xxxvii., &c.); Joël ('Blicke in d. Relig. Gesch.' i. pp. 71, &c.); Strack in Herzog's 'Real-Encykl.' vii. pp. 430, 431; and others—latest, Hamburger in the Supplemental Part to his 'Real-Encykl.' pp. 77–86.

[2] It is certainly rather a reference, although a very close one, than a quotation. It is adduced as a saying of the sages. On the other hand, the saying of José, the son of Joezer, "Let thy house be the meeting-place for the sages" (Abh. i. 4), and this other saying of the son of Jochanan (Abh. i. 5), "Let the poor be the children of thy household," might be intended as a protest against the bacchanalian feasts alluded to in Ecclus (comp. also Ecclus. ix. 14–16). On José b. Jochanan comp. Frankel in his 'Monatsschr.' i. (1852), pp. 405–407; Grätz, 'Gesch.' ii. pp. 274, &c., iii. p. 7.

Digitized by Microsoft®

Outward circumstances induced the Jewish teachers at different times to pronounce differently upon the book of Ben Sira. First, we have a series of quotations in which our book is adduced with the same formula as the hagiographa, and indeed is apparently classed with them.[1] Next, we are warned that, unlike the books of Holy Scripture, "the writings of Ben Sira . . . do not defile the hands" ('Tos. Yad.' ii. 13, ed. Zuckerm. p. 683). This, however, only implies the emphatic exclusion of Ecclus. from the Canon.[2] But the Jewish Fathers went further. Rabbi Aqibha declared the book included in those "outside" writings the perusal of which involved the loss of eternal life (Jer. Sanh. 28 a, near top); and the Midrash on Eccles. xii. 12, by a play on the words "and what is beyond (besides) these (viz. the words of the sages)," explains that "the rest," viz. the bringing into the house of uncanonical books such as Ben Sira, only brings confusion (reading instead of ויתר מֵהֵפָּה— מְהוּמָה, confusion). We would suggest that the change of feeling was connected with the Christian controversy—being due partly to apprehension of the danger of allowing the perusal of not strictly orthodox Rabbinical works, and partly to the wide use of Ecclus. in the early Christian Church. Be this as it may, the mood was only partial and transient. In consequence of a discussion on the saying of Aqibha, Rabbi Joseph, the head of the Babylonian Academy of Pumbadita, ultimately gave forth a statement which not only allowed the judicious use of the book, but leads us to infer that, as in the Church so in the synagogue, it was regarded as an ecclesiasticus, suited for catechetical and homiletic purposes (Sanh. 100 b). The passages specially recommended for this are the following, although from the modifications, additions or contractions, as compared with the Greek text, some of them are only hypothetically identified: Ecclus. xxvi. 3; xxv. 26; xxvi. 1; ix. 3, 8, 9; xxvi. 29; xi. 30 a, 32 a, 33 a; xi. 29 a; vi. 6; xxx. 21 or else xl. 7; xxxi. 4 (?). (Sanh. 100 b.) Indeed, we find references to our book not only in the Talmud, but in the Midrashim.[1] And from the first half of the 14th century comes the explanation that the Talmud had only intended to prohibit such a study of Ben Sira as should be made of the Bible, but not occasional resort to it (Ritba[2] in the En-Iaqobh to Bab. B. 98 b, apud Joël, u. s., p. 76).

We only add that, although the so-called Alphabet of Ben Sira contains in the first (or Aramæan) Alphabet four quotations from our book, and in the second (or Hebrew) Alphabet two such citations, it must not be confounded with our Ecclesiasticus,[3] and is of very much later date.

Use in the early Christian Church.—Leaving aside the general question of the use of the Apocrypha in the Church (on which the view of the Church of England is sufficiently expressed in Art. VI.), we briefly note some points of historical interest. Reference has already been made to the evident acquaintance with Ecclus. implied in the Epistle of St. James. There can be little doubt that in the Ep. of Barnabas xix. we have a quotation from Ecclus. iv. 31. Tertullian seems to refer to our book (Ecclus. xv. 18) with the formula: sicut scriptum est ('de Exhort. Cast.' c. 2, and 'de Monogam.' c. 14). Clement of Alexandria frequently quotes Ecclus.: thirteen times with the formula ἡ γραφὴ λέγει,

[1] So often: see Zunz, u. s. Strack ('Proleg. Crit. in V. T.' pp. 64, 65) has certainly not succeeded in the attempt either to explain or disprove this. On the other hand, Joël's proposed emendations of the condemnatory terms used in the Talmud about Ben Sira are ingenious, but neither satisfactory nor convincing (Joël, u. s. pp. 72–75).

[2] For the meaning of the expression "defileth the hands," see 'Life and Times of Jesus,' ch. xxxi. (vol. ii.).

[1] Four in Ber. R. (c. 8; 10; 73; 91); one in Shem. R.; two in Vayyk. R.; one in Bamidb. R.; one in the Midr. on Prov. c. 22 (?); two in that on Eccles.; three in the Midr. Tanchuma, &c.

[2] The name is an abbreviation from R. Jom Tobh b. Abraham Ishbili [from Seville].

[3] For an English translation of the two Alphabets of Ben Sira, as well as for that of the Talmudic quotations from our book, I take leave to refer the reader to my 'History of the Jewish Nation,' pp. 559–563. Comp. also Dukes (u. s.), Delitzsch (u. s.), and the literature of the subject in Fürst, 'Biblioth. Jud.' iii. p. 341; a new ed. by Steinschneider ('Alphab. Sirac. utr.' Berlin, 1858).

Digitized by Microsoft®

φησίν and the like; nine times with that of ἡ σοφία λέγει, φησίν and the like; thrice as the words of the παιδαγωγός. But as he also twice designates the book as ἡ σοφία Ἰησοῦ, it can scarcely be argued that he placed it on the same level with the Solomonic writings (but see 'Strom.' ii. 5, 24). Similar in form are the quotations of Origen from Ecclus., although he expressly ascribed the work to Jesus the son of Sirach ('contra Cels.' vi. 7). Cyprian, who often quotes from it, seems to treat it as if belonging to the Canon.[1] On the other hand, Jerome expressly declares it non-Solomonic and non-canonical (see the quotation in a former paragraph), and equally emphatically Athanasius ('Epist. fest.' 39), who ranks our book with the Didache, 'The Shepherd,' &c. None the less was the book used and quoted by the Fathers in a manner similar to that of the Jewish Fathers. Lastly, St. Augustine ranks the book with the canonical writings on account of its authority in the Church, although he denies its Solomonic authorship ('de doctr. Christ.' ii. 8). It is enumerated in the Hebrew Canon by the Synods of Hippo (393) and Carthage (397). The inclusion of the Apocrypha in the Canon by the Council of Trent (in the 4th Session, 8 April, 1546, 'Canon. et Decr.' ed. Tauchnitz, pp. 15, 16) is sufficiently known. (Comp. Herbst, 'Einl.' i. pp. 24, &c.; De Wette-Schrader, 'Lehrb.' pp. 596–599; Keil, 'Einl.' pp. 702, 703, 747; Schürer, u. s.)

§ XI. Literature of the Subject.

The references in the preceding paragraphs sufficiently indicate the works which have been chiefly consulted in preparing the present commentary. The literature of the subject is, however, very large. For its complete enumeration we must refer to the various Encyclopædias (German and English) and to the books of 'Introduction' to the Old Testament. The Greek text used has been that of Tischendorf ('Vetus Test. Graece,' &c., ed. vi^ta, 1880), and generally referred to as the Vatican, though it scarcely deserves that designation (see § VIII.). The full Vat. and Sin. readings have been collated from Nestle's supplement to the ed. (Lips. 1887). Besides, the variants in the magnificent ed. of Holmes and Parsons have been referred to. The critical edition of the Apocrypha by Fritzsche (Lips. 1871) has been already described. Of the various separate editions of the Greek text of Ecclesiasticus—with notes—that of Linde has no special value ('Sententiae Jesu Siracidae,' Gedani, 1795); that of Bretschneider has been constantly compared ('Liber Jesu Sirac. Graece,' Ratisb. 1806). The Syriac text used has been generally that in Walton's Polyglot. For Hebrew translations we have had the rendering by Ben Seebh (previously noticed). The Hebrew is elegant, but the translation follows sometimes the Syriac, sometimes the Greek — sometimes scarcely either the one or the other. The Hebrew in the translation of the Apocrypha by S. J. Fraenkel (Lips. 1830) is not so elegant as that of Ben Seebh, nor yet much more faithful to the text. Translations into Hebrew of portions of the text—such as that of ch. xxiv. by Lowth, emended by Fritzsche, and of ch. li. by Professor Bickell—are noted in their places in the commentary. The German translation of Gutmann ('Die Apokryphen d. A. Test.' Altona, 1841) affords not any help. The English version by Dr. Bissell (in the vol. on the Apocr. supplemental to Dr. Schaff's American ed. of the English translation of Lange's Bible Comment.) resembles in character that of Fritzsche. The latter, which is not strictly literal, is appended to his Commentary on Ecclus. ('Kurzgef. Exeg. Handb.' 5^te Lief. 1860).

The general questions connected with the book (such as its authorship, date, arrangement, versions, &c.) are discussed in the corresponding articles in the various Encyclopædias — such as (in German) those of Winer, Schenkel (by Fritzsche), Herzog (by Schürer), Riehm, and Hamburger—although with little variety or progression. So far as the Apocrypha and especially Ecclesiasticus are concerned, the like sameness characterises the account of our book in the various Introductions to the Old Testament:

[1] Comp. Schürer in Herzog's 'Real-Encykl.' art. Apokr., 487; 'Gesch.' 597.

Digitized by Microsoft®

De Wette-Schrader, Keil, Reuss ('Gesch. d. h. Schr. A. T.' 1882). To these must be added, as containing by far the fullest treatment of the subject, the account of Ecclus. by Schürer in the 'Gesch. des Jüd. Volkes' (1886), to which reference has already been made. A special place must, for various reasons, be assigned both to Welte's (R. C.) 'Einl. in d. deuterokan. B. d. A. T.' (in Herbst u. Welte's 'Einl.' Sect. II. part iii., Freiburg, 1844) and to Eichhorn's 'Einl. in d. Apokr. Schr. d. A. T.' (Leipz. 1795 —being vol. iv. of his 'Krit. Schr.'). Besides these German works, the articles Ecclesiasticus and Jesus the Son of Sirach in Smith's 'Dict. of the Bible' (vol. i.) have been consulted, as well as the able and learned summary by Dr. Davidson in vol. ii. of his ed. of Horne's Introd. (1856, pp. 1024–1033).

On the relation of our book to Philo and Jewish Hellenism, the works of Gfrörer and Dähne and the art. Philo by the present writer in Smith and Wace's 'Dict. of Chr. Biogr.' have been referred to. For the relation of the Greek text to the Syriac and for other general questions the articles by Geiger in the 'Z. D. M. G.' xii. 1858, and by Horowitz in Frankel's 'Monatsschrift,' vol. xiv. (since published as a separate brochure, 1865), have been perused. For the relation of Ecclus. to Proverbs we have referred to C. Seligmann ('D. B. d. Weish. J. Sir.' 1883); for the references in the Epistle of St. James, to A. Boon ('Dissert. Exeg. Theol. de Jac. ep. cum Sir. libro convenientia'). As regards the relation of the Vetus Latina to the Hebrew original, special notice has been taken of Bengel's art. in Eichhorn's 'Biblioth.' vol. vii., which is repeated in summary in Bertholdt's 'Histor. Krit. Einleit.' pp. 2306–2309. On historical questions the works of Herzfeld, Ewald, and Grätz have been referred to. On the Wisdom-teaching and the Dogmatics and Ethics of Ecclus., the book of Dr. J. F. Bruch ('Weisheits-Lehre d. Hebr.' Strassburg, 1851) and the 'Schul-Programm' by Dr. V. Merguet (Königsberg, 1874) have been perused.

Beyond the works just referred to, an exhaustive study of all the Commentaries on Ecclesiasticus has not been attempted —the more so that it was wished to make a fresh study of the book. The Annotations in vol. v. of the 'Critici Sacri' deserve constant attention, especially those by Drusius and Grotius. The latter are mostly the source of the classical parallels, not unfrequently noted by writers. For this reason, and because they are often rather coincidences than parallels, it has not been deemed necessary to repeat them. It needs scarcely be said that the Commentary of Fritzsche (in the 'Exeg. Handb.') has been constantly compared and used. It is by far the fullest work on Ecclesiasticus, and its learning and ability are beyond question. The (American) Commentary of Dr. Bissell in vol. xv. of Schaff's ed. of Lange's Comment. chiefly follows that of Fritzsche. Besides these, the Commentary of Bretschneider ('Liber Jesu Siracidae') deserves and requires careful perusal, although the book bears marks of youth and haste. The brief annotations of Joach. Camerarius ('Sententiae Jesu Sirac.,' at the end of the Greek text, pp. 136–213) are chiefly interesting for the quotation of parallelisms from classical writers. The notes of J. G. Linde ('Sent. J. S.' Gedani, 1785) are very brief, but occasionally really valuable; the few Rabbinic annotations of M. Gutmann ('D. Apokr. d. A. Test.') are not only scanty, but also slight.

Lastly, we have now to add to the literature on Ecclus. the discussion of the book in Professor Cheyne's 'Job and Solomon,' pp. 179–198, which came too late to be used in the preparation of the present commentary. It is characterised by the learning, clearness, and beauty of diction of that writer.

Digitized by Microsoft®

THE WISDOM OF JESUS THE SON OF SIRACH,

OR

ECCLESIASTICUS.

[A Prologue made by an uncertain Author.

Some refer this Prologue to Athanasius, because it is found in his Synopsis.

THIS Jesus was the son of Sirach, and grandchild to Jesus of the same name with him: this man therefore lived in the latter times, after the people had been led away captive, and called home again, and almost after all the prophets. Now his grandfather Jesus, as he himself witnesseth, was a man of great diligence and wisdom among the Hebrews, who did not only gather the grave and short sentences of wise men, that had been before him, but himself also uttered some of his own, full of much understanding and wisdom. When as therefore the first Jesus died, leaving this book almost ‖perfected, Sirach his son receiving it after him left it to his own son Jesus, who, having gotten it into his hands, compiled it all orderly into one volume, and called it Wisdom, intituling it both by his own name, his father's name, and his grandfather's; alluring the hearer by the very name of Wisdom to have a greater love to the study of this book. It containeth therefore wise sayings, dark sentences, and parables, and certain particular ancient godly stories of men that pleased God; also his prayer and song; moreover, what benefits God had vouchsafed his people, and what plagues he had heaped upon their enemies. This Jesus did imitate Solomon, and was no less famous for wisdom and learning, both being indeed a man of great learning, and so reputed also.]

Or, collected.

The Prologue of the Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach.

WHEREAS many and great things have been delivered unto us by the law and the prophets, and by others that have followed their steps, for the which things Israel ought to be commended for learning and wisdom; and whereof not only the readers must needs become skilful themselves, but also they that desire to learn be able to profit them which are ‖without, both by speaking and writing: my grandfather Jesus, when he had much ‖ Or, of another nation.

Whereas many and great things have been delivered unto us.] "Great," in the sense of important; "delivered," here δεδομένων, not παραδίδοσθαι, as usually and more aptly; "to us," viz. to the Jews.

by the Law, the Prophets, and the others who followed upon them.] Viz. the writers (not the writings) that followed—presumably, the authors of the Hagiographa.

for which it is due to commend Israel for culture (παιδεία, disciplina; De Wette, "instruction") and wisdom.] The two terms are again found immediately afterwards, and (though in inverse order) in Ecclus. i. 27. In the LXX. παιδεία is the equivalent of ten Hebrew words. Here it probably stands for the Hebrew מוּסָר, which is so rendered twenty-one times in the LXX. rendering of Prov., while the two terms, as here, are four times combined (Prov. i. 2, 7, xv. 33, xxiii. 23; Theod., S.-H., 23, and ten other Codd.), and in only two instances (Prov. x. 17 b; xvii. 8?) two other Hebrew words are represented by παιδεία in Prov. The Hellenistic tone of this commendation should be marked. It seems intended to strengthen the confidence of Israel in their position among the Greeks, and to conciliate the favour of the latter.

and since it behoves those who read (or, readers) not only to become skilful (scientes, "einsichtsvoll") themselves (X, C, H, 55, 155 read γενέσθαι), but also that they who love learning (are eager after knowledge) should be able to be of use, both speaking and writing (by verbal instruction and written works), to them that are without.] This is the common meaning of the expression. In that case the reference would seem to be to Grecian proselytes, or perhaps even to inquiring heathens, and only secondarily to the Jews in the dispersion. But in the usage of Polybius the expression only means "outsiders" or "others."

my grandfather Jesus.] Or, possibly: "my given himself to the reading of the law, and the prophets, and other books of our fathers, and had gotten therein good judgment, was drawn on also himself to write something pertaining to learning and wisdom; to the intent that those which are desirous to learn, and are addicted to these things, might profit much more in living according to the law. Wherefore let me intreat you to read it with favour and attention, and to pardon us, wherein we may seem to come short of some words, which we have laboured to interpret. For the same things uttered in Hebrew, and translated into another tongue, have not the same force in them: and not only these things, but the law itself, and the ‖ prophets, and the rest of the books, have no small ‖ difference, when they are spoken in their own language. For in the eight and thirtieth year cir. 133.

Digitized by Microsoft®

‖ Gr. prophecies.
‖ Or, excellency

ancestor Jesus." On the meaning of this word and on the date of the work of the older Siracide, comp. Introd.

having given (devoted) himself more [than others] (so in the usage of Polyb.—amplius; but Wahl, "for longer") to the reading (study), &c.] The arrangement of the Old Testament into "Law, the Prophets, and the other books of the fathers" (comp. St. Luke xxiv. 27; Jos. c. Ap. i. 8), appears here for the first time. It is probable that this passage gave rise to the tripartite division of the Old Testament which was afterwards universally adopted.

and having gotten therein sufficient (= much, sat multus, quod satis est) proficiency.] So in the usage of Polyb.: "as the result of practice." In LXX. 1 Kings (1 Sam.) xvi. 7 the word stands for "height."

that those who love (are eager for) learning.] The next clause is ambiguous. Most modern writers render it: "becoming also attached to these things," viz. to this new contribution of the Siracide. But the rendering of the A. V., slightly modified, seems better: and are become attached to these things, viz. those things in which Ben Sira himself had gotten such skill—the Law, the Prophets, and other writings of the fathers. This agrees better with the plural number (τούτων ἔνοχοι: comp. ἐν τούτοις . . . ἦν), whereas the work of Ben Sira is referred to in the singular (τι τῶν κ. τ. λ.). It also accords with the general context. The object of the elder Siracide was to further in religion those who, comparatively ignorant, were desirous to learn, and had become attached to these things. On the other hand, it would be difficult to attach any definite meaning to their becoming attached to his new work.

might make all the more progress by a life (living) according to the Law.] The διὰ is generally rendered "in," not "by," but the sense is nearly the same in both cases.

Although the tone of this introductory statement is Grecian, it is Palestinian in spirit. For the Rabbis often urge the duty of those who had learned to teach others. Thus it was said that the promise Ps. cxii. 3 applied to those who, having learned, also taught the Law (Kethub. 50 a); and the expression "the law of kindness" (Prov. xxxi. 26) is explained to mean study in order to teach (Sukk. 49 b). On the other hand, we are told that there is not greater vanity than to have learned the Law and not to instruct others (Deb. R. 2). Indeed, according to Rabbi Meir, such an one "despised the word of the Lord," according to Numb. xv. 31 (Siphré, ed. Friedmann, p. 33 a). Similarly, in regard to the necessity of knowledge in order to attain purity of life, there was not any principle more generally current than that an uncultivated person did not fear sin, and that the ignorant could not be pious (Ab. ii. 5). Indeed, Rabbinic study was based on this idea.

In what follows the younger Siracide bespeaks "favour and attention" for the work of his ancestor, and as translator asks the readers to pardon (to have a lenient judgment) wherein (in those things where) we may appear, while having bestowed diligent labour on the translation (circa interpretationem laborando), to have failed in some of the words. It has, however, also been proposed to render the sentence: "Wheresoever we seem in our carefully elaborated translation in certain of our phrases to give no meaning." The next sentence—translated in the A. V. with sufficient accuracy, though not quite literally—explains as reason of such failure, that a translation could never quite convey the force of the original. "These things" refer to the present work. We note that the expression "Hebrew" (tongue) occurs here for the first time in Old Testament literature.

Lastly, the translator proceeds to give his reasons for undertaking the work.

For in the eight and thirtieth year, under king Euergetes.] See Introd. Rather: "I found no small difference of culture." coming into Egypt, when Euergetes was king, and continuing there some time, I found a book of no small learning: therefore I thought it most necessary for me to bestow some diligence and travail to interpret it; using great watchfulness and skill in that space to bring the book to an end, and set it forth for them also, which in a strange country are willing to learn, being prepared before in manners to live after the law.

Or, help of learning.

CHAPTER I.

1 All wisdom is from God. 10 He giveth it to them that love him. 12 The fear of God is full of many blessings. 28 To fear God without hypocrisy.

B. C. cir. 200.

ALL [a]wisdom cometh from the Lord, and is with him for ever.

[a] 1 Kings 3. 9. James 1. 5.

The word which we have rendered "difference" has been variously translated, and also means "made like unto." But our version suits the context best. Having during his residence in Egypt felt the difference of culture —in modern parlance: of standpoint and development—between the Palestinians and Grecians (whether Jews, proselytes, or Greek friends and inquirers), he was anxious to present the work of his ancestor in a Greek garb. It will be noticed that, strictly speaking, the text gives not any information on the controverted question, at what precise date the younger Siracide had begun his translation, still less when he finished and published it, but only states that he had arrived and settled in Egypt under the reign of Euergetes.

Fritzsche inserts after "most necessary" οὖν (from X, C, H, 55, 105, al., Old Latin); after "thought," καί, "therefore I also thought" (from III. and the previously-quoted readings). "Diligence:" rather, zeal [speed, trouble] and laboriousness. "To interpret it:" rather, "on the translating of this book." "Using:" add "indeed." "In that space:" rather, "in the interval of the time," i.e. while he carried on his work, he robbed himself of sleep and employed all his knowledge and skill "in order, having brought the book to an end (for ἄγοντα read ἀγαγόντα, C, H, Alex., 55, 106, 155, 253, 254, 296), to give it forth (publish it) also for those abroad (in foreign lands, i.e. in "the dispersion") who are," &c. The expression is used of sojourn in a strange land, as in Acts xiii. 17, 1 Peter i. 17; and in the same sense the verb (St. Luke xxiv. 18; Heb. xi. 9) and the subst. adjective (Acts vii. 6, 29; Eph. ii. 19; 1 Pet. ii. 11; and also frequently in the LXX., in the Apocrypha, and by Philo). "And are prepared," &c.: rather, "prepare themselves in manners (as to morals and customs) to live after the law."

CHAPTER I.

This chapter naturally forms the Introduction to the whole work. It consists of two equal parts, each of fourteen (2 × 7) verses, viz. Part I., vv. 1–15 (omitting the spurious v. 5); Part II., vv. 16–30. The first part may be designated as the theoretical (or objective), the second as the practical (or subjective) aspect of the theme.

Each part is again subdivided into equal stanzas. [In general we notice that the numerical arrangement of stanzas, and even verses, throughout this book is marked, and indeed characteristic.] Part I. consists of two stanzas, each of seven verses (vv. 1–8, 9–15). The first stanza (vv. 1–8) opens with a statement of the general theme (v. 1)—the other six verses being an enlargement of v. 1 b, which sets forth that Wisdom is for ever with God. Similarly, the second stanza (vv. 9–15) takes up the first clause of the initial proposition (v. 1 a), that Wisdom cometh from the Lord. It is created, and bestowed by God as His gift to humanity (vv. 9, 10); it is moral and practical ("the fear of the Lord") as well as speculative, and bestows the best gifts in life and death (vv. 11–13); and it is a permanent gift alike to the individual and to humanity (vv. 14, 15). In the last two verses (14, 15) the author returns to the subject of the first two verses in the stanza (vv. 9, 10).

Part II. consists of three stanzas of five, five, and four verses—the last being, however, a double verse (v. 30). It may be described as the practical aspect of the subject. Stanza i. (vv. 16–20) sets forth what Wisdom is, and what Wisdom does for the wise. Stanza ii. (vv. 21–26) might be briefly thus inscribed: "The fool (= ungodly) and the wise (= righteous);" and stanza iii. (vv. 27–30) conversely: "The wise and the fool."

[On the relation of the Greek text of this chapter to the Syriac Version, see the notes.]

1. The manner in which Wisdom is set forth is extremely characteristic of the standpoint of Ecclesiasticus, as intermediate not only between the Old Testament and Jewish Hellenism, but between the latter and what afterwards was distinctively Palestinian teaching. Comp. here on the one hand such descriptions of Wisdom as in Wisd. vii. 21–27, and chap. viii.—or still further in the writings of Philo—and on the other hand the teaching of the Rabbis, which identified Wisdom with the Torah, or Law. Even the opening sentence

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

2 Who can number the sand of the sea, and the drops of rain, and the days of eternity?

3 Who can find out the height of heaven, and the breadth of the earth, and the deep, and wisdom?

4 Wisdom hath been created before all things, and the understanding of prudence from everlasting.

B. C. cir. 200.

5 The word of God most high is the fountain of wisdom; and her ways are everlasting commandments.

of Ecclus. (v. 1) is both Grecian and Hebrew—the former element appearing in the word all, the latter in the derivation of "all wisdom" from God. And this "wisdom" is "for ever" with God (comp. Job xii. 13). The Old Lat. Version has: "and was with Him ever, and is before the Age" (et cum illo fuit semper, et est ante ævum).

2. The proposition in the second clause of v. 1 is farther carried out, both negatively and positively, in the following verses. That Wisdom is really with the Lord for ever, appears from the inscrutable mysteries by which we are surrounded (vv. 2, 3). The whole passage reminds us of Prov. xxx. 4. "The days of eternity"—lit. "of Æon." The reasoning may be thus paraphrased: Who can compute either the numberless grains which make up the sand of the sea, or the drops in the rainfall, or the series of days which constitute Æon? To us it is all inscrutable. The term "Æon" occurs very frequently in the LXX.—almost exclusively for the Hebrew Olam. The expression "days of Æon," or of "the Æon," is found in the LXX. rendering of Deut. xxxii. 7; Is. lxiii. 9; Am. ix. 11; Mic. v. 2, vii. 14; Mal. iii. 4. Similarly, the expression "sand of the sea" is frequent in the LXX., and in the Bible is employed to denote an innumerable quantity. The reference to the rain-drops recalls Job xxxvi. 27, where the LXX. use the same words. It has, however, been also suggested that v. 2 may not be intended to mark the inscrutable character of what is there mentioned, but rather to indicate topics of comparison with the inscrutable character of Divine wisdom.

3. find out.] Rather, trace out.

the deep.] Rather, the abyss. The Armenian Version has: "the abyss of wisdom." The Syriac (as also Vet. Lat. and 70) omits "and wisdom." We regard the words as a Hellenising addition by the Greek translator. The language recalls the cosmogony of Philo ('de Mundi opif.' ed. Mangey, i. 6, 7; ed. Fref., p. 6), in which first the "unbodily" heaven and the "unseen" (invisible) earth and "the idea" of air and vacuity were made by God in the "intelligible" (ideal) world. It seems the more likely that the younger Siracide may have entertained views kindred to those afterwards developed by Philo, since the same ideas appear in the LXX. rendering of Gen. i. 2: "And the earth was unseen (invisible) and unwrought" (unformed—the word occurs only here in biblical literature). Among the Rabbis we find similar speculations—although under ban of the authorities—about the pre-existence of matter and the formation, rather than the creation, of the world (comp. 'Life and Times of Jesus,' vol. i. pp. 50, 51). In these speculations water was mostly regarded as the original matter. One Rabbi (Ben Soma) thought that only two or three fingers' breadth intervened between the upper and the lower waters (Ber. R. 1); and that these issued from the Thehom, or abyss. The Hellenistic character of the views of the younger Siracide accounts for the otherwise apparently incongruous juxtaposition of "abyss" with "wisdom"—here in the sense of creative, formative wisdom.

4. understanding of prudence.] Rather, intelligence of understanding [purpose? thoughtfulness?]. The Armen. Vers. has the two words in apposition, as similarly Prov. i. 4; their conjunction in Prov. viii. 12, comp. i. 4. The verse seems another of the Hellenistic alterations by the Greek translator. The Syr. renders v. 4: "More abundant than all these is wisdom, and stronger is faith." The latter words suggest a Christian hand.

from everlasting.] Lit. from Æon.

On the negative statement concerning "Wisdom" (in vv. 2, 3) follows now the positive. Alike the first and second clauses of v. 4 seem parallel to, and are explained by the first and second clauses of v. 6. Verse 5 is found only in H, 23, 55, 70, 106, 248, Co. and in the Old Lat., and has been rightly omitted by Fritzsche. It is evidently an interpolation, intended to avert heterodox teaching or application.

In regard to the term "create" in v. 4, it is true that in Ecclus. it is used in the sense of "forming" or preparing (so probably, though not certainly, in Ecclus. xxxix. 25, and in xl. 1, xliv. 2, and more doubtfully, xlix. 14). But in these passages the word is evidently employed in a wider, almost figurative sense. Bretschneider is therefore not justified in contending that the word in our verse does not mean "to create." It might represent the Hebrew קנה, which the LXX. render in Prov. viii. 22 by "create" (so also in Gen. xiv. 19, 22, while generally they translate ברא by κτίζω). Although this view of "Wisdom" as created before all things is here probably

B. C. cir. 200.

6 [b] To whom hath the root of wisdom been revealed? or who hath known her wise counsels?

7 [Unto whom hath the knowledge of wisdom been made manifest? and who hath understood her great experience?]

8 There is one wise and greatly to be feared, the Lord sitting upon his throne.

9 He created her, and saw her, and numbered her, and poured her out upon all his works.

B. C. cir. 200.

10 She is with all flesh according to his gift, and he hath given her to them that love him.

11 The fear of the Lord is honour, and glory, and gladness, and a crown of rejoicing.

12 The fear of the Lord maketh a

[b] Isai. 40. 13. Wisd. 9. 13. Rom. 11. 34. 1 Cor. 2. 16.

Grecian, it may also be referred to Prov. viii. 22. The Rabbis substituted for "Wisdom" the Torah (Law), which they represented as one of the six things created before the world (Ber. R. 1), or according to another passage, 2000 years before it (Midr. on Song v. 11). They commented on Prov. viii. 22 to this effect, that God had looked into the Torah, as an architect into his plans, and so created the world (Ber. R. 1). The second clause of v. 4 may probably refer to the details of creation. The personification of "Wisdom" in our verse is only figurative. It is interesting to mark that Philo also quotes Prov. viii. 22, interpreting it in a manner similar to the Siracide ('de Temul.' [ebriet.], ed. Mang. i. 362; Frcf. p. 244).

6. Rather, was revealed, and who knew her subtle devices? "Subtle devices," with the additional meaning of secrecy—Vet. Lat., astutias illius. The inscrutable character of "Wisdom" is farther shewn in regard to her root—as being in God, and to her working. The reference is not to Wisdom as in God, but to Wisdom as manifesting herself. The second half of the verse is omitted in the Armenian Version. The Syr. begins the verse with מן לקודמין—evidently the "from Æon" of the close of v. 4 in the Greek Version.

7. This is another interpolation, found in the same Codd. as v. 5.

8. One is wise, and to be feared greatly, sitting upon His throne: the Lord.] "To be feared greatly," comp. Joel ii. 11, and Ecclus. xliii. 29. In Him Wisdom is joined to power, although the reference may also be to His moral properties: He is the Lord. The Syr. and Arab. Versions have: "ruleth over all her treasures." The Syr. Vers. and the Old Lat. omit the words "wise and," which probably were not in the Hebrew original.

9, 10. Beginning of stanza ii. (vv. 9–15). The writer proceeds to give an account of Wisdom as Divinely bestowed. "Numbered her"—so literally. Although the words of the Hebrew original were probably taken from Job xxviii. 27 (see marg.), it does not follow that the younger Siracide mistranslated them because they differ from the rendering of the LXX. (ἐξηγήσατο). Some have translated: "He divided her," i.e. He bestowed on the things to be created, to each its part of wisdom. And this may be the meaning of the addition in the Syr. and Arab. Versions: "He numbered and gave it." We hesitate connecting the expression with the Sephiroth, or "enumerations" (emanations) of the Kabbalists, although to "enumerate" might be equivalent to creatively determining and setting it forth, and in that sense revealing it.

There cannot be any doubt as to the meaning of the next clause, with which the first part of v. 10 must be logically connected (the words "she is" are not in the original): "He poured her upon all (the Arm. omits "all") His works—v. 10*a*: [together] with all flesh, according to His good will (donation)." That this latter is here the correct meaning rather than "gift"—certainly not "appointed portion"—appears not only from the Syr. and Arab. Versions, but from the whole context, and seems supported by Ecclus. xi. 17, where the word δόσις in the first clause is parallel to "good pleasure" in the second. The expression "all flesh" means here "all mankind," as in Gen. vi. 12; Joel iii. 1. The word "with" seems at first sight to render the explanation difficult. But it may mean that wisdom has been bestowed on all God's works in connexion with man. It follows quite aptly (v. 10*b*) that "He supplied (bestowed) her abundantly to them that love Him." Teaching similar to this, only in more developed form, occurs frequently in Philo. Notably, he tells us ('de Profug.' ed. Frcf. p. 470) that God pours of His etherial wisdom upon all generous and inquiring minds. But while they rejoice in it, they know not the author and source of it. This is God, who has given His word as the bread from heaven. These Divine precepts bring to the Israelitish, i.e. the receptive soul, light and sweetness. And then Philo proceeds to shew the superior happiness (as compared with that of the mere philosopher) of obedience to the commandments and the service of God.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

merry heart, and giveth joy, and gladness, and a long life.

13 Whoso feareth the Lord, it shall go well with him at the last, and he shall find favour in the day of his death.

[a] Or, shall be blessed.

B. C. cir. 200.

14 [c]To fear the Lord is the beginning of wisdom: and it was created with the faithful in the womb.

15 She hath built an everlasting foundation with men, and she shall continue [d] with their seed.

[c] Ps. 111. 10. Prov. 1. 7. & 9. 10.

[d] 2 Chron. 20. 21.

11. From this account of Wisdom, as Divinely bestowed—to which vv. 14, 15 correspond (see the introduction)—the writer passes in v. 11 to Wisdom in its practical aspect, which is the fear of the Lord, telling us what it is, and what it bestows, alike in life and death. The "crown of rejoicing" is a figure easily understood, derived from the custom on festive occasions.

12. gladdens (cheers) the heart.] The same expression occurs in LXX. Prov. xxvii. 9. The verbs, it should be noticed, are all in the future tense. For the last clause comp. Deut. iv. 40, vi. 2; Prov. iii. 1, 2, 16, x. 27; Eccles. i. 20. The Rabbis also regard length of life as the reward of righteousness (Prov. x. 2): it delivered even from natural death (Shabb. 156 b), and death at sixty was "by the hand of God" (Jer. Bikk. 64 c). Similar statements frequently occur in the Midrashim.

13. In the margin, "shall be blessed," which marks the better meaning and reading of 111., X. H, 23, 70, al., Co., and the Old Lat. So also the Syr. and Arab. Versions. We should be glad to believe that the expression "it shall be well at the last" (ἐπ' ἐσχάτων) was intended to bear reference to the after-death. But the term (in the plural), which occurs in at least five other passages of Eccles. (four of them wrongly marked in Trommius, 'Concord.'), refers in only one of these places (Eccles. xlviii. 24) to what we would call "the last things," "the end of time." On the other hand, the dreary references to death by Ben Sira (as xviii. 12; xxxviii. 17–23; xli. 1–4) indicate a poor philosophy and an almost worse than Sadducean theology, which entertains not any real hope for after death. The single passage in Eccles. xlviii. 11, quoted on the other side, requires special consideration (see the comment. On the subject generally see the Introduction). Bretschneider and Fritzsche understand the clause to refer to a gentle death (Eccles. xi. 26). This seems somewhat jejune. But the Rabbis also speak of 903 different kinds of death [this by gematria, of which that "by the kiss" (of God) was the gentlest (Ber. 8 a), like drawing a hair out of the milk (Moed. Q., 28 a, b), while a painful death was to be the fate of the wicked. Inferences as to the condition of the soul were also derived from the look and even the posture of the dying (Ab. de R. Nath. 25). Perhaps the expression in Eccles. may refer to death when children are left behind, especially sons. The Rabbis suppose that this is marked in Scripture by the expression "falling asleep," in contradistinction to dying (the former in the case of David, the latter in that of Joab). The second half of the verse, however, seems to refer to public acknowledgment upon death: and this, even accepting the reading in the margin, which is that of A, C, and other Codd., as well as of the Syr. and Vet. Lat. We know what value the Rabbis attached to public lamentations of the dead and to encomium at funeral orations.

14. This and v. 15 are extremely interesting from their connexion with vv. 9, 10, and the light which they cast upon them. The additions in the Vet. Lat. (Latin Version) are very curious and characteristic of their source. For the first half of v. 14 comp. Prov. i. 7; ix. 10. The second half is quite in accordance with the later teaching of Philo, who regarded as the highest class of virtue that from an innate good disposition. ('Leg. Alleg.' iii., ed. Fref. p. 76; 'de Congr.' u. s. p. 429, and specially 'de Prof.' p. 474; comp. generally Siegfried, 'Philo,' p. 269, &c., and the art. "Philo" in Wace and Smith's 'Dict.') The views of the Rabbis were similar (comp. St. John ix. 2; see 'Life and Times of Jesus,' ii. p. 178). "The faithful" are the neemanim (2 Macc. i. 2) of the Jews. The same expression occurs also in the LXX. and the N. T.

15. The rendering of this verse is very difficult. Literally translated, the first half of it could scarcely mean anything else than: And with men, as an eternal foundation (the same word for the Heb. word "place" in LXX. Job xviii. 4; Is. xiii. 13), she has built her nest—since the verb (νοσσεύω) is not a transitive. But as this would present a strange mixture of figures, we can only suggest that there is here a misreading and misrendering of the original, as in LXX. Prov. xvi. 16—perhaps in imitation of it—in which case the Hebrew original really meant: "And she has acquired an eternal foundation (place, habitation) with men." And it is probable that the substantive (νοσσιά) is used with the same application in Eccles. xxxvi. 26 c. The rendering of the second clause is scarcely less difficult. Fritzsche translates what he supposes the original (תֵּאָמֵן) by "she shall be continuous," or "accredited, faithful (approved)," but the better rendering seems to

B. C. cir. 200.

16 To fear the Lord is fulness of wisdom, and filleth men with her fruits.

17 She filleth all their house with things desirable, and the garners with her increase.

18 The fear of the Lord is a crown of wisdom, making peace and perfect health to flourish; both which are the gifts of God: and it enlargeth their rejoicing that love him.

19 Wisdom raineth down skill and knowledge of understanding, and exalteth them to honour that hold her fast.

B. C. cir. 200.

20 The root of wisdom is to fear the Lord, and the branches thereof are long life.

21 The fear of the Lord driveth away sins: and where it is present, it turneth away wrath.

22 A furious man cannot ‖ be justified; for the sway of his fury shall be his destruction.

‖ Or, escape punishment.

be: she shall be credited (fide digna habebitur, vel reperietur). As regards the meaning of the verse, Eccles. xxiv. 7, 8 seems to leave no doubt that the reference in the first clause is to the Mosaic Law, as wisdom that had obtained an eternal foundation in Israel, although it seems doubtful whether "their seed," among which the Law is to shew itself worthy of credence, or to be approved, refers to mankind generally, or to the descendants of Israel.

16. The verse is not merely a repetition, but opens the second part of the chapter, and begins a new stanza (see introduction). The connexion with v. 14 should be marked. As "to fear the Lord is the beginning of wisdom" (v. 14), so "the fulness" or "abundance" "of wisdom"—the determining substantive being here used in the sense of a superlative—is once more "to fear the Lord" —wisdom begins and ends there; "and makes them drunk," i.e. fully satisfies them. See a similar use of the figure in Deut. xxxii. 42, and a similar expression in LXX. Ps. xxii. 5 (A. V. xxiii. 5).

17. Comp. Prov. viii. 18, 19. "All their house:" rather, all her house. The Syr. has: "she filleth her treasuries with wisdom and her treasures," &c.—the Syr. reading מטמנים for מטעמים, or perhaps חכמה for חמדה. "With her fruits:" more literally, her products. We have little doubt that here the Greek rendering preserves the Hebrew original of the older Siracide.

18. The relation between fear of the Lord as the beginning and the fulness of wisdom in vv. 14 and 16 is inverted in vv. 18 and 20. This is not the case in the Syr., which has once more "the beginning of wisdom," and also more correctly renders the second clause: "and increaseth peace, and life, and health." "Perfect health:" literally, health of healing—health restored. The fear of the Lord is a crown of wisdom (perhaps in the sense of Wisdom being crowned when this fear shall universally prevail), making to flourish (here probably a Hebraism) peace (between man and man) and health of healing (the healing of all present breaches). The sentiment, which in its Greek form is one of the modifications of the original by the younger Siracide, reappears in Philo. There we find the same anticipations fully, and in exact correspondence, expressed in the descriptions of Messianic times, specially in 'de Præm. et Pœn.' ed. Mangey, ii. 421, &c.; ed. Frcf. pp. 923–925. The clauses in the A. V. after "to flourish" must be struck out.

19. The A. V. omits (with 253, 248, Co.) the opening words of the verse: And He saw and numbered (or revealed) her. The clause, which is precisely parallel to v. 9 (see the note), once more points forward to Philo. But it cannot be omitted, if only because it supplies the subject—God—for what follows. The word "Wisdom" with which v. 19 begins in the A. V. does not occur in the original, and the subject is God. The idea of presenting Him as "pouring down, like rain," "skill and knowledge of understanding," is thoroughly Hellenistic. Indeed, the first two clauses of this verse, which are quite different in the Syr., must be attributed to the younger Siracide. In the same manner Philo applied the expression "I will rain bread from heaven" (Ex. xvi. 4) to the showering down from above of Wisdom on all who are receptive ('de Prof.,' c. 25, ed. Frcf. p. 470). "And exalteth them to honour:" rather, heightens (increases) the honour of them, &c. On the whole comp. Prov. iv. 8.

21. This verse in our A. V. is not found in the best Codd., and must be omitted. From v. 20–27 the Syr. contains an entirely different portion.

22. The verse begins a new stanza.

A furious man.] The better reading is unrighteous anger, although A. V. represents a correct gloss: comp. Prov. xv. 18. Shall not be justified—that is, before God; nor yet will it be vindicated or established before men. In general the expressions must

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

23 A patient man will bear for a time, and afterward joy shall spring up unto him.

24 He will hide his words for a time, and the lips of many shall declare his wisdom.

25 The parables of knowledge are in the treasures of wisdom: but godliness is an abomination to a sinner.

26 If thou desire wisdom, keep the commandments, and the Lord shall give her unto thee.

B. C. cir. 200.

27 For the fear of the Lord is wisdom and instruction: and faith and meekness are his delight.

28 ‖ Distrust not the fear of the Lord when thou art poor; and come not unto him with a double heart.

‖ Or, Be not disobedient to.

29 Be not an hypocrite in the sight of men, and take good heed what thou speakest.

30 Exalt not thyself, lest thou fall, and bring dishonour upon thy soul, be taken in their widest and most manifold application. "The sway of his anger," in the sense of momentum, impetus, "shall be his destruction"—rather, to his fall—it shall be the cause or occasion of it. The second clause of the verse does not give the reason, but rather explains the meaning of the statement in the first clause, and carries it further. The transition here from v. 20 b is abrupt, although v. 22 may possibly be intended as a demonstration and continuation of vv. 19 c, 20 b.

23. In contrast to this "man of wrath" (Prov. xv. 18) is he who is patient, long suffering (μακρόθυμος, אֶרֶךְ אַפַּיִם), as in Prov. xiv. 29; xv. 18. See also the similar rendering by Aquila of אַאֲרִיךְ נַפְשִׁי, Job vi. 11. Instead of "will bear," Fritzsche renders, after another reading (ἀνέξεται): "will hold out." But the alteration does not seem to be sufficiently supported, and the ordinary reading and rendering best accord with the context. He will bear till the time (not "for a time")—עַד־עֵת—viz., of his vindication and deliverance by God.

24. He will hide his words till the time.] Till the right time, that appointed of God for his vindication and deliverance, he will keep back, restrain, his speech. Comp. Ps. xxxix. 1; Prov. x. 19. The second part of the verse shews how ample his public vindication shall be. Grotius aptly: "Silentium illius in tempore compensabitur multorum de ipso sermonibus." The Wisdom here spoken of is not abstract (σοφία), but practical (σύνεσις)—intelligence, prudence.

25. In [or among] the treasures of wisdom is a parable (or else in the collective sense, "are parables") of understanding—the latter indicating their quality or the kind of parable. But quite the opposite are the views of life and the conversation of the sinner, v. 25 b.

26. The theoretical and the practical are here combined: the way to acquire wisdom is obedience to the commandments. Yet this wisdom is not in any way the reward of obedience: and the Lord will abundantly furnish thee with it. This is not a distinctively Judaic (Rabbinic) sentiment, but the writer occupies Old Testament—we had almost said, New Testament—ground.

27. This verse, which opens the last stanza, continues the reasoning of v. 26. It also looks back on the beginning of the previous stanza in vv. 22, &c. Practical wisdom in the fear and service of the Lord is here represented as quiet, patient bearing in well-doing, in opposition to the wrathful self-assertion of the proud sinner. "Faith and meekness"—gentleness—"are His delight:" rather, good pleasure, that with which He is well pleased, which He approves and loves. The word εὐδοκία occurs in the LXX. only in the Psalms (there eight times) and in the Apocrypha only in Ecclus.—giving another indication of the connexion in time between the version of the Psalms and our book. [In Cant. vi. 3—LXX. 4—the name Tirzah is so rendered.]

28. The clause "when thou art poor" must be omitted, as not supported by the best authorities. It is evidently an explanatory gloss. The rendering "distrust not," "disbelieve not" (which seems supported by LXX. Is. xxx. 12), appears to correspond better with the second part of the verse than the "be not disobedient" of the margin. "A double heart" (comp. Ps. xii. 2)—one that alternates between faith and unbelief: comp. St. Jas. i. 8; iv. 8.

29. To inward truth outward truthfulness must correspond. "What thou speakest:" lit. "in thy lips." With the exception of 250 the Greek Codd. read, instead of "in the sight of men," "in the mouths [or mouth] of men." The Greek translator evidently misread בפי for בפני. The Syr. read it correctly, and the Vet. Lat. follows it. It seems needless to limit the verse to a spurious public profession of religion. The wider view is fully borne out by the next verse.

B. C. cir. 200. and so God discover thy secrets, and cast thee down in the midst of the congregation, because thou camest not in truth to the fear of the Lord, but thy heart is full of deceit.

CHAPTER II.

1 God's servants must look for trouble, 7 and be patient, and trust in him. 12 For woe to them that do not so. 15 But they that fear the Lord will do so.

B. C. cir. 200. MY son, if [a] thou come to serve the Lord, prepare thy soul for temptation.

2 Set thy heart aright, and constantly endure, and ‖ make not haste in time of trouble.

3 Cleave unto him, and depart not away, that thou mayest be increased at thy last end.

4 Whatsoever is brought upon

[a] Matt. 4. 1. 2 Tim. 3. 12. 1 Pet. 4. 12.

‖ Or, haste not.

30. Comp. St. Matt. xxiii. 12; St. Luke xviii. 14. "Discover:" in the sense of reveal, —make publicly known that which had been hidden. On the first part comp. Prov. xxvi. 28; on the last clause, Acts xiii. 10. The Syr. has in the closing verses several other renderings, some of which probably depend on a different reading of the Hebrew. One very clear instance of this (pointed out by Mr. Margoliouth) is in v. 30; for "thou camest not" the Syr. has "thou bearest the name" (omitting "not")—evidently the one reading נקרבת, the other נקרית.

CHAPTER II.

The arrangement of this chapter into three unequal stanzas (1–6; 7–11; 12–18) is well marked. The first of them (vv. 1–6) connects itself with the penultimate stanza of the previous chapter (i. 22–26). Similarly, stanzas ii. and iii. of chapter ii. (especially stanza ii.) look back on the last stanza of chap. i., and further develop the idea of "the fear of the Lord," referred to in the opening and closing verses of that stanza (i. 27 a, 30 e).

Thus viewed, the first stanza of chapter ii. continues and carries out what had been set forth in the previous chapter—especially as to faith, patience, and meekness. The second stanza (vv. 7–11) is well marked by a threefold "Ye that fear the Lord," to which an admonition or a promise is in each case attached. The two concluding verses of the stanza—or perhaps three verses, since v. 10 is double—furnish the ground for each of the preceding admonitions. We mark that each of the three verses of admonitions has its corresponding couplet of lines in the two (or three) following verses (vv. 10, 11).

In stanza iii. (vv. 12–18) the three "Ye that fear the Lord" of the previous stanza have as their counterpart a threefold "Woe" (vv. 12–14)—in which we also mark correspondence with the first stanza of the chapter. The threefold "Woe" is followed by a threefold "They that fear the Lord" (vv. 15–17) —but here of a descriptive, not (as in stanza ii.) of a hortatory character. The concluding verse (v. 18) furnishes the ground of what had immediately preceded, and thus corresponds with vv. 10, 11 in stanza i.

1. if thou come.] "Come forward," "set out." Practical advice is now given to him who really wishes to serve the Lord, in opposition to those referred to in the closing verses of ch. i. The first thing to be remembered is that temptation will meet us by the way. Such temptation may, as Drusius rightly remarks, come by adversity or by prosperity. But the reference here is to adversity, as the following verses shew.

2. Guide thy heart straight, direct, govern it (so in LXX. Josh. xxiv. 23). This is the literal meaning of the word. "And be steadfast," which probably gives the meaning more fully, as the verb signifies both "to be staunch" and "to endure patiently." This in opposition to making haste in the time of trouble—of distress or misery (Bissell, "visitation"). The verb is often used in Philonic writings of afflictions sent. In such seasons we are to be staunch — not perturbed nor hasty in thought or deed. Comp. Ps. xxvii. 14. The verse is wanting in the Syr.

3. depart not.] Viz. from God—turn not aside (the Hebrew סוּר מִן). "Increased:" in the sense of compensating exaltation afterwards, at his end, or rather at a later time, when affliction and temptation well endured shall give place to happiness. But there is no reference here to the "after death." Comp. St. Jas. v. 11. For "mayest be increased at thy last end" the Syr. has: "mayest be wise in thy paths"—(as has been noted) reading באורחותיך, while the Greek read באחריתך.

4. brought upon thee.] Viz. by God; "take," viz. upon thyself—accept it, submit to it. The word "cheerfully" should be omitted, as not properly authenticated. "When thou art changed to a low estate" gives the meaning correctly—lit. "in the changes of thy humiliation," i.e. when changes come by which thou art brought into a low estate. But the reading of 248, ἀλλάγματι (in the singular), is supported by the Syr. and better.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

thee take cheerfully, and be patient when thou art changed to a low estate.

[b] Prov. 17. 3. Wisd. 3. 6.

5 [b]For gold is tried in the fire, and acceptable men in the furnace of adversity.

[c] Ps. 37. 3, 5.

6 [c]Believe in him, and he will help thee; order thy way aright, and trust in him.

[d] Ps. 37. 7.

7 Ye that fear the Lord, [d]wait for his mercy; and go not aside, lest ye fall.

8 Ye that fear the Lord, believe him; and your reward shall not fail.

9 Ye that fear the Lord, hope for good, and for everlasting joy and mercy.

B. C. cir. 200.

10 Look at the generations of old, and see; [e]did ever any trust in the Lord, and was confounded? or did any abide in his fear, and was forsaken? or whom did he ever despise, that called upon him?

[e] Ps. 37. 25.

[f] Ps. 86. 15. & 145. 8.

11 [f]For the Lord is full of compassion and mercy, longsuffering, and very pitiful, and forgiveth sins, and saveth in time of affliction.

12 Woe be to fearful hearts, and faint hands, and the sinner that goeth two ways!

13 Woe unto him that is faint-hearted! for he believeth not; therefore shall he not be defended.

14 Woe unto you that have lost

5. The higher reason of the direction of v. 4 and the comfort in it are indicated. Such changes are divinely ordered to try and to purify us. "Adversity:" lit. humiliation. The figures employed frequently recur in Holy Scripture (Prov. xvii. 3, xxvii. 21; Zech. xiii. 9; Mal. iii. 3; 1 Pet. i. 7).

6. Help or "take part with thee." The idea of helping, as in St. Luke i. 54. "Order thy way aright" gives correctly the sense of the original—lit. guide (make) thy ways straight (set, direct them)—certainly not in the sense of "straightforwardness." "Trust:" rather, hope. For "hope in Him" the Syr. has: "and He will direct thy paths."

7. This verse, which begins the second stanza (see the introd.), farther indicates the duty of waiting for the merciful deliverance of God, and the danger of attempts at sinful self-deliverance. In this and the following two verses the progression of thought is always in the second clauses.

8. The promise that their "reward shall not fail," or be lost, must—at least by us—not be taken in a Judaic sense.

9. The admonition passes now from the individual to the general, and hence must be considered as applicable to the pious at all times and in all circumstances. This should be kept in view in the interpretation of the expression "everlasting joy and mercy." The term "everlasting" can scarcely be regarded as equivalent to "lasting" or "long enduring." Nor yet does it seem to refer to what we understand by "everlasting." Rather does it seem to mean that they who fear the Lord may always look for joy and mercy from God. That this is the right interpretation appears from the review in v. 10 of the experience of believers in the past.

10. The last clause should be worded like the two which precede: "Or did any call upon Him, and He despised them;" rather, took not notice of them?

11. And this, although we cannot plead freedom from sin and its ill desert. The words "longsuffering and very pitiful" should be omitted, as not supported by the best authorities.

12. This verse opens the third stanza. The writer now turns to those who neglect his admonitions. The antithesis between vv. 12–14, and both that which had preceded and that which follows, should be marked. The threefold "Woe" is not to be regarded as a denunciation of judgments, but rather as equivalent to "Alas for those." Each of them bears reference to want of that steadfast faith and unswerving trust previously recommended. In the first "woe" failure in a staunch and straight course is denounced; in the second, failure of courage and assurance; in the third, that of patient endurance.

faint hands.] Rather, hands that hang down (Heb. xii. 12). The expression is parallel to that in Job iv. 3 and Is. xxxv. 3 (the latter being rendered in the LXX. in nearly the same manner). "Fearful hearts" is no doubt the equivalent of the Heb. in Deut. xx. 8 (in the A. V. "faint-hearted"), where the LXX. employ exactly the same words. Similarly also in 2 Chron. xiii. 7, both in the Heb. and the LXX. To "go upon two ways" refers not to uncertainty, but to want of decision and the attempt to keep in with both sides. The classical reader will remember the "duabus sellis sedere" (with our proverbial sequence of "falling between two stools"); while the biblical student will recall, both as to expression and patience! and what will ye do when the Lord shall visit you?

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

15 They that fear the Lord will g John 14. 23. not disobey his word; and g they that love him will keep his ways.

16 They that fear the Lord will seek that which is wellpleasing unto him; and they that love him shall be filled with the law.

17 They that fear the Lord will prepare their hearts, and humble their souls in his sight,

2 Sam. 24. 14. 18 Saying, We will h fall into the hands of the Lord, and not into the hands of men: for as his majesty is, so is his mercy.

CHAPTER III.

B. C. cir. 200.

2 Children must honour and help both their parents. 21 We may not desire to know all things. 26 The incorrigible must needs perish. 30 Alms are rewarded.

HEAR me your father, O children, and do thereafter, that ye may be safe.

2 For the Lord hath given a the father honour over the children, and hath confirmed the ‖ authority of the mother over the sons.

a Exod. 20. 12. Deut. 5. 16. Matt. 15. 4. Mark 7. 10. Eph. 6. 2.

‖ Or, judgment.

3 Whoso honoureth his father maketh an atonement for his sins:

4 And he that honoureth his mother is as one that layeth up treasure.

meaning, Prov. xxviii. 6, 18. (Comp. also 1 Kings xviii. 21.) The verse presents a climax: heart, hands, walk—moral defect in either always leading to that in the other.

14. "Patience:" in the sense of endurance rather than of hope (the latter, Fritzsche). For "have lost patience" the Syr. has "polletis fiducia"—perhaps a confusion of אַבְּרִי with אֹבְדִי.

15. The opposite course is traced as that which characterises the "fear of the Lord." One of the most valuable parts of this chapter is the Old Testament view which it presents of the "fear of the Lord." "Will not disobey"—in the Syr. "will not hate"—a different rendering of the word מֵאֵן in the original. "His word:" rather, words. Mark that as in vv. 7–9 we have a threefold admonition to those who "fear the Lord," and in vv. 12–14 a threefold "woe" upon failure in this, so in vv. 15–17 a threefold description of what may be expected of them who "fear the Lord"—the expression "they that love Him" (v. 16 b) being almost parallel to it.

16. that which is wellpleasing unto him.] This is misleading. The right rendering is, His good pleasure (εὐδοκίαν). "Filled with:" in the sense of satiating themselves with it, seeking, aiming, and living only after His Law.

17. For "humble their souls" the Syr. has: "he that forsaketh him shall ruin his soul"—reading (as has been suggested) יִשְׁחַת for יִשְׁחָה.

18. majesty.] Rather, greatness. It is scarcely necessary to point out the reference to 2 Sam. xxiv. 14; only that in the present instance the reason of the choice is indicated in the preceding context, and also in the last clause of this verse, which is truly grand and Old Testament in its conception. It should be added that the Rabbis also noted that wherever God's greatness was spoken of in Scripture, there His condescension was also immediately indicated. So in Deut. x. 17, 18; Is. lvii. 15; Ps. lxviii. 4, 5 (Meg. 31 a).

CHAPTER III.

This chapter seems to be arranged into four stanzas. After an introductory line, the first two stanzas consist each of fourteen lines, in commendation of filial duty (vv. 1*b*–9; 10–16). The third stanza (vv. 17–24), also of fourteen lines, is in praise of humility; while the fourth, of twelve lines (vv. 26–29; v. 25 must be omitted), seems chiefly directed against pride of heart and mind, and intended to inculcate an opposite frame.

1. your father.] Rather, the father. This expression, and that of "children," must not be pressed literally, although the writer immediately proceeds to describe what is the proper filial relation. The "safety" here spoken of—ut salvi sitis—does not refer to that in the next world, as appears from what immediately follows.

2. "Given honour"—extolled. Fritzsche, however, renders "with, or in, the children," in the sense that according to Divine appointment the honour of a father consists in this, that the children honour him. "The authority of the mother over sons:" omit the article. The word "authority" probably expresses here the meaning better than any other. The Greek. κρίσις, no doubt corresponds to the Hebrew mishpat, for which it occurs in the LXX. not less than 132 times. But mishpat also means "a right" in the sense of that which is due (so in Deut. xviii. 3, both in the Hebrew and in the LXX.) —and the "right" of the mother, that which is due to her, is equivalent to her authority.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

5 Whoso honoureth his father shall have joy of his own children; and when he maketh his prayer, he shall be heard.

6 He that honoureth his father shall have a long life; and he that is obedient unto the Lord shall be a comfort to his mother.

7 He that feareth the Lord will honour his father, and will do service unto his parents, as to his masters.

[b] ver. 2.

8 [b] Honour thy father and mother both in word and deed, that a blessing may come upon thee from them.

[c] Gen. 27. 27, 28, 29. Deut. 33. 1.

9 For [c] the blessing of the father establisheth the houses of children; but the curse of the mother rooteth out foundations.

B. C. cir. 200.

10 Glory not in the dishonour of thy father; for thy father's dishonour is no glory unto thee.

11 For the glory of a man is from the honour of his father; and a mother in dishonour is a reproach to the children.

12 My son, help thy father in his age, and grieve him not as long as he liveth.

13 And if his understanding fail, have patience with him; and despise him not when thou art ‖ in thy full strength.

‖ Or, in all thine ability.

14 For the relieving of thy father

It need scarcely be pointed out how needful this admonition is.

3, 4. These verses carry the preceding into further detail. "Honoureth his father:" perhaps better reverences, which will also distinguish this verb from that applied in the next verse to one's mother. "Maketh an atonement"—according to the better reading, in the future tense: shall make atonement, not in the Christian sense, but in that indicated in ver. 14 and 15. "As one that layeth up treasure," providing for the time of need, so is he that showeth due honour to his mother. The word ἀποθησαυρίζω occurs only in this passage (not in the LXX.) and in 1 Tim. vi. 19.

5. shall be rejoiced—made happy—by children. Although the verb does not otherwise occur with ὑπό, there cannot be any doubt that this, rather than ἐπὶ τέκνοις, is the better reading. In the day of his prayer: this rather than as in the A. V., especially as it seems to point to special prayer—primarily, prayer in time of calamity.

6. "A comfort," in the sense of giving restfulness and refreshment. In the LXX. it mostly corresponds to the verb נוּחַ, in its various forms; and 2 Sam. vii. 1, 11; 1 Kings v. 4; 1 Chron. xxii. 9, 18; Is. xiv. 3, but especially Prov. xxix. 17, may here be mentioned as parallels.

7. According to the weight of authorities, the first half of the verse should be omitted, but alike the preceding verse and the clause which follows seem to require it—although, on the other hand, it may have owed its origin to a feeling of abruptness in the text without it. The "service" spoken of is like that of a slave. The Rabbis also held that a child was bound to do a slave's service to his father, and likewise to his teacher. The construction with ἐν (δουλεύσει ἐν) occurs only again in LXX. Jer. xxv. 11.

8. In deed and word (comp. St. Luke xxiv. 19) reverence thy father, that a blessing may come upon thee from him. Thus according to the better reading, and literally.

9. Better the indefinite article: a father, a mother. The expression "houses" refers not only to the prosperity but to the permanence of a family. This appears still further from the second clause. But Ex. i. 21, 2 Sam. vii. 11, are scarcely parallels.

10. The verse begins the second stanza, which presents the negative aspect of what had formerly been inculcated. "Dishonour"—as generally in reference to fathers, a derivative of τιμάω is used. The verse accurately represents ancient Hebrew feeling, and rebukes the spurious modern boasts of independence from ancestry.

12 b. For "grieve him not" the Syr. has "leave not his glory"—as has been suggested, a confusion of תעצבנו with תעזבנו.

13. Make allowance—"have indulgence" with him. The Rabbis were wont to enforce this by an appeal to the beautiful legend according to which the broken tables of the Law were likewise preserved in the Ark (Ber. 8 b; Baba B. 14 b). "In thy full strength:" rather, in all thy strength. The Syr. has: "all the days of his life"—reading כל ימי חייו [or בימי], while the Greek read חילך.

14. relieving.] Better, probably, the more general term "pity" or "mercy." "Instead of sins," that is in place of the evil and destruction which thy sins would have brought, it shall be built up to thee again, viz.

B. C. cir. 200.

shall not be forgotten: and instead of sins it shall be added to build thee up.

15 In the day of thine affliction it shall be remembered; thy sins also shall melt away, as the ice in the fair warm weather.

16 He that forsaketh his father is as a blasphemer; and he that angereth his mother is cursed of God.

17 My son, go on with thy business in meekness; so shalt thou be beloved of him that is approved.

18 [d]The greater thou art, the more humble thyself, and thou shalt find favour before the Lord. B. C. cir. 200. [d] Phil. 2. 3.

19 Many are in high place, and of renown: but [e]mysteries are revealed unto the meek. [e] Ps. 25. 9, 14.

20 For the power of the Lord is great, and he is honoured of the lowly.

21 [f]Seek not out the things that are too hard for thee, neither search the things that are above thy strength. [f] Prov. 25. 27. Rom. 12. 3.

thy house (or, perhaps: "it shall be added to thee for building up"). The verb, without πρός, occurs repeatedly in the LXX., notably in Deut. xiii. 16; Jer. xviii. 9; Zech. i. 16; Mal. iii. 15.

15. He (Syr. "she") shall remember thee—the Syr. adds to thee—viz. for good, or for help and deliverance. The correctness of this rendering is attested by the Syr. Like fair weather upon ice, so thy sins shall be dissolved (melt away). The meaning is, that just as the warmth of fine weather dissolves the ice which is the result of cold, so would dutifulness towards parents remove the guilt and consequences of our sins. The moral and spiritual view here taken alike of sin and of duty towards parents is the opposite of elevated. In the Syriac, "as heat against ice, to the abolishing of thy sins;" in the Arabic we have, instead of the last clause, "shall drive away evils from thee, as cold is driven away by the fierceness of heat"—both explanatory rather than literal renderings.

16. In the Greek the order of the sentences in each of the two members of the verse is inverted (as compared with the A. V.), and this makes the meaning much more emphatic. "Forsaketh:" that is, leaves unhelped. "Angereth:" probably, by refusing aid. The tone of at least the first part of this verse rises to a greater moral height.

17. In the new stanza which here opens, the writer proceeds to admonish to modesty and humility; and this, first, as regards outward conduct and bearing (vv. 17–20); then as regards the mind (vv. 21–24), and, lastly, as regards the heart and feelings (vv. 25–28). The admonition to humility is supported by three arguments: 1st, it secures the goodwill of pious men—of such as are "approved," viz. of God (comp. ii. 5), v. 17; 2ndly, it gains the favour of God, v. 18; which, 3rdly, is the source of all success, v. 20.

18. Humility should increase with outward success. It almost seems as if the writer had in his mind that otherwise an envious fate would dispense calamity. A similar admonition, but from a much higher point of view, is given in 1 Pet. v. 5.

19. This verse is an interpolation.

20. "The power of the Lord," Syr. "the mercy of the Lord"—perhaps a confusion between חסד and חזק. "Honoured of:" rather, glorified by. Instead of the last clause the Syr. has: "and to the meek His secrets are revealed"—probably repeated from v. 19 b.

21. In the admonitions to humility which now follow, the reasoning is as follows: Abstain from useless speculations and attempts to comprehend that which is above human reason (v. 21). Practical obedience is required, not speculative knowledge, which is barren (v. 22). The latter employs our powers to no purpose, whereas all that is really necessary has been quite clearly told us (v. 23). Lastly, such speculations have led many fatally astray (v. 24). The argument is deeply interesting, not only as shewing that a spirit of inquiry and speculation was abroad, but as containing one of the passages quoted in Rabbinic writings as from 'The Book of Ben Sira.' The fullest recension of it is in Ber. R. 8 (ed. Warsh. 17 a), where v. 21 and the substance of v. 22 are quoted as follows: "Rabbi Elazar said in the name of Ben Sira (so also in Jer. Chag. 77 c), What is too great for thee, seek not out; into what is too strong (powerful) for thee, search not; what is too high for thee seek not to know; into what is hidden from thee, inquire not; what is within thy power (that which is within thy reach, that which is practically before thee), consider, and busy not thyself with secret things." The same saying is quoted, with slightly different wording, in the Jer. Talmud (Chag. 77 c), and in the Bab. Talmud (Chag. 13 a—there, as from 'The Book of Sira'), but without the first two clauses given in Ber. R. 8. There can be little doubt that the recension in the Talmud,

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

22 But what is commanded thee, think thereupon with reverence; for it is not needful for thee to see with thine eyes the things that are in secret.

23 Be not curious in unnecessary matters: for more things are shewed unto thee than men understand.

24 For many are deceived by their own vain opinion; and an evil suspicion hath overthrown their judgment.

25 Without eyes thou shalt want light: profess not the knowledge therefore that thou hast not.

26 A stubborn heart shall fare evil at the last; and he that loveth danger shall perish therein.

B. C. cir. 200.

27 An obstinate heart shall be laden with sorrows; and the wicked man shall heap sin upon sin.

28 ‖ In the punishment of the proud there is no remedy; for the plant of wickedness hath taken root in him.

‖ Or, The proud man is not healed by his punishment.

29 The heart of the prudent will understand a parable; and an attentive ear is the desire of a wise man.

30 ℰ Water will quench a flaming fire; and alms maketh an atonement for sins.

ℰ Ps. 41. 1, &c. Dan. 4. 27. Matt. 5. 7.

with its four members in exact parallelism, is the correct one, nor yet that it—rather than the Greek—represents what had originally been written by the older Siracide.

22. The words "with reverence" and "to see with thine eyes" must be omitted. The last clause should read: for thou hast no use (or else, no necessity) for (non pertinent ad te) the things that are hidden—they are not required for any practical purpose.

23. Rather, In the things which go beyond (surpass, exceed—both in quantity and quality) thy works (the requirements of practice, referred to in the previous verse) be not a busybody—the same word as in 2 Thess. iii. 11: here probably in the sense of meddling with what does not concern one, wasting one's labour. For what exceeds (is beyond) the intelligence of man (i.e. is more than enough for his comprehension, his practical capacity) has been shewn to thee (marked out before thee).

24. The admonition to humility in abstaining from searching into what is beyond our ken concludes with a warning: For many has their notion (a notion on their part, or else, an assumption) led astray (misled), and a wrong (noxious) supposition made their judgment to slip (slide, fall on a slippery place). Others, however, have applied the substantives "notion" and "supposition" to excessive opinion of oneself =conceit, which led to entering on dangerous and misleading speculations.

25. This verse must be omitted, as not supported by the best authorities. In the Syr. and Arab. Versions it follows after v. 27, and in the Arab. rather as a paraphrase.

26. Here begins with the last stanza the commendation of heart-humility. The reference seems to wilful and proud neglect of the warnings previously given, leading a person to rush into the fatal dangers above indicated. Practically the same expression for a "stubborn heart" occurs in the LXX. Deut. x. 16; Prov. xvii. 20, xxviii. 14; Ezek. iii. 7. In 1 Kings (1 Sam.) xxv. 3 we have this about Nabal: ὁ ἄνθρωπος σκληρὸς καὶ πονηρὸς ἐν ἐπιτηδεύμασι. [The Syr. rendering of 26 b, "he that loveth good things shall attain them," is contrary to the whole structure of this stanza, in which the clauses of each verse are not in antithesis.]

27. Sorrows, or labours, cares, troubles. "The wicked man:" rather, the sinner. We mark as parallel to the second clause this saying of Ben Azai in Ab. iv. 2: "One transgression draws another after it."

28. Probably best rendered: By (in) the calamity (ἐπαγωγῇ—H, 248, Co. prefix ἐν —that which is brought to him in trial or punishment) of the proud there is not healing: it does not lead to his spiritual healing. The connexion of thought is as follows: Pride of heart will lead to danger and ruin (v. 26); sin will prove progressive (v. 27), and even trials will not act as corrective (v. 27).

29–31. The last three verses read like a practical application of the parabolic teaching of this whole chapter. In opposition to the stubbornness and conceit which had been condemned, we have here on the part of the prudent understanding of the parabolic or proverbial teaching just given him—his earnest desire being to learn and obey (v. 29). The expression "heart" is used in its wider Hebraic sense for the mind, or what we might designate the inner man.

30. This practical lesson comes to us parabolically, that the moral effect of alms

B. C. cir. 200.

31 And he that requiteth good turns is mindful of that which may come hereafter; and when he falleth, he shall find a stay.

CHAPTER IV.

1 We may not despise the poor or fatherless, 11 but seek for wisdom, 20 and not be ashamed of some things, nor gainsay the truth, 30 nor be as lions in our houses.

MY son, defraud not the poor of his living, and make not the needy eyes to wait long.

2 Make not an hungry soul sorrowful; neither provoke a man in his distress. B. C. cir. 200.

3 Add not more trouble to an heart that is vexed; and [a]defer not to give to him that is in need. [a] Prov. 3. 27, 28.

4 Reject not the supplication of the afflicted; neither turn away thy face from a poor man. [b] Tobit 4. 7. Matt. 5. 42.

5 [b]Turn not away thine eye from ‖ the needy, and give him none occasion to curse thee: ‖ Or, him that asketh.

upon sins is like that of water upon fire—it puts an end to their destructive effect. Low as is the spiritual tone of such a sentiment, it is even more painfully and realistically expressed in the Book of Tobit (comp. iv. 8–11; xii. 9; xiv. 11).

31. The word "and" must be omitted; and instead of "that which may come hereafter," better: the things which are after these (τὰ μετὰ ταῦτα)—that is, after that which is now going on, our present condition, which may change to one of need. The Syr. has: "beneficus expeditus est in via sua"—reading ארחות for אחרית. Difference of opinion prevails whether the subject of the first clause is God or man. The former view has probably led to the insertion of the words "the Lord" in 106, 248, Co., H, Vet. Lat. But the reading is not trustworthy; and as man is the subject in the second clause, it seems natural to supplement also the same word in the first clause. Thus viewed, v. 31 forms the final link in the teaching of this chapter. The man who requiteth benefits—viz. those which he had received from his parents—is remembered in such changes and events as may come upon him hereafter, and in the time of his falling shall find support (stay, succour). Comp. iii. 1–16.

CHAPTER IV.

From the consideration of duty towards parents the writer proceeds to what is required of us in regard to our neighbour. As in the previous chapter, duty is here primarily viewed under the aspect of beneficence. Hence the relations indicated are mainly those towards the poor. Here also the writer shews that true religion, which in his mind consists in the practice of good works, is true wisdom. This explains the transition to the praise of wisdom (vv. 11–19). Wisdom is practical religion in well doing; on the other hand, sin is evil doing and the loss of wisdom. This appears also in the third stanza, which, like the concluding stanza of ch. iii., is chiefly of a warning character (vv. 20–28). As ch. iii., so ch. iv. closes with three verses of practical application. Thus the chapter consists of three stanzas—respectively of ten, of nine, and again of nine verses (vv. 1–10; 11–19; 20–28)—of which the three concluding verses form the application.

1. This verse may be only introductory and general, in which case each of the stanzas of which the chapter is composed would consist of nine verses. "Defraud," or possibly in the more general sense specially applicable in regard to benevolence: "Withhold not from the poor." The verb is used in reference to the wages of the poor in the LXX. Deut. xxiv. 16 (Cod. Alex.; the Vat. has ἀπαδικήσεις) and in Mal. iii. 5. Here it is probably used with wider application than to wages. For "deprive not," &c., the Syr. has: "deride not the life of the poor"—according to Mr. Margoliouth, the one deriving the word from the root בזה, the other from בזז. "His living:" in the sense of all that is necessary to sustain life, or for one's life. The same meaning attaches to the term in St. Luke xii. 15. Generally comp. Prov. iii. 28. Both Latin and Greek parallels might also be here adduced.

2. Few sayings more wise, kind, and suitable than this. It is too often the manner of men to moralise to those who are in sorrow, and to provoke to anger those who are in difficulty, embarrassment, or distress. And even when words are not spoken, our bearing may effect this. The Syr. has here "forget not."

3. The direction not to add further distress to a heart already vexed goes beyond the previous verse. It has for its counterpart the admonition not to defer giving (a gift) to one in need.

4–6. [The Syr. omits 4 b and 5 a.] From spontaneous compassion the writer next turns to that which should follow on the appeal of distress: Refuse not a suppliant who is

B. C. cir. 200.

6 [c]For if he curse thee in the bitterness of his soul, his prayer shall be heard of him that made him.

[c] Deut. 15. 9.

7 Get thyself the love of the congregation, and bow thy head to a great man.

8 Let it not grieve thee to bow down thine ear to the poor, and give him a friendly answer with meekness.

9 [d]Deliver him that suffereth wrong from the hand of the oppressor; and be not fainthearted when thou sittest in judgment.

[d] Isai. 1. 17. Jer. 22. 3.

10 [e]Be as a father unto the fatherless, and instead of an husband unto their mother: so shalt thou be as the son of the most High, and he shall love thee more than thy mother doth.

[e] Job 29. 16. & 31. 18. Isai. 1. 17. Jam. 1. 27.

B. C. cir. 200.

11 Wisdom exalteth her children, and layeth hold of them that seek her.

12 [f]He that loveth her loveth life; and they that seek to her early shall be filled with joy.

[f] Prov. 3. 18.

13 He that holdeth her fast shall inherit glory; and wheresoever she entereth, the Lord will bless.

14 They that serve her shall minister ‖to the Holy One: and them that love her the Lord doth love.

‖ Or, in the sanctuary.

afflicted. In v. 4 b and v. 5 this is farther carried out by shewing the consequences of embittering the soul of the distressed by a refusal of his entreaty. The admonition goes indeed further than what we read in Ex. xxii. 22, 23, and Deut. xv. 9, but scarcely beyond Prov. xxviii. 27. The closing words of Ecclus. iv. 6 indicate alike the ground on which our obligation to the poor rests and the reason why his curse shall not be in vain, viz. that the God to whom he appeals is his Maker, and also the Maker of us all. The teaching of Prov. xiv. 31 and xvii. 5, although parallel, is higher in character. It need scarcely be added that the Gospel has pointed far beyond this.

7. This verse has been regarded by some critics as inserted in the wrong place, being apparently unconnected with the previous argument. The Latin Version has sought to remove this objection by inserting after "congregation" the words "of the poor." But the difficulty referred to is rather apparent than real. There is twofold progression in vv. 7–10 as compared with those which preceded: first, from the negative to the positive; and, secondly, from response to direct appeals—chiefly for charity—to spontaneous action under certain circumstances. At the same time the advice of v. 7 is rather Eastern in character than religious, and reflects unfavourably on what follows in the next verses.

8. According to the better reading: Incline to the poor thine ear. This and the next clause, and answer him peaceful things (peace) in meekness, are truly Hebraic. The expression "incline the ear" occurs in Ps. xvii. 6, Jer. xi. 8; and this, "to answer peace," in Gen. xli. 16 and in Deut. xx. 11. In fact the LXX. render the latter passage by exactly the same terms.

9. The first clause perhaps misses the antithetic force of the original: the oppressed from the hand of the oppressor. "Not fainthearted:" that is, not afraid to decide in favour of the poor as against the proud oppressor.

10. The final admonitions recall Deut. xxiv. 17–21; Job xxix. 15–17, xxxi. 16, &c.; and Isa. i. 17. The expression "He shall love thee more than thy mother doth," seems to bear reference to Isa. xlix. 15.

11. With this verse commences, according to Fritzsche, a new section: on Wisdom (iv. 11–vi. 16)—consisting of five parts, the first containing 20 members (10 + 10); the second, 18 members (6 + 6 + 6); the third, 24 (12 + 12); the fourth, 28 (7 + 14 + 7); and the last, 26 members (6+6+6+8). Thus arranged, Part I. would embrace iv. 11–15 + iv. 16–19; Part II., iv. 20–28; Part III., iv. 29–v. 3 + v. 4–7; Part IV., v. 8–10 + 11–15 + vi. 1–3; Part V., vi. 4–12 + 13–16.

"Wisdom exalteth," viz. to greatness and happiness, her sons: see St. Matt. xi. 19; "layeth hold of them that seek her," in the sense of bringing them help. The word, which otherwise often occurs in the LXX. and the New Testament, is used in this signification only in Heb. ii. 16.

12. that seek to her early—that rise early after her—to betake themselves to her: indicating zeal and earnestness in the search after Wisdom, as the main object engaging mind and heart.

13. wheresoever she entereth.] Viz. Wisdom. This seems more congruous to the whole argument than to render (with Fritzsche) "whither he entereth," in the sense that whatsoever such a man undertaketh, God will bless him in it.

14. The cultivation of true wisdom is

B. C. cir. 200.

15 Whoso giveth ear unto her shall judge the nations: and he that attendeth unto her shall dwell securely.

16 If a man commit himself unto her, he shall inherit her; and his generation shall hold her in possession.

17 For at the first she will walk with him by crooked ways, and bring fear and dread upon him, and torment him with her discipline, until she may trust his soul, and try him by her laws.

18 Then will she return the straight way unto him, and comfort him, and shew him her secrets.

B. C. cir. 200.

19 But if he go wrong, she will forsake him, and give him over to his own ruin.

20 Observe the opportunity, and beware of evil; and be not ashamed when it concerneth thy soul.

21 For there is a shame that bringeth sin; and there is a shame which is glory and grace.

22 Accept no person against thy soul, and let not the reverence of any man cause thee to fall.

identical with true religion. Consequently the relation of God towards us will depend on our relation towards Wisdom.

15. The first clause in the Greek seems to have the great Messianic hope in view, in the sense that just as at the last that true wisdom which Israel had received would lead to their rule over the nations, so in measure would its acceptance on the part of individuals secure for them a similar moral supremacy. But a comparison with the Syr. shews that the Greek here depends on a misreading of the Hebrew original. Instead of "shall judge nations," the Syr. has: "shall judge truth"—אֱמֶת, which the Greek misread אֻמּוֹת, "nations" (see General Introduction, § VIII.). Instead of the correct reading προσέχων (Alex., other MSS., Old Lat., Syr., Ar.) the Vatican has προσελθών. The promise of the second clause, which repeatedly occurs in the Old Testament, also points to Messianic times for its final fulfilment. In this connexion the same expression occurs in LXX. Jer. xxiii. 6; and with more general application, in LXX. Deut. xxxiii. 12, 28.

16. If a man commit himself unto her.] Probably better: If a man trust [rely], viz. in her, commit himself to be led and ruled by her, not only shall he inherit her, but his descendants also shall enjoy the benefits which her possession conveys. The Vat. has: "If thou trust . . . thou shalt inherit." But the other reading is the correct and best supported one.

17. The verse looks back upon the previous statement. A man must have "trust" in Wisdom, for at first her ways will seem to be neither straight nor happy, but crooked and trying—it will seem as if they did not lead to the promised goal, nor yet brought either security or happiness. This strange discipline—until she (Wisdom) have trust in his soul [the same word as in v. 16] and have proved him by her statutes [ordinances]. Similarly in Ab. vi. 4 the way of the Law is described as contentment with the meanest outward provision and every privation, combined nevertheless with unceasing occupation with the Law. If such be our bearing, we shall inherit the greatest blessing both in this and in the next world.

18, 19. Then—when Wisdom can put trust in a man, and he has approved himself by obeying her precepts through all difficulties—will she again turn to him according to the straight way, and there will not any longer be either sorrow nor yet misunderstanding about her ways. He that has faithfully walked in them amidst trials will be comforted, and also perceive the meaning of what to others are secrets. On the other hand, if a man cannot endure the ordeal, he will be given over to his own ruin (v. 19).

20, 21. The writer proceeds in the next stanza to set forth the practical aspect of true wisdom as true religion, and this, first, in a negative manner. Here he warns us to be on our guard lest we fall into sin. The second clause of v. 20 is somewhat difficult. Its literal rendering, and about [concerning, as regards] thy soul be not ashamed, leaves it open to regard it either as an admonition for the present or as pointing to the future. The former seems most accordant with v. 21, which sets forth the difference between false and true shame. [Verse 21 is inserted in LXX. Prov. xxvi. 11, at the close of that verse.]

22. False shame is further described in its various manifestations; and first in regarding or accepting the face of a person—that is, taking part for or against him—against one's soul. To this applies the warning in the second clause, which should be rendered: and be not abashed [or ashamed, as in 2 Thess. iii. 14; Tit. ii. 8] to thy fall. Such "shame" would lead to one's own fall.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

23 And refrain not to speak, ‖when there is occasion to do good, and hide not thy wisdom in her beauty.

‖ Gr. in time of saying.

24 For by speech wisdom shall be known: and learning by the word of the tongue.

25 In no wise speak against the truth; but be abashed of the error of thine ignorance.

‖ Or, and strive not against the stream.

26 Be not ashamed to confess thy sins; ‖and force not the course of the river.

B. C. cir. 200.

27 Make not thyself an underling to a foolish man; neither accept the person of the mighty.

28 Strive for the truth unto death, and the Lord shall fight for thee.

29 [g] Be not hasty in thy tongue, and in thy deeds slack and remiss.

[g] Jam. i. 19.

30 Be not as a lion in thy house, nor frantick among thy servants.

31 [h] Let not thine hand be stretched out to receive, and shut when thou shouldest ‖repay.

[h] Acts 20. 35.

‖ Or, give.

23. The verse marks a progress on the preceding one. The marginal rendering of the first clause is the more exact and expressive. The last words of the second clause (εἰς καλλονήν) are extremely difficult, nor has any alteration proposed in the words of the Greek text or any reference to the Hebrew original as yet rendered their explanation more easy. The most likely rendering would seem: hide not thy wisdom for beauty (for embellishment, viz. of self); that is, in order thereby to acquire glory. The clause which is omitted in the Vat., Alex., and Sin. is found in H. 106, 248, 253, Syr., and Vet. Lat., and seems almost necessary.

24. This verse indicates the reason of the previous admonition.

25. If silence may be unseasonable, so may speech be in certain circumstances. To speak against the truth, whether purposely or in ignorance, must be wrong; to feel our want of knowledge, and to be abashed by, and thus to admit it, must be right. The words "In no wise speak," which depend on a reading not so well supported, must be altered to Speak not. For the same reason, the words "of the error" in the second clause must be omitted.

26. To the admonition not to be restrained by false shame from confessing our errors and sins, the advice is aptly added not to "strive against the stream:" that is, not only to give up seeking excuses for our wrong-doing, but also to realise that it is impossible to resist the consequences of our sins. To "strive" or "swim against the stream" (niti contra torrentem, dirigere brachia c. t.) is an expression, common among all nations, for attempting the impossible. For this latter clause the Syr. has: "and resist not a fool," perhaps reading the later word יִשְׁטֹף for יִשְׁטֹחַ.

27. Make not thyself an underling.] Lit. "spread not thyself under as a mat." There is not, however, any other instance of this very forcible metaphorical use of the term.

28. the Lord.] According to the better reading, the Lord God.

29. hasty.] Syr. "boastful." The reading ταχὺς seems for various reasons preferable to that of τραχὺς, although the latter ("rough" or "harsh") is adopted by modern interpreters: for (1) it forms a good antithesis to the second clause; (2) it corresponds to such passages as Ecclus. v. 11; Prov. xxix. 20; Eccl. v. 1, 2 (A. V. 2, 3). Besides, it finds its exact counterpart in Rabbinic sayings. Thus Ab. i. 15 (the saying of Shammai): "Speak little and do much;" the praise of silence in Ab. i. 17 and iii. 13, in Pes. 99 a, and in Meg. 18 a; and in such passages as Babh. Mets. 87 a: "The righteous say (promise) little and do much; the wicked say much and do not even a little," the former being illustrated by the conduct of Abraham (Gen. xviii. 5 comp. with v. 7); the latter by that of Ephron (Gen. xxiii. 15 comp. with v. 16). Comp. also Ab. de R. Nath. xiii. p. 18*d* (top).

30. For "a lion" the Syr. Vers. has "a dog;" evidently כלבי for כלבי (as a lion). "As a lion,"—wild, hasty, relentless, destructive. The verb in the second clause rendered "be not frantick" really means to indulge in vain fancies, here probably not only fancies but suspicions, which would lead to fitful, moody, and tyrannical conduct towards one's household.

31. Compare with this the far transcending words of Christ, treasured up by St. Paul (Acts xx. 35): "It is more blessed to give than to receive." The following sentence in the Epistle of Barnabas (ch. xix.) is so similar as naturally to suggest derivation from Ecclus., or at least connexion with it: "Do not be ready to stretch forth the hands to take, but contracting them in regard to giving." In general the whole chapter in the Epistle of Barnabas contains much to remind us of the Book of Ecclesiasticus.

CHAPTER V.

The subject is still the same as before: deed and speech. As often, the opening verse of this chapter is connected with the

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

CHAPTER V.

1 We must not presume of our wealth and strength, 6 nor of the mercy of God, to sin. 9 We must not be doubletongued, 12 nor answer without knowledge.

[a] SET not thy heart upon thy goods; and say not, [b] I have enough for my life.

2 [c] Follow not thine own mind and thy strength, to walk in the ways of thy heart:

3 And say not, Who shall controul me for my works? for the Lord will surely revenge thy pride.

4 [d] Say not, I have sinned, and what harm hath happened unto me? [e] for the Lord is longsuffering, [f] he will in no wise let thee go.

B. C. cir. 200.

[a] 1 Tim. 6. 17. Luke 12. 15, 19. Prov. 11. 28.
[b] Eccles. 8. 12.
[c] 2 Pet. 3. 9.
[d] Eccles. 8. 11.
[e] Exod. 34. 7. ch. 16. 13.
[f]

closing verse of the previous one. And yet there is manifestly progression in the argument. The chapter naturally divides itself into two parts: (1) as to feeling and conduct, and (2) as to speech. Verse 1 must be regarded as a general introduction: 1 a to the first part; while 1 b already indicates the subject of the second part of the chapter, which is speech. Part II. begins with v. 10, to which v. 9 a forms an introduction, while v. 9 b, c connect this new introduction with the previous part, thus forming a transition. The general arrangement of the chapter might be thus outlined:—

Part I. v. 1. General Introduction.

Then follow four verses of two lines each, and two verses of four lines each.

v. 8. Conclusion in two lines which precisely correspond to those of the introductory verse.

v. 9 a, b. Transition connecting what follows with Part I., and exactly corresponding in its two lines to the two lines of v. 2, which forms the opening verse of Part I.

Part II. v. 9 c. Transition from v. 9 a, b, and generally from Part I. to Part II.

Then follow four verses of two lines each, and two verses of four lines, including in ch. v. the opening verse of ch. vi. (See below.)

1. Set not thy heart.] The verb ἐπέχειν occurs rarely (with different meanings) in the LXX., but repeatedly in the Apocr. (nine times in Ecclus. and twice in 2 Macc.). As here with ἐπί and the dat. it is only met with in this verse, in v. 8, and in xxxvii. 11. In the latter passage the meaning seems to be "to depend," or "rely." But in Hebrew to "depend" or "rely" is often equivalent to setting one's heart upon a thing. So certainly in Ps. lxii. 10 b, of which Ecclus. v. 1 seems an echo. Thus there would also be a progression of thought in the second line, which would on the other hand be only a repetition of the first clause, if we were to translate "rely." In the second line the words "for my life" (H, 248, 253, 308, Co., Vet. Lat. est mihi sufficiens vita) are a spurious and not very wise addition. The verse warns against satisfaction with and confidence in our possessions. Its parallels are Ps. lxii. and St. Luke xii. 15, 19. In 'Yoma,' 86 b, we read that the abundance of their silver and gold had led the Israelites to make themselves gods of gold.

2. thy mind.] τῇ ψυχῇ σου = inclinations: the words are omitted in the Syr. Vers.

strength.] Either physical strength or else power and ability—noli facere quicquid potes ac libet (Bretschn.).

the ways.] 248, Co., ὁδοῖς; according to the correct reading, the desires, ἐπιθυμίας.

3. for my works.] These words must be omitted, according to the better reading. In the second clause the words "thy pride" must equally be omitted. The reading generally accepted has σε, in which case we should have to translate, will surely punish thee. But it seems more in accordance with the Hebraism in the text (ἐκδικῶν ἐκδικήσει) to suppose that the original had נָקֹם יִנָּקֵם, in which case σε must be omitted (as by some authorities), and we should have to translate, "for the Lord will surely avenge."

4. According to the better reading, the word "harm" must be omitted from the first clause, and from the second line the words "he will in no wise let thee go." The meaning is: Make not wrongful inference from temporary impunity, nor yet from the mercy of God. On the contrary, the latter should lead to repentance and restitution. This seems indicated in v. 5.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

5 Concerning propitiation, [g] be not without fear to add sin unto sin:

[g] ch. 21. 1.

6 And say not, His mercy is great; he will be pacified for the multitude of my sins: [h] for mercy and wrath come from him, and his indignation resteth upon sinners.

[h] ch. 16. 11, 12.

7 Make no tarrying to turn to the Lord, and put not off from day to day: for suddenly shall the wrath of the Lord come forth, and in thy security thou shalt be destroyed, and perish in the day of vengeance.

[i] Prov. 10. 2. & 11. 4. Ezek. 7. 19.

8 [i] Set not thine heart upon goods unjustly gotten; for they shall not profit thee in the day of calamity.

B. C. cir. 200.

9 Winnow not with every wind, and go not into every way: for so doth the sinner that hath a double tongue.

10 Be stedfast in thy understanding; and let thy word be the same.

11 [k] Be swift to hear; and let thy life be sincere; [l] and with patience give answer.

[k] Jam. 1. 19.

[l] 1 Pet. 3. 15.

12 If thou hast understanding, answer thy neighbour; if not, lay thy hand upon thy mouth.

5. The Syr. transposes vv. 5 and 6. It need scarcely be said that the term "propitiation" must not be taken in the Christian, but in the Jewish sense. In illustration of this saying, we quote the following from the Mishnah, "If a man says [thinks], I will sin and repent, I will sin and repent—no furtherance is given to his repentance. (If he says) I will sin and the Day of Atonement shall make atonement (propitiate), the day of Atonement will not propitiate [for him]" ('Yoma,' viii. 9). The Mishnah adds that the Day of Atonement only brings pardon of sins against God; as regards those against our neighbours, reconciliation is first required. The Talmud, however, explains that pardon is extended three times on the Day of Atonement (after confession), but not a fourth time. Yet if a man had sinned and sinned again, he would come to look upon it as lawful ('Yom.' 86 b). In another passage we are told that forgiveness is procured by "repentance and good works" (u. s. 87 a). [But the Jerus. Talmud (in loc.) attributes pardon to the Day of Atonement, even without repentance.]—To be without fear as regards propitiation might lead to adding sin unto sin (v. 5 b).

6. pacified for.] The same expression as in the previous verse, "propitiation." In the original the words used were probably כַּפָּרֶת (v. 5), and here כַּפֵּר. This would bring the statement into still closer agreement with what we read in the Mishnah about the Day of Atonement (Yom kakkippurim). The reason for the warning is that not only mercy but also wrath cometh from God. The expression "resteth" probably corresponds to the Hebrew נוּחַ, which indicates permanence, continuance (so of the Spirit of God in Is. xi. 2).

7. On the other hand, repentance should not be delayed. In the Jerus. Talmud we have a discussion as to the precise moment on the Day of Atonement when pardon is obtained. There also the various sins are grouped into four classes. Those consisting of the breach of an affirmative precept are said to be pardoned immediately on repentance, irrespective of the Day of Atonement ('Jer. Yoma,' 45 b, c).—The expression for "from day to day" also occurs in 2 Pet. ii. 8; and in the LXX. Gen. xxxix. 10, Numb. xxx. 15. According to the better reading, the following italicised words must be omitted from the last clause: in thy security, and be destroyed, and.

8. Returns to v. 1 (see introd. remarks). The reading ὠφελήσεις, which Fritzsche prefers, does not alter the sense. Comp. Prov. x. 2.

9. This verse forms a very apt transition to the next subject: the sins of the tongue. The meaning of the first clause seems to be: in order to get wealth—it may be unjustly (v. 8)—do not seize every possible opportunity that may offer: this would necessitate sinful temporising and duplicity.

10. On the contrary, inward and outward stedfast truthfulness is required of us. Σύνεσις is not exactly "understanding," but the result of inward perception and conviction. The verse would therefore convey the admonition to adhere to that of which one was fully persuaded in one's own mind, and to be always truthful in the utterance of it.

11. In order that such may be the case, be swift in thy listening, and with deliberateness (or forbearance, μακροθυμία) speak answer. Comp. St. Jas. i. 19. The words "and let thy life be sincere" are spurious.

12. In strict accordance with vv. 10, 11, it is added: If thou hast knowledge [σύνεσις—if thou hast arrived at a state of clear inward perception], answer thy neighbour: but if not, thy hand be upon thy

B. C. cir. 200.

13 [m]Honour and shame is in talk: and the tongue of man is his fall.

14 [n]Be not called a whisperer, and lie not in wait with thy tongue: for a foul shame is upon the thief, and an evil condemnation upon the double tongue.

15 Be not ignorant of any thing in a great matter or a small.

[m] Matt. 12. 37.

[n] Rom. 1. 29.

CHAPTER VI.

2 Do not extol thine own conceit, 7 but make choice of a friend. 18 Seek wisdom betimes. 20 It is grievous to some, 28 yet the fruits thereof are pleasant. 35 Be ready to hear wise men.

B. C. cir. 200.

INSTEAD of a friend become not an enemy; for [thereby] thou shalt inherit an ill name, shame, and reproach: even so shall a sinner that hath a double tongue.

2 Extol not thyself in the counsel of thine own heart; that thy soul be not torn in pieces as a bull [straying alone].

mouth,—the latter expression exactly as in Prov. xxx. 32, יָד לְפֶה; Job xxi. 5, יָד עַל־פֶּה.

13. Comp. Prov. xviii. 21.

14. The word "foul" before "shame" is scarcely required; and the last words had better be rendered the double-tongued. The verse is intended to point out that to steal entailed only disgrace, but to detract from the good name of another would bring evil condemnation upon him that was guilty of it. This saying of the Siracide may have been in the mind of Shakspeare when he wrote: "Who steals my purse steals trash," &c. ('Othello,' Act iii. sc. 3).

15. Be not ignorant.] Neither this rendering nor yet "err not" seems to express the meaning of ἀγνοέω. The verb properly signifies "to be ignorant," and hence "to err," owing to want of knowledge. Thus it may correspond to the Hebrew שָׁגָה, although the latter term is rather used in contradistinction to sins "with a high hand," and may therefore apply to sins caused by weakness as well as to those that are due to want of knowledge (comp. Delitzsch, 'Comm. z. Br. an d. Hebr.' p. 175). In Heb. v. 2 the expression seems to refer exclusively to sins from want of knowledge. Similarly, in the passage before us (Ecclus. v. 15) we would confine the meaning of the word to a want of knowledge. In that case the verse would (in accordance with vv. 11, 12) convey the admonition to have definite, right, and well-grounded views on all subjects, whether great or small. The verb does not again occur in Ecclus., but the use of the substantive (xxiii. 3; xxviii. 7) seems to bear out the meaning which we have assigned to it. We could scarcely translate the verb by "err," viz. with the tongue, since the term cannot be used of purposed sins, while on the other hand it would be impossible to characterise sins of the tongue as sins of ignorance.

With this (first) line chap. v. ends in the LXX. and in the Syriac Version. But it seems highly probable, as Fritzsche suggests, that the first verse of chap. vi. should be added to the close of chap. v. Chap. vi. 1 begins in all MSS. with the word "and." Its reasoning evidently forms part of chap. v., while it is wholly unconnected with the subject of chap. vi. Accordingly we would join vi. 1 to v. 15, as follows: "and instead of a friend become not an enemy." To this we would add the rest of vi. 1, omitting with the Syr. the word οὕτως: For an evil name, shame, and reproach shall the sinner who is double-tongued inherit.

CHAPTER VI.

The chapter (omitting v. 1) consists of five parts. Part I., which comprises four verses (vv. 2–5), connects itself with the previous chapter, and sets forth a twofold danger—that arising from want of proper knowledge and that due to intentional sin. The last verse in the stanza (v. 5) forms a transition to the admonition to make proper friendships. Part II., consisting of ten verses (vv. 6–15), contains this admonition. Part III., of two verses (16, 17), forms another transition, and connects the previous with the following parts. True friendship is the gift of God, and must be based on His fear; for as the best friendship, so the truest counsel cometh from the Wisdom that is from above. In Parts IV. and V., each of ten verses (18–27; 28–37), this Divine instruction is further set forth. The last four verses form a twofold conclusion, corresponding to that of Part III. (vv. 16, 17). The verses in this chapter are of two lines, except in the middle (v. 19) and at the close (v. 37), where the verses are of four lines.

2. Exalt not thyself in the counsel of thy soul]—a common Hebraism (עֲצַת־נַפְשִׁי) for "inmost mind." Considerable difficulty attaches to the next clause, as in our present Greek text, partly because the verb διαρπάζειν does not admit the rendering "torn away," while it is difficult to attach any meaning to such a strange figure as "torn in pieces like a

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

3 Thou shalt eat up thy leaves, and lose thy fruit, and leave thyself as a dry tree.

4 A wicked soul shall destroy him that hath it, and shall make him to be laughed to scorn of his enemies.

‖ Gr. A sweet throat.

[a] ch. 20. 13.

5 ‖ [a]Sweet language will multiply friends: and a fairspeaking tongue will increase kind greetings.

6 Be in peace with many: nevertheless have but one counsellor of a thousand.

B. C. cir. 200.

7 If thou wouldest get a friend, ‖ prove him first, and be not hasty to credit him.

‖ Or, get him in the time of trouble.

8 For some man is a friend for his own occasion, and will not abide in the day of thy trouble.

9 And there is a friend, who being turned to enmity and strife will discover thy reproach.

[b] ch. 37. 4, 5.

10 [b]Again, some friend is a companion at the table, and will not continue in the day of thy affliction.

bull;" but chiefly because there is not any connexion between v. 2 and v. 3, where, however, not only the argument but even the figure must be continued. The Syriac, even if emended, does not seem to us to clear up or remove the difficulty. In these circumstances we feel inclined to adopt the suggestion of Böttcher, that by one of the most frequent clerical errors in MSS.—that by which when a word ends with the same letter as that with which the next begins, one of these letters is dropped out—what had been ὡς σταυρός may have been miswritten ὡς ταῦρος. In that case the meaning would be: "Set not up thyself in thine own mind and conceit (like a pole or stake) lest thy soul be robbed [here = stripped] like (as is) a pole." Possibly there may even have been in the Hebrew a word-play between the עֲצָה, the "counsel" of his soul, and עֵץ, or in later Hebrew עֲצָה, "a pole."

3. If this suggestion in regard to v. 2 is correct, the figure would be beautifully continued in v. 3. And the hypothesis is further supported by this, that for ὡς σταυρός of v. 2 we have in v. 3 the parallel ὡς ξύλον, which is the word by which the LXX. render עֵץ in Gen. xl. 19; Deut. xxi. 22; and Josh. x. 26. Nor could any more apt description of self-conceit be given than that it eats up the leaves, destroys (this probably better than "loses") the fruits, and leaves a man as a dry tree—a pole—instead of a fresh tree, covered with leaves and fruit.

4. We suppose that the comparison with a tree stripped of its leaves recalled to the writer the use of the same figure in Ps. i. in regard to the wicked. The second line of v. 4 had best be rendered: And shall make him the derision of enemies—the word "derision" including the idea of the joy felt by his enemies, which is conveyed by ἐπίχαρμα.

5. In contrast to this self-conceit—this folly and wickedness—which will only lead to destruction, and raise up enemies who will rejoice at our fall and laugh at us, is the suggested advice to make friends, who shall be our counsellors (instead of following the conceit of our own soul). Only let them be good, wise friends. And v. 5 indicates how to make such friends. The first clause literally rendered is: A sweet throat [larynx] will multiply his [one's] friends.

6. Let them that are at peace with thee be many; but thy counsellors one out of a thousand.] The verse begins Part II.—concerning friendship. It is quoted in 'Yebam.' 63 b (towards the end): "Many they that seek [inquire for] thy peace: the secret reveal to one out of a thousand;" and again in Sanh. 100 b (lines 10, 9 from bottom) with very slight alterations, and the addition of the last clause of Mic. vii. 5.

7. If thou art getting [acquiring] a friend, get him in trial—that is, when his being a friend shall be tried.

and trust not in him hastily.] Be not hasty in putting trust in a person. The last clause should logically stand first, but the positive is here advanced before the negative. The reference is to a real friend, whom one may trust at all times. If we are looking out for such, let us not be hasty in regarding acquaintances as friends, but let ours be a tried friend.

8. For there is a friend in his (own) time—i.e. as long as it suits him.

9. And there is a friend [who will be] changed to enmity, and he will reveal [disclose, make known] the conflict of thy shame—viz. that conflict through which thou hadst to pass, with all thy difficulties and weaknesses and failures, and this will tend to bring shame upon thee in the opinion of others.

10. And there is a friend, &c.] Perhaps the words "companion at the table" do not fully express the meaning of the original, which is, that such an one is ready to accept our hospitality; but when we have not any longer an invitation to give, his friendship ceases. This kind of friendship is so frequent

B. C. cir. 200.

11 But in thy prosperity he will be as thyself, and will be bold over thy servants.

12 If thou be brought low, he will be against thee, and will hide himself from thy face.

13 Separate thyself from thine enemies, and take heed of thy friends.

14 A faithful friend is a strong defence: and he that hath found such an one hath found a treasure.

15 Nothing doth countervail a faithful friend, and his excellency is invaluable.

16 A faithful friend is the medicine of life; and they that fear the Lord shall find him. B. C. cir. 200.

17 Whoso feareth the Lord shall direct his friendship aright: for as he is, so shall his neighbour be also.

18 My son, gather instruction from thy youth up: so shalt thou find wisdom till thine old age.

19 Come unto her as one that ploweth and soweth, and wait for her good fruits: for thou shalt not toil much in labouring about her, but thou shalt eat of her fruits right soon.

20 She is very unpleasant to the that the writer adds some further details.—Verses 9 and 10 are omitted in the Syriac.

11. But.] Rather, And.

and speak freely against (or else, "to") thy servants.] So intimate is he, as if he were thine alter ego.

12. But when thy circumstances change, his bearing also changes. Instead of being "as thou," he is now "against thee;" instead of making himself at home in thy house, he hides himself from thee, so that if thou seekest him he cannot be found. It is needless to quote (as in most Commentaries) similar sayings from classical writers. The case described is only too common in all countries and in all ages.

13. These, then, are the three classes of friends to be avoided: a friend for his own advantage; a changeable friend; a time-serving friend. While therefore one should absolutely separate oneself from enemies, "of thy friends (of such friends) have a care:" take care in regard to them.

14. To these three classes of spurious friends a threefold description of true friendship is now opposed. It affords protection, bestows a treasure, and brings healing in the troubles of life (vv. 14–16).

15. Of [for] a faithful friend there is not any equivalent (by way of exchange); and there is not any balance [by weight] of his excellence.] ἀντάλλαγμα is the LXX. rendering for מַחִיר in 3 Kings xx. 2 (Cod. Alex.); Job xxviii. 15; and Jer. xv. 13. But only in the first of those passages does it mean an equivalent in money by way of purchase, in the other two an equivalent by way of exchange; and with this agrees the use of the word in St. Matt. xvi. 26, St. Mark viii. 37. Thus v. 16 would carry out the idea of friendship as a "treasure," broached at the close of v. 15.

17. so also is his neighbour.] The meaning is not that a man so influences his neighbour that the latter becomes like himself, but that a man chooses as his companion one who is of the same disposition with himself, so that we can judge of his character by that of his associate. A similar "common Proverb" is found in the Midrash Shochar Tobh on Ps. civ. 1.

18. The two previous verses formed the transition to the new subject opened in v. 18. The connexion between them is as follows: true friendship must be wisely directed by the fear of the Lord—and this fear is true wisdom. Son, from thy youth choose [= elige ex aliis] instruction [the verb no doubt represents the Hebrew בחר], and unto grey hairs thou shalt find wisdom. This is one of the most thoughtful sentences in Ecclus. Mark the twofold distinction between choosing instruction, and finding wisdom—the one being the early choice, the other the continual result to the end.

19. The idea of v. 18 is now presented under a beautiful figure. The verse would gain in force if we arranged the words as in the original: As one that ploweth and that soweth, come unto her, . . . for in thy labour about her [the figure of the work of the husbandman being still continued] thou shalt [but] a little [time] have weariness [toil], and speedily shalt thou eat of her fruits. The substantive to be supplied in both clauses is Wisdom.

20. As one that is rough exceedingly [the figure is probably still that of the soil; or perhaps of the road] she is to the uninstructed (to the untutored, the ἀπαιδεύτους, in opposition to those who from their youth choose παιδείαν, v. 18).] But it has been suggested that σφόδρα, "exceedingly," is a clerical error for σοφία, "Wisdom," which both the Syr. and the Vet. Lat.

Digitized by Google

B. C. cir. 200.

unlearned: he that is without ‖understanding will not remain with her.

21 She will lie upon him as a [c]mighty stone of trial; and he will cast her from him ere it be long.

22 For wisdom is according to her name, and she is not manifest unto many.

23 Give ear, my son, receive my advice, and refuse not my counsel, 24 And put thy feet into her fetters, and thy neck into her ‖chain.

25 Bow [d]down thy shoulder, and bear her, and be not grieved with her bonds.

26 Come unto her with thy whole heart, and keep her ways with all thy power.

27 Search, and seek, and she shall be made known unto thee: and when thou hast got hold of her, let her not go.

28 For at the last thou shalt find her rest, and that shall be turned to thy joy.

29 Then shall her fetters be a strong defence for thee, and her chains a robe of glory.

30 For there is a golden ornament upon her, and her bands are ‖purple lace.

B. C. cir. 200.

‖ Or, heart.

[c] Zech. 12. 3.

‖ Or, collar.

[d] Matt. 11. 29.

‖ Or, a rib-band of blue silk, Numb. 15. 38.

have. The expression "without understanding," ἀκάρδιος, is an exact rendering of the corresponding Hebrew terms in Prov. xvii. 16 and in Jer. v. 21; comp. also the similar expression in Prov. x. 13. But in the Hebrew parallels the "understanding" is that aspect of it which is directed to what is higher—the לֵב.

21. The figure is now changed. Not only does wisdom seem rough soil, and the uninstructed not persevere in his work; but as he approaches it, it proves a heavy weight which he speedily casts from him. "The stone of trial" seems to have been one for trying strength. St. Jerome notes on Zech. xii. 3 (A. V. and R. V. "a burdensome stone") that it had been an ancient custom in Palestine, continued in his days, to have in towns and villages a round stone of very great weight, on which the young men made trial of their strength, how high they could lift, and hold it in their hands. For "lie upon him," rather be upon him,—and he will not delay to cast her from him [Bissell].

22. It seems impossible by any critical ingenuity to explain the first clause of this verse, since there is not any Hebrew or Greek word which would admit of a play upon the word "wisdom." [On the suggested explanation of Hitzig, see Nowack on Eccles. iii. 11 in the 'Kurzgef. Exeg. Hdb.' p. 229.] We must therefore suppose the Hebrew text to have been corrupted or misread. We may here quote, without adopting it, the suggestion of Dr. Horowitz (Frankel's 'Monatsschr. f. Gesch. u. Wissensch. d. Judenth.,' vol. xiv. p. 197) that the Hebrew original had בְּשֵׁמָה, "by name," which was misread כִּשְׁמָהּ, "according to her name." He supposes the original to have been: החכמה רק בְּשֵׁמָה היא לוֹ—"wisdom is his [he possesses it] only by name," or perhaps "it only exists nominally for him," = he only knows of it by name. (The correction into שִׁמְעָה, "by hearsay," need scarcely be discussed.) In that case the translator, unable from his misreading to account for the לוֹ, would have dropped it as a clerical error. But there are serious linguistic objections to the suggestion of Horowitz. The Syr. has: "Her name is like her teaching [hidden?], and she is not approved by fools."

23. Having given such full warning, the writer resumes the subject of which he is treating.

advice.] Perhaps "judgment," or "opinion."

24. chain.] Rather, "collar," as in the margin. The words of our Lord (St. Matt. xi. 29) will here readily occur to the reader.

25. Bow down.] Rather, put under [Bissell].

be not grieved.] Rather, be not weary, chafe not. The figure is here of an animal unaccustomed to the yoke.

26. heart.] Literally, "soul." The figure is now dropped. Verses 24, 25 form an antithesis to v. 20, and verses 26, 27 to v. 21.

28. that shall be turned.] From v. 29 we infer that the reference is to the previous trouble and labour (vv. 25, 26), not to "wisdom." We would therefore translate: it (thy previous labour) shall be turned to thee into joy.

29. be to thee for a strong defence, and her collars [in the sense of "yoke"] for a robe of glory.] This marks the change indicated in v. 28.

30. The figure is now somewhat clumsily varied. The reference may be to the High-priest's mitre, which would explain the

B. C. cir. 200.

31 Thou shalt put her on as a robe of honour, and shalt put her about thee as a crown of joy.

32 My son, if thou wilt, thou shalt be taught: and if thou wilt apply thy mind, thou shalt be prudent.

33 If thou love to hear, thou shalt receive understanding: and if thou bow thine ear, thou shalt be wise.

34 Stand in the multitude of the [e] elders; and cleave unto him that is wise.

[e] ch. 8. 9.

35 Be willing to hear every godly discourse; and let not the parables of understanding escape thee.

36 And if thou seest a man of understanding, get thee betimes unto him, and let thy foot wear the steps of his door.

37 Let thy mind be upon the ordinances of the Lord, and [f] meditate

[f] Ps. 1. 2.

B. C. cir. 200.

continually in his commandments: he shall establish thine heart, and give thee wisdom at thine own desire.

CHAPTER VII.

1 We are exhorted from sin, 4 from ambition, 8 presumption, 10 and fainting in prayer: 12 from lying and backbiting, 18 and how to esteem a friend: 19 a good wife: 20 a servant: 22 our cattle: 23 our children and parents: 31 the Lord and his priests: 32 the poor, and those that mourn.

DO no evil, [a] so shall no harm come unto thee.

[a] 1 Pet. 3. 13.

2 Depart from the unjust, and iniquity shall turn away from thee.

3 My son, [b] sow not upon the furrows of unrighteousness, and thou shalt not reap them sevenfold.

[b] Job 4. 8. Prov. 22. 8.

4 Seek not of the Lord preeminence, neither of the king the seat of honour.

omission of vv. 29 b and 30 in the Syr. But, on the other hand, comp. the expressions in Jer. iv. 30.

31. a robe of glory ... upon thee.] Not "about thee."

32. thou shalt be instructed.] This, with reference to v. 18.

33. The word "understanding" (σύνεσιν), not found in the better MSS., is only a disturbing addition.

34. the multitude.] Probably קהל. Who is wise (= if any is wise) to him cleave.

35. Here also the order of the sentence had best be inverted. "Be willing" is probably not strong enough; and if the word corresponded (as Fritzsche supposes) to אבה or חפץ, it would imply "desire after," and "pleasure in." And let not the proverbs of understanding (משלי בינה) escape from thee. Although the common usage would suggest the rendering "escape thee," viz. from thy memory, yet the other translation seems better suited to the context.

36. get thee betimes.] Rather, at early morning.

37. Last line: And thy desire for wisdom shall be granted thee [Bissell].

CHAPTER VII.

This chapter might be generally inscribed: Rules for the Wise. It consists of two parts: I. Rules regarding oneself (vv. 1–17); II. Rules regarding others (vv. 18–36). To be more detailed: Part I. has (1) a Prooemium in three verses, warning the wise against sin; (2) then follow two stanzas of four, and two stanzas of three verses (= 2 × 7), giving warning in regard to mind (ambition, vv. 4–7); to heart (presumption, vv. 8–11); to speech (vv. 12–14); and, lastly, in regard to life (vv. 15–17). Part II., which gives Rules in reference to others, consists, like Part I., of four stanzas (respectively of four, seven, three, and four verses), with a conclusion (v. 36) which takes the place of the Proem of Part I. In Part II. the first stanza gives rules as regards friends and dependants (vv. 18–21); the second, in regard to property and family (vv. 22–28); the third, in regard to the Lord and His priests (vv. 29–31); the fourth, in regard to our neighbour (the poor, mourners, the sick, vv. 32–35). Lastly, v. 36 forms an apt conclusion to what had preceded.

1. Do not evil, and harm [evil] shall not befall thee.] Drusius: κακά, mala culpae; κακόν, malum poenae.

2. This verse marks an advance in thought: depart from what is unjust, and it shall turn away from thee [Bissell]; i.e. thou shalt not experience its evil consequences. The figure of v. 3 repeatedly occurs in the Old Testament, as in Job iv. 8, Prov. xxii. 8, Hos. x. 12, and in Gal. vi. 8.

4. With this verse begins the enumeration of the various occasions to sin, against the consequences of which the previous verses had warned.

preeminence.] Rather, leadership (a place of command), "the seat,"—better, a seat.

B. C. cir. 200.

5 [c]Justify not thyself before the Lord; and boast not of thy wisdom before the king.

6 Seek not to be judge, being not able to take away iniquity; lest at any time [d]thou fear the person of the mighty, and lay a stumbling-block in the way of thy uprightness.

7 Offend not against the multitude of a city, and then thou shalt not cast thyself down among the people.

8 Bind not one sin upon another; for in one thou shalt not be unpunished. B. C. cir. 200.

9 [e]Say not, God will look upon the multitude of my oblations, and when I offer to the most high God, he will accept it.

10 Be not fainthearted when thou makest thy prayer, and neglect not to give alms.

11 Laugh no man to scorn in the bitterness of his soul: for [f]there is one which humbleth and exalteth.

[c] Job 9. 20. Ps. 143. 2. Eccles. 7. 16. Luke 18. 11.
[d] Lev. 19. 15.
[e] Prov. 21. 27.
[f] 1 Sam. 2. 7.

5, 6. The warning of v. 4 was against ambition, whether before God or man, but the arguments by which this advice is now supported are only of a prudential and worldly character. The connexion between verses 5 and 6 seems somewhat difficult. We would propose to arrange them as follows. The advice in 5 a, make not thyself just before the Lord (profess not to be righteous and perfect), is supported by 6 b, lest thou be not able to put away iniquities; the advice in 5 b, make not thyself wise before the king (profess not and pretend not to be a wise man), is supported by 6 c, lest haply thou shouldst fear (be timid) before the face of the ruler (lord); and, lastly, 6 a by 6 d, seek not to become a judge—and [lest] thou shouldest put [set up] a stumbling-block in [in reference to] thy righteousness. But commentators generally regard clauses b, c, d as connected with clause a of v. 6, and as indicating the dangers of becoming a judge. In that case the two clauses of v. 5 would correspond to the two clauses of v. 4. But such a parallelism of verses is not common. Further, v. 6 would begin a new subject, and clause a be supported by not less than three distinct arguments.

7. This verse opens another subject, and indicates those causes of evil which have their root in the heart, as the others (pride and ambition) had theirs in the mind.

Sin not.] The Hebrew חטא—the same construction with εἰς in LXX. Gen. xx. 6, 9, xliii. 9, xliv. 32; 1 Kings ii. 27, xix. 4, 5, xxiv. 12; Prov. viii. 36, xx. 2. Here it is used in the sense of "offend not." On the other hand, the words: and cast not thyself down among the people, bear the same meaning as our English "throw not thyself away" (te ipse abjicies et prosternes, Cicero), or the German, sich wegwerfen.

8. The order is now inverted. In the previous stanza it was pride, first before God and then before man; here it is presumption first before man (v. 7), then before God—this being, in each case, the more natural order. Bind not twice sin; for in the one thou shalt not be unpunished. Repeat not sin; even its first commission shall not go unpunished. Bretschneider explains the words, "bind not up (as a wound) sin;" De Wette, "palliate not:" Fritzsche, "atone not twice." But these renderings seem forced. In reference to this and the following verse, we once more recall the saying in the Mishnah: "If a man says [thinks], I will sin and repent, I will sin and repent, no furtherance is given to his repentance; I will sin, and the Day of Atonement shall make atonement—the Day of Atonement will [does] not propitiate [make atonement] [for him]" ('Yoma,' viii. 9). And although the Talmud rather weakens this saying of the Mishnah, yet we mark in connexion with the warning of the Son of Sirach that the Rabbis also insist that, if a man commits a sin and repeats it, it appears to him as if it were lawful ('Yoma,' 86 b, 87 a).

10. Fritzsche supposes that this verse is intended to indicate "the right means for pleasing God." But in that case it would scarcely fit in with the previous verse. We regard the words as meant to correct any possible misunderstanding. If the presumptuous sinner may not hope for acceptance by sacrifices or the like, others need not, and must not be faint-hearted in their prayers, and our best sacrifices are alms. In the Talmud ('Erubh.' 65 a) the first half of the verse is adduced, without mentioning its source, but in the same manner in which ordinarily Scripture is quoted (שנאמר בצר אל יורה). Comp. St. Jas. i. 6.

11. This verse seems naturally to connect itself with the last clause of v. 10. Comp. Prov. xvii. 5.

12. The verse begins another stanza, referring to sins of the tongue. Characteris-

B. C. cir. 200.

12 ‖Devise not a lie against thy brother; neither do the like to thy friend.

‖ Gr. Plow not.

13 Use not to make any manner of lie: for the custom thereof is not good.

14 Use not many words in a multitude of elders, [g] and make not ‖much babbling when thou prayest.

[g] Eccles. 5. 2. Matt. 6. 7.

‖ Or, vain repetition.

15 Hate not laborious work, neither husbandry, [h] which the most High hath ‖ordained.

B. C. cir. 200.

16 Number not thyself among the multitude of sinners, but remember that wrath will not tarry long.

[h] Gen. 3. 19, 23.

‖ Gr. created.

17 Humble thy soul greatly: for the vengeance of the ungodly is fire and worms.

18 Change not a friend for any good by no means; neither a faithful brother for the gold of Ophir.

tically, duty is here once more presented from a negative aspect, the writer indicating in this and the following verses the various causes of offence which are to be avoided.

Devise not.] Rather, plough not or "till not." There cannot be question that the expression was the same as in Prov. iii. 29, but even there the word חרשׁ seems to mean "plough" rather than "devise" (the latter most comment. and Nowack ad loc.). From the whole context we gather that the reference is to sins of the tongue, not to the purpose of sinning. The speech of a man may be like ploughing and tilling the soil to bring forth a crop of lies against one's "brother;" the term being here equivalent to "neighbour." Nor need we in that case feel surprise at the addition in the second clause, since unfortunately the practice of "ploughing and tilling lies" is quite as common, if not more so, in regard to "friends," as to one's neighbour generally.

13. The A. V., though not literal, correctly expresses the meaning of the verse. For the continuance thereof (is) not unto good, —such a habit leads, or comes, to no good; it has a bad end. A rather low, but prudential, motive for abstaining from participation in raising a crop of lies.

14. The writer had probably in view some person of importance—whether really such, or only in his own opinion—to whom (in his intense self-consciousness) he addresses counsels. If in the previous verse he had advised to avoid lying talk about others, which would lead to no good end, he now warns against "idle talk." Prate not in the multitude of elders—talk not idly, babble not. In the LXX. the verb ἀδολεσχεῖν is always used sensu bono, except in the solitary instance Ps. lxviii. (lxix.) 12—and make not repetition in thy prayer: μὴ δευτερώσῃς λόγον—probably somewhat different from the βαττολογεῖν of St. Matt. vi. 7, which was πολυλογία rather than δευτέρωσις. The verb βαττολ. does not otherwise occur either in the LXX., the Apocr., or the N. T. Such silly, idle talk before man or God proves a man to be a fool, if not a liar.

15. This verse begins the enumeration of that which in our life may lead to evil consequences. The following are here specially mentioned: (1) idleness, or unwillingness to do hard work, especially to engage in husbandry, which was appointed of God, v. 15; (2) evil companions, v. 16; (3) proud self-seeking and self-sufficiency, v. 17. In the latter verse the writer rises from the negative to the positive. The expression used ("to humble one's soul") is in the LXX. indeed applied to fasting (LXX. Lev. xvi. 29, 31; xxiii. 29, 32; Is. lviii. 3, 5). But here it obviously refers to submission to God in a sense parallel to Mic. vi. 8. At first sight it seems difficult to refer "the fire and the worm" (sing., not plural), which are to be "the punishment [this rather than "vengeance"] of the ungodly," to other than the punishment after death. But in Judith xvi. 17 the same expressions are used in regard to the presumably temporal judgments on the heathen in the Messianic day. With this the descriptions in the Book of Henoch xlvi. and xlviii. also accord. (Comp. Fritzsche on Jud. xvi. 17 in the 'Kurzgef. Exeg. Handb.' 2 Lief., p. 208.) These parallelisms and the general absence in Ecclus. of any reference to the rewards or punishments of another life, lead to the inference that such are not alluded to in our verse. The admonition to humility (17 a) may have called up by way of contrast the typical "proud"—the foes of Israel—and their doom in the Messianic day (v. 17 b).

18. With this begins Part II., which details the rules to be observed towards others; and, first, in regard to friends and dependants (vv. 18–21). There cannot be any doubt that the right reading and rendering of v. 18 a is: Exchange not a friend for [what is] indifferent, ἀδιάφορον. The latter is the technical term of Stoic philosophy for the media, the indifferentia, such as "riches, strength, appearance, honours, rule," &c. (Seneca, 'Epist.' lxxxii. 12). The meaning is, for the

B. C. cir. 200.

19 Forego not a wise and good woman: [i] for her grace is above gold.

20 [k] Whereas thy servant worketh truly, entreat him not evil, nor the hireling that bestoweth himself wholly for thee.

21 Let thy soul love a good servant, and defraud him not of liberty.

22 [l] Hast thou cattle? have an eye to them: and if they be for thy profit, keep them with thee.

23 Hast thou children? [m] instruct them, and bow down their neck from their youth.

24 Hast thou daughters? have a care of their body, and shew not thyself cheerful toward them.

25 Marry thy daughter, and so shalt thou have performed a weighty matter: but give her to a man of understanding.

26 Hast thou a wife after thy mind? forsake her not: but give not thyself over to a ‖ light woman.

27 [n] Honour thy father with thy whole heart, and forget not the sorrows of thy mother.

28 Remember that thou wast be-

B. C. cir. 200.

[i] Prov. 31. 10.

[k] Lev. 19. 13. ch. 33. 30. & 34. 22.

[l] Deut. 25. 4. Prov. 27. 23, &c.

[m] Prov. 22. 6. Ephes. 6. 4.

‖ Or, hateful.

[n] Tobit 4. 3. ch. 3. 2, &c.

sake of what is ἀδιάφορον, do not part with a friend—neither with a true [γνήσιος here certainly in that sense; comp. 2 Macc. xiv. 8; 3 Macc. iii. 23] brother for the gold of Ophir [Σουφείρ, as in the LXX.].

19. Turn not away from a wise and good wife.] We have rendered ἀστοχεῖν by "turn away," as being a more comprehensive term than "forego not." But we have no doubt that the meaning is, as given by Wahl: noli separari ab uxore sapiente. This aptly follows on v. 18. Grace = gracefulness.

20. After the wife comes the servant: A [domestic] servant who worketh truly [really, honestly] illtreat not, nor a hireling who devoteth his soul [life],—who gives himself wholly to it. The expression is probably taken from Deut. xxiv. 15: נַפְשׁוֹ אֵת נֹשֵׂא.

21. an intelligent servant . . . defraud him not of release.] Comp. Jerem. xxxiv. 8–16.

22. Rules in regard to property and family (vv. 22–28); and, first, as to kindness towards animals, yet this tempered by prudential considerations.

23. instruct.] Rather, train—in the sense of discipline. In the Syriac Version the second clause is rendered: "and give them wives in their youth." This might seem only a sarcastic paraphrase of what we read in the Greek. But when in Qidd. 30 a (comp. 29 b) we read the advice to marry one's son, and in connexion with it find the expression, while "thy hand is upon" his "neck" (אידיך על צוארי דבריך), i.e. while he is young, we conclude that this was an old Jewish saying, and that the Syriac Version, which throughout this section is very apt, accurately represents the Hebrew original, of which the younger Siracide only retained so much in his translation as seemed to him suitable. And we are confirmed in this view by the circumstance that Prov. xxii. 6, to which evidently there is reference in Ecclus. vii. 23, is expressly quoted in Qidd. 30 a, in connexion with the advice just mentioned.

24. care of their body.] That it be preserved pure and chaste.

and make not thy face cheerful towards them.] Let not thy bearing be jocular, but rather austere and severe. In what is known as the 'First Alphabet of Ben Sira' (4) we find the following, which may be a parallel to v. 23: "Gold requires beating and a young man chastising." Similarly, the Talmud offers a somewhat coarse parallel to v. 24, and even more so to Ecclus. xlii. 9, in what it says of a daughter as a doubtful boon to her father (Sanh. 100 b). In general, all such sayings seem the outcome of the Rabbinic maxim that "Women are of a light mind" (for example, Qidd. 80 b).

25. Marry.] Lit., give away, viz. out of the house; a common mode of expression.

thou wilt have performed [completed, accomplished] a great work: and to a man of understanding give her.] The Talmud goes much farther than this, and advises a father, if his daughter have attained marriageable age, even to set his slave at liberty and to marry him to her (Pes. 113 a).

26. do not cast her out [in the sense of divorce]. H, 248, Syr., Vet. Lat. add the following clause, as in the A. V.: but give not thyself to one that is hateful. This, either in the sense that it would be dangerous to trust such an one, or else with the meaning attaching to it in the Syr. or in the Arab. Version. The Syr. has, quod si sit improba ne te concredas illi; the Arab., nec fidem adhibeas illi si fuerit impudica. The current views on divorce are sufficiently known, and receive further illustration in this verse.

27. sorrows.] I.e. birth-pangs.

B. C. cir. 200.

gotten of them; and how canst thou recompense them the things that they have done for thee?

29 Fear the Lord with all thy soul, and reverence his priests.

[o] Deut. 6. 5. [p] Deut. 12. 19.

30 [o] Love him that made thee with all thy strength, [p] and forsake not his ministers.

[q] Lev. 2. 3, 10. & 6. 16. & 7. 7, 9, 34. Numb. 5. 9. & 18. 8–19. [r] Deut. 15. 8, 10.

31 Fear the Lord, and honour the priest; and give him his portion, [q] as it is commanded thee; the firstfruits, and the trespass offering, and the gift of the shoulders, and the sacrifice of sanctification, and the firstfruits of the holy things.

32 [r] And stretch thine hand unto the poor, that ‖ thy blessing may be perfected.

B. C. cir. 200.

‖ Or, thy liberality.

33 A gift hath grace in the sight of every man living; and for the dead detain it not.

[s] Rom. 12. 15.

34 [s] Fail not to be with them that weep, and mourn with them that mourn.

[t] Matt. 25. 36, 39, 43.

35 [t] Be not slow to visit the sick: for that shall make thee to be beloved.

36 Whatsoever thou takest in hand, remember the end, and thou shalt never do amiss.

CHAPTER VIII.

1 Whom we may not strive with, 8 nor despise, 10 nor provoke, 15 nor have to do with.

28. the things that they have done for thee.] Lit., "just as they to thee."

29. Directions as to our duty towards the Lord and His priests (vv. 29–31). See the marginal references. In the Syr. Version all the clauses in v. 31 after "as it is commanded thee" are omitted. In their place the following words are added: "the bread of oblations and the firstfruits of the hands." This is undoubtedly a Christian alteration, and otherwise interesting as probably marking early Christian practice.

32. Our duties towards our neighbour; especially the poor, the sick, and the mourners (vv. 32–35). The injunctions are in entire accordance with Rabbinic teaching, which points to God as giving the example of clothing the naked (Gen. iii. 21), visiting the sick (Gen. xviii. 1), burying the dead (Deut. xxxiv. 6), and comforting the mourners (Gen. xxxv. 9). [So often; see, for example, Ber. R. 8.] The "blessing," εὐλογία, no doubt represents the Hebrew ברכה, in the sense of blessing received.

33. This verse seems to present real difficulty. We propose translating, supposing the text not to be corrupted: Bestowal [boon, shewing of favour, display of kindness] of gift [of giving] towards every one alive, and from the dead withdraw not bestowal. We believe that the Hebrew original for χάρις δόματος was גְּמִילוּת חֲסָדִים, and we adduce the following as an illustrative parallel from Sukk. 49 b (lines 13, 12, 11 from bottom): "In three things does the benefiting [boon, favour] of acts of kindness excel almsgiving. Almsgiving is by money, gemiluth chasadim alike by money and personally; almsgiving is to the poor (mark the prepos. ל), gem. chas. is alike to the poor and to the rich; almsgiving is to the living, gem. chas. is alike to the living and to the dead" (by attending to their bodies, burial, &c.). And the parallelism is the more marked, that in v. 32 there is express reference to almsgiving.

34. Comp. the following in 'Der. er. Zuta,' v. p. 34 d (at the close of vol. ix. in the Talmud): "A man should not be weeping among those who laugh, nor laughing among those who weep." The same sentiment is expressed in Rom. xii. 15, but there more truly and beautifully. A somewhat similar admonition to take part in mourning for the dead occurs in Moed. Q., 28 b, with special reference to Ecclesiastes vii. 2.

35. for through these (things) thou shalt be beloved.

36. In all thy things (λόγοι = דברים—acts, undertakings).] A similar saying occurs in Ab. iii. 1 in the name of Aqabhya the son of Mahalalel: "Consider three things (דברים), and thou shalt not come into transgression—from whence thou comest, and whither thou goest, and before whom thou shalt have to give a judicial account." Thus we are on thoroughly Jewish ground in these verses.

thou shalt not ever sin.] The εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα has evidently here a temporal meaning.

CHAPTER VIII.

From ch. vii. the transition is easy to practical rules of life in ch. viii. These are once more divided into two parts: Part I. details those regarding oneself (vv. 1–7); Part II. those which bear reference to others (vv. 8–19). Part I. consists of three stanzas, sufficiently indicated by the initial words: "Strive not," v. 1; "Jest not," v. 4; "Neglect not," v. 8. The first stanza is of three verses (2 + 4 + 2), the second of four verses (4 × 2), the third of two verses (2 × 4). Part II. consists of

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

STRIVE not with a mighty man, lest thou fall into his hands.

[a] Matt. 5. 25.

2 [a] Be not at variance with a rich man, lest he overweigh thee: for gold [b] hath destroyed many, and perverted the hearts of kings.

[b] ch. 31. 6.

3 Strive not with a man that is

‖ Or, of an evil tongue.

‖ full of tongue, and heap not wood upon his fire.

4 Jest not with a rude man, lest thy ancestors be disgraced.

[c] 2 Cor. 2. 6. Gal. 6. 2.

5 [c] Reproach not a man that turneth from sin, but remember that we are all worthy of punishment.

[d] Lev. 19. 32.

6 [d] Dishonour not a man in his old age: for even some of us wax old.

7 Rejoice not over thy greatest enemy being dead, but remember that we die all.

B. C. cir. 202.

8 Despise not the discourse of the wise, but acquaint thyself with their proverbs: for of them thou shalt learn instruction, and how to serve great men with ease.

[e] ch. 6. 34.

9 [e] Miss not the discourse of the elders: for they also learned of their fathers, and of them thou shalt learn understanding, and to give answer as need requireth.

10 Kindle not the coals of a sinner, lest thou be burnt with the flame of his fire.

11 Rise not up [in anger] at the presence of an injurious person, lest he lie in wait ‖ to entrap thee in thy words.

‖ Or, for thy mouth.

12 Lend not unto him that is mightier than thyself; for if thou lendest him, count it but lost.

four stanzas. It warns against foolish confidence in our private dealings (first stanza, ידי. 10, 11), in business transactions (second stanza, ידי. 12–14), in public association (third stanza, ידי. 15, 16), and in private association (fourth stanza, ידי. 17–19). Thus the arrangement would be: Part I., three stanzas—respectively, $2+4+2$; 4×2; 2×4. Part II., four stanzas—respectively, 2×2; 3×2; 2×4; 3×2.

1. Strive not.] Viz. in words.

2. Be not at variance [rather, contend not] ... lest he overweigh thee [rather, lest he put against thee weight]—that is, bring down the opposite scale by the weight of his wealth.

destroyed.] Rather, corrupted. The reference may be not to actual bribery, but to the influence of greater riches on the mind and in the esteem of others.

3. full of tongue.] Rather, glib of tongue. Vet. Lat., linguatus.

4. a rude man.] Rather, one uncultured. Our ancestors might be "disgraced" by possible reflections upon them.

5. Omit "but" in the second line. The reasoning is, that as we have all sinned, so we all deserve punishment. Seneca: Det ille veniam facile, cui venia est opus.

6. Dishonour not [although this is perhaps rather too strong an expression for want of respect] a man in his old age, for even some of us are waxing old.

7. Rejoice not over the dead.] H, 248, Co., add: "thy greatest enemy being dead," —correctly as to sense, but not according to the best reading.

8. This verse opens the third series of warnings.

Despise not.] Rather, neglect not.

acquaint thyself.] Rather, be conversant, busy thyself.

and to serve great men.] Omit "how" and "with ease"—in all probability in the same sense as Horace's: Quo tandem pacto deceat majoribus uti = versari cum magnatibus. (Ep. I. xvii. 67.)

9. elders.] Rather, old men. Last clause: and in time of need (viz. when it is required) to give an answer.

10. Here begins Part II.

with the flame.] Rather, "in the flame."

11. Rise not up [in anger or altercation] before an insolent person.] To judge from the Greek text (ἀπὸ προσώπου), the Hebrew original must have been מִפָּנַי, not לִפָּנַי (perhaps in a causal sense). The rendering "insolent" scarcely fully expresses the meaning of the Greek word, for which the German übermüthig, with the additional idea of godlessness, seems the appropriate equivalent. In the LXX. ὑβριστής occurs five times for נָאָל or נָאוֹת. This was probably the word used in the original work of Ben Sira—probably in the same form as in the Targum, מְתַנְּאָה. Grotius supposes the scene to be an assembly. Lest he seat [or set] himself as an ambush [as lying in wait] to thy mouth—to what thou sayest.

12. The meaning of the second clause

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

13 Be not surety above thy power: for if thou be surety, take care to pay it.

14 Go not to law with a judge; for they will judge for him according to his ‖honour.

‖ Or, opinion.

f Gen. 4. 8.

15 f Travel not by the way with a bold fellow, lest he become grievous unto thee: for he will do according to his own will, and thou shalt perish with him through his folly.

g Prov. 22. 24.

16 g Strive not with an angry man, and go not with him into a solitary place: for blood is as nothing in his sight; and where there is no help, he will overthrow thee.

17 Consult not with a fool; for he cannot keep counsel.

18 Do no secret thing before a stranger; for thou knowest not what he will bring forth.

B. C. cir. 200.

19 Open not thine heart to every man, lest he requite thee with a shrewd turn.

CHAPTER IX.

1 We are advised how to use our wives. 3 What women to avoid. 10 And not to change an old friend. 13 Not to be familiar with men in authority, 14 but to know our neighbours, 15 and to converse with wise men.

BE not jealous over the wife of thy bosom, and teach her not an evil lesson against thyself.

2 Give not thy soul unto a woman to set her foot upon thy substance.

would be probably better represented by translating, instead of "count it but lost," make as if (thou hadst) lost,—whether in the sense of pretending or of considering that it was lost. Instead of "for" translate and.

13. and . . . consider [have thought, have a care] that thou shalt [have to] pay.] Be prepared for it.

14. a judge.] Bretschneider, however, regards κριτοῦ as the gen. not of κριτής, "a judge," but of κριτός, electus, egregius, praestans, nobilis. Δόξα, "honour," "estimation."

15. bold.] Rather, venturous or daring.

lest he become a burden [burdensome] to thee . . . and thou shalt perish through [together with] his folly.] Vet. Lat.: Ne forte gravet mala sua in te . . . et simul cum stultitia illius peries.

16. with a furious [perhaps irritable] man make not strife.] Comp. Prov. xv. 18, xxii. 24, xxix. 22, where in the LXX. also the word ἐνμώδης is used.

into a solitary place.] Rather, through the desert.

overthrow thee.] In the sense of killing.

17. for he cannot keep a matter secret.] λόγον στέξαι undoubtedly in the original, כסה דבר.

18. a stranger.] Probably, although perhaps not exclusively, a non-Israelite.

bring forth—engender, beget, bring into the world: what kind of child he will bring into the world as representing what hast thou done.

19. lest he requite thee, &c.] Rather, lest he return thee ill thanks [Bissell: and so get an ill return]. Syr.: ne te beneficio adstringat.

CHAPTER IX.

The prudential rules for social intercourse are here continued: and, first, in regard to women (vv. 1–9), the admonitions being arranged under four particulars (vv. 1, 2; 3, 4; 5, 6; 7–9); secondly, with reference to what is to be sought or else avoided in intercourse with acquaintances. The arrangement is as follows: first, what is to be desired in regard to friends (v. 10); secondly, what is not to be sought nor wished for (vv. 11, 12); thirdly, what is to be actually avoided (v. 13); lastly, again, what is to be desired (vv. 14–16). The two closing verses, which at first sight seem difficult to arrange, form a very apt conclusion: v. 17 referring to stanza vv. 14–16, and v. 18 to the stanza of six lines in v. 13.

1. Bretschneider designates this egregium monitum. The Rabbis also often warn against groundless jealousy. The reason here given is that it might direct the mind of a wife to the very thing feared. Bretschneider quotes from Tibullus: Ipse miser docui, quo possit ludere pacto.

2. On the other hand, the opposite extreme is to be avoided.

Give not up thy soul to a woman, that she set not her feet [step not, trample not] upon thy power [authority].] The Talmud has it: "Of three the life is not a life: of him who hopes [looks] for the table of his neighbour, of him over whom his wife holds rule, and of him who is affected with disease in his body. [To these some add, as a fourth, him who has only one shirt.] (Bets. 32 b, and otherwise.) In 'Babh. Mets.' 75 b,

B. C. cir. 200.

3 [a] Meet not with an harlot, lest thou fall into her snares.

4 Use not much the company of a woman that ‖ is a singer, lest thou be taken with her attempts.

5 [b] Gaze not on a maid, that thou fall not by those things that are precious in her.

6 Give not thy soul unto harlots, that thou lose not thine inheritance.

7 Look not round about thee in the streets of the city, neither wander thou in the solitary places thereof.

8 [c] Turn away thine eye from a beautiful woman, and look not upon another's beauty; for many have been deceived by the beauty of a woman; for herewith love is kindled as a fire.

9 Sit not at all with another man's wife, nor sit down with her in thine arms, and spend not thy money with her at the wine; lest thine heart incline unto her, and so through thy desire thou fall into destruction.

10 Forsake not an old friend; for

[a] Prov. 7. 5, &c.
‖ Or, playeth upon instruments.
[b] Job 31. 1.
[c] Gen. 34. 2. 2 Sam. 11. 2. Judith 10. 19. & 12. 16. Matt. 5. 28.

three are enumerated who cry in vain: he who lends money without witnesses; he who gets himself a lord over him, and he who is under the rule of his wife.

4. Use not much the company of.] Rather, Be not long with.

5. We would prefer translating the second clause: "lest thou be made to offend through the honours paid to her;"—if this meaning of ἐν τοῖς ἐπιτιμίοις αὐτῆς could be established. But it will be safer to render it: lest thou be offended (annoyed) by the penalties for her,—the money—or other penalties on her account, possibly with reference to Deut. xxii. 29. This seems also to accord with the Syriac Version. The moral code of the Rabbis went much beyond this, and forbade even to look at the finger of a woman, or at her shoe, as well as to exchange any needless words with her. Two Rabbis, shoemakers by trade, are mentioned as extraordinary instances of forbearing any such forbidden gaze, even under the daily temptation of their trade (Pes. 113 a).

7 b. For "neither wander thou in the solitary places thereof," the Vet. Lat. has: "nec oberraveris in plateis illius"—perhaps after the Syr, and reading רחבתיה for הרבתיה.

8. beautiful.] Rather, handsome, comely, as referring more to form.

another's beauty.] The beauty of one who is another's.

deceived.] Rather, led astray.

for herewith.] Rather, and therefrom. This and v. 9 are among the passages quoted in the Talmud as from Ben Sira (Sanh. 100 b, Yebam. 63 b). As bearing on the mode of quotation in the New Testament, it is instructive to find that these Talmudic citations from Ben Sira are not literal, but probably made from memory. They are as follows: "Avert thine eye lest thou be caught in her snare. Do not resort to her husband to drink with him wine and strong drink. For by the fairness of a beautiful woman many have been destroyed, 'and mighty [either in the sense of numerous, or of strength] are all her slain' (Prov. vii. 26)." "Many are the wounds caused by the pedlar [who sells articles de luxe to women], which lead to the committing of sin, as the spark kindles the coal. 'As a cage is full of birds, so are their houses full of deceit' (Jer. v. 27)." The Syr. places v. 8 after v. 9.

9. A warning against familiarity which may lead to sin. A similar, if not the same, saying is adduced in the Mishnah in the name of José b. Jochanan (Abh. i. 5).

another man's wife.] A married woman. The next clause in the A. V., "nor sit down," &c., must be omitted. It is evidently a paraphrastic gloss.

and be not feasting with her at wine.] The expression (συμβολοκοπεῖν) probably means frequent indulgence in feasts or entertainments where wine is drunk. We are not to give in her honour nor to take part in merry wine-parties with her (not necessarily in the absence of her husband—probably rather the contrary). Fritzsche applies it to what he calls "Pikenike," but we have not been able to discover any trace of picnics amongst the ancient Jews. The verb is used for the Hebrew נָגַל in the LXX. Deut. xxi. 20, and also by Aq.; and either as verb or substant. for the same Hebrew word by Theod. in Prov. xxiii. 30; by Aq., Sym., and Theod. in Prov. xxiii. 21, and by Aq. and Theod. in Prov. xxviii. 7 (see the note on the latter passage in Field's 'Hexapla'). Schleusner (ad voc.) attaches to the word the somewhat strange meaning of contending in jokes, bandying jests.

through thy desire.] Or passion, inclination—πνεύματι (πνεῦμα here = רוּחַ). For πνεύματι Clemens Alex., the Syr., Arab., and Vet. Lat. have = αἵματι. Comp. Lev. xx. 10; Deut. xxii. 22; Prov. vii. 26, 27.

10. The verse begins a new section. The

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

the new is not comparable to him: a new friend is as new wine; when it is old, thou shalt drink it with pleasure.

[d] Ps. 37. 1, &c. & 73. 3, 17.

11 [d]Envy not the glory of a sinner: for thou knowest not what shall be his end.

12 Delight not in the thing that the ungodly have pleasure in; but remember they shall not go unpunished unto their grave.

13 Keep thee far from the man that hath power to kill; so shalt thou not doubt the fear of death: and if thou come unto him, make no fault, lest he take away thy life presently: remember that thou goest in the midst of snares, and that thou walkest upon the battlements of the city.

14 As near as thou canst, guess at thy neighbour, and consult with the wise. B. C. cir. 200.

15 Let thy talk be with the wise, [e]and all thy communication in the law of the most High. [e] Ps. 1. 2.

16 And let just men eat and drink with thee; and let thy glorying be in the fear of the Lord.

17 For the hand of the artificer the work shall be commended: and the wise ruler of the people for his speech.

18 A man of an ill tongue is dangerous in his city; and he that is rash in his talk shall be hated.

CHAPTER X.

1 The commodities of a wise ruler. 4 God setteth him up. 7 The inconveniences of pride, injustice, and covetousness. 14 What God hath done to the proud. 19 Who shall be honoured, 29 and who not.

second clause would be more adequately rendered: for the fresh one—he who is newly made (πρόσφατος; comp. Delitzsch on Heb. x. 20)—is not equal to him. The third line gains in force by omitting (as in the original) the words "is as." The so-called 'First Alphabet of Ben Sira' has the same or a similar admonition: "An old friend deny not."

11. the glory.] In the sense of "prosperity."

12. Have not pleasure in [what is] the pleasure of the ungodly: remember that they will not be justified (i.e. escape punishment as the sentence of their condemnation) unto the grave (Hades); that is, punishment will surely overtake them before their end.

13. If vv. 11, 12 had indicated what a man should not seek for nor wish, v. 13 continues the same reasoning and shews what he should actually avoid. "The man that hath power to kill" is presumably "the sinner" of v. 11 and "the ungodly" of v. 12, and his "power to kill" consists in his evil example, and in the danger accruing from his companionship and from fellowship with his deeds, which will entail such punishment on the doer. Keep far from him,—"and thou shalt not be in the anguish of fear of death; and if thou approach [or come to] him, do not go wrong [err not, in the moral sense], lest he take away [rob] thy life: know [recognise] that thou goest in the midst of snares, and that thou walkest on the battlements of a city;" that is, thou art like one who walketh on the battlements of a city besieged—such and so great is thy danger, and so watchful must thou be.

14. The advice that follows is closely connected with what had preceded: According to thy power [to the utmost of thy power, so far as thou canst] seek to make out [search out] thy neighbour (to know what he really is). "Consult" in the sense of taking counsel.

15. Let thy conference (διαλογισμός) be with those of understanding.

16. Omit "and." "Let just [righteous] men be thy table-companions" (who dine and sup with thee).

17. In the hand of artificers is the work commended.] The skilful artificer produces work that brings its own commendation: the German, das Werk soll den Meister loben. "And the ruler"—perhaps, rather, the leader—"of the people is wise in speech."

18. Dreaded [a matter of fear] in his city (is) a man glib of tongue [linguatus], and he that is rash [reckless, perhaps violent] in his speech shall be hated.] Thus the two last verses form an apt conclusion of the preceding argument.

CHAPTER X.

The second line of chap. ix. 17 evidently leads up to chap. x., which treats of rulers, both good and evil. From this subject the transition to that of pride is easy and almost natural. Rulership and pride form the theme of the whole chapter. Its division into two parts is clearly marked. In Part I. (vv. 1–17)

B. C. cir. 200.

A WISE judge will instruct his people; and the government of a prudent man is well ordered.

[a] Prov. 29. 12.

2 [a]As the judge of the people is himself, so are his officers; and what manner of man the ruler of the city is, such are all they that dwell therein.

3 An unwise king destroyeth his people; but through the prudence of them which are in authority the city shall be inhabited.

4 The power of the earth is in the hand of the Lord, and in due time he will set over it one that is profitable.

B. C. cir. 200.

5 In the hand of God is the prosperity of man: and upon the person of the scribe shall he lay his honour.

‖ Or, face.

6 [b]Bear not hatred to thy neighbour for every wrong; and do nothing at all by injurious practices.

[b] Lev. 19. 17. Matt. 18. 21.

7 Pride is hateful before God and man: and by both doth one commit iniquity.

rulership and pride are viewed in relation to God. The argument turns, so to speak, on the alternate formula: "from God" and "before God." The first stanza, vv. 1–3 (3 × 2), shews how a people is bound up with its rulers. This is followed by a moral reflection, intended to shew that this is of God's appointment, vv. 4, 5 (2 × 2). The next stanza, vv. 6–8 (3 × 2), reverses the reasoning, and points out that the fate of rulers is connected with the state of the people, and winds up with a moral reflection on the folly of pride and the transient character of everything earthly, vv. 9–11 (3 × 2). The Part concludes with a stanza of six verses (vv. 12–17) on the pride of nations—shewing that the origin and the essence of pride are departure from God, and that the issue of such pride are the Divine judgments (2 + 4 and 4 × 2). In Part II. pride is treated in a parenetic manner. The following are the principal points: (1) To the question, wherein true honour consists and how is it to be sought, the answer is twofold: first, positive, vv. 18–22 (2 + 4; 2 × 2); secondly, negative: in two stanzas, vv. 23–25 and vv. 26, 27 (3 × 2; 2 × 2). (2) This is followed by the usual caution against the opposite extreme, vv. 28, 29 (2 × 2). (3) The chapter concludes in a somewhat flat manner in a stanza of two verses (vv. 30, 31; 2 × 2), of which v. 30 may specially refer to theme 1, and v. 31 to theme 2 of Part II.

1. A general introduction to this part of the subject. "Judge" is used in the sense of supreme magistrate, ruler, שׁפט; "instruct," in the sense of moral guidance, discipline. The general proposition is set forth in the second clause of the verse: "And the government of one of understanding shall be well ordered."

2. As in v. 1, the governor is presented in his twofold capacity, as judge and as ruler. Lit. According to the judge of his people, so also his officers [ministrants], and according to the ruler of the city all they that inhabit it.

3. unwise.] Rather, uninstructed: here also in the moral sense, as in v. 1. The verb answers to the Hebrew יסר, and the common rendering of יסר and מוסר in the LXX. is παιδεύω and παιδεία. But a city shall be upbuilt [in the sense of "flourishing"] through the (good) understanding of those in authority.

4. in the hand of the Lord (is) the dominion of the (whole) earth.] In the LXX. ἐξουσία is the word used for ממשלה and the Chald. שלטן. Hence it must here be rendered by "dominion" or "rule." "And him who is serviceable [profitable, useful for fulfilling God's purpose] will he raise up in due time upon it" (upon the earth).

5. In the hand of the Lord is the prosperity of a man.] I.e. his success—here probably the promotion of an individual to power. And not only does God so promote him, but He afterwards sustains and invests him with His own authority. Instead of "scribe," rather officer or ruler; the word γραμματεύς here being not the scribe in the ordinary Jewish sense, but the equivalent for שׁטר, "officer" (as in Ex. v. and otherwise), which word is in the LXX. of the Pentateuch always rendered by γραμματεύς, or (in Deut.) by a compound of it.

6. Transition to the next subject. The fate of rulers and kingdoms is connected with the state of the people.

every wrong.] Rather, any wrong.

and do not anything at all in works of violence.] Probably in the sense: when violence is wrought against thee. This rather than that a person should not resent wrong by violence.

7. Hateful before God and before men is pride.] The next line is difficult, and we render it with some hesitation: and according to both (i.e. in the judgment both of God and man, ἐξ ἀμφοτέρων) it (pride)

Digitized by Google

B. C. cir. 200.

8 Because of unrighteous dealings, injuries, and riches got by deceit, the kingdom is translated from one people to another.

9 Why is earth and ashes proud? There is not a more wicked thing than a covetous man: for such an one setteth his own soul to sale; because while he liveth he casteth away his bowels.

10 The physician cutteth off a long disease; and he that is to day a king to morrow shall die.

11 For when a man is dead, he shall inherit [c]creeping things, beasts, and worms. B. C. cir. 200.

12 The beginning of pride is when one departeth from God, and his heart is turned away from his Maker. [c] Isai. 14. 11.

13 For pride is the beginning of sin, and he that hath it shall pour out abomination: and therefore the Lord brought upon them strange calamities, and overthrew them utterly.

14 [d] The Lord hath cast down the thrones of proud princes, and set up the meek in their stead. [d] 1 Sam. 2. 8. Luke 1. 52.

shall commit wrong [offend wrong]. Bretschneider regards the ἐξ as = ἔναντι. Grotius would read εἰς ἀμφοτέρους; but this is to cut rather than unravel the knot. Pride is not only hateful before God and men, but it issues in what is wrong according to God and man.

8. This idea is now further developed: "Because of unrighteousness, violence, and wrongly gotten wealth" (greed of wealth?). Such are the moral reasons which by the judgment of God and through the instrumentality of men lead to national decline.

9. All the calamities mentioned in v. 8 are really the consequences of that pride to which v. 7 refers. But for such pride there is assuredly no reason. "Why is earth and ashes proud?"—what is it proud of? The next two clauses in the A. V. ("There is not . . . soul to sale") must be omitted. Their place is, if anywhere, at the close of v. 8. The last line is, if we rightly understand it, not only realistic, but coarse. The question what man has to be proud of is answered by this ironical suggestion: for in life [while he liveth] he casts out [or according to the other reading: I cast out?] his bowels. Lindius, "ἐῤῥιψα pro ἔῤῥιψε ut in pluribus codicibus." Alex., 157, 248, Co., ἔῤῥιψαν; Vetus Lat., Orig., projecit; but most modern critics adopt the Vat. reading ἔῤῥιψα, "I cast out." The rendering of Fritzsche seems farfetched: "For in life [while he liveth] I have cast down [upset, shaken] his inward organism." Syr.: cujus latera, dum vivit, vermes perrepunt. Arab.: e quo vermes scaturiunt dum vivit. These variations shew at least the difficulty of the passage. It is not impossible that, as has been suggested, the Greek depends on a misreading of the original Hebrew: רמה, jacere, dejicere, for רמם, tabescere. Yet, on the whole, the rendering proposed (which refers to the ordinary fluxus corporis) seems to us the most likely.

10. a long disease, the physician jokes.] This either in the sense that he ironically refers to it as such, or else that he speaks of it lightly, as a long disease or weakness; while in truth he who to-day is a king will even to-morrow be dead. This would give good sense. But the Syr. clearly shews us not only what the original bore, but how the error in the Greek version arose. The Syr. has in the first clause: "To-day he walks," instead of the Greek: "to-day a king." As pointed out by Mr. Margoliouth, the Hebrew was יְהַלֵּךְ or יְלֵךְ, "he walketh," which the Greek misread מֶלֶךְ, "a king." The correct rendering of v. 10 b is therefore: Yea, he walketh to-day, and to-morrow he shall die.

11. Such shall be his portion. This and v. 10 b has been erroneously regarded as referring to Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc. vi. 8, 9; 2 Macc. ix. 9), and hence as a later, spurious addition. But the restoration of 10 b from the Syr. leaves no room for such a conjecture.

12. The verse opens the stanza (vv. 12–17), which treats specially of pride, and more particularly of national pride, as appears from vv. 14–17. Indeed, pride had all along been the subject of moralising. Comp. v. 7. In v. 12 the source of pride is pointed out.

13. The better reading is: For the beginning of pride is sin. The reading of the A. V. is that of 248, Co., Syr., Chrysost.

strange calamities.] Rather, unexpected, unwonted, marvellous. The verb (παραδοξάζω) stands in LXX. Deut. xxviii. 59 for הפלא, and the word generally bears this meaning in the LXX., whether sensu bono or malo.

14. The verse points out the final issue, and at the same time accounts for the extraordinary calamities referred to in v. 13. Omit "proud," and in the second clause "up."

B. C. cir. 200.

15 The Lord hath plucked up the roots of the proud nations, and planted the lowly in their place.

16 The Lord overthrew countries of the heathen, and destroyed them to the foundations of the earth.

17 He took some of them away, and destroyed them, and hath made their memorial to cease from the earth.

18 Pride was not made for men, nor furious anger for them that are born of a woman.

19 They that fear the Lord are a sure seed, and they that love him an honourable plant: they that regard not the law are a dishonourable seed; they that transgress the commandments are a ‖deceivable seed.

‖ Or, unstable generation.

20 Among brethren he that is chief is honourable; so are they that fear the Lord in his eyes.

B. C. cir. 200.

21 The fear of the Lord goeth before ‖the obtaining of authority: but roughness and pride is the losing thereof.

‖ Or, principality.

22 Whether he be rich, noble, or poor, their glory is the fear of the Lord.

23 It is not meet to despise the poor man that hath understanding; neither is it convenient to magnify a sinful man.

24 Great men, and judges, and potentates, shall be honoured; yet is there none of them greater than he that feareth the Lord.

25 [e] Unto the servant that is wise shall they that are free do service: [e] Prov. 17. 2.

16. countries of the heathen.] Rather, lands of nations. But the Syr. here offers a more correct translation, at least in v. 15. It reads in v. 15, instead of "nations," and in v. 16, instead of "the heathen," "the proud," which suits the context better. The Syr. may have vocalised גַּיִם and the Greek גֵּיִם—or more probably the one read גַּאִים, the other גּוֹיִם. The Syr. rendering is supported by 248 and the Vet. Lat. in v. 15, but not in v. 16.

17. He took some of them away.] Thus, if we read with A.C.S., when we may either read with the Compl. ἐξ αὐτῶν or correct αὐτούς (as A.S.[2] and six other Codd. C. has αὐτάς). The Vat. has ἐξήρανεν ἐξ αὐτῶν, "he made waste," dry, "some of them" = הֶחֱרִיב, יְבֵשׁ (Fritzsche). In that case the reference in the next clause, he destroyed them (αὐτούς), would be to the inhabitants. On the whole, this gives the better meaning.

18. This verse begins Part II., with manifest, though somewhat loose, reference to what had before been said of nations.

not made.] Lit., "not created"—pride is personified. The outcome of it is: "furious anger" (passionate anger).

of a woman.] Rather, of women.

19. The A. V. here follows the Compl. and 248, probably representing what originally had been a marginal gloss. In its place must be substituted from the Alex. and Vat. (also in part quoted by Orig. 'c. Cels.' viii. 50): What generation [lit. "seed," זֶרַע] is honoured? The generation of man. What generation is honoured? They that fear the Lord. What generation is unhonoured? The generation of man. What generation is unhonoured? They that transgress the commandments. Thus man may either attain to high dignity or the opposite, according to his relation towards God.

20. In the midst of [among] brethren, he that is chief among them [their chief] is honoured.

in his eyes.] i.e. in the eyes of God.

21. This verse (found in 106, 248, Co., at the end of v. 20) must be omitted.

22. Whatever the outward condition of a man, that which alone constitutes glory is the fear of God. This is shewn in detail in the following verses (23–25). Indeed, the connexion of v. 22 with the next stanza is so close that it is not easy to separate them.

23. This verse follows as a corollary from v. 22. "Meet" = right, righteous.

a sinful man.] Lit. a man, a sinner. Drusius thinks the use of the word "man" (ἄνδρα) indicates a rich man [so also the Syr.], since people generally hold a rich man in honour, though he be a sinner. But perhaps we should not confine the idea to wealth, but extend it to all those outward distinctions to which men pay regard, irrespective of character and conduct. He is but a man, and as such must be judged according to v. 22. "Understanding," in the true sense, as opposed to "sin."

25. wise.] In the same sense as "understanding" in v. 23: "Will not grudge:" rather, will not murmur (the verb occurs and he that hath knowledge f will not grudge when he is reformed.

26 Be not overwise in doing thy business; and boast not thyself in the time of thy distress.

27 g Better is he that laboureth, and aboundeth in all things, than he that boasteth himself, and wanteth bread.

28 My son, glorify thy soul in meekness, and give it honour according to the dignity thereof.

29 Who will justify him that sinneth against his own soul? and who will honour him that dishonoureth his own life?

30 The poor man is honoured for his skill, and the rich man is honoured for his riches.

31 He that is honoured in poverty, how much more in riches? and he that is dishonourable in riches, how much more in poverty?

B. C. cir. 200.

f 2 Sam. 12. 13. Prov. 15. 5.

g Prov. 12. 9.

CHAPTER XI.

4 We may not vaunt or set forth ourselves, 8 nor answer rashly, 10 nor meddle with many matters. 14 Wealth and all things else are from God. 24 Brag not of thy wealth, 29 nor bring every man into thy house.

WISDOM lifteth up the head ‖ of him that is of low degree, and a maketh him to sit among great men.

‖ Or, of the lowly.

a Gen. 41. 40. Dan. 6. 3.

2 Commend not a man for his seven times in the N. T.). The words "when he is reformed," although occurring in the Syr. and Vet. Lat., should be omitted. Comp. Prov. xvii. 2.

26. Another species of pride. It probably refers to a man who imagines himself superior to doing his own plain work—too wise or clever for it—and afterwards claims merit and piety when failure and distress supervene. For "be not overwise" the Syr. has "be not slow," which the Vet. Lat. reproduces, although in the second clause [for "boast not thyself," which it transfers into the first clause].

28. honour thy soul.] Honour thyself—proper self-esteem.

dignity.] Rather, worth.

29. The sinning here referred to springs from want of proper self-esteem, from undue self-depreciation.

30, 31. See introductory remarks to the chapter.

CHAPTER XI.

The previous chapter had suggested the contrast between the seeming and the real—appearance and fact. This is the subject of ch. xi., the moral being to avoid rashness and inconsiderate judgment in regard to what we see (vv. 2–6), what we hear (vv. 7–9), and what we do (vv. 10–13). This concludes Part I. In it the writer had already by implication pointed to the Lord as the only Source of all good—He whose giving alone bestows what is real. This forms now the theme of Part II. (beginning with v. 14). The argument may be thus summarised: Not the appearance of outward possessions, but the judgment of the Lord (vv. 14–21); not the present and immediate sequences—that which appears—but the final arbitrament as determined by God (vv. 22–24), when there shall be a final adjustment of things (vv. 25–28), and that which before God was all along the real shall also outwardly be experienced and become apparent. The last stanza, beginning with v. 29, seems more naturally to belong to ch. xii., unless indeed we were to consider it as another species of that which presents itself to us in outward life, and in regard to which we require to be warned. Thus the chapter would consist of two parts, each of thirteen verses (as vv. 15 and 16 in Part II. must be omitted). Part I. would comprise three stanzas (vv. 1–6, $3\times2+4+2\times2$ lines; vv. 7–9, 3×2 lines; vv. 10–13, alternately 4, 2 and 4, 2 lines). Part II. would be similar in its arrangement, having also three stanzas (vv. 14–21, omitting vv. 15, 16 in the A. V., or $3\times2+4+2+4$ lines; vv. 22–24, 3×2 lines; vv. 25–28, 4×2 lines). The last stanza in the chapter (vv. 29–34) we prefer regarding as part of chap. xii.

1. This verse seems really to belong to the previous chapter, but it may have been placed at the beginning of chap. xi. as an apt introduction. The better reading of the first clause is no doubt the Alex. [also C. S. (X), 248, and seven other Codd.], which has αὐτοῦ after κεφαλήν. Translate: The wisdom of the humble [modest] shall lift up his head, and make him to sit among great men. There are so many Rabbinic sayings to the same effect that this sentiment may be almost regarded as a Jewish axiom.

2. Commend not.] Praise not, make not much of him. The writer had probably 1 Sam. xvi. 7 in view. For the Vat. reading αἰνέσεις we must certainly adopt the Alex. (supported by many others) αἰνέσῃς. "His beauty; neither abhor a man for his outward appearance.

B. C. cir. 200.

3 The bee is little among such as fly; but her fruit is the chief of sweet things.

[b] Acts 12. 21.

4 [b]Boast not of thy clothing and raiment, and exalt not thyself in the day of honour: for [c]the works of the Lord are wonderful, and his works among men are hidden.

[c] Ps. 139. 14.

‖ Gr. tyrants.

5 Many ‖kings have sat down upon the ground; and one that was never thought of hath worn the crown.

[d] 1 Sam. 15. 28. Esther 7. 10.

6 [d]Many mighty men have been greatly disgraced; and the honourable delivered into other men's hands.

[e] Deut. 13. 14. & 17. 6, 7.

7 [e]Blame not before thou hast examined the truth: understand first, and then rebuke.

B. C. cir. 200.

[f] Prov. 18. 13.

8 [f]Answer not before thou hast heard the cause: neither interrupt men in the midst of their talk.

[g] Ps. 1. 1.

‖ Or, in the judgment of sinners.

9 Strive not in a matter that concerneth thee not; and [g]sit not ‖in judgment with sinners.

‖ Or, escape hurt.

10 My son, meddle not with many matters: for if thou meddle much, thou shalt not be innocent; and if thou follow after, thou shalt not obtain, neither shalt thou ‖escape by fleeing.

[h] Prov. 10. 3. Matt. 19. 22. 1 Tim. 6. 9.

11 [h]There is one that laboureth, and taketh pains, and maketh haste, and is so much the more behind.

12 Again, there is another that is outward appearance;" i.e. because of its unattractive character.

3. Before μέλισσα the article should be inserted, with C, H, and many authorities. (Comp. Chrysost., 'Hom. 20 in Eph. v.')

4. Boast not in the putting on of clothes.] Or else, as in the A.V., "of thy clothing and raiment." The reference is to outward prosperity. The Syr. very curiously renders the first two lines: "deride not him who is dressed in rags, nor despise him whose throat is bitter." If the latter sentiment seems Hebraic, the former is scarcely in accordance with Jewish thought. Indeed a Rabbinic work (comp. Zunz, 'Gottesd. Vortr.' p. 104) quotes as from Ben Sira the following sentence (found also in 'Der. er. Z.' towards the end of the last ch.): "The adornment (splendour) of God is man; the adornment of man is his dress." And this agrees with many Rabbinic sayings in which attention to dress is enjoined on the sages. Lines c and d give the reason for the warning in lines a and b. God may send sudden reversal in punishment of our pride, or else the prosperity of which we boasted may be only apparent and temporary. Verses 5 and 6 carry out this idea.

7, 8. Before thou blamest, examine [omit "the truth"]: consider first.] This perhaps rather than "understand first." In Babha B. 98 b, we find the following as a quotation from the book of Ben Sira [the last clause in it we italicise to mark the quotation from Ecclus. xi. 8 b]: "Everything have I weighed in the balances, and I have not found anything lighter than bran (סוּבִין, the husks which fall off from the flour in the mill), yet lighter than bran the bridegroom who lives in the house of his father-in-law; and lighter than such bridegroom a guest who brings a guest; and lighter than such guest he who returns answer before he has heard, and interrupt not in the middle of a discourse" [speech]. Comp. Prov. xviii. 13.

9. of sinners.] That is, where sinners sit in judgment.

10. From rashness as to what we see and hear the writer proceeds to rashness in what we undertake and do.

Son, let not thy deeds [undertakings, aims] be about many things.] The A.V. gives the sense correctly.

for if thou completest.] That is, if thou art successful. This seems to suit the sense and context better than "if thou multiply;" viz. if thou engage in many pursuits. The alternative would be: success and failure are here to be equally deprecated. Success will involve what is morally blameworthy; failure will be disastrous.

if thou pursuest [seekest after, followest after, viz. these various objects], thou shalt not overtake [seize, catch]; and if thou runnest away, thou shalt not escape.] Viz., blame, or else damage. Success involves guilt, the pursuit will lead to failure, and even if abandoned it will involve damage.

11. This verse further illustrates the latter part of v. 10, while vv. 12, 13 refer to the first two lines in v. 10, shewing, in opposition to that haste after many things which involves guilt, that the blessing of God enricheth and exalteth those who are apparently not prosperous but pious and content to wait upon God. Verse 11 reads better by omitting the word "one." It tells us that speed is not success.

B. C. cir. 200.

slow, and hath need of help, wanting ability, and full of poverty; [i] yet the eye of the Lord looked upon him for good, and set him up from his low estate,

[i] Job 42. 10.

13 And lifted up his head from misery; so that many that saw it marvelled at him.

14 [k] Prosperity and adversity, life and death, poverty and riches, come of the Lord.

[k] 1 Sam. 2. 7. Job 1. 21. Ezek. 28. 4, &c.

15 Wisdom, knowledge, and understanding of the law, are of the Lord: love, and the way of good works, are from him.

16 Error and darkness had their beginning together with sinners: and evil shall wax old with them that glory therein.

17 The gift of the Lord remaineth with the godly, and his favour bringeth prosperity for ever.

B. C. cir. 200.

18 There is that waxeth rich by his wariness and pinching, and this is the portion of his reward:

19 Whereas he saith, [l] I have found rest, and now will eat continually of my goods; and yet he knoweth not what time shall ‖ come upon him, and that [m] he must leave those things to others, and die.

[l] Luke 12. 19.

‖ Or, pass.

[m] Ps. 49. 10. ch. 14. 4.

20 [n] Be stedfast in thy covenant, and be conversant therein, and wax old in thy work.

[n] Matt. 10. 22.

21 Marvel not at the works of sinners; but trust in the Lord, and abide in thy labour: for it is an easy thing in the sight of the Lord on the sudden to make a poor man rich.

12. On the other hand, "There is that is slow and hath need of help, is inferior in strength and aboundeth in poverty," &c. It seems a mistake to regard (with Fritzsche) the person here described as one who is idle or wanting in energy. Such an one could not be represented as receiving Divine help—the argument is not in support of fatalism, but intended to shew the superiority of moral worth.

yet.] Rather, and.

13. Omit "from misery," and again, "that saw it;" translate the last clause: and many marvelled at him.

14, 17. Here begins Part II., which presents the other aspect: so to speak, the Divine view-point. In v. 14 the general principle is laid down; in v. 17 it is added that what God so giveth [or else His "good will" and "good pleasure;" see i. 10] to the godly is not merely seeming and transient, as is the prosperity of the wicked, but abiding. (Verses 15 and 16, which are wanting in all the best MSS., and disturbing, must be omitted, although occurring in the Syr. and the Vet. Lat.)

18–21. These verses contain an antithesis —two verses (18, 19: 2 + 4 lines) concerning the rich fool being opposed to two other verses concerning the poor who is pious (20, 21: 2+4 lines).

19. The A. V. and commentators close v. 18 with a colon, and regard v. 19 as indicating what is "the portion of his reward." But we would suggest that v. 18 closes with a full stop, and that v. 19 constitutes a separate sentence, complete in itself. Probably the Hebrew original, as has been suggested, bore: בְּאָמְרוֹ . . . וְלֹא יָדַע—a well-known Hebrew construction (for the instances of this use of בְּ see 'Noldii Concord. Partic.'). The translator rendered the Hebrew באמרו . . . ולא literally, ἐν τῷ εἰπεῖν . . . καὶ οὐκ. The Hebraism ἐν τῷ with infinitive is of frequent occurrence in the N. T. (see Vorstius, 'de Hebraism. N. T.' c. xxxii.). It is also met with in our book (Ecclus. iv. 9, vii. 9, x. 11, xlvi. 5). The meaning is: While [or although] he saith (viz. in his heart) . . . and now will eat of my good things, and knoweth not [or yet knoweth not—καί for δέ] what time shall pass. Comp. our Lord's parable of the rich fool (St. Luke xii. 16, &c.). Similar sentiments are expressed in Rabbinic writings. Thus in the Midr. on Eccles. i. 4: "In this world one man builds a house and another inhabits it, one planteth a garden and another eateth the fruit thereof." Comp. also the Midr. on Eccles. ii. 1.

20. thy covenant.] Viz. with the Lord. Grotius here rightly reminds us of Neh. ix. 38.

and have thy conversation in it (ὁμιλεῖν, Schleusner = התהלך; for the use of the word, see LXX. Prov. xxiii. 31).] Do thy work quietly and godly to old age.

21. Marvel not, &c.] Either in the sense of marvelling at what a sinner doeth, so as to be disturbed in the quiet pursuit of duty or in the stedfastness of faith; or else: marvel not at the success of his works. According to the better reading, the last

B. C. cir. 200.

22 The blessing of the Lord is ‖ in the reward of the godly, and suddenly he maketh his blessing to flourish.

‖ Or, for a reward.

23 Say not, [e] What profit is there of my service? and what good things shall I have hereafter?

[e] Mal. 3. 14.

24 Again, say not, I have enough, and possess many things, and what evil can come to me hereafter?

25 In the day of prosperity there is a forgetfulness of affliction: and in the day of affliction there is no more remembrance of prosperity.

B. C. cir. 200.

26 For it is an easy thing unto the Lord in the day of death to reward a man according to his ways.

27 The affliction of an hour maketh a man forget pleasure: and in his end his deeds shall be discovered.

28 Judge none blessed before his death: for a man shall be known in his children.

clause must be rendered: "quickly of a sudden to make a poor man rich."—The moral of this verse can scarcely be considered elevated.

22. The blessing of the Lord is for reward.] Or more simply, is the reward. The Hebrew had here no doubt בְּ, which was literally translated by ἐν. For this use of בְּ, see Ewald, 'Lehrb.' § 217 f and § 299 b.

suddenly.] Literally, in a swift hour. It has been suggested (by Mr. Margoliouth) that the Hebrew original had in both lines the word חֶפְיָן, "the blessing of the Lord his blessing;" but that there was a mistake in translating the second חפין by εὐλογία, and referring it to God. In that case the word would have been used in the sense of "business," "undertaking," "endeavour." In fact there would be a play on the word חפין, and the meaning of the Hebrew original would have been: The blessing of the Lord for reward (in reward) of the godly, and rapidly He maketh his (the man's) business (undertaking) to flourish. This seems to accord with the previous verse. On the arrangement of this (vv. 22–24) and the following stanza (vv. 25–28), see the introductory remarks. The Syr. omits vv. 22–27 b.

23. Say not, What need have I?] The tempting suggestion that the Hebrew original rendered by τίς ἐστί μου χρεία may have been מַה חֶפְיָן, is forbidden by the circumstance that although the LXX. twice render חפין, "pleasure," desiderium, by χρεία (Jer. xxii. 28, xlviii. 38), yet the uniform use in the Book of Sirach is different. It occurs in it nineteen times—seventeen times in the sense of "need," only once (xxxii. 2, or rather xxxv. 2) in the sense of "business" (work), and once doubtfully so (iii. 22). We therefore feel constrained to adopt the common usage of the word. The words in the A. V. "in my service" must be omitted.

and what good things shall I have from now?] I.e. in the immediate present.

24. Similarly the opposite extreme must be avoided. "Say not, I have what is sufficient: and what evil shall befall me from now?"—in the immediate present. Omit the words in the A. V., "and possess many things."

25. If in the previous verses the author displayed a considerable knowledge of human nature, his philosophy is weak and his theology poor in the last stanza (vv. 25–28), which gives a kind of general summary and application of the teachings of this chapter. Past sufferings will be forgotten by the righteous when prosperity cometh, and the opposite will be the case with the wicked. In his displeasure at not being invited to a feast, a Rabbi is said to have written to his colleague on the day of his son's marriage: "After all thy joy, death; and what advantage hast thou then of thy joy?" (Midr. on Eccles. i. 3.) And it was a common saying that a man did not depart out of this world till he had had at least half of his wishes (u. s. i. 13). Some retribution would come in the end to the wicked. None therefore was to be pronounced blessed before his death.

28. and in his children shall a man be known.] That is, either generally his punishment would overtake him in the fate of his children, or else, even if he should die unpunished, yet his character will appear in his children and his punishment in their punishment. The Rabbis express similar notions as to sins of the parents leading to physical and moral consequences in their children; while, on the other hand, it was a common saying that before the sun of one righteous person set that of another rose. This was said with reference to the birth of pious sons on the day that a pious father died (Midr. on Eccles. i. 5). The curious idea also prevailed that a son is commonly like his maternal uncle (Baba B. 110 a. In general, as to children being morally either like or unlike their parents, see Midr. Shir Hash. 1 a, b). But, apart from all this, what most painfully impresses us in vv. 25–28 is the marked absence of any reference to another life.

Digitized by Google

B. C. cir. 200.

29 Bring not every man into thine house: for the deceitful man hath many trains.

30 Like as a partridge taken [and kept] in a cage, so is the heart of the proud; and like as a spy, watcheth he for thy fall:

31 For he lieth in wait, and turneth good into evil, and in things worthy praise will lay blame upon thee.

32 Of a spark of fire a heap of coals is kindled: and a sinful man layeth wait for blood.

33 Take heed of a mischievous man, for he worketh wickedness; lest he bring upon thee a perpetual blot.

B. C. cir. 200.

34 Receive a stranger into thine house, and he will disturb thee, and turn thee out of thine own.

CHAPTER XII.

2 Be not liberal to the ungodly. 10 Trust not thine enemy, nor the wicked.

WHEN thou wilt do good, [a] know to whom thou doest

[a] Matt. 5. 6.

29. With this verse chap. xii. manifestly begins. The first line is quoted in the Talmud (Yeb. 63 b; Sanh. 100 b) as from the book of the Son of Sira: "Exclude many from within thy house, and bring not every one to thy house." With this may be compared this other saying: "Never let a man multiply (let him not have many) intimate friends in his house" (Ber. 63 a; Sanh. 100 b). The second clause should be rendered: for many are the wiles (insidiæ) of the deceitful. For δολίου, 106, 248, Co. read διαβόλου—a strange gloss.

30. The mention of tricks and wiles leads up to what seems in its present form an un-Jewish simile, since, although Aristotle speaks of it ('Hist. An.' ix. 8), we cannot recall any Jewish reference to the training of partridges as decoys. The first clause should be rendered: A decoy-partridge in a basket. Κάρταλλος occurs in four passages in the LXX., each time representing a different Hebrew word, but all meaning "basket." The word has also passed into Rabbinic writings as קַרְטִיל and קַרְטָלִיתָא (Babha Mets. 42 a; Babha B., 74 a; and in Ber. R. 60, Vayy. R. 25). [Bochart—'Hieroz.' Part II., b. i., ch. 13—has a whole chapter on this verse in Ecclus.]

so the heart of the proud [ὑπερήφανος, in the O. T. sense of proud = wicked (just as "meek" = pious) answering to the Hebrew זד or נאה; indeed our verse seems based on Ps. cxl. (LXX. cxxxix.) 5, where the LXX. so render גאים]; and as the spy that watcheth [looketh out] with a view to (for) the fall (ἐπιβλέπει).] As already stated, the illustration is based on Ps. cxl. 5, 6.

31. And on things worthy of praise—choice [excellent] things—will he put a blemish.] He will affix to them, find in them a blemish, μῶμος, the מוּם of the Levitical law (and otherwise in the O. T.), maculam. If even in the O. T. the word was used to indicate a moral spot or blemish (Job xi. 15; xxxi. 7), it is frequently so applied by the Rabbis, as in the following appropriate saying: "he that is proud is one who has a blemish" (בעל מום הוא), Meg. 29 a.—The Syr. has instead of this a different verse.

33. Take heed of an evildoer, for he worketh wickedness.] In the sense of struo or machinor; not so much as regards his own conduct, but what he deviseth and prepareth.

34. Receive a stranger [rather: take a stranger, viz. to live with thee]: . . . and he will distract thee with disturbances and estrange [alienate] thee from thine own—from thine own family. This construction—rather than "turn thee out of thine own," viz. property—accords with the context, and is established by its occurrence in Jos. 'Ant.' iv. 1, 1 (about the middle). There is evidently here a word-play between the ἀλλότριος, "the stranger," whom we are not to take into our house, and its consequence, that he will make us a stranger to our family: ἀπαλλοτριώσει σε τῶν ἰδίων σου.

CHAPTER XII.

The chapter with which, as previously stated, the concluding stanza of ch. xi. should have been joined, treats of our dealings with others. Ch. xii., as in our A. V., consists of three stanzas, each of six verses, which may be roughly headed as follows: To whom to do good, and to whom not to do it (stanza 1, vv. 1–6); the reasons for this advice (stanza 2, vv. 7–12); the consequences of neglecting such advice (stanza 3, vv. 13–18). Each of the first two stanzas might be headed, Give unto the good; and stanza 3, If thou doest otherwise, thou wilt have thyself only to blame. Lastly, each of the three stanzas may be subdivided into two shorter stanzas, each of three verses, which respectively mark progression in thought.

1. This verse forms a general introductory

B. C. r. 200.

it; so shalt thou be thanked for thy benefits.

2 Do good to the godly man, and thou shalt find a recompence; and if not from him, yet from the most High.

3 There can no good come to him that is always occupied in evil, nor to him that giveth no alms.

4 Give to the godly man, and help not a sinner.

5 Do well unto him that is lowly, but give not to the ungodly: hold back thy bread, and give it not unto him, lest he overmaster thee thereby: for [else] thou shalt receive twice as much evil for all the good thou shalt have done unto him.

B. C. cir. 200.

6 For the most High hateth sinners, and will repay vengeance unto the ungodly, and keepeth them against the mighty day of their punishment.

7 Give unto the good, and help not the sinner.

8 A friend cannot be known in statement—as it were, the text. Instead of the first clause, "When thou wilt do good, know," &c., the Syr. has: "If thou doest good to one who is evil, thou doest nothing" —evidently a confusion of רע and דע. And there will be thanks for thy benefits—beneficia, "good doings."

3. The meaning of this verse is extremely difficult, and we may conjecture that either the Greek translator did not properly understand the Hebrew original, or that by an attempted literalism he clumsily rendered it into Greek. In either case our commentation must be somewhat conjectural.

There are not benefits [perhaps גמולים טובים, or else חסדים—in the sense that there is not room for them, they are not in place, hence they should not be shewn] (in regard) to him who is continuous in evil [perhaps מתמיד ברע, or else מסתכל ברע, in the later usage of that word], nor [in regard] to him who (himself) bestoweth not alms.] The original may have had מישלם, which bears the twofold meaning of bestowing and retributing (the older Siracide viewing it in the latter, the younger Siracide taking it in the former sense); or it may have been גָּמֵיל חֶסֶד, or even מישלם גמול—for all these expressions occur, while in Rabbinic thought צדקה וגמילות חסדים are always most closely connected.

4. This verse presents a sad contrast to the words of our Lord, St. Matt. v. 42–48. But the saying of the Son of Sirach is entirely in accordance with Rabbinic views. It occurs in the so-called 'First Alphabet of Ben Sira' in the following form: "Do not good to the evil, and evil shall not befall thee" (comp. Paul Fagius, 'Sent. mor. Ben Syræ,' c. comment. ix.). It is also found as a proverb in several of the Midrashim (Ber. R. 22; Vayy. R. 22; Midr. on Eccles. v. 9) in the form just cited, and also in the following: "If thou doest good to the evil, thou hast done evil." In the Midr. on Eccles. v. 9 it occurs (among a number of legendary illustrations) in connexion with the story of a man who, having seen a bird restoring another to life by means of a certain herb, took it with the view of raising the dead in Palestine. By the way he saw a dead fox, on whom he made successful experiment of his herb. But when he afterwards applied the same cure to a dead lion, the latter straightway rent him in pieces. —In the Syr. vv. 4 and 5 are inverted.

5. Do well.] Rather, do good.

lowly.] In the moral sense = pious.

hold back.] Probably the Hebrew מנע, as Fritzsche suggests.

thy bread.] Rather, his bread, but in the sense of "the bread which thou givest him." "Bread" is here used in the sense of sustenance or support, like the Heb. לחם. The meaning of v. 5*c* seems to be: lest by giving him assistance thou furnish him only with the means of injuring thee; and then the consequences will be as described in clauses d and e. Bretschneider regards vv. 5–7 as a later addition, chiefly because v. 7 repeats v. 4. But each of these verses begins a new stanza and serves as text to it, and the repetition in v. 7 only renders the advice more emphatic.

6. For.] Rather, For also; a vindication of the sentiment expressed in v. 5, very different in spirit from Rom. xii. 19–21. The last part of the verse in the A. V. (beginning with "and keepeth," &c.) must be omitted.

7. Another stanza begins with the same heading as the former (v. 4).

8. A friend cannot be tested.] The A. V. adopts the rendering of the Vet. Lat. agnoscetur, the reading being ἐπιγνωσθήσεται, with 106, 253; the Alex. has ἐμβληθήσεται. But there is no occasion for departing from the prosperity: and an enemy cannot be hidden in adversity.

B. C. cir. 200.

9 In the prosperity of a man enemies will be grieved: but in his adversity even a friend will depart.

10 Never trust thine enemy: for like as ‖ iron rusteth, so is his wickedness.

‖ Or, brass.

11 Though he humble himself, and go crouching, yet take good heed and beware of him, and thou shalt be unto him as if thou hadst wiped a lookingglass, and thou shalt know that his rust hath not been altogether wiped away.

B. C. cir. 200.

12 Set him not by thee, lest, when he hath overthrown thee, he stand up in thy place; neither let him sit at thy right hand, lest he seek to take thy seat, and thou at the last remember my words, and be pricked therewith.

13 Who will pity a charmer that is bitten with a serpent, or any such as come nigh wild beasts?

14 So one that goeth to a sinner, and is ‖ defiled with him in his sins, who will pity?

‖ Or, mingled.

Vat. reading, ἐκδικηθήσεται. We feel convinced that the Hebrew word so rendered was דרש, which the LXX. render by ἐκδικέω in Deut. xviii. 19. In our passage the Heb. word would be used in the sense of "search out," "test," "prove." Comp. the similar use of δικαιωθείς in Aesch. 'Ag.' 393. For "cannot" in both clauses, rather shall not.

9. enemies will be grieved.] Rather, his enemies are in sorrow. For the second clause comp. Prov. xix. 4, 7.

will depart.] Rather, will separate himself. There seems little doubt that the original had מרעהו יפרד, as in Prov. xix. 4, which must be rendered: "but the poor—his friend separateth himself." (The R. V. misses the meaning alike in text and margin; comp. Nowack ad loc.)

10. Rather, for as the bronze is covered with rust [= contracteth rust; Vet. Lat. aeruginat], so his wickedness, viz. contracteth evil. Wahl (after Bretschneider): sic malitia ejus semper nova mala parit.

11. The construction and meaning, especially of the last clause, are somewhat difficult. In any case the Greek cannot be rendered as in the A. V., "and thou shalt know that his rust hath not been altogether wiped away." We propose translating the verse: And though he humble himself and go crouching, take heed to thyself [the Greek expression = שית לב] and beware of him [Bissell], and be in regard to him as one that hath wiped a mirror, and thou shalt know that it is not always tarnished—κατίωσε or κατίωται, as in St. Jas. v. 3, which we would also render "is tarnished." The meaning is: if thou take heed, and wipe the mirror, thou wilt get a true reflexion, and thus experience that it does not always give a false image and representation. The Hebrew original probably had כי לא לנצח חלאה. The word חלא occurs as a substantive חֶלְאָה in Ezek. xxiv. 6, 11; and although it is commonly rendered "rust," its primary meaning is "tarnishing," "dirt" (comp. 'Castelli Lexic.' i. 1133, and especially Pagninus, 'Thes.' 704, 705). Accordingly the Targum renders the word in Ezek. by זְיהוּמְתָּא (= זוהמה, זיהומה) from זהם, "to be dirty," "to defile," "to dirty" (one of the derivat. is used of the manuring of plants: comp. generally Levy ad voc.). In later Hebrew "to be rusty" is חלד, and חלודה, "rust." Without prolonging this discussion, we venture to think that the simile of the Son of Sirach gives an apt meaning according to our rendering of it, whereas it would be well-nigh unintelligible if we were to adopt the common interpretation: that it [the mirror] does not cover itself to the last with rust. We scarcely require to add that the mirror was of polished metal. [The Syr. has here some strange variants.]

12. Set him not up beside thyself, lest when he hath overthrown thee he set himself up in thy position.] τόπος, here condition in society, dignity.

seat him not at thy right hand [Bissell] —[give him not the place of honour], lest he seek thy chair [καθέδρα, the seat of honour], and at the last thou come to recognise [know the truth of] my sayings, and thou be afflicted [Wahl, acri dolore afficior, either והתעצב, as in LXX. Gen. xxxiv. 7, or נכאה, as in Ps. cix. (cviii.) 16] over my words.] That is, because thou hast neglected them.

14. With this verse begins the third double stanza (see introd. to the chapter). The verb is continued in v. 14, which reads: "So (who will pity) him that goeth unto a sinner, and is mingled up (with him) in his sins." As in the case mentioned in v. 13, so here: a man has himself to blame

B. C. cir. 200.

15 For awhile he will abide with thee, but if thou begin to fall, he will not tarry.

16 An enemy speaketh sweetly with his lips, but in his heart he imagineth how to throw thee into a pit: he will [b] weep with his eyes, but if he find opportunity, he will not be satisfied with blood.

[b] Jer. 41. 6.

17 If adversity come upon thee, thou shalt find him there first; and though he pretend to help thee, yet shall he [‖] undermine thee.

‖ Or, supplant.

18 He will shake his head, and clap his hands, and whisper much, and change his countenance.

CHAPTER XIII.

B. C. cir. 200.

1 Keep not company with the proud, or a mightier than thyself. 15 Like will to like. 21 The difference between the rich and the poor. 25 A man's heart will change his countenance.

HE that toucheth pitch shall be defiled therewith; and [a] he that hath fellowship with a proud man shall be like unto him.

[a] Deut. 7. 2.

2 Burden not thyself above thy power while thou livest; and have no fellowship with one that is mightier and richer than thyself: for how agree the kettle and the earthen pot together? [‖] for if the one be smitten against the other, it shall be broken.

‖ Gr. this shall smite against it, and be broken.

for the consequences, if he deliberately goes into such dangers.

15. For awhile.] For a brief time.

but if thou begin to fall.] Rather, but if thou turn aside,—that is, if thou no longer entirely consort with him and co-operate in all his schemes.

he will not be staunch.] In such case you must be prepared for his giving you up, so that you cannot even reckon on his sympathy unless you go with him in everything.

16. And with his lips sweetly speaks the enemy, and [but] in his heart he is planning to throw thee into a pit.] The expression "he will not be satisfied with blood" is generally understood as meaning: he will not be satisfied, even although thy blood has been shed. But taking it in connexion with the following verse, which in our view further develops the thought, we understand it as meaning that such a hypocritical enemy will not be satisfied to let matters have their course to our destruction, but will himself take part in it.

17. If adversity come upon thee, thou shalt find him there before thee.] This cannot mean: as if to sympathise, for in such case he would not be there "before" the adversity came; but must mean that he will be in waiting for the event, not leave it simply to take its course (v. 16): and as though helping he will trip thee up [Bissell].

18. He will "whisper" [as does a hypocrite] every kind of evil against thee, and "change his countenance," openly now assuming the appearance of an enemy.

CHAPTER XIII.

From warnings of the dangers attaching to intercourse with evil, the writer proceeds to describe unwise intercourse: such as the attempted companionship of the poor with the rich (vv. 2–23); and he concludes by moralising with the view of dissuading the pious poor from either wrongfully seeking riches and courting the rich, or being discontented with their lot. Apart from v. 1, which, as often, serves as a link of connection with the previous chapter, and omitting v. 14 as a spurious addition, the chapter consists of twenty-four verses, and is divided into two parts: Part I., vv. 2–13; Part II., vv. 15–26. Part I. contains two double stanzas, each of six verses (vv. 2–4 + vv. 5–7 and vv. 8–10 + 11–13), shewing the folly of such attempted intercourse between poor and rich. In Part II. the first double stanza, vv. 15–20, shews the impossibility and the danger of such intercourse (vv. 15–17: what fellowship? vv. 18–20: what peace?). There is really no equality between the rich and the poor (vv. 21–23), although we ought at the same time to take the higher view of riches and poverty (vv. 24–26). Thus Part II. also consists of two double stanzas, each of six verses (3 + 3, 3 + 3).

1. Omit "therewith." The Syr., "it sticks to his hand." The saying has passed into a common proverb.

shall be like unto him.] Better, shall become like him. Syr., "put on of his ways" — didicit mores ejus (Payne Smith). The verse forms a transition from the former to the present chapter.

2. A burden (which is) above thy power lift not up, and with mightier than thou and richer than thou have no fellowship; what fellowship shall (earthen) pot have with (brass) kettle [caldron]? It shall hit [knock] against it [viz. the kettle against the pot, reading αὐτῇ, and not αὗτη—so also the Syr.], and it

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

3 The rich man hath done wrong, and yet he threateneth withal: the poor is wronged, and he must intreat also.

4 If thou be for his profit, he will use thee: but if thou have nothing, he will forsake thee.

5 If thou have any thing, he will live with thee: yea, he will make thee bare, and will not be sorry for it.

6 If he have need of thee, he will deceive thee, and smile upon thee, and put thee in hope; he will speak thee fair, and say, What wantest thou?

7 And he will shame thee by his meats, until he have drawn thee dry twice or thrice, and at the last he will laugh thee to scorn: afterward, when he seeth thee, he will forsake thee, and shake his head at thee.

B. C. cir. 200.

8 Beware that thou be not deceived, and brought down ‖in thy jollity.

‖ Or, by thy simplicity.

9 If thou be invited of a mighty man, withdraw thyself, and so much the more will he invite thee.

10 Press thou not upon him, lest thou be put back; stand not far off, lest thou be forgotten.

11 ‖Affect not to be made equal unto him in talk, ‖and believe not his many words: for with much communication will he tempt thee, and smiling upon thee will get out thy secrets:

‖ Or, Forbear not.

‖ Or, but.

(the pot) shall be broken.] Thus much for the folly and danger of such attempts.

3. The folly of the whole thing, viewed from the standpoint of the rich, could scarcely be more graphically set forth than in this and the following verses to the end of the stanza (vv. 3–7). The A. V., although not quite literal, gives the sense with sufficient accuracy: "and yet he threateneth withal;" rather, and is very wroth besides.

4. if thou have nothing.] Rather, if thou be in want. Similarly we read in Abh. ii. 3: "Be cautious (in your intercourse) with the great [lit., those in authority], for they do not bring near [to themselves] a man except for their own purposes: they appear as friends when it is to their advantage, and stand not by a man in the hour of his need."

In all probability the ἐργᾶται ἐν σοί represents the Hebrew עָבַד בְּ.

5. If thou have [anything], he will live with thee.] In the sense of associating and making a companion. The Syr. has: "he will speak fair"—probably יְחַלֶּה.

make thee bare.] Rather, empty thee [Bissell].

but he himself will not be sorry.] Bissell: "will not trouble himself."

6. If he have need of thee, he will lead thee astray.] Not necessarily (as Fritzsche thinks) to hurt and damage.

What wantest thou?] Viz. I shall get it for thee.

7. We cannot help thinking that the Hebrew had here a word-play between the αἰσχυνεῖ, הֶבִישֵׁךְ, from בוש, "to be ashamed," and הֹבִישֵׁךְ, from יבש, "to make dry," for the ἀποκενώσει in the second clause. (The word is only used by Aq., Sym., and Theod.: comp. Field's 'Hex.,' Judg. iii. 25; 1 Kings [1 Sam.] xxiv. 4.)—For "by his feasts" the Syr. has: "by his devices"—the Greek deriving the word from אבל, the Syr. from נבל.

drawn thee dry.] Better, emptied thee. The idea seems to be that, incited by the banquets of the great man, the poor man tries to imitate his prodigality, and, while he is drained, he is only laughed at for his pains. The interpretation, that the great man borrows from him and so drains him (Fritzsche), is unsuited to the context.

8. Beware lest thou be led astray.] This verse begins a new stanza. The "jollity" refers to the invitations described in v. 9. The transition from v. 7 seems clearly marked. The Vet. Lat. reads ἀφροσύνῃ, which the Syr. shews to represent the original.

brought down.] Rather, humbled, or humiliated.

9. withdraw thyself.] Possibly, "appear reluctant" (Bissell). This would at any rate be in accordance with Jewish ideas, according to which a man should require a repeated invitation to a feast before going to it, and, when called upon for a public function in the synagogue, at first decline. But the Son of Sira at the same time warns us to avoid alike one and the other extreme, v. 10.

11. Affect not [aim not, make not a point of it] to talk with him as an equal.] I.e. familiarly, or rather freely and without reserve.

with much talk he will tempt thee.] Viz. unreservedly to open up all that is in thy mind.

and as smiling he will search thee

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

12 But cruelly he will lay up thy words, and will not spare to do thee hurt, and to put thee in prison.

13 Observe, and take good heed, for thou walkest in peril of thy overthrowing: when thou hearest these things, awake in thy sleep.

14 Love the Lord all thy life, and call upon him for thy salvation.

15 Every beast loveth his like, and every man loveth his neighbour.

16 All flesh consorteth according to kind, and a man will cleave to his like.

[b] 2 Cor. 6. 14.

17 [b] What fellowship hath the wolf with the lamb? so the sinner with the godly.

B. C. cir. 200.

18 What agreement is there between the hyena and a dog? and what peace between the rich and the poor?

19 As the wild ass is the lion's prey in the wilderness: so [c] the rich eat up the poor.

[c] Jam. 2. 6.

20 As the proud hate humility: so doth the rich abhor the poor.

21 A rich man beginning to fall is held up of his friends: but a poor man being down is thrust also away by his friends.

out.] (Similarly, Bissell.) The rendering of the A. V. depends on another reading which seems a gloss on the text.

12. Merciless, he that keepeth not words [concealeth not counsel, i.e. betrays what is said either in confidence or in the freeness and openness of conversation], nor will he spare [viz. to inflict, or cause to be inflicted—in the original, either חום or חמל, both frequently so translated in the LXX.] injury or bonds.] He is reckless of consequences.

13. Keep thyself [=take care of thyself], and take good heed, for thou walkest [goest about—Bissell] with thy fall.] A figurative expression (comp. Job xxxi. 5: Prov. xiii. 20), as it were: thou hast thy fall as a close companion in thy walk under such circumstances. The last clause in the A. V., beginning with "when thou hearest," &c., must be omitted.

14. This verse in the A. V. must be omitted as a spurious addition; perhaps a gloss embodying moral reflection.

15. This verse begins Part II. (see introductory remarks), shewing the reasonableness and the propriety of the advice hitherto given, as representing a universal law in the physical and moral world, as well as of society. Similis simili gaudet; aequalis aequalem delectat.

and every man loveth his neighbour.] In the sense of kindred in mind or station.

16. All flesh consorteth according to kind.] לְמִינֵהוּ, LXX. Gen. i. 25, κατὰ γένος. The passage is quoted in the Talmud (Babha K. 92 b) in illustration of the proverb, "A bad date-tree goes and joins itself to the reed." This saying is illustrated by examples from the Law, Gen. xxviii. 9: and from the Prophets, Judg. xi. 3; to which is curiously added as an illustration from the Hagiographa what is evidently our passage in Ecclus.: "Every bird dwells with its kind, and man with him that is his like." It will be noticed that the Talmud has "every bird" (כל עוף) instead of "all flesh" (πᾶσα σάρξ)—the Greek translator probably having misread (as Raymundus Martini already suggests) כל גוף for כל עוף. Other similar sayings occur in Rabbinic writings. The Syr. has a somewhat different, but unsatisfactory, rendering.

17. This figure, taken from Is. xi. 6, has its parallel in classical writings, among which the best known is probably that of Horace ('Epod.' iv. 1): Lupis et agnis quanta sortito obtigit, tecum mihi discordia est. For other parallels, see Grotius and Bretschneider.

18. What peace is there between the hyena and a dog?] Classic writers describe the enmity between these two, and how the hyena contrives to allure and then to devour the dog. The curious reader is referred to Bochart, 'Hieroz.' Pars i., pp. 832, &c.

19. The prey of lions (are) wild asses in [of] the wilderness [פראים במדבר, Job xxiv. 5, LXX. ὄνοι ἐν ἀγρῷ, but see Field's 'Hexapl.' ad loc.]: so the fodder of the rich (are) the poor.] For the plural use of the subst. see Winer, 'Gram. d. N. T. Sprach-Id.' § 27, 3.

20. An abomination to the proud is lowliness; so (is) the poor an abomination to the rich. The verse is omitted in the Syr.

21. beginning to fall.] Rather, The rich when he is moved—beginning to shake—in the biblical acceptation, especially in that of the Psalms (as in Ps. x. 6, and often) where the LXX. render מוט by σαλεύω. It is not necessary to confine the meaning of the clause to the threatening decay of outward fortune; it had better be understood

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

22 When a rich man is fallen, he hath many helpers: he speaketh things not to be spoken, and yet men justify him: the poor man slipped, and yet they rebuked him too; [d] he spake wisely, and could have no place.

[d] Eccles. ix. 15, 16.

23 When a rich man speaketh, [e] every man holdeth his tongue, and, look, what he saith, they extol it to the clouds: but if the poor man speak, they say, What fellow is this? and if he stumble, they will help to overthrow him.

[e] Job 29.

24 Riches are good unto him that hath no sin, and poverty is evil in the mouth of the ungodly.

B. C. cir. 200.

25 The heart of a man changeth his countenance, whether it be for good or evil: and [f] a merry heart maketh a cheerful countenance.

[f] Prov. 15. 13.

26 A cheerful countenance is a token of a heart that is in prosperity; and the finding out of parables is a wearisome labour of the mind.

CHAPTER XIV.

1 A good conscience maketh men happy. 5 The niggard doeth good to none. 13 But do thou good. 20 Men are happy that draw near to wisdom.

in the most general and wide application. Grotius: sustentatur ne ruat.

the lowly when he is fallen [when he is down] is besides pushed away by friends (προσαπωθεῖται).] One might almost be tempted to render: "is besides kicked by friends." Syr.: pellitur ex malo in peius— evidently a confusion between רַע and רָעַע. With this verse a new stanza begins. See introductory remarks.

22. When the rich maketh a fall [σφαλέντος] (there are) many helpers.] To take hold of him, to help him, to take his part.

he speaketh [spoke] things not to be spoken.] What really only reflects upon or incriminates him.

and they justify him [declare him just]. The lowly cometh to a fall, and they rebuke him besides; he speaketh forth reason [what is reasonable] and no room is given him]—locum dare alicui; he is not listened to, nor his reasonable statement accepted.

23. There is a realistic force in the A. V. which makes us hesitate to substitute the more literal rendering: "The rich speaketh and all are silent, and what he saith they extol [Syr. "and his favourers extol him"] to the clouds; the poor speaketh, and they say, Who is this? and if he stumble, they overthrow him besides." [So Bissell, with the exception of the last four words.]

24. From these worldly experiences the writer turns in the last stanza to somewhat tardy and scarcely elevated moralising.

Good are riches to which no sin attaches.] This seems to suit the context better than the rendering of the A. V., which, however, is admissible.

and poverty is evil [wrong?] in the mouths of the ungodly.] I.e. according to their sentence, in their view, they declare it such.

25. But happiness or misery depends not on outward circumstances, but on the inner state of a man, on his heart. "Good" and "evil" must not be here taken in the moral sense. The saying is quoted in the Midrash in the name of Ben Sira in illustration of Gen. xxxi. 2: "The heart of a man changeth his countenance, whether for good or for evil" (בין לטוב בין לרע, Ber. R. 73). The last clause in the A. V., beginning "and a merry heart," &c., must be omitted.

26. Literally, "The token of a heart in prosperity [in good, in happiness] is a cheerful countenance, but the finding out of parables is thinking [cogitations, considerations] with pain." Manifestly the two sentences must be intended as antithetical, and equally manifestly they are a further development of the thought in v. 25 in some such form as this: A heart in prosperity changeth the countenance for good: on the other hand, as regards the change for evil, the strain of the mind, whether in finding out wise sayings, or interpreting parables, or reading the deep things of Providence or the problems of social life,—in short, troubling oneself with such problems and cares only makes a man miserable, and his appearance indicates it. Probably the writer had in his mind Eccles. xii. 12, which warns against much study, as יגעת בשר, "weariness of the flesh." There also the previous verses (9–11) bear reference to "parables" and "sayings of the wise." Beyond these (ויתר מהמה) we are warned not to go, since much study is weariness to the flesh. But by the side of this parallelism we also mark the wide contrast between Ecclesiastes and Ecclesiasticus. For while Eccles. xii. 12 is followed by the noble conclusion in vv. 13, 14, Ecclus. xiii. 26 leads

B. C. cir. 200.

[a] ch. 19. 16. & 25. 8. Jam. 3. 2.

Or, sorrow.

[b] Rom. 14. 22. 1 John 3. 21.

BLESSED [a] is the man that hath not slipped with his mouth, and is not pricked with the ‖ multitude of sins.

2 [b] Blessed is he whose conscience hath not condemned him, and who is not fallen from his hope in the Lord.

3 Riches are not comely for a niggard: and what should an envious man do with money?

B. C. cir. 200.

4 He that gathereth by defrauding his own soul [c] gathereth for others, that shall spend his goods riotously.

[c] ch. 11. 19. ver. 15.

5 He that is evil to himself, to whom will he be good? he shall not take pleasure in his goods.

up to the doubtful, if not actually Epicurean, stanza in xiv. 11–19.

CHAPTER XIV.

There is a close sequence between this chapter and the previous one. The latter had ended by shewing that riches are not always and absolutely desirable, and that happiness comes from within rather than from without, concluding with a hint not to burden oneself with thought or care. Chapter xiv. begins with a prologue of two verses, which, as usually, forms a transition from the subject of the previous to that of the present chapter. Then follows stanza 1 in eight verses (vv. 3–10), presenting another aspect of the possible undesirableness of riches: they may not really be of benefit to a man—not even give him pleasure. The second stanza of eight verses (vv. 11–18) advises us rather to enjoy life so far as we can, closing with a transition in v. 19 to the third stanza of eight verses (vv. 20–27), in which the writer once more assumes the functions of the moralist, this time in favour of wisdom.

1. The warning against the trouble and labour of "finding out parables" leads the writer to consider more serious consequences which may ensue: since a man may offend with his lips, and there may be a more bitter cause of sorrow than anything outward, even an evil conscience: "Happy [blessed] the man that slippeth not with his mouth" [possibly such passages may have been in the writer's mind as Ps. xvii. 3; xxxix. 1; cxli. 3: comp. St. James iii. 2], "and is not pricked [grieved] with the sorrow of sin" (so according to the better reading), i.e. with mourning for sin. The Aethiop. somewhat boldly renders, or rather paraphrases: "Happy is the sinner who is not troubled by grief." The Syr. has for the second clause: "from whose eyes justice is not hidden." Probably the Greek read: ולא התעצב כיעוניו; the Syr. ולא התעצם כיעיניו.

2. Happy [blessed] (he) whom his soul convicteth not.] The word καταγινώσκω, as in the parallel passages 1 St. John iii. 20, 21, means more than "accuse" and less than "condemn" in the sense of the actual pronouncing of sentence; in the LXX. it represents several Hebrew words and bears different meanings. In the second clause the words "in the Lord" in A. V. must be omitted, although in Hebrew "hope" is sometimes put for the object of hope. Possibly, however, Eccles. ix. 4, &c., may have been in the mind of the writer, in which case it would indicate absolute and final despair.

3. With this verse begins the subject-matter of the first stanza: "To a niggard [to a man who is niggard] wealth is not comely,"—it does not really adorn. We suppose that the writer had in view Eccles. v. 10–17, which leads up to v. 18. Riches in themselves do not make happy—all depends on the enjoyment of them. Accordingly Eccles. v. 18 proceeds: "Behold, what I have found good, what is comely [that it is comely] is to eat and to drink," &c. The LXX. here render "comely" (יפה) by καλόν. We suppose then that the Hebrew original of Eccles. also had פה, and applied the reasoning in Eccles. as follows: Since the niggard does not eat and drink, and enjoy the good of all his labour, his wealth is not καλός, not יפה. On the other hand, the second clause of the verse takes us to Prov. xxviii. 22: "The man of evil eye hasteth after riches, and he knoweth not that want will come upon him." The expression, "the man of evil eye," is rendered in the LXX. by ἀνὴρ βάσκανος: and similarly in the passage before us: to what [purpose] are all riches to a man of evil eye? (ἀνθρώπῳ βασκάνῳ)—since in the end want will overtake him (Prov. xxviii. 22): comp. Hor. 'Sat.' i. 1, 59, &c. The meaning of "man of an evil eye" (comp. also Prov. xxiii. 6) is best gathered from its opposite: "he of good eye," Prov. xxii. 9.

4. He that gathereth from (off) his own soul [i.e. by pinching himself] gathereth for others [ἄλλοις], and on his good things shall others fare sumptuously [revel, τρυφήσουσιν ἕτεροι].] Comp. Hor. 'Od.' ii. 14, 25, &c.

5. Clause 1 seems an application and farther development of Prov. xi. 17: "He that doeth good to his soul [not in the spiritual

B. C. cir. 200.

6 There is none worse than he that envieth himself; and this is a recompence of his wickedness.

7 And if he doeth good, he doeth it unwillingly; and at last he will declare his wickedness.

8 The envious man hath a wicked eye; he turneth away his face, and despiseth men.

[d] Prov. 27. 20.

9 A [d] covetous man's eye is not satisfied with his portion; and the iniquity of the wicked drieth up his soul. B. C. cir. 200.

[e] Prov. 23. 6, 7.

10 [e] A wicked eye envieth [his] bread, and he is a niggard at his table.

11 My son, according to thy ability do good to thyself, and give the Lord his due offering.

12 Remember that death will not be long in coming, and that the covenant of the grave is not shewed unto thee.

sense] is a gracious man, and he that afflicteth his flesh is cruel." And he shall not have pleasure in [be happy in] his riches.

6. There is none more evil [or else wretched] than he that has an evil eye [grudgeth?] towards himself.] In the second clause we should prefer, instead of "a recompense," "the recompense," which suits the context better. The worst evil is when a man grudges things to himself, and this is what he gets as return and reward of his wickedness. But according to some the τοῦτο refers to v. 7.

7. And if he doeth good, he doeth it unwittingly [lit., in forgetfulness—so also the Aeth. —viz. of his real character and course of conduct. But this forgetfulness does not last], and in the end he sheweth forth his wickedness.

8. Wicked (is he) who is evil of eye.] Viz. in regard to others, who has not pity nor mercy on them. Βασκαίνω seems = βασκανίζω ὀφθαλμῷ, by which the LXX. render תרע עינו, Deut. xxviii. 54, comp. v. 56.

and despiseth men.] The original would bear this rendering, but the better and more literal translation would be "and neglecteth souls," in the sense of the needy and craving. The Syr. omits this verse.

9. Rather: is not satisfied with a portion, and wicked injustice drieth up the soul. The A. V. reads ἀδικία πονηροῦ with 248, Co. The meaning is: not satisfied with a part, he wants all, and his wicked injustice as regards the claims of others drieth up every better feeling. Syr.: qui autem usurpat quod proximi sui est, evidently mispointing רַע for רָע.

10. Some misreading of the Hebrew must have caused the Syr. rendering: Oculus nequam multiplicat panem. The Greek has: "An evil eye is envious over bread, and [yet?] there is lack (deficiency) at his table"—although such an one grudgeth and envieth even bread to his neighbour, yet his own board is bare; or else, and at the same time his own board is bare. This latter view suits better as a transition to the stanza beginning with v. 11, which recommends free enjoyment of what we possess, so long as it is in our power.

11. Son, according as thou hast, do good to thyself, and properly [rightly, duly, in measure proportionate to thy possessions] bring oblations to the Lord.] A kind of attempted combination of enjoyment with piety, which reminds us of a similar proposal recorded in Eccles. ii. 3. But perhaps the writer may have had Prov. xvii. 1 in his mind, —the "dry morsel" there becoming here whatever a man has, and the "sacrifices" being no longer "of strife." The Syriac has substantially the same for the first clause, but instead of the second virtually repeats the first clause: And if thou hast anything, do good to thyself. The alteration in this case seems to us to have been in the Syr.

12. the covenant of the grave.] Rather, a covenant of Hades—perhaps a reference to Isa. xxviii. 15. The expression naturally conveys the thought that one knows not such a covenant, that he has not seen it, and that such an agreement does not exist; in other words, we have not drawn up a bargain with Hades that we shall die at a certain fixed period, and know not at what moment we may have to depart. Yet there may be another view of it, which the Greek translator may have either misunderstood or else chosen to keep back. We find it, although with an explanatory paraphrase (marked by us with square brackets), in the Talmud, which reproduces vv. 11, 12, 18, although without quoting them. The subject is introduced by this admonition of a Rabbi: "Make haste to eat, make haste to drink, for this world which we leave is like a wedding" (equally brief). To which another Rabbi adds this: "If thou hast anything, do good to thyself [for in Sheol there is no pleasure], and death knows no delay:" comp. Ecclus. xiv. 11, 12 a. "And [if thou say, I will leave to my son] the law in Sheol who will declare to thee?" (חוֹק בִּשְׁאוֹל מִי יַגִּיד לָךְ): comp. Ecclus. xiv. 12 b. "The children of man are like the herbs of the field —some bloom and some fade away:" comp. Ecclus. xiv. 18 (Erubh. 54 a).

B. C. cir. 200.

13 [f] Do good unto thy friend before thou die, and according to thy ability stretch out thy hand and give to him.

14 [g] Defraud not thyself of [h] the good day, and let not the part of a good desire overpass thee.

15 [i] Shalt thou not leave thy travails unto another? and thy labours to be divided by lot?

16 Give, and take, and sanctify thy soul; for there is no seeking of dainties in the grave.

17 [k] All flesh waxeth old as a garment: for the covenant from the beginning is, [l] Thou shalt die the death.

18 As of the green leaves on a thick tree, some fall, and some grow; so is the generation of flesh and blood, [m] one cometh to an end, and another is born.

19 Every work rotteth and consumeth away, and the worker thereof shall go withal.

20 [n] Blessed is the man that doth

[f] Tobit 4. 7. Luke 14. 13.
[g] Eccles. 5. 18, &c. & 6. 1, &c.
[h] Or, the feast day.
[i] ver. 4.
[k] Ps. 102. 26. Isai. 40. 6. Hebr. 1. 11. Jam. 1. 10. 1 Pet. 1. 24.
[l] Gen. 2. 17. & 3. 19.
[m] Eccles. 1. 4.
[n] Ps. 1. 2.

13. Do good unto thy friend.] Rather: to a friend.

14. Miss not a good day.] The Alex. omits ἀπὸ ἀγαθῆς. There can be little doubt that the Vat. represents the proper reading. But we must not (with Fritzsche) understand the "good day" in the later technical signification of יוֹם טוֹב = festive day. The writer had Eccles. vii. 14*a* in his mind, and perhaps intended this as a paraphrase of בְּיוֹם טוֹבָה הֱיֵה בְטוֹב—LXX. ἐν ἡμέρᾳ ἀγαθωσύνης. The second clause reads: "And let not a portion of a good desire [perhaps, a part in desirable good—presumably, participation in lawful pleasure] go past thee." In short, carpe diem. The Syr. paraphrases the last clause: "and desire not an evil desire."

15. thy travails . . . thy labours.] Viz. the fruit of them.

16. The more than doubtful sentiment of this verse led to early attempts at emendation. Grotius would read ἀγάπησον for ἀπάτησον—a conjecture in which he was anticipated by the Armen. Version. But we cannot conceive such a use of the word אהב in the original. The Syr. has "nourish thy soul." It adds, probably as an apologetic corrective: "and whatever is fair to be done before the Lord, that do." Some Codices have ἁγίασον, as the A. V.—evidently a later apologetic emendation; the Vet. Lat. has justifica. It is needless to give other conjectural emendations. The meaning of the verse is: "Beguile [Böttcher = oblecta] thy soul [let thy soul enjoy itself], for there is no seeking after dainties [here the cause for the effect: seeking for finding] in Hades." It is indicative of the former estimate of the Apocrypha that, like Ecclus. xiii. 1, the first clause of v. 16 ("give and take") has passed into a popular adage, although with a very different meaning attaching to it.

17. All flesh.] כל בשר, a frequent expression, = every living creature, and specifically all men. But possibly the Hebrew original simply quoted Ps. cii. 27, וְכֻלָּם כַּבֶּגֶד יִבְלוּ, which the Greek translator paraphrased for greater clearness. The LXX. render the verse in the Ps. by the same words as the Hebrew: πάντες ὡς ἱμάτιον παλαιωθήσονται.

for the covenant from everlasting [ἀπ' αἰῶνος, but both in the Hebrew usage and here (comp. xliv. 2) it might be rendered: "from the beginning"] (is): Dying thou shalt die (מוֹת תָּמוּת, here literally rendered from the Hebrew, as in LXX. Gen. ii. 17).] The underlying thought may have been the same as that of certain Rabbis that death was not the sequence of sin, but from the first appointed to man; although the other idea is not necessarily excluded, that physical death came upon all in consequence of Adam's sin. In Siphré (ed. Friedmann, p. 141*a*) we find a curious application of the words in Numb. xix. 14, זֹאת הַתּוֹרָה, as implying a Divine decree of death upon all men. The Syr. has the following, no doubt later (Christian?) modification of v. 17: "for all the sons of men are certainly for corruption (corrumpendi sunt), and the generations of the world are certainly to die."

18. As green leaves [it is not possible literally to render φύλλον θαλλον] on a thick tree.] Thick in the sense of "with branches," perhaps רַעֲנָן; but see Schleusner ad voc.

flesh and blood.] The well-known expression for man: בישר ודם.

19. Conclusion of this and transition to the next stanza. "Every work which is corruptible [or perhaps: being corruptible] shall consume away, and the worker thereof shall pass away with it." The Syriac has here also what seems a Christian modification: "and all his works shall be searched into before him, and the work of his hands shall follow after him."

20. New stanza. Happy he that doth meditate [so the Alex. reading, and others, and this is preferable to the Vat. τελευτήσει] in wisdom.] Omit "good things." The meditate good things in wisdom, and that reasoneth of holy things by his understanding.

B. C. cir. 200.

21 He that considereth her ways in his heart shall also have understanding in her secrets.

22 Go after her as one that traceth, and lie in wait in her ways.

23 He that prieth in at her windows shall also hearken at her doors.

24 He that doth lodge near her house shall also fasten a ‖ pin in her walls.

‖ Or, stake.

25 He shall pitch his tent nigh unto her, and shall lodge in a lodging where good things are.

B. C. cir. 200.

26 He shall set his children under her shelter, and shall lodge under her branches.

27 [n] By her he shall be covered from heat, and in her glory shall he dwell.

[n] Wisd. 10. 16.

CHAPTER XV.

2 Wisdom embraceth those that fear God. 7 The wicked shall not get her. 11 We may not charge God with our faults: 14 for he made, and left us to ourselves.

verse is evidently based on Ps. i. 2, although significantly "wisdom" now takes the place of "His law,"—a difference characteristic, on the one hand, of the age and date of Ps. i., and, on the other, of the standpoint of the Siracide.

and discourseth (about it) in his understanding.] This may also answer to יהגה in Ps. i. 2.

21. He considereth [or, "he that considereth"—if we regard the "happy" of v. 20 as still carried on to this verse] her ways in his heart, and pondereth on her secrets.] Wisdom is here personified.

22. that traceth.] Viz., her footsteps. The figure is of a hunter. This sentence must be either regarded as intercalated, by way of admonition, or else we must suppose that the Syr. here represents the Hebrew more accurately when it connects all these sentences as subordinate to and dependent on v. 20.

23. He prieth in . . . and listeneth.] In other words, all means are used to learn her secrets.

24. In pursuit of the same object: "He lodgeth . . . and fasteneth the peg in her walls." The peg, viz., of his tent. Mark that Wisdom is represented as having a house —solid and permanent; whereas the human searcher after her is described as in a tent. See next verse. In the LXX. πάσσαλος always represents the Heb. יָתֵד, except in Ex. xxxix. 33 (of the Hebrew text; in the LXX. there is a different order, or rather disorder, and v. 33 is represented by v. 9).

25. and shall lodge in a lodging where good things are.] Lit., "in a hostelry of good things."

26. under her shelter.] The figure varies now to that of a tree. The shelter which his lodgment under her branches affords, extends to "his children" (descendants). The Syr. has: manus suas jactabit super ramos eius. At first sight we might conjecture that the Syr. read יָדָיו, "his hands," for יְלָדָיו, "his children" (as in the Greek Version). But on further consideration it seems more likely that the Syr., which here is throughout confused, had somehow transferred hither the κατὰ χεῖρας αὐτῆς ("by the side of her") of v. 25. But, manifestly, it is impossible to make any good sense out of the Syr. Version. When, however, the Syr. has in v. 27 b: et in habitaculis eius relaxabit animum, it is evident that it read instead of הָדָר, "glory," חֶדֶר, "chamber," while it understood the word rendered in the Greek καταλύσει, "he shall lodge," as relaxabit, viz. animum, just as the LXX. similarly use the same Greek word (six times) for שָׁבַת or הִשְׁבִּית.

CHAPTER XV.

This chapter forms a natural and easy continuation of the preceding, and a progression upon it. If we might borrow the language of our public life, what in the last stanza of the previous chapter (xiv. 20–27) was the moral "amendment" on "the original motion" to do good to oneself, becomes in ch. xv. (1–10) "the original motion," to which the objections or excuses on the part of a sinner in vv. 11–20 are again a proposed "amendment" which is discussed and rejected. Thus the chapter consists of two parts. Part I. (vv. 1–10): praise of Wisdom, in two stanzas —stanza 1 (vv. 1–5), Wisdom from its objective aspect; stanza 2 (vv. 6–10), Wisdom from the subjective aspect—the relation of the wise and of the fool or sinner to Wisdom. Naturally, the latter is chiefly dwelt upon. This prepares us for the excuses which the sinner makes for not submitting to Wisdom, that is, for continuing in his sinful ways. This forms the subject of Part II. (vv. 11–20), which also consists of two stanzas, each of five verses. The first stanza (vv. 11–15) once more presents the objective aspect of the answer to the sinner's excuse: I cannot help myself—cir-

B. C. cir. 200.

HE that feareth the Lord will do good; and he that hath the knowledge of the law shall obtain her.

2 And as a mother shall she meet him, and receive him as a wife married of a virgin.

3 With the bread of understanding shall she feed him, and give him the water of wisdom to drink.

4 He shall be stayed upon her, and shall not be moved; and shall rely upon her, and shall not be confounded.

5 She shall exalt him above his neighbours, and in the midst of the congregation shall she open his mouth. B. C. cir. 200.

6 He shall find joy and a crown of gladness, and she shall cause him to inherit an everlasting name.

7 But foolish men shall not attain unto her, and sinners shall not see her.

8 For she is far from pride, and men that are liars cannot remember her.

9 [a] ‖Praise is not seemly in the mouth of a sinner, for ‖it was not sent him of the Lord.

10 For ‖praise shall be uttered in wisdom, and the Lord will prosper it.

[a] Ps. 33. 1. Prov. 26. 7.

‖ Or, A parable.

‖ Or, he was not sent of, &c.

‖ Or rather, a parable.

cumstances, or rather God, caused my choice. Lastly, the second stanza (vv. 16–20) contains the answer to be given to the sinner, from the subjective aspect of the question, viz. man has liberty, and God will help him, if he seeks to do well. Naturally the two aspects (and stanzas) merge into each other (comp., on the one hand, v. 15; and, on the other, vv. 18, 20).

1. He that feareth the Lord shall do this [viz. so follow, and cleave to, Wisdom, as described in the last stanza of ch. xiv.]; and he that is an adept in the law [a master in it] shall obtain her.] Viz. Wisdom. This verse is both important and characteristic as marking Hellenistic views. The object is to represent fear of the Lord as the search after wisdom, and a proper and full knowledge of the Law as the attainment of Wisdom. The transition from "the Law" to "Wisdom" which was in process in the so-called Chokhmah-books (Wisdom-books) of the Old Testament appears here as an accomplished fact.

2. and receive him as a wife of (one's) youth.] Comp. Prov. ii. 17. That γυνὴ παρθενίας means not virgin-wife, but wife of one's youth, seems established by LXX. Jer. iii. 4, where παρθενία is the translation of נְעוּרִים, "youth." And here it may be well to bear in mind that the Book of Jeremiah was apparently a favourite one with the Alexandrians (comp. Philo, 'de Cher.' § 14).

3. Fritzsche explains the simile: as bread and water are the ordinary daily food, so wisdom supplies him spiritually with ordinary daily food. But the addition of these adjectives seems needless. The meaning conveyed to our minds is that of a supply, which differs from that of ordinary men as regards its source, and is suitable for nourishment. Here and in the following verses we mark a gradation: food, support (v. 5), advancement (v. 6), joy (v. 7).

6. Omit "He shall find."

joy and a crown of gladness, and an everlasting name shall he inherit.] This begins the second stanza of Part I., and serves as transition to what follows.

7. Some authorities have καί—in the A. V. "but"—which must be omitted. Fools shall not attain to wisdom; sinners have this goal not even in sight. Comp. here Erubh. 55 a.

8. cannot remember her.] Rather, shall not be mindful of her (Bissell)—either in the sense of bearing her in mind, or caring for her. For the first part of this verse there are many Rabbinic parallels, such as: "God lifteth up him that abaseth himself, and abaseth him that uplifteth himself" (Erubh. 13 b; comp. St. Matt. xxiii. 12); or "he that becometh proud shall fall into Gehenna" (Babh. B. 10 b), &c.

9, 10. These are perhaps among the most difficult verses in Ecclus. The A. V. represents the Greek text with sufficient accuracy. Nothing can be learned from a comparison with the Syriac. We would suggest that the writer, or the translator, had in his mind and wished to improve upon Prov. xxvii. 21 b, which in the LXX. has a clause added. It reads in the LXX. as follows: "but a man is tried [in the sense of "tested"] by the mouth of them that praise him. [LXX. adds:] The heart of the transgressor seeks after evil [mischief], but an upright heart seeks after knowledge." In whatever sense we may understand the somewhat difficult clause in the Hebrew of Prov. xxvii. 21, the writer of Ecclus. would, if our view be correct, have paraphrased or applied it in the following manner: Such praise as cometh from a sinner is not seemly, becoming, beautiful.

B. C. cir. 200.

11 [b]Say not thou, It is through the Lord that I fell away: for thou oughtest not to do the things that he hateth.

Jam. 1. 13.

12 Say not thou, He hath caused me to err: for he hath no need of the sinful man.

13 The Lord hateth all abomination; and they that fear God love it not.

B. C. cir. 200.

14 He himself [c]made man from the beginning, [d]and left him in the hand of his counsel;

[c] Gen. 1. 26, 27. [d] Gen. 2. 16, 17.

15 If thou wilt, to [e]keep the commandments, and to perform acceptable faithfulness.

[e] Matt. 19. 17.

It is not real praise, however many may utter it, because it is not sent of the Lord and has not His sanction. Praise—real praise—is uttered in wisdom (= by the truly wise = the pious); and such praise the Lord will prosper, that is, confirm and add His blessing to it. Bretschneider would regard αἶνος as = מִשְׁל, dicta sapientiæ; Fritzsche understands it as referring to praise of God (Lobgesang)—both, in our view, impossible explanations, alike as regards the meaning of the words and the context.

11. With this verse Part II. begins (see introductory remarks). The connexion between this verse and vv. 9, 10 seems as follows: Praise (although coming from the ungodly) might lead a man to imagine that he had the Divine approbation, and so hurry him on to his fall, which in that case he might attribute to God. But for any such error the second clause furnishes a corrective by giving this test: for what He hateth, thou shalt not do (so more accurately than in the A. V.). It is not necessary to correct οὐ ποιήσεις into οὐ ποιήσει. On the imperative use of οὐ with the indic. fut., see Winer, 'Gram. d. Neut. Spr.' § 43, 5*c*, and § 56, p. 445. On the passage generally, comp. St. James i. 13—which here, as in so many places, shews lines of correspondence with Ecclus. (comp. the General Introduction).

12. Say not thou, [God] Himself hath made me stray: for He hath no pleasure in a sinful man.] In LXX. Prov. xviii. 2 οὐ χρείαν ἔχει is the translation of לֹא־יַחְפֹּץ; comp. also Is. xiii. 17. As the rendering "He hath no need of a sinful man" does not give any proper meaning, we conclude that the Greek translator used the same expression as in LXX. Prov., where the original had יחפץ. In that case the meaning would be: it is impossible to impute your conduct to God, since He has no pleasure in a sinner. Or else, as Symmachus renders by χρεία the חפץ of Eccles. iii. 1, 17, v. 3, which in the first two passages means "purpose," while in later Hebrew it stands for "a thing (or a thing valued)," the sentence might also mean: "for He has no purpose with, or else, He has no dealing with, or even, He attaches no value to a sinful man." But our first rendering is confirmed by the Syr.: non enim oblectatur homine sceleroso.

13. The Lord hateth every abomination, and it is not loved by [not loveable to] them that fear Him.] The Syr. renders the last clause: "and will not give them [it] to them that love Him." The rendering "will give" is unintelligible unless, as has been suggested by Mr. Margoliouth, the Syr. misread יהב, dabit, for יֶאֱהַב.

14. Similar evidence of direct translation from the Hebrew original comes to us from the use here in the Syriac of the expressions בראשית for ἐξ ἀρχῆς and יצר for διαβούλιον. There can be little doubt that the original contained the term Yetser, although not in the later application of it to either the good or the evil impulse in man, but in the earlier meaning of disposition, mind, counsel (Sinn, Gesinnung). The Greek rendering also is manifestly Hebraistic. The original may have been: וַיִּתְּנֵהוּ בְּיַד יִצְרוֹ, while the ἐξ ἀρχῆς of the first clause may represent the Hebrew מִבְּרֵאשׁוֹנָה. But it is not only these expressions which are of interest. The verse is important as confirming the conclusion derived from Ecclus. xiv. 17. For whatever meaning we may attach to the first clause of xv. 14, the second clause, when taken in conjunction with v. 15, implies a virtual denial of the moral consequences of the fall.

in the hand of his counsel.] A Hebraism; rather, "in the power of his counsel" [will, mind] = to his own free choice. In passing we may notice that the later Alexandrian distinction between the ἔπλασε, which was in reference to the "earthly," and the ἐποίησε, which applied to the "heavenly man," had not yet been made; comp. Philo, 'Leg. Alleg.' i. 12, 16.

15. Rather, "If thou wilt, thou shalt [canst] keep the commandments, [in?] working [doing] acceptable faithfulness." The infinitive ποιῆσαι in the second clause we suppose to represent the Hebrew לַעֲשׂוֹת, here used in an adverbial or gerundial sense, in further explanation of what preceded (comp. Ewald, 'Lehrb.' pp. 698, 699). It is need-

B. C. cir. 200.

16 [f] He hath set fire and water before thee: stretch forth thy hand unto whether thou wilt.

17 [g] Before man is life and death; and whether him liketh shall be given him.

18 [h] For the wisdom of the Lord is great, and he is mighty in power, and beholdeth all things:

19 And [i] his eyes are upon them that fear him, and he knoweth every work of man.

20 He hath commanded no man to do wickedly, neither hath he given any man licence to sin.

B. C. cir. 200.

[f] Deut. 30. 19. Josh. 24. 15.
[g] Jer. 21. 8.
[h] Ps. 147. 5.
[i] Ps. 33. 18. & 34. 15. Hebr. 4. 13.

CHAPTER XVI.

1 It is better to have none, than many lewd children. 6 The wicked are not spared for their number. 12 Both the wrath and the mercy of the Lord are great. 17 The wicked cannot be hid. 20 God's works are unsearchable.

DESIRE not a multitude of unprofitable children, neither delight in ungodly sons.

less to mention the explanations and corrections proposed by others, since they only involve fresh difficulties.

16, 17. These verses begin the last stanza.

16. stretch forth.] Rather, "thou mayest stretch forth thy hand." "Fire and water," in the sense of opposite extremes, yet probably not without some reference to their effects. The harsh Greek rendering of 16 b would represent what was elegant in the Hebrew original: שְׁלַח יָדְךָ.

17 b. and whichever he liketh.] In the Hebrew either רצה or חפץ, for both of which the word is used in the LXX.—whichever of the two may be pleasing to him, or engage his choice: naturally not life or death, but that which leads to them, shall be his portion, or "be given him," in the end. Bearing in mind that verses 16 and 17 are based on Deut. xxx. 15 (comp. Jer. xxi. 8), we are struck with the absence of any reference to God as placing this choice before man. Can the translator have intended thus to emphasize man's absolute self-determination? The Syr., although in what seems a paraphrastic rendering, may perhaps more faithfully represent the meaning of the Hebrew original. It translates: "For life and death are given to the children of man that they may choose life and eschew death." The last verses form the general conclusion and application of Part II. With v. 19 a comp. Ps. xxxiii. 18; xxxiv. 16.

CHAPTER XVI.

This chapter is one of the most lofty in the book. Omitting vv. 15, 16—which, although found in 106, 248, Co., and in the Syr., are manifestly an interpolation—the chapter consists of twenty-eight verses, which naturally divide themselves into two equal parts: Part I., vv. 1–14: Part II., vv. 17–30. Taken as a whole, the chapter forms an exact counterpart to the preceding one. In ch. xv., Part I. in praise of Wisdom (vv. 1–10) led up in Part II. to man's free determination, shewing his absolute liberty of choice, in accordance with which God would ultimately hold him responsible, therein also vindicating His own character. On the other hand, in ch. xvi., Part I. (vv. 1–14) leads up, not to man's choice and doings, but to God's determination and work (v. 26 and following), which appear in those benefits which He so freely bestowed upon earth. So close is the correspondence between the two chapters that Part II. of ch. xvi. (v. 17) begins with exactly the same words ("Say not thou") as Part II. of ch. xv. (v. 11). In both cases an objection is met: in ch. xv. that man is not responsible; in ch. xvi. that he will not be called to account. In both chapters the refutation of the objection leads up to the statement of the positive truth which forms not only the climax, but the real subject-matter of each chapter. Part I. of ch. xvi. consists of three stanzas (5 + 5 + 4 verses). Stanza 1 is connected with the previous chapter, and shews that, since man is a responsible agent, even the most coveted possession—that of a numerous posterity—may not always prove a blessing. Stanza 2 illustrates the general inference that only the good will remain, while those who are evil shall perish in judgment. This is shewn by a reference to the history of Israel (vv. 6–10). Lastly, in stanza 3 the writer proceeds to shew that God deals in this manner not only with nations, but also with individuals (vv. 11–14). At this point the objection is artistically introduced that it is unreasonable to imagine that every single individual in this vast universe will be called to give a separate account, v. 17, which opens the first stanza of Part II. (vv. 17–23). The answer to this objection lies in higher views of God, which exhibit His often hidden wisdom and justice (vv. 18–23). Lastly, in the second stanza of Part II. (like the first, of seven verses: vv. 24–30) this is farther enforced by a consideration of the sovereignty, care, and personal rule of God.

1. unprofitable.] In LXX. Hos. viii. 8 the

B. C. cir. 200.

2 Though they multiply, rejoice not in them, except the fear of the Lord be with them.

3 Trust not thou in their life, neither respect their multitude: for one that is just is better than a thousand; and better it is to die without children, than to have them that are ungodly.

4 For by one that hath understanding shall the city be replenished: but the ‖kindred of the wicked shall speedily become desolate.

B. C. cir. 200.

5 Many such things have I seen with mine eyes, and mine ear hath heard greater things than these.

‖ Or, tribe.

6 [a]In the congregation of the ungodly shall a fire be kindled; and in a rebellious nation wrath ‖is set on fire.

[a] ch. 21. 9.

‖ Or, hath been.

7 [b]He was not pacified toward the old giants, who fell away in the strength of their foolishness.

[b] Gen. 6. 4. Wisd. 14. 6.

same word stands for אֵין חֶפֶץ בּוֹ. In Jer. xxii. 28, xlviii. 38 (in LXX. xxxi. 38), the same Hebrew expression is similarly rendered (οὐκ ἔστι χρεία αὐτοῦ). Comp. also Philem. v. 11 (see the excellent remarks on the expression in Philem. in the 'Speaker's Comment.' ad loc.). In any case the word ἄχρηστος conveys here a much stronger meaning than our ordinary usage of "unprofitable," although probably not one so strong as in the Hebrew passages referred to, which seem rather to be represented in Rom. ix. 21; 2 Tim. ii. 20.

neither delight in.] Better, neither have joy over. The general meaning of the verse is farther set forth in v. 2.

3. neither respect their multitude.] Rather, neither have respect [in the sense of reliance] to their place [in the sense of rank or condition]. The difficulty of the expression led to such attempts at correcting the text as the Alex. reading (and that of other authorities), τὸ πλῆθος, "the multitude," for τὸν τόπον—adopted in the A. V.—or the Vulg. reading, κόπον, labores. But from the usage in the LXX. there cannot be any doubt that the Hebrew original for τόπος was מקום—here in the later Targumic and Talmudic sense of rank, condition (comp. the beautiful saying: "Not his rank maketh a man honourable, but the man his rank," Taan. 21 b, anticipating Burns). Indeed that meaning of the word seems already implied in Eccles., as in Eccles. iii. 16, and especially x. 4. Accordingly the words of the Siracide mean: trust not in their life, and have no reliance on, look not to, their present rank and condition. In the next clause the words "that is just" must be omitted as a later gloss. The last line of the verse reads: And to die childless than to have ungodly children [Bissell].

4. Omit "speedily" in the second clause.

the city.] Rather, a city. We retain the rendering "shall be replenished" for συνοικισθήσεται, as more general, and including more than merely the population of a city. The expression seems to have been chosen as antithetic to the ἐρημωθήσεται ("shall be made desolate") in the second clause.

but the house of the wicked shall become desolate.] "House" in the wider Hebrew sense of בית or משפחה = the whole kindred and family, viewed as a unit. "Desolate:" the Hebrew word was either חרב or שמם.

5. greater.] Rather, more mighty,—I have heard, or come to know, even more striking instances of this than those which I have personally witnessed.

6. This verse begins the stanza of historical illustrations. If we regard v. 6 as the first instance of them, the reference would be primarily to Numb. xi. 1, comp. Ps. lxxviii. 21, although the history of Korah may also have been in view (Numb. xvi.). In that case we would translate: "In the congregation of sinners fire was kindled;" the Greek translator having for some reason rendered the Hebrew imperfect (in the first, though not in the second clause) by the future (in the LXX. Numb. xi. 1 reads: ἐξεκαύθη ἐν αὐτοῖς πῦρ). But it is at least conceivable that v. 6 a is intended not as a reference to any particular event, but as a general summary and inference from the past, and as a prediction of what would take place in the future. This would avoid the strange transition from a much later event to the history of the giants, of Lot, and of Israel, in the following verses, which are all related in their chronological order. If this view of v. 6 be adopted, the future tense must be retained in the translation: "shall fire be kindled." See note on v. 8.

7. toward the old giants.] Rather, in regard to. The reference is to Gen. vi. 1–4. On the view here taken of this narrative comp. Wisd. xiv. 6; Bar. iii. 26; 3 Macc. ii. 4, the Pseudepigr. (B. of Hen.; B. of Jubil. Comp. Dillmann, 'B. Hen. Einl.' p. xlii.), Jos., Philo, and as regards the Greek text of Gen. vi. 1, Field's 'Hex.' ad loc. On the interpretation of Gen. vi. 1–4 see the special literature in Dillmann, 'Die Genesis' (Kurzgef. Exeg. Handb., ed. 1882), pp. 113, 114,

B. C. cir. 200.

8 [c]Neither spared he the place where Lot sojourned, but [d]abhorred them for their pride.

[c] Gen. 19. 24.
[d] Ezek. 16. 49, 50.

9 He pitied not the people of perdition, who were taken away in their sins:

Numb. 14. 15. 35. & 16. 21. & 21. 6. & 26. 64.

10 [e]Nor the six hundred thousand footmen, who were gathered together in the hardness of their hearts.

11 And if there be one stiffnecked among the people, it is marvel if he escape unpunished: for [f]mercy and wrath are with him; he is mighty to forgive, and to pour out displeasure.

[f] ch. 5. 6.

12 As his mercy is great, so is his correction also: [g]he judgeth a man according to his works.

B. C. cir. 200.

[g] Ps. 62. 12.

13 The sinner shall not escape with his spoils: and the patience of the godly shall not be frustrate.

14 Make way for every work of mercy: for every man shall find according to his works.

15 [h]The Lord hardened Pharaoh, that he should not know him, that his powerful works might be known to the world.

[h] Exod. 7. 3. & 14. 4, 8. Rom. 9. 17, 18.

16 His mercy is manifest to every creature; and [i]he hath separated and Delitzsch, 'Comm. ü. d. Gen.' (ed. 1872), pp. 190, &c.

[i] Gen. 1. 4.

in the strength of their foolishness.] Rather, in their strength, omitting what evidently was a gloss (emendatory or else apologetic).

8. He spared not those who dwelt with Lot, whom He abhorred for their pride.] According to the common interpretation, the reference is here to the people of Sodom. But these would not have been "the sojourners with Lot;" rather was Lot a sojourner with them. A further difficulty arises from the fact that the following two verses (יחיד. 9, 10) can only refer to Israel. Hence we conclude that all these historical illustrations are taken from what befell the professing children of God. Accordingly they "who dwelt with Lot" must be those of his own family whose pride prevented their listening to his warning—παροικία standing for the Hebrew בית, and not מגור, as sometimes in the LXX. On the other hand, the Syr., which has here several alterations, seems to wish to apply יחיד. 6–9 not to Israel, but to their enemies,—as we think, wrongly.

9. the people of perdition.] I.e. devoted to perdition. The reference may be to what is recorded in Ex. xxxii., or else in Numb. xi. The Syr. would read the Heb. וְלֹא רִחֵם עַל עַם חֲרֵמוֹ—a play on the words.

10. Nor.] Rather, and so. The reference here is to the fact that the 600,000 footmen who came out of Egypt (Ex. xii. 37) perished in the wilderness on account of the hardness of their hearts. The rendering of the Greek: "who were gathered together,"—ἐπισυναχθέντας,—is due to a misunderstanding of the verb אסף (הַנֶּאֱסָפִים, or it may have been אֲשֶׁר נֶאֱסְפוּ), which means indeed "to gather," but in the twofold sense of gathering together and of gathering away = taking away = destroying. The meaning of the Hebrew original no doubt was: who were carried off [swept away] in the hardness of their hearts.

11. Third stanza, preparing for Part II. Not only a community, but individuals are punished of God. Omit "among the people."

13 b. nor will He delay [defer, cause to come too late] the hope of the godly.] Briefly, God will fulfil, and that ere long, the hope of His people. The wicked shall not be allowed to be rich in his robbery, nor yet the just to fail of his hope. We have rendered ὑπομονή not "patience," but "hope," in accordance with the usage of the LXX. The Hebrew may have been: וְתִקְוַת צַדִּיק לֹא יְאַחֵר.

14. He will make a place for all mercy; every one shall find (= receive) according to his works.] The difficulty here is whether the "mercy" (ἐλεημοσύνη) referred to is that shewn by man, of which God will make acknowledgment, or that displayed by God in the sense that, while He will prove very merciful, every one shall receive a just retribution. The meaning of the expression "He will make a place" (ποιήσει τόπον) is illustrated by Acts xxv. 16; Rom. xii. 19; Heb. viii. 7, xii. 17. It corresponds to the Hebrew נתן מקום ל. Although the term ἐλεημοσύνη is very rarely employed in reference to God, it is so used in Ecclus. xvii. 29, and in LXX. Ps. cii. (Heb. ciii.) 6 a, where it stands for "righteous acts," צדקות. Indeed, this latter passage may have been in the mind of the writer, and the ποιῶν ἐλεημοσύνας of that Ps. have become the πάσῃ ἐλεημοσύνῃ ποιήσει τόπον of our passage. At the same time it must be admitted that the addition of πάσῃ seems to point to the exercise of human rather than Divine mercies. In that case "make a place" would = assign a place.

B. C. cir. 200.

his light from the darkness with an ‖adamant.

17 Say not thou, I will hide myself from the Lord: shall any remember me from above? I shall not be remembered among so many people: for what is my soul among such an infinite number of creatures?

‖ Or, strong partition.

[k] 1 Kings 8. 27. [l] Chron. 2. 18. [m] Pet. 3. 10.

18 [k]Behold, the heaven, and the heaven of heavens, the deep, and the earth, and all that therein is, shall be moved when he shall visit.

19 The mountains also and foundations of the earth shall be shaken with trembling, when the Lord looketh upon them.

B. C. cir. 200.

20 No heart can think upon these things worthily: [l]and who is able to conceive his ways?

[l] Rom. 11. 33.

21 It is a tempest which no man can see: for the most part of his works are hid.

22 Who can declare the works of his justice? or who can endure them? for his covenant is afar off, and the trial of all things is in the end.

17. Omit vv. 15, 16. (See introductory remarks.) It adds to our difficulties of interpretation that vv. 15, 16 are found in the Syr. Again, the Syr. also gives a totally different turn to v. 17 (comp. Syr. v. 18), and presents it in a sense foreign, as we believe, to the purpose of the original writer. It is not difficult to perceive the apologetic motives for these alterations — although some may regard it as open to question whether the Greek or the Syriac translator tampered with the Hebrew original. For our own part we have no hesitation in abiding by the Greek Version. The last clause of the verse should be rendered: "For what is my soul in immeasurable [infinite] creation?" It must, however, be admitted that alike the thought and its mode of expression (κτίσις) are not Hebrew, but Alexandrian.

18. Omit the words "and all that therein is"; "shall be moved," &c.—rather: shall be shaken at His visitation. It is possible that vv. 18–22 still continue the objections of v. 17, derived from a misapplication of the observed greatness of God. But it seems difficult to imagine such language on the part of an unbeliever. On the other hand, if, as we suppose, vv. 21, 22 are intended as an answer to his secret thinking, vv. 18, 19 must also be regarded as part of the same argument. In that case the reasoning would be: True, God is very great; yet He is not far from His creation, but penetrates, pervades, and directs all—both physically and ethically—even though this may be unperceived or unheeded.

19. shall be shaken, &c.] Rather: "are shaken with trembling when He looketh upon them."

20. But (καὶ for δέ) upon (ordinarily, περί) these things the mind (לב) shall not think.] The future here in the sense of "cannot," to express what is morally impossible: comp. Rom. v. 7; 1 Cor. viii. 8 (Winer's 'Gramm.' p. 250). Most commentators, however, regard the words as implying a reproof of such a state of mind.

and His ways who shall consider?] The interpretation proposed by us of this and the preceding clause, although not free from difficulty, agrees best with v. 19. We may add that the Syr. Version offers not any help on these difficult verses, and indeed is not trustworthy.

21. As a tempest, &c.] The figurative comparison of God's dealings with the wind seems to have been not only frequent, but to have become almost proverbial. Comp. Ps. cxxxv. 7; Prov. xxx. 4; Eccles. i. 6 (viii. 8?), xi. 5; and especially St. John iii. 8.

22. The works of (God's) justice [righteousness] who shall announce, or who shall expect [await]?] Ὑπομένειν stands in the LXX. for a number of Hebrew words, but in a very large proportion of instances for such as mean "to expect" or "await." The meaning here is: as it is extremely difficult, almost impossible, to announce and anticipate the manner in which God's justice shall be manifested (since it is secret, sudden, irresistible, like the storm), so, on the other hand, there are few who expect it.

for far off is the covenant.] The clause following on these words in the A.V. must be omitted (in the Syr. the whole verse is wanting). These words express the false inference drawn by men from the impossibility of announcing God's judgments, as well as the reason why they are not expected. They imagine: far off is the covenant. The reference to the διαθήκη is a favourite one with the Son of Sirach, who employs the term twenty-two times. In the LXX. it stands almost invariably for ברית. We suppose that "the covenant" here in view is that with death and Hades, to which reference was made in Ecclus. xiv. 12, 17. The writer had probably in his mind LXX. Is. xxviii. 15, and especially v. 17: "And I will cause

B. C. cir. 200.

23 He that wanteth understanding will think upon vain things: and a foolish man erring imagineth follies.

24 My son, hearken unto me, and learn knowledge, and mark my words with thy heart.

25 I will shew forth doctrine in weight, and declare his knowledge exactly.

[m] Ps. 111. 7, 8.

26 [m] The works of the Lord are done in judgment from the beginning: and from the time he made them he disposed the parts thereof.

B. C. cir. 200.

27 He garnished his works for ever, and in his hand are the ‖ chief of them unto all generations: they neither labour, nor are weary, nor cease from their works.

‖ Or, beginnings.

28 None of them hindereth another, [n] and they shall never disobey his word.

[n] Ps. 148. 8.

29 After this the Lord looked upon the earth, and filled it with his blessings.

judgment to be for hope (here ἐλπίς), and my compassion (ἐλεημοσύνη, as in Ecclus. xvi. 14) for just measures, and ye that trust vainly in falsehood shall fall: for the tempest (καταιγίς, as in Ecclus. xvi. 21) shall not by any means pass by you except it also take away your covenant of death (διαθήκη, as in Ecclus. xvi. 22), and your hope in Hades shall by no means stand; if the rushing tempest (καταιγίς) should come upon you, ye shall be beaten down by it." In our view this passage explains not only the expression "for far off is the covenant," but also the following verse.

23. He that wanteth understanding [lit. heart, חֲסַר־לֵב] will think these things, and an unwise and erring man will think foolish things [μωρά = נְבָלָה].

24. Stanza of final admonition. The expression "mark with the heart," as often in the Hebrew (שִׂים לֵב), here apparently derived from Deut. xxxii. 46 (both in the Heb. and LXX.). Comp. also Ezek. xliv. 5. Hence the proper translation is: "And set thy heart upon my words."

25. I will shew forth instruction by weight [carefully and accurately measured out, perhaps also with a secondary reference to its value], and declare [announce, set forth] knowledge with exactness [accuracy, precision].

26. By [according to] the counsel [appointment, decree — כְּמִשְׁפָּט] of the Lord (are) His works from the beginning, and from [the time of?] their making He assigned [apportioned] their parts [to each its part? perhaps וּלְכָל־אֶחָד חֶלְקוֹ חָלַק.] This vast creation, so far from leading us to infer—as the foolish had suggested in the previous stanza—that the individual is lost or unheeded amidst the vast mass, rather leads to an opposite conclusion. From the first all things have had the law of His appointment impressed upon them, and in every part of creation we mark this orderly distribution.

27. He ordered [settled, appointed, prepared — adorned?] for ever His works, and their rule to their generation.] Simple as these words seem, it is not easy to decide how exactly to render them. "The works" here referred to are God's chief works: the sun and stars to which Jewish Alexandrian philosophy attached such high importance, as well as the regulation of all nature (comp. here especially Philo, 'de Monarch.' i. § 1; comp. ii. 5, 6, and the art. Philo in Smith and Wace's 'Dict. of Chr. Biogr.'). We have rendered ἐκόσμησεν: He "ordered," "settled," which meaning it certainly bears in LXX. Mic. vi. 9, as well as a kindred meaning in other passages. The common rendering, "garnished" or "beautified," seems to give no meaning, while ours suits the context. Again, we have rendered τὰς ἀρχάς by "their rule," being the expression used in reference to the rule of sun and stars in LXX. Gen. i. 16, 18, and Philo similarly designates them as ἄρχοντας ('de Monarch.' i. 1). As to their "ordering for ever," the writer had probably Ps. cxlviii. 6 in view, where the same language is used. Indeed it is not improbable that the Hebrew original reproduced the וַיַּעֲמִידֵם לָעַד לְעוֹלָם of that Ps. (comp. also Ps. cxxxv., in the Heb. cxxxvi. 8, 9). It is even possible that the following clause also, καὶ τὰς ἀρχὰς αὐτῶν εἰς γενεὰς αὐτῶν, may be the younger Siracide's peculiar mode of rendering the second clause of Ps. cxlviii. 6: חָקַק־נָתַן וְלֹא יַעֲבוֹר—"they neither labour," — rather: they hunger not.

28. hindereth [crowdeth, in the sense of moving out of its place] another [lit. "his neighbour"]. "Each presseth not upon his neighbour, and unto everlasting [Aeon] shall they not disobey His word."

29. And after this.] Viz. after having 30 [o]With all manner of living things hath he covered the face thereof; [p]and they shall return into it again.

CHAPTER XVII.

1 How God created and furnished man. 14 Avoid all sin: 19 for God seeth all things. 25 Turn to him while thou livest.

THE Lord [q]created man of the earth, and turned him into it again.

2 [b]He gave them few days, and a short time, and power also over the things therein.

3 He endued them with strength by themselves, and [c]made them according to his image,

4 And put the fear ‖of man upon all flesh, [d]and gave him dominion over beasts and fowls.

5 [They received the use of the

B. C. cir. 200.

[o] Gen. 1. 25.
[p] Eccles. 3. 20.
[q] Gen. 1. 27. & 3. 19. & 5. 2. Eccles. 3. 20. Wisd. 2. 23. & 7. 1, 6.

B. C. cir. 200.

[b] Job 14. 1.
[c] Gen. 1. 26. & 9. 6. 1 Cor. 11. 7. Coloss. 3. 10.
‖ Or, him.
[d] Gen. 1. 28.

thus established and regulated for ever what is in heaven above.

30. living things.] Rather, "living creatures." The Hebrew may have been: מְלֹא פָנֶיהָ נֶפֶשׁ כָּל־חָי.

and they shall return into it again.] Lit. "and unto it the return of them."

CHAPTER XVII.

The argument of the previous chapter is here continued. What had previously been stated in regard to the world is now shewn to apply also to man—only that in his case personal responsibility is superadded. The world has a Divine Law inherent in itself; for man, as made in the image of God, his mental and moral individuality—the mind, conscience, heart, and free will—are that Law. Man is thus in the highest sense a law unto himself. In his case there exists not any necessity of nature, but he has the moral freedom of a personal choice, for which he is also endowed with the necessary moral qualifications. Hence he is absolutely and personally responsible (comp. xvi. 17, &c.). This forms the subject of the first stanza (vv. 1–8; v. 9 must be omitted). Turning next from this subjective to the objective aspect of the question, the writer lays down this further position, that man is intended by God to glorify Him, for which purpose God has made Himself known to him, and this involves another and still higher degree of responsibility. This forms the subject of the second stanza (vv. 10–15, v. 15 marking the climax, while v. 16 must be omitted). But the highest responsibility attaches to Israel (stanza 3: vv. 17–24). In a concluding stanza (vv. 25–32) the writer makes a religious application of what had preceded. Thus the chapter consists of four irregular stanzas. We add that vv. 5, 9, 16, 18, and 21 in our A. V. must be omitted as spurious.

1. and turned him.] But the sense requires: "and shall turn him." In the Heb. it was no doubt יְשִׁיבֵהוּ, or more probably יְשִׁיבֵנּוּ (comp. Kautzsch-Gesenius, 24th ed., p. 145, 4, note); or, as in the Syr., with יוּב before it. In the latter case the meaning would have been: He shall certainly turn him again (Ewald, p. 782). The Greek translator used the aorist instead of the future, possibly as in Rev. x. 7; 1 Cor. vii. 28 (Winer, l. l. p. 248). The statement itself is parallel to Ps. cxlvi. 4.

2. few days.] ἡμέρας ἀριθμοῦ, lit. "days of number." A common Hebraism, as in שָׁנוֹת מִסְפָּר, "a few years," Job xvi. 22, and ימים מספר, "a few days," Numb. ix. 20 (LXX. ἡμέρας ἀριθμῷ), where the words in the Heb. are however in apposition, while in Ecclus. the original had יְמֵי מִסְפָּר. The use of the word "number" for "numbered" = few, is frequent, alike in the Heb. and in the LXX.

and a (definite) time [a season].] No doubt עֵת, perhaps, as suggested by the next clause, with the secondary sense of a Divine appointment attaching to it, as in Eccles. iii. In Ezek. vii. 7, 12, the words "day" and "season" are also conjoined, both in the Heb. and the LXX., but in the inverse order of Ecclus.

and He gave them the dominion [imperium, as apparent from the gen. of the object] of what is upon it.] Viz. of all that is upon the earth.

3. He endued them with their own strength.] I.e. strength of their own (so the Aethiop.), strength which was their own, human; while the Figure, which was behind that strength and directed it, and of which they were "the image," was Divine. καθ' ἑαυτούς, probably for the sake of antithesis to the κατ' εἰκόνα ("according to His image") in the next clause. The καθ' ἑαυτοὺς stands here instead of the genitive: comp. Acts xvii. 28, xviii. 15, xxvi. 3; Eph. i. 15 (Winer, l. l. p. 139, and § 30, Anm. 5, p. 174 of the 6th ed.). The Syr., which renders the second clause, "and covered them with terror," seems inapt and a confusion with the first clause of the next verse.

5. This verse must be omitted. As Grotius

B. C. cir. 200.

five operations of the Lord, and in the sixth place he imparted them understanding, and in the seventh speech, an interpreter of the cogitations thereof.]

6 Counsel, and a tongue, and eyes, ears, and a heart, gave he them to understand.

7 Withal he filled them with the knowledge of understanding, and shewed them good and evil.

8 He set his eye upon their hearts, that he might shew them the greatness of his works.

9 He gave them to glory in his marvellous acts for ever, that they might declare his works with understanding.

B. C. cir. 200.

10 And the elect shall praise his holy name.

11 Beside this he gave them knowledge, and the law of life for an heritage.

12 He made an everlasting covenant with them, and shewed them his judgments.

13 Their eyes saw the majesty of remarks, it is probably the marginal gloss of some Stoic annotator.

6. Counsel.] Rather, a disposition. Cp. xv. 14. The Syr. omits, as we think rightly, this word. It should be noted that διαβούλιον in the singular does not occur in the LXX. and only twice in Ecclus.: here and in xv. 14 [see note] in the sense of disposition, mind = יצר. It occurs in the plural (whether of διαβουλία or διαβούλιον) in the sense of "counsels," "purposes," and "thoughts," in LXX. Ps. v. 11 and ix. 23 (Heb. x. 2), and in Hos. xi. 6; also in Hos. iv. 9, v. 4, vii. 2, where the Heb., however, has "doings" (for the rendering of קֶשֶׁר in 2 Sam. [LXX. 2 Kings] xv. 12 by διαβούλιον, see Field, 'Hex.' ad loc.). We infer that the use of διαβούλιον and of יצר in that sense was post-biblical, and, as regards the Greek term, we would suggest, Alexandrian. In omitting the word, the Syr. is probably faithful to the original. We farther mark that the Syr. order of the verses differs from the Greek, there being an inversion of vv. 6 and 7 as well as of clauses a and b in v. 9, while clause a of v. 8 is omitted. The Syriac order therefore is: vv. 7, 6, 8 b, 9 b, 9 a, these last three clauses forming Syr. v. 8, then v. 9, which is v. 10 of the A. V. The Vulgate, it must be remembered, represents in Ecclesiasticus the ancient Latin Version (Vet. Lat.). See the Introd. It omits v. 5 and adds a clause both at the beginning and the end of v. 6 (in A. V.). It also inserts a clause between a and b in v. 7, and adds a clause to, while it generally confirms, vv. 8–10 (in our A. V.). Lastly, the reading of A. V. differs from that of the Vatican, which we are throughout following. From all this we infer that the text of these verses has been altered, probably by successive "hands," from philosophical and theological motives, which, so far as vv. 5–7 are concerned, will be easily understood. On the whole, we prefer the Syr. arrangement of the verses.

to understand.] Perhaps, to consider.

7. Omit "withal."

9, 10. Verse 9 is omitted in the LXX. (Vatic.), while v. 10 reads as follows: And they shall praise His holy Name [in the Syr. only: "And that they may praise His holy Name"] that they may declare (tell) the greatnesses of His works (μεγαλεῖα = גְּדֻלּוֹת, Ps. lxxi. 19). Here—or perhaps at the next verse—begins a new stanza.

11. He gave them besides.] But we are inclined, in accordance with the Syr., to emend προσέθηκεν into προέθηκεν: he set before them. This would suit the context much better.

and made them inherit a law of life.] Houbigant understands this as an allusion to the Law of Nature in man. But this seems incompatible with clause a and with v. 12, both of which—as we understand them, and as the original no doubt intended—would point to the Law of Moses. But we suspect that some alterations were purposely made in this verse by the younger Siracide. The Syr. has "covenant," and we suspect that the younger Siracide purposely changed the ברית, "covenant," of the original into "wisdom," ἐπιστήμη, in order to give the verse a more general, Alexandrian sense. Similarly the Syr. has in the second clause "He taught them" (perhaps הוֹדִיעָם), which was changed into "made them inherit," as if it were a general human inheritance. Thus Houbigant may, after all, have rightly indicated the intention of the Greek translator, though not the meaning of the original.

12. This verse confirms our previous interpretation. "His judgments," in the sense of the Hebrew מִשְׁפָּטָיו = laws, commandments, ordinances.

13. Here it is no longer open to doubt that the reference is to the revelation on Sinai. "The majesty of his glory,"—rather, the greatness of the glory (omitting "his");

B. C. cir. 200.

his glory, and their ears heard his glorious voice.

14 And he said unto them, Beware of all unrighteousness; and he [e]gave every man commandment concerning his neighbour.

15 [f]Their ways are ever before him, and shall not be hid from his eyes.

16 Every man from his youth is given to evil; neither could they make to themselves fleshy hearts for stony.

17 For [g]in the division of the nations of the whole earth he set a [h]ruler over every people; but [i]Israel is the Lord's portion:

18 Whom, [k]being his firstborn, he nourisheth with discipline, and giving him the light of his love doth not forsake him.

B. C. cir. 200.

19 [l]Therefore all their works are as the sun before him, and his eyes are continually upon their ways.

20 None of their unrighteous deeds are hid from him, but all their sins are before the Lord.

21 But the Lord being gracious, and knowing his workmanship, [m]neither left nor forsook them, but spared them.

22 The [n]alms of a man is as a signet with him, and he will keep the good deeds of man [o]as the apple of the eye, and give repentance to his sons and daughters.

[e] Exod. 20, & 21, & 22, & 23.
[f] ch. 15. 19. ver. 19. Hebr. 4. 13.
[g] Deut. 32. 8, 9.
[h] Rom. 13. 1.
[i] Deut. 4. 20. & 10. 15.
[k] Exod. 4. 22.
[l] ver. 15.
[m] Deut. 31. 6.
[n] ch. 29. 12, 13.
[o] Ps. 17. 8.

and again in the second clause, and the glory of their voice [sound = their glorious sound] heard their ear. Many authorities correct αὐτῶν, "their" [after φωνῆς], into αὐτοῦ, "His," and the Syr. has the same reading. But there seems no need for the correction. "Their" voice or sound was that of the commandments, v. 12, while they only saw "the greatness of glory," not "His" glory itself.

14. The reference seems to be to the chapters following the ten commandments, especially Ex. xxi., xxii.

15. This verse sets forth the final inference from all as regards Israel's personal responsibility, in answer to the objections mentioned in Ecclus. xvi. 17, &c.

16. The whole verse must be omitted. It is so evidently an interpolation and of late, probably Christian, authorship, that it is difficult to understand its insertion.

17. Omit "For in the division of the nations of the whole earth." Fritzsche regards the "rulers" whom God had set over each nation as their guardian angels, through whom He stood in some relationship to "every people," and he refers in corroboration to LXX. Deut. xxxii. 8 and Heb. ii. 5. The latter passage has not any reference to this subject, nor does even the former bear out the contention of Fritzsche, since the parallelism between the verse in Ecclus. and that in LXX. Deut. is, to say the least, extremely doubtful. It is indeed true that the LXX. rendering of Deut. xxxii. 8 reproduces the tradition in the Jer. Targ. on Gen. xi. 7, 8, where the "We" who came down to confound the languages and to scatter the people are explained to be the seventy angels, having reference to the seventy nations who would be formed (comp. also Pirqé d. R. El. 24). In the later Midrash this is further developed, and God not only assigns to the nations their bounds "according to the number of the angels of God" (LXX. Deut.), but these angel-princes are protectors of the nations, hostile to Israel, and shall ultimately be cast down (Ber. R. 56; Shem. R. 21; Vayy. R. 29; Ruth R. ed. Warsh. p. 36 b). But in Ecclus. there is as yet not any mention of such hostility to Israel on the part of the "angel-princes," nor even a clear indication of the legend underlying the LXX. gloss on Deut. and the Jer. Targum. When to this we add that Michael was similarly regarded as the "Angel-prince" of Israel, we are inclined to regard "the rulers" of Ecclus. xvii. 17 as secular princes, and the reference —if any—to be to Deut. xxxii. 8, 9 in the Hebrew. And words of comfort like these would be very appropriate in the political condition of Israel in the time of the older Siracide.

18. This verse must be omitted.

19. Omit "therefore."

20. Their unrighteous deeds are not hid from Him, and all their sins are before the Lord.] The Syr.: "and open before Him are all their thoughts"—perhaps more true to the original, or else by way of softening it.

21. This verse must be omitted.

22. The last clause after "apple of the eye" must be omitted. From the nation the writer passes to the individual. Although Israel as a people may suffer for their sins, yet there are the righteous among them. We have here clear indication of the later doctrine of

B. C. cir. 200.

23 [p]Afterwards he will rise up and reward them, and render their recompence upon their heads.

24 [q]But unto them that repent, he granted them return, and comforted those that failed in patience.

25 [r]Return unto the Lord, and forsake thy sins, make thy prayer before his face, and ‖ offend less.

26 Turn again to the most High, and turn away from iniquity: for he will lead thee out of darkness into ‖ the light of health, and hate thou abomination vehemently.

27 [s]Who shall praise the most High in the grave, instead of them which live and give thanks?

28 Thanksgiving perisheth from the dead, as from one that is not: the living and sound in heart shall praise the Lord.

29 How great is the lovingkindness of the Lord our God, and his compassion unto such as turn unto him in holiness!

30 For all things cannot be in men, because the son of man is not immortal.

[p] Matt. 25. 34, 35.
[q] Acts 3. 19.
[r] Jer. 3. 12.
‖ Or, lessen thy offence.
‖ Or, illumination.
[s] Ps. 6. 5. & 115. 17. Isai. 38. 18, 19. Baruch 2. 17.

the meritoriousness of "good works," especially of "almsgiving." Altogether the verse forms a later Judaic paraphrase, or rather transformation, of Deut. xxxii. 10. It is now "almsgiving" which is precious as "the signet" on the hand, and which God guards as carefully as the apple of the eye. Nothing can annul what that signet has sealed; nothing shall disturb or dim that eye. The meaning which we attach to this verse is confirmed by the paraphrastic Syr. rendering: "The righteousness [merit] of all the sons of men is sealed and deposited with Him, and the goodness of all the sons of men is as the apple of the eye preserved before Him."

23. From the use of the expression "and render their recompence upon their own heads," which is not only exactly parallel to Joel iii. (Heb. iv.) 6, 7, but reproduces the wording of the LXX., we conclude that this verse refers not to the subject of v. 22, but to the punishment of the wicked. With this agrees the Syr.: "and return [give] their sins (in the Heb. it was probably גְּמוּלָם; comp. also Ps. xxviii. 4) upon their head."

24. granteth . . . comforteth . . . fail in confidence.] That is, those whose hope or confidence of forgiveness faileth. The Syr. either misread or misunderstood the original.

25. Last stanza. and offend less.] Rather: and lessen (the occasion for) offence; lit., "the stumble." The word πρόσκομμα is used in that sense (although for different Hebrew words) in LXX. Ex. xxiii. 33, xxxiv. 12; Is. viii. 14, xxix. 21; and in N. T. Rom. ix. 32, 33, xiv. 13, 20; 1 Cor. viii. 9; 1 Pet. ii. 8. Substantially, therefore, the advice is to avoid what would lead to sin. The Syr. had here either a different text, or altered the original. Or it may be that the younger Siracide had modified it in his own fashion. The Greek is certainly feeble as compared with the Syriac.

26. The clause beginning "for he will lead thee," and ending "into the light of health," must be omitted.

27, 28. grave.] Rather, Hades.

thanks . . . thanksgiving.] Rather, praise. Verses 27 and 28*a* seem again to imply a denial of personal immortality. On the other hand, the Syr. has: "For what delight hath the Lord in all those who perished in the world instead of them who live and render praise to Him?" Does the Greek text represent an alteration on the part of the younger Siracide, or is the Syr. version a Christian emendation? After "sound" in v. 28 omit the words "in heart." The gloss may have been intended to mitigate what might seem offensive in the original, while the limitation of "praise" to corporeal and temporal benefits is quite in the spirit of at least the younger Siracide.

29. Omit as glosses, similar in character to that just noticed, in clause a, "our God;" and in clause b, "in holiness."

30. The first clause in the Greek gives no meaning. If we were to alter πάντα into ταῦτα, it would agree with the Syr. and the sense would be: "For these things are not in man." But this does not fit in either with what precedes or with what follows. It seems not unlikely that the Hebrew original was כִּי לֹא אֵל בְּאָדָם or אֱנוֹשׁ—"for the Lord is not as man," and that the younger Siracide misread כל for אל and בְּאָדָם for כְּאָדָם (comp. Horowitz, in Frankel's 'Monatschr.' xiv. p. 198). If we may thus account for the first clause by a misreading of the Hebrew, it is not easy to explain the second clause. It accords indeed with the first clause in the Greek, but we can scarcely imagine that it faithfully represents the original. Can it have been intended to convey the same meaning as vv. 27, 28 a—or else to attenuate that meaning

B. C. cir. 200.

31 [t]What is brighter than the sun? yet the light thereof faileth: and flesh and blood will imagine evil.

32 He vieweth the power of the height of heaven; and all men are but earth and ashes.

[t] Job 25. 5, 6.

CHAPTER XVIII.

4 God's works are to be wondered at. 9 Man's life is short. 11 God is merciful. 15 Do not blemish thy good deeds with ill words. 22 Defer not to be justified. 30 Follow not thy lusts.

HE that liveth for ever [a]created all things in general.

B. C. cir. 200.

2 The Lord only is righteous, and [b]there is none other but he,

[a] Gen. 1. 1.
[b] Deut. 4. 35.

3 Who governeth the world with the palm of his hand, [c]and all things obey his will: for he is the King of all, by his power [d]dividing holy things among them from profane.

[c] ch. 42. 23.
[d] Lev. 10. 10.

4 To whom hath he given power to declare his works? [e]and who shall find out his noble acts?

[e] Ps. 106. 2.

by a vague generality? The Syr. has: "nor is his counsel like that of the sons of flesh."

31. Whether we adopt the Greek or the Syriac version of v. 30, v. 31 is evidently intended to set forth in contrast to the greatness and goodness of God the inherent weakness of the creature: What is more shining [more brilliant] than the sun? yet even this is obscured: and an evil man will think of flesh and blood. Fritzsche translates: "taketh flesh and blood into consideration," and regards it as referring to a moral obscuration. But this explanation is not satisfactory. For in that case we should have the inapt comparison of the natural obscuration of the light of the sun with the voluntary moral obscuration of the wicked. Our A. V. adopts the Alex. reading, which must be regarded as an attempt at emendation. The Syr. paraphrases. Horowitz (u. s.) conjectures that the Hebrew original was: אף כי מחשבות אנוש בישר ודם, "how much more the thoughts of man who is flesh and blood;" or else, on a like supposition, אף כי יצר אדם הרע בישר ודם, "how much more the evil imagining of man who is flesh and blood." If so, the Greek translator might have treated the substantive יצר as a verb, and interpreted it by "meditateth," or "imagineth."

32. He surveys the host of the height of heaven, and men, all [of them], are earth and ashes.] We have rendered δύναμιν by "the host," supposing the original to have been חֵיל or חַיִל, which is generally rendered in the LXX. by δύναμις. The Syr. has: "He judgeth the host of heaven, also the children of flesh . . ."

CHAPTER XVIII.

As is the case in other chapters, so here also the closing part of chap. xvii. becomes the subject of farther teaching in chap. xviii. It consists of two Parts: Part I., vv. 1–18; Part II., v. 19–end. Part I. contains three stanzas (6—originally 7? — + 7 + 4 verses). The first stanza (vv. 1–7) sets forth the greatness of God relatively to man; the second stanza (vv. 8–14), the smallness of man relatively to God in His greatness and goodness; while the third stanza (vv. 15–18) admonishes man in his own way to imitate the goodness of God. This forms the transition to Part II., which deals with man. Here also we have three stanzas (7 + 4 + 4 verses), which may be thus summarized: stanza 1 (vv. 19–25), man relatively to God; stanza 2 (vv. 26–29), general inferences; stanza 3 (vv. 30–33), moral application, or rather the commencement of a series of useful commonplace sayings.

1. The text seems here corrupt. The Syr. begins with what we number as v. 4. In the A. V. v. 3 must be omitted, so that the first stanza would only consist of six verses. But we would suggest that both vv. 1 and 2 must in the original have had a second clause, and that there is a lacuna between vv. 2 and 4. Thus stanza 1 may originally have consisted of seven verses.

in general.] Rather, generally. This in the sense of the world as a whole (comp. the use of κοινῇ in 2 Macc. ix. 26). We conjecture that if this verse was in the original Hebrew, it contained a strong assertion of the Divine creation of everything out of nothing, and that the younger Siracide, entertaining the Alexandrian notion of the pre-existence of matter, had modified it, but disguised this under the ambiguous expression κοινῇ, which might mean "together," "as a whole," or "generally."

2. The Lord alone shall be justified [perhaps: "declared righteous"].] This verse seems also fragmentary. We can only conjecture that it expressed an antithesis to the imperfectness and defects of all creatures. See under v. 5. The second clause in the A. V., "and there is none other but he," as well as v. 3, must be omitted.

4. To no one [so the better reading] gave He power to proclaim His works.] Schleusner: facultatem dedit, seu copiam fecit—

B. C. cir. 200.

5 Who shall number the strength of his majesty? and who shall also tell out his mercies?

6 As for the wondrous works of the Lord, there may nothing be taken from them, neither may any thing be put unto them, neither can the ground of them be found out.

7 When a man hath done, then he beginneth; and when he leaveth off, then he shall be doubtful.

8 What is man, and whereto serveth he? what is his good, and what is his evil?

B. C. cir. 200.

9 f The number of a man's days at the most are an hundred years. f Ps. 90. 10.

10 As a drop of water unto the sea, and a gravelstone in comparison of the sand; so are a g thousand years to the days of eternity. g Ps. 90. 4. 2 Pet. 3. 8.

11 Therefore is God patient with them, and poureth forth his mercy upon them.

12 He saw and perceived their end i.e. none of His creatures is able or sufficient for it; none is qualified fully to proclaim them. Fritzsche regards it as = ἐνεποίησε in Ecclus. xlii. 17. But although the two passages are parallel, the meaning of ἐμποιέω (in Ecclus. xlii.) is somewhat different from that of ἐκποιέω. The expression "to proclaim His works" is the same as in LXX. Ps. cvi. (Heb. cvii.) 22, although the idea is rather parallel to LXX. Ps. cv. (Heb. cvi.) 2. In the Syr.: "Who is able to shew forth—manifest, declare—His works?"

and who can search out His mighty acts?] The same word (as for "search out") is used in the LXX. both for דרשׁ and for חקר; "mighty acts," μεγαλεῖα, as in LXX. Ps. lxx. (Heb. lxxi.) 19: גְּדֻלּוֹת.

5. In the Syr. the Greek v. 4 (there v. 1) is followed (as v. 2) by what is fragmentarily preserved in the Greek v. 2: "The whole world shall be examined together, and the Lord alone be just." The Greek v. 5 is omitted in the Syr. "Number" = enumerate; "tell out" = set forth. In the Hebrew original the second clause (if genuine) may have been: מִי יוֹסִיף לְהַגִּיד חֲסָדָיו.

6. There is not [it is not possible] to make fewer [to diminish] nor to add to, nor is there (fully) to search out the wonderful works [נִפְלָאוֹת; generally—thirty-one times—so translated in the LXX.] of the Lord.

7. When a man hath ended, then he beginneth.] I.e. when he is at the end of his attempts to compute or understand, he is really only at the beginning of his task and of God's wonderful works.

and when he ceaseth [Bretschneider aptly, scil. opere peracto—when he gives up the search, rests from it], then is he perplexed.] I.e. astonied, confounded, in utter perplexity, viz. alike by what he cannot search out and by the multitude of the things opening to his view. The most apt rendering here is the Latin obstupescere. This not only answers to the Syr. rendering, but ἀπορέω is used in the same sense in the LXX. (see, for example, Gen. xxxii. 8 (LXX. 7), where it stands for וַיִּצַר לוֹ) and repeatedly in the N. T. The Syr. translates "when they return," instead of "when he ceaseth." Possibly the original may have been יָשַׁב, which the Greek translator rendered "when he ceaseth:" while the Syr. derived it from שׁוּב. The Greek gives a better sense.

8. This leads up to the second stanza about man. Instead of "whereto serveth he?" the Syr. has, "what is his defect and what his advantage?"—Heb. מַה חֶסְרוֹנוֹ וּמַה יִתְרוֹנוֹ —a word-play. Altogether a pessimist view of man and of life.

9. The number of days of a man [the duration of his life] many years, (if) an hundred.] Bretschneider quotes from Seneca, 'de brevit. vitae,' c. 3: "Pervenisse te ad ultimum aetatis humanae videmus: centesimus tibi, vel supra, premitur annus." But then the philosopher continues to shew how much has to be deducted from this age on account of trouble, illness, and needless or frivolous waste, so that the real span of life is after all very short (ed. Ruhkopf, i. pp. 497, 498).

10. As a drop of water out of the sea and a little stone out of the sand [the omission of the prepos. in the second clause is a Hebraism. See Winer, l. l., p. 373, &c.], so a few years in the day of eternity.] The Syr. here paraphrases in targumic manner.

11. Therefore is the Lord long-suffering towards them.] He bears with them in their sins. Bretschneider notes here the absence of any reference to another life. This appears especially in v. 12.

12. their end.] Καταστροφή is a rather stronger word than "end," and used sensu malo. The Hebrew had probably אַחֲרִיתָם, as in the Syr.

B. C. cir. 200.

to be evil; therefore he multiplied his compassion.

13 The mercy of man is toward his neighbour; [h]but the mercy of the Lord is upon all flesh: he reproveth, and nurtureth, and teacheth, and bringeth again, [i]as a shepherd his flock.

14 He hath mercy on them that receive discipline, and that diligently seek after his judgments.

15 [k]My son, blemish not thy good deeds, neither use uncomfortable words when thou givest any thing.

16 Shall not the dew asswage the heat? so is a word better than a gift.

17 Lo, is not a word better than a gift? but both are with a gracious man.

18 A fool will upbraid churlishly, and a gift of the envious consumeth the eyes.

19 Learn before thou speak, and use physick or ever thou be sick.

20 Before judgment [l]examine thyself, and in the day of visitation thou shalt find mercy.

[h] Ps. 145. 9.

[i] Jer. 31. 10.

[k] ch. 41. 22.

[l] 1 Cor. 11. 28, 31.

13. toward his neighbour.] The Syr., "him that is near in flesh:" this, in accordance with Rabbinic usage and ideas.

reproving, and disciplining, and teaching, and bringing back.] The reference is to God.

14. He hath mercy on them that accept discipline, and who hasten [make haste] after His ordinances.] Lit., "judgments," מישפטים—who submit to the discipline which He administers and become obedient. The Syr. here substitutes: "Happy they who hope in His compassion and they who receive [approve] His judgments."

15. Third stanza: see Introd.

Son, add not blame in thy good deeds.] Lit., give not blame, viz. joining words of reproach to benefits bestowed—a not uncommon mode of pharisaic churlishness. The opposite characteristic in the gifts of God in St. James i. 5—one of the many parallelisms between that Ep. and Ecclus. (see General Introd.).

nor with [in] every gift sadness [mourning] of words.] I.e. words that cause sadness. The Syr. evidently misunderstood this verse. The sentiment is truly Jewish in the best sense.

16. heat.] Perhaps "scorching east-wind:" in that case it would mean that it restores what such east-wind, קָדִים, "has scorched" (see Grimm, 'Lex. in l. N. T.' sub καύσων).

17. a word.] Viz. a good, kind word.

better than a gift.] In the Hebrew probably: טוֹב מִמַּתָּן. The Talmud contains many similar statements. Thus Sukk. 19*b*: Alms are rewarded only according to the graciousness which accompanies them. In 'Jer. Peah,' viii. 9, it is pointed out that in Ps. xli. 1 it is said, "Blessed is he that considereth" (not "that giveth to") "the poor." In 'Babh. B.' 9*b* we read that he that gave to the poor a Perutah (the smallest coin) was blessed with six blessings (according to Is. lviii. 8, 9), but he that comforted them with words was blessed with eleven blessings (according to Is. lviii. 10–12). Lastly, in 'Ab. de R. Nath.' xiii. we are told that if one bestowed on another all the gifts in the world, but with an unpleasant countenance, it would be reckoned as if he had not given anything, while if a man received his neighbour with a pleasant face, even if he gave him nothing, it would be reckoned as if he had bestowed on him all the gifts in the world.

but.] Rather, and.

gracious.] The same expression in St. Luke i. 28.

18. A fool will upbraid ungraciously, and the gift of a churl [βάσκανος, Ecclus. xiv. 3, and often—here not exactly = envious, but corresponding to the German scheelsüchtig, misgünstig] melteth the eyes.] Not, as Fritzsche understands it: "causeth weeping," but as in Job xxxi. 16, for כָּלָה; here possibly מְכַלֶּה עֵינַיִם—"consumeth the eyes," perhaps in the sense of their looking and longing in vain.

19. This verse begins the second Part.

use physick.] Rather, attend to thy health, or else get thee medicine. The Syr.: "before thou fightest procure for thyself an helper, and before thou art sick a physician."

20. Before judgment.] Here evidently that of God, whether the controversy be between Him and man, or between man and man.

and in the hour of visitation thou shalt find reconciliation.] Syr.: "Before adversity comes upon thee, pray, and in the hour of adversity thou shalt find it, and it will procure favour for thee." The meaning

B. C. cir. 200.

21 [m]Humble thyself before thou be sick, and in the time of sins shew repentance.

22 [n]Let nothing hinder thee to pay thy vow in due time, and defer not until death to be justified.

23 Before thou prayest, prepare thyself; and be not as one that tempteth the Lord.

24 [o]Think upon the wrath that shall be at the end, and the time of vengeance, when he shall turn away his face. B. C. cir. 200. [o] ch. 7. 17, 36.

25 When thou hast enough, remember the time of hunger: and when thou art rich, think upon poverty and need.

26 From the morning until the

[m] ch. 7. 17.
[n] Deut. 23. 21. Eccles. 5. 4.

of the Greek is, that if a man thus makes timely self-examination, and combines with it humiliation and repentance, judgment will not descend upon him.

22. The second clause may refer to the practice of delaying to perform a vow till just before death, and then discharging his obligation, and thereby becoming "justified," that is, escaping punishment.

In general ירש. 19–21 are strictly Judaic and find their parallel in Rabbinic writings. Thus we read ('Jer. Taan.' iii. 6, p. 9 a): "Honour thy physician before thou hast need of him." In the Midrash it is quoted as a proverb (Shem. R. 21), and explained to mean that we are to worship and to entreat God before we are overtaken by sickness or adversity (comp. Ecclus. xxxviii. 1). In another place (Shabb. 32 a) we find this: "Ever let a man seek mercy before he is ill. For when he becomes sick they say to him: Shew thy merits, and thou shalt be delivered." In Sanh. 44 b we read: "Ever let a man pray before adversity comes." Again in Nedar. 41 a it is said: "The sick does not rise from his sickness till all his sins are forgiven him;" and in 'Babh. K.' 46 b, "There is no medicament like the medicine of prayer and of the Law." Other passages might be quoted from the tractate 'Berakhoth,' setting forth the connexion of prayer and humiliation with the healing of disease. The Syr. renders the passage somewhat differently, and as it seems to us, at any rate, paraphrastically.

23. Before thou vowest, prepare thyself.] That is, we are to consider whether the vow should be made, and whether we are prepared to perform it. In the Midrash 'Tanchuma' (Par. Vayyishlach, ed. Warsh. p. 43 b) this saying of Ben Sira is quoted as follows: "Before thou vowest, prepare thy vow lest thou be [or, that thou be not] as one that causeth to err." This agrees with the Syr., which, however, renders the second clause: "and be not as a man that tempteth his lord"—possibly altering the אדני of the Hebrew original into אדניו. But from the quotation in 'Tanchuma' it would rather seem that neither the one nor the other word was in the original. The passage is evidently based on Eccles. v. 4, 5, with which it is brought into connexion in 'Tanchuma.'

24. The Syr. here paraphrases what the translator either did not or else would not understand.

Remember [think upon the] wrath in the days of the end [death?], and the time of retribution in the turning away [or hiding] of the countenance.] Viz. when God shall turn away or hide His countenance. This rendering is established by the use of the similar expressions in LXX. Deut. xxxi. 18, on which, indeed, the saying of the Siracide seems founded. Comp. for the expression also Deut. xxxii. 20 and other passages. (In general we mark the frequent reference in Ecclus. to LXX. Deut.) The verse under consideration has been generally understood as referring to the time of a man's death: "the days of the end" = "the days of death." But in that case we should have expected the singular, not the plural: "in the day," as in Ecclus. xi. 26, not "in the days." Accordingly we would suggest that the expression refers not to "death," but represents the Hebrew אַחֲרִית: that which cometh afterwards, the end, in later Heb. especially the future. Indeed, in LXX. Prov. xxiv. 14 אחרית is rendered by τελευτή. Thus the meaning of the verse would be: remember the wrath in the days hereafter, in the future, in the end, and that there will be a time of tribulation when He turneth away His countenance. We would farther suggest that the reference is primarily to the making of vows by which God is provoked (v. 24), and secondarily to all sins of rashness. Thus it would, in the strictest sense, be a paraphrase of Eccles. v. 6, which should be rendered (not as in the A. V., nor as in the R. V., but): "Suffer not [cause not] thy mouth to bring punishment upon thy flesh."

25. Remember the time of hunger in the time of satiety, (and) poverty and need in the days of wealth.] Here also the reference seems primarily to vows rashly made in a season of prosperity without bearing in mind the future difficulties which this may involve. Besides, the verse may also be intended generally to enjoin the evening the time is changed, and all things are soon done before the Lord.

B. C. cir. 200.

27 [p] A wise man will fear in every thing, and in the day of sinning he will beware of offence: but a fool will not observe time.

28 Every man of understanding knoweth wisdom, and will give praise unto him that found her.

29 They that were of understanding in sayings became also wise themselves, and poured forth exquisite parables.

30 [q] Go not after thy lusts, but refrain thyself from thine appetites.

31 If thou givest thy soul the desires that please her, she will make thee a laughingstock to thine enemies that malign thee.

32 Take not pleasure in much good cheer, neither be tied to the expence thereof.

33 Be not made a beggar by banqueting upon borrowing, when thou hast nothing in thy purse: for thou shalt lie in wait for thine own life, and be talked on.

[p] Prov. 28. 14.

[q] Rom. 6. 5. & 13. 14.

CHAPTER XIX.

2 Wine and women seduce wise men. 7 Say not all thou hearest. 17 Reprove thy friend without anger. 22 There is no wisdom in wickedness.

need of timely preparation for the future. The Rabbis are urgent on the same topic, chiefly with the view of counselling preparation in this life for that which is to come: preparing during the week for the Sabbath; providing before setting out for the requirements of the journey, &c.

26. By a natural transition the writer passes to the rapidness of great changes and the consequent need of preparedness.

From morning to evening.] I.e. in the brief space between these two. For the expression, comp. Ruth ii. 7; Job iv. 20.

the time is changed.] We might almost incline to regard καιρός = tempus, in the sense of "weather," but it gives good sense even if we retain the ordinary rendering "time."

and all things are rapid before the Lord.] As the time quickly flieth—or else as the weather rapidly changes—from morning to evening, so all things are in their changeful occurrence rapid before God.

27. Omit "but a fool will not observe time."

A wise man will be careful [cautious] in every thing, and in the days of sins—i.e. in those in which sin abounds—will beware of offence [transgression].] The Syr. must here have had another text, since it conveys a different kind of lesson from the Greek.

28. The Syr. has: "Every wise man has to teach wisdom, and to render thanks to them that know her." It must be admitted that this fits in better with the following verse.

29. They who are of understanding in sayings—who understand their meaning—become also wise themselves—probably: also display their wisdom, and pour forth exquisite proverbs.] Their wisdom shews itself in this.

30. This verse is headed in the Greek text by the words: "Mastery (control) over the soul." This can scarcely have been in the original, and probably slipped from the margin into the text. It is therefore all the more remarkable that there should be an indication of this inscription in the Syr.—unless, indeed, the translator, or a later "hand," had the Greek before him. The heading itself is not inapt. In all probability the writer intended to begin with v. 30 the exquisite commonplaces or proverbs to which reference was made in v. 29.

but.] Rather, and.

31. If thou ministerest [suppliest] to thy soul the pleasure [gratification] of desire [appetite, passion], it will make thee, &c.] Omit the words: "that malign thee." A man who gives the reins to his desires will soon become a laughing-stock to his enemies.

32. Delight not in much luxuriousness, nor suffer thyself to be bound to its association.] So literally; the purport being to warn against being drawn into association with, or the society of, bons vivans. Συμβολή, in the LXX. always for חִבָּרָה or כִּיחֻבָּרָה — "Luxuriousness," not merely in the pleasures of the table, but including all the wantonness of which this formed part.

33. banqueting.] The expression refers to having a share in joint banquets. Philo ('de Ebr.,' § 6, ed. Mang. i. p. 360) makes curious reference to such joint feasts, and in haggadic manner traces the word συμβολοκοπέω to a connexion between συμβολαί, the contributions to these feasts, and κόπτω, "I strike," "wound," "smite." The last clause in the A. V. after "thy purse" must be omitted. The Syr. paraphrases or rather is a Targum on the verse.

B. C. cir. 200.

A LABOURING man that is given to drunkenness shall not be rich: and he that contemneth small things shall fall by little and little.

[a] Gen. 9. 21. & 19. 32. &c. [b] 1 Kings 11. 1, 4.

2 [a]Wine and [b]women will make men of understanding to fall away: and he that cleaveth to harlots will become impudent.

3 Moths and worms shall have him to heritage, and a bold man shall be taken away. B. C. cir. 200.

4 [c]He that is hasty to give credit is lightminded; [d]and he that sinneth shall offend against his own soul. [c] Josh. 22. 11. [d] Prov. 8. 36.

5 Whoso taketh pleasure in wickedness shall be condemned: but he that resisteth pleasures crowneth his life.

6 He that can rule his tongue

CHAPTER XIX.

From what seems a confusion in the text of vv. 3–5, it is not easy to arrange the chapter. But its general subject seems an admonition to carefulness: first in reference to sinful indulgence (vv. 1–3 of A. V.); secondly, in regard to what we listen to, and say (vv. 4–12 of A. V.), and what we credit (vv. 13–17). Then follows a caution as regards true and false wisdom, and what hypocritically assumes the appearance of wisdom (vv. 20–28); the last two verses forming a general conclusion (vv. 29, 30).

1. This verse connects itself with the close of the previous chapter.

and he that despiseth the few things —either he who is not careful over the few things which he hath, or else he who freely spends what in itself seems little, small sums —shall speedily [soon] fall, in the sense of being ruined. The Syr. has: "he that loveth flesh shall inherit poverty." It is difficult to account for this: the Greek seems more congruous with the first clause of v. 1; the Syr. with v. 2.

2. fall away.] Viz. from God: "will become impudent;" rather, will be more reckless (daring, audacious), viz. than those referred to in the first clause.

3. moths.] In the wider sense of insects of that kind (maggots).

and a reckless soul shall be destroyed.] Several considerations seem to suggest corruption in the text. Thus the description of him that cleaveth to harlots as more reckless seems strange, while the second clause of v. 3 is not only needless, but weakens the first clause. Accordingly it has been suggested that the words "will be more reckless" (τολμηρότερος) have somehow intruded from the second clause of v. 3 (ψυχὴ τολμηρά), and that the verse should read: "he that cleaveth to harlots, moths and worms shall have him to heritage." This would be parallel to such passages as Prov. v. 5; vii. 26, 27; ix. 18. But in that case it would also seem necessary to strike out the second clause of v. 3, as now doubly incongruous. That clause may originally have been a marginal gloss, which somehow crept into the text, and then in turn gave rise to the intrusion of τολμηρότερος ἔσται in v. 2. The alterations thus made may seem extensive, but they are in accordance with the Syr., which has: "and he that cleaveth to whoredom shall perish."

4. The writer now passes to an entirely different subject, which is connected with the verses following.

He that hastily [quickly] trusteth [giveth credence]—who is hasty to give trust and credence—is of a light mind.] The next clause presents difficulties. Its literal translation would be: and he that sinneth against his soul shall offend, or else be guilty. This, rather than the somewhat unnatural arrangement of the words adopted in the A. V. and by Fritzsche. But in any case it is difficult to see the connexion between this and the first clause of the verse. As in the LXX. the expression "against his own soul" is rendered by εἰς τὴν ἑαυτοῦ ψυχήν (LXX. Prov. xx. 2; comp. viii. 36) and not ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ, we might be inclined to suppose that the Son of Sirach had meant that one who sinned against the soul of another (not "his own") by lightly crediting a report was guilty of offence. But in the Book of Sirach ψυχὴ αὐτοῦ is also used for "his own soul." We would therefore suggest that the whole of this difficult clause was not in the original, but has somehow crept into the Greek text. And we are confirmed in this view by the circumstance that the Syr. substitutes for it: "he that condemneth himself, who shall justify him?"—which is an interpolation from x. 29, and is omitted in the Arabic Version.

5, 6. We notice, first, that clause 2 of v. 5 and clause 1 of v. 6 must be omitted. But even so the Greek text is evidently corrupt. Although generally unwilling to adopt extensive emendations, yet those proposed by Drusius are so reasonable and give such a good meaning that we accept them, although shall live without strife; and he that hateth babbling shall have less evil.

B. C. cir. 200.

[e] ch. 41. 23.

7 [e]Rehearse not unto another that which is told unto thee, and thou shalt fare never the worse.

‖ Or, of friend or foe.

8 Whether it be ‖to friend or foe, talk not of other men's lives; and if thou canst without offence, reveal them not.

B. C. cir. 200.

9 For he heard and observed thee, and when time cometh he will ‖ hate thee.

‖ Or, shew his hatred.

10 If thou hast heard a word, let it die with thee; and be bold, it will not burst thee.

they involve some difficulties. The present text runs: ὁ εὐφραινόμενος καρδίᾳ καταγνωσθήσεται—"he that rejoiceth in heart" [is of joyous heart (?)] "shall be condemned;" καὶ ὁ μισῶν λαλιὰν ἐλαττονοῦται κακίᾳ—"and he that hateth babbling shall have less evil." Even Fritzsche admits that nothing can be made of καρδίᾳ in the first clause. It is therefore easiest to suppose with Drusius that the καρδίᾳ of the first clause, and the κακίᾳ of the second, have been misplaced and must be interchanged. This gives a very good sense for the first clause: "He that taketh pleasure in evil shall be condemned," i.e. he whose delight it is to hear and spread evil. In the second clause a further emendation is required. Drusius supposes that the Hebrew text had שֹׁנֵא, "he that repeateth a thing," lit. a word, and that the translator misread it שֹׂנֵא, "he that hateth," and accordingly rendered "he that hateth babbling" (דבר). That the original had "he that repeateth" is confirmed by the Syr., which has the same word. The difficulties unsolved are the substitution of the א for the ה, and that in v. 7 what at first sight seem to have been the same Hebrew words (אַל תְּשַׁנֶּה דָּבָר) are correctly rendered in the Greek: μηδέποτε δευτερώσῃς λόγον (but see v. 7). Still the suggestion of Drusius offers the only satisfactory emendation of the verse. We have little doubt that the same inattention or ignorance which appears in the rendering "he that hateth babbling," also led to the strange error of literally translating חֲסַר לֵב by ἐλαττονοῦται καρδίᾳ. Thus corrected, the second clause in the Hebrew may have read as follows: וְשֹׁנֵא דבר (בדבר) חֲסַר־לֵב; and the whole verse (vv. 5, 6 in A. V.) would have to be thus rendered: He that taketh pleasure in evil shall be condemned; and he that repeateth a matter is wanting in understanding.

7. Never repeat a speech [a word], and thou shalt fare never the worse.] Thus in the Greek. In the Syriac the last clause reads: "and no one shall revile thee." The Greek evidently took the root to be חָסַר, while the Syr. derived the word from חָסַד in the Piel, "to revile." Which of these was correct? We incline to the Syr., which would be a virtual adaptation of Prov. xxv. 9 b, 10 a. If we were conjecturally to reconstruct it according to that passage, the Hebrew of v. 7 may have differed from that in v. 6 (see above), and perhaps have run as follows: אַל־תְּגַל דָּבָר [וְלֹא] פֶּן־יַחַסְדְּךָ אִישׁ, "reveal not a matter [we prefer giving דבר the wider meaning of "matter," rather than "word" or "speech"] lest man revile thee;" or if וְלֹא, "and no one shall revile thee." But perhaps the construction may have been somewhat different.

8. Our conjecture of the derivation of v. 7 from Prov. xxv. 9 b, 10 a, is strengthened by v. 8, which would be an enlargement of the advice in Prov.—in fact, we have the אל תגל in the μὴ ἀποκάλυπτε at the close of the verse. The Syr. has here something quite different—whether by way of "targum" or otherwise, it is impossible to say. But we cannot suppose that it gives a correct representation of the Hebrew text, if only because it does not in any wise fit into the context. The Greek text runs: Relate not [viz. a speech, or any matter] whether to friend or to foe [an enlargement on Prov. xxv. 9], and, unless sin [fault, blame] attach to thee, reveal (it) not, i.e. either in the sense that blame or guilt would be imputed or else that it would really accrue, in which cases it would be duty to disclose a matter.

9. The Syr. has: "lest he that heareth thee hateth thee, and regard thee as an harmful person." This seems a closer paraphrase of Prov. xxv. 10 than the Greek text. But the whole section to the end of v. 12 bears evident reference to that passage. The verse reads: For he heareth thee, and is on his guard against thee; and on occasion [when occasion arises] he will hate thee; he will not only feel, but shew hatred. Grotius aptly: occasione exacta odium tui monstrabit.

10. Hast thou heard a thing? [lit. "a word," but λόγον here = דבר]. Let it die with thee. Take courage! [cheer up.] It will not burst thee.] For this latter the Syr. uses another illustrative figure.

B. C. cir. 200.

11 A fool travaileth with a word, as a woman in labour of a child.

12 As an arrow that sticketh in a man's thigh, so is a word within a fool's ‖ belly.

‖ Or, heart.

13 [f] Admonish a friend, it may be he hath not done it: and if he have done it, that he do it no more.

[f] Lev. 19. 17. Matt. 18. 15.

14 ‖ Admonish thy friend, it may be he hath not said it: and if he have, that he speak it not again.

‖ Or, Reprove.

15 Admonish a friend: for many times it is a slander, and believe not every tale.

16 There is one that slippeth in his speech, but not ‖ from his heart; and who is he that hath not offended with his [g] tongue?

‖ Or, willingly.

B. C. cir. 200.

17 ‖ Admonish thy neighbour before thou threaten him; and not being angry, give place to the law of the most High.

[g] ch. 14. 1. & 25. 8. James 3. 2.

‖ Or, Reprove.

18 [h] The fear of the Lord is the first step ‖ to be accepted [of him,] and wisdom obtaineth his love.

[h] Prov. 1. 7. ch. 40. 26.

‖ Or, of receiving him.

19 The knowledge of the commandments of the Lord is the doctrine of life: and they that do things that please him shall [i] receive the fruit of the tree of immortality.

[i] Rev. 2. 7. & 22. 2, 14.

20 The fear of the Lord is all wisdom; and in all wisdom is the 11, 12. Two apt illustrations follow. "A fool will travail over [by reason of] a matter [ἀπὸ προσώπου λόγου = מִלְּפְנֵי דָבָר] as over an infant she that giveth birth. An arrow stuck in the fleshy thigh, so (is) a matter [lit. "word," as above] in the inside of a fool." In the Heb. (after the analogy of Ps. xl. 9) probably בְּתוֹךְ מֵעֵי סָכָל: this, rather than בְּלֵב, since לֵב is never rendered in the LXX. by κοιλία; or it may have been, though less probably, בְּקֶרֶב. The Syr.: "the thigh of a man."

13. The writer proceeds a step further. From warning against telling a thing, he goes on to caution against crediting a matter or else allowing it a permanent influence.

Cross-question a friend.] More than merely "question," and not exactly "admonish," = the German zurechtweisen, probably somewhat stronger than Fritzsche's zur Rede stellen: frequently in the LXX. = הוֹכִיחַ. The Syr. adds: "that he may not do evil." This would require in the Greek ποιήσῃ, instead of the ἐποίησε of the text.

and if he did something.] I.e. if he did any part, although perhaps not the whole of what is imputed to him, &c.

14. Cross-question [perhaps: "expostulate with"—and so in the following verses] a friend, perhaps he did not say (it) [the Syr. makes here an alteration in the verb similar to that in v. 13]; and if he has said (it), that he may not repeat (it) [say it again].] Fritzsche supposes that the subject of the admonition, alike in vv. 13 and 14, is "a friend," and that the difference lies in this, that in the one case his deed, in the other his speech, is the object of expostulation. Fritzsche reads with C, Sin., some MSS., the Syr., and Vet. Lat., "the neighbour" instead of "a friend." In that case the distinction seems to extend also to the persons—in the one case, a friend; and the admonition would be, that we should speak to a friend about what he is supposed to have done, and to a neighbour about what he is reported to have said.

15. Admonish.] Rather, cross-question; see v. 13.

16. There is that slippeth [omit "in his speech"]; but not from his soul.] The reference here seems not to sins of speech (Fritzsche), but to slips in outward conduct, which do not always proceed from inward badness, so that we must not in all cases judge the one from the other.

and who sinned not with his tongue?] Sins of deed do not necessarily imply a bad heart, and every one is guilty of sins of speech. Syr.: "For there is that sinneth but not from the heart, and there is that stumbleth but not with the tongue."

17. Omit in the second clause the words "not being angry."

Admonish [rather, cross-question] before thou threaten, and give place to the law of the most High.] Fritzsche understands this to mean that in doing as directed in the first clause we shall obey the law of God, as in Lev. xix. 17. But the phrase means, as in Rom. xii. 19, Eph. iv. 27, "to give free scope to a thing." Here: expostulate first, and, if needful, reprove and threaten; but beyond this allow the Law of God to take its course, give free course to it. Thus Rom. xii. 19 would really be a reference to this passage. The Syr. is here quite different.

18, 19. These verses must be omitted.

20. All wisdom is fear of the Lord;

B. C. cir. 200. performance of the law, and the knowledge of his omnipotency.

[k] Matt. 21. 29. 21 [k]If a servant say to his master, I will not do as it pleaseth thee; though afterward he do it, he angereth him that nourisheth him.

22 The knowledge of wickedness is not wisdom, neither at any time the counsel of sinners prudence.

23 There is a wickedness, and the same an abomination; and there is a fool wanting in wisdom.

24 He that hath small understanding, and feareth God, is better than B. C. cir. 200. one that hath much wisdom, and transgresseth the law of the most High.

25 There is an exquisite subtilty, and the same is unjust; and there is one that turneth aside to make judgment appear; and there is a wise man that ‖justifieth in judgment. ‖ Or, judgeth.

26 There is a wicked man that hangeth down his head ‖sadly; but inwardly he is full of deceit, ‖ Or, in black.

27 Casting down his countenance, and in all wisdom (there) is doing [fulfilling, observance] of the Law.] The words that follow in the A. V. must be omitted. The writer naturally passes from reference to the Law of God to true wisdom, which is its fulfilment. As regards the expression "doing of the Law," we again mark a similar use in St. James i. 25 (comp. v. 22), and the parallelism extends beyond the wording to the reasoning. But in the form in which the saying appears in Ecclus. it is so Alexandrian that we instinctively turn to the Syr. This has: "The words of prophecy and all wisdom is the fear of the Lord [religion?], and the fear of God is wisdom." If we could accept this as representing or approximating to the true text, it would, first, imply a desire to combine the prophetic and the "Wisdom"-books of the Old Testament as constituting the substance of true religion; and thus, secondly, represent the via media in the combination of a moderate Hellenism with Palestinianism, before their separation and later antagonism; in short, what we consider to have been the peculiar theological standpoint of which the Book of Sirach is the expression. It is scarcely necessary to add that if we adopt the Syriac text, the Greek rendering must be regarded as an Alexandrian adaptation by the younger Siracide.

21. This verse must be omitted.

22. And wisdom is not knowledge of wickedness, nor is, where the counsel of sinners (is), prudence.] Or else, "there is no case where the counsel of sinners is prudence." Fritzsche omits ὅπου with the Alex.: "nor is the counsel of sinners prudence." The verse seems aptly to follow the reasoning of v. 20. The Syr. gives the sentiment in a concrete form: "He is not wise who is wicked," &c.

23. As the first clause yields no proper meaning, Fritzsche proposes to substitute for πονηρία, "wickedness," πανουργία, "cleverness," as in v. 25—supposing that πονηρία had crept in from the preceding verse. But there is little MS. support for this emendation. Besides, even if we were so to correct the first clause of the verse, a similar want of meaning exists in the second clause. On the other hand, it has been well suggested that a comparison with the Syr. shews that the word πονηρία, "wickedness," in the first clause, has been interchanged with σοφία, "wisdom," in the second clause. Thus corrected, the text reads: "There is a wisdom and it is an abomination, and there is a silly person who is without [free from] wickedness." With this the following verse agrees.

24. Better one inferior in understanding who feareth (the Lord) than one who excelleth [aboundeth] in cleverness and transgresseth the Law.] The Syr. is only a virtual repetition of the previous verse.

25. There is an exact [accurate, precise] prudence [subtilty], and it is unjust.] The outcome of this precise subtilty is not truth nor justice, but unrighteousness and injustice.

and there is that turneth aside (judgment) for the sake of making it appear judgment.] I.e. he not only makes his turning aside of judgment appear as if it were true judgment, but he is so subtle as to give to that which is really a turning aside of judgment the appearance of having been done for the sake of shewing forth judgment and vindicating the right. The clause is confessedly very difficult. We supply κρίμα after διαστρέφων; the same expression occurs in LXX. Ex. xxiii. 6 for הַטֵּה מִשְׁפַּט.

26. The transition is natural from the clever deceiver to the clever impostor. "There is that is wicked who is bowed down with sadness, and . . ."

27. He boweth down the face and

B. C. cir. 200.

and making as if he heard not: where he is not known, he will do thee a mischief before thou be aware.

28 And if for want of power he be hindered from sinning, yet when he findeth opportunity he will do evil.

29 A man may be known by his look, and one that hath understanding by his countenance, when thou meetest him.

[l] ch. 21. 20.

30 A man's attire, and [l] excessive laughter, and gait, shew what he is.

CHAPTER XX.

1 Of silence and speaking. 10 Of gifts and gain. 18 Of slipping by the tongue. 24 Of lying. 27 Of divers advertisements.

B. C. cir. 200.

THERE is a reproof that is not ‖ comely: again, some man holdeth his tongue, and he is wise.

‖ Or, season-able.

2 It is much better to reprove, than to be angry secretly: [a] and he that confesseth his fault shall be preserved from hurt.

[a] Prov. 28. 13.

3 How good is it, when thou art reproved, to shew repentance! for so shalt thou escape wilful sin.

4 As is the lust of an [b] eunuch to deflower a virgin; so is he that executeth judgment with violence.

[b] ch. 30. 20.

5 There is one that keepeth silence, and is found wise: and another by much babbling becometh hateful.

is deaf with one ear; when he is not observed [perceived], he will anticipate [surprise, prevent] thee.] The A. V. correctly gives the meaning of the writer.

29. By his look [i.e. by what is seen of him, as it were the impression made by his appearance — מִרְאֶה] shall a man be known, and one that hath understanding shall be known—occursu faciei—by the meeting of countenance.] I.e. by the manner in which his countenance is met, the expression it wears.

30. The Talmud also gives rules in regard to appearance and demeanour by which a man may be known. Two of those here mentioned—dress and gait—are referred to in Ber. 43 b. Comp. also the three things in which it is said that a man shews what is in him: in his cups, in his purse, and in his anger, to which is added as a fourth—in his merriment (Erubh. 65 b).

CHAPTER XX.

From the long parenthesis in chap. xix. 20–30 the writer returns to the topic of chap. xix. 13–17. The main subject discussed in chap. xx. seems to be that of speech. The various points in the reasoning are somewhat loosely connected—rather linked together than of one piece. But this is characteristic of the whole book. In the first eight verses the advantages and disadvantages of silence and speech are discussed; the moral being that it is impossible to lay down any absolute rule, and that sometimes what seems the worse is the better and more desirable, and vice versâ. This leads the writer into a series of other illustrations, vv. 9–13. With v. 14 the writer returns to his subject, treating of the silly man in his talk (vv. 14–17), of the unpleasant man in his conversation (vv. 18–20), of rashness, especially in speech (vv. 21–23), of false speaking (vv. 24–26), and lastly, of the bearing of the wise, whether as regards speech, silence, or conduct.

1. There is an expostulation [arguing, ἔλεγχος] which is not seasonable.] Ὡραῖος bears the twofold sense of our word "seasonable,"—timely and seemly. As previously indicated, there is not an exact English equivalent for ἔλεγχος: it is not precisely admonition nor yet reproof, but that arguing which may imply either, or both, or on the other hand may fall short of them. The second clause is, if not quite literally, yet so forcibly rendered in the A. V. and so fully expresses the meaning of the writer that it had best be adopted, although for "again, some man" it will be better to substitute "and there is."

2. How much better to expostulate than to cherish anger.] Omit "his fault."

hurt.] Rather, damage. The Syr. has here something quite different.

Omit v. 3 in A. V.

4. We should be disposed to regard this as an interpolation, since, at first sight at least, it does not seem to fit into the context, but it occurs also in the Syr. If, however, we regard ποιεῖν κρίματα not as meaning to execute judgment, but, like עֲשָׂה מִשְׁפָּטִים, in the Heb. and in the LXX., as occasionally meaning "to do judgments," in the sense of doing what is righteous, it would yield a good sense: "so he that doeth judgments (but) in [by] violence." The point of comparison in the coarse illustration of clause 1 would then be the incongruity and impossibility of the attempt in both cases. If this be the correct view, v. 4 may be connected with the first clause of v. 2.

5. There is that keepeth silence who is found wise, and there is that is odious

B. C. cir. 200.

6 Some man holdeth his tongue, because he hath not to answer: and some keepeth silence, [c]knowing his time.

[c] Eccles. 3. 7.

[z] ch. 32. 4.

7 A wise man will hold his [d] tongue till he see opportunity: but a babbler and a fool will regard no time.

8 He that useth many words shall be abhorred; and he that taketh to himself authority therein shall be hated.

9 There is a sinner that hath good success in evil things; and there is a gain that turneth to loss.

10 There is a gift that shall not profit thee; and there is a gift whose recompence is double.

11 There is an abasement because of glory; and there is that lifteth up his head from a low estate.

B. C. cir. 200.

12 There is that buyeth much for a little, and repayeth it sevenfold.

13 [e]A wise man by his words maketh himself beloved: but the ‖ graces of fools shall be poured out.

[e] ch. 6. 5.

‖ Or, pleasant conceits.

14 The gift of a fool shall do thee no good when thou hast it; neither yet of the envious for his necessity: ‖ for he looketh to receive many things for one.

‖ Or, lost, or, spilt.

‖ Gr. for his eyes are many for one to receive.

15 He giveth little, and [f] upbraideth much; he openeth his mouth like a crier; to day he lendeth, and to morrow will he ask it again: such

[f] ch. 41. 22.

on account of [through] much talk.] "Found," probably נִמְצָא, and used in the same wide sense as = turn out, appear, be.

6. There is that is silent, because he hath not a reply; and there is that is silent, knowing the proper time [the opportunity, עֵת].] There is the silence of the foolish—because he has nothing to say; and there is the silence of the wise, who waiteth for the proper time and opportunity for speaking.

7. A wise man will be silent till the proper time, but a boaster and a fool will pass beyond the opportunity.] The one because he deems himself independent of opportunity, the other because he does not discern it.

8. and he that assumeth authority.] That is, he who speaks in an authoritative manner, as if every one must listen and obey.

9. There is prosperity in adversity [lit. "evils"] to a man [that is, as we understand it, what appears to be adverse may turn out for good], and there is a gain unto loss.

10. "Recompence" = return, גְּמוּל; "double," rather twofold. The Rabbis speak of certain good deeds, the fruit or interest of which is enjoyed in this world, while the capital itself still remaineth for the next world (Peah, i. 1; Shabb. 127 a; Qidd. 39 b, 40 a). But here it probably refers to the return which men make to us for our benefits. The Syr. of vv. 10 b and 11 is quite different.

11. There is loss [damage] on account of glory.] That is, a man may sustain loss or damage by reason of the glory which he either seeks after or attains unto.

from a low estate.] Out of a low estate, out of humiliation. The expression "there is" = there may be. The attainment of high estate may entail real loss, while sinking to a humble condition may issue in real exaltation. In all these matters outward or temporary appearance must not deceive us.

12. In the end it will cost him seven times the amount: "repayeth," יְשַׁלֵּם.

13. The wise man by his speech . . . but the amenities of fools shall be poured out.] That is, all the speeches and the like in which fools do their best to make themselves pleasant shall be like water, or some other fluid, that shall be poured away.

14. The middle clauses in A. V. must be omitted.

The gift of one [who is] senseless [silly, foolish — אויל, or else כסיל] shall not profit thee, for in his view [opinion, lit. his eyes—in the Heb. בְּעֵינָיו, "in his eyes," or it may have been בעיניו = כי עיניו] instead of one many.] I.e. he considers one thing as if they were many: not necessarily with a view to the return which he expects, but it is characteristic of certain persons that they look upon every little thing that they have or bestow as if it were an immense quantity, and so indefinitely multiply in their own minds any favour or benefit. This view is confirmed by the following verse. [We would here call attention to the Syr. and the Vet. Lat., both for their additions and the remarkable agreement between them, as specially noticed in the General Introduction, § VIII., when treating of the Vet. Lat.]

15. Omit the closing words "of God and man."

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200

an one is to be hated of God and man.

16 The fool saith, I have no friends, I have no thank for all my good deeds, and they that eat my bread speak evil of me.

17 How oft, and of how many shall he be laughed to scorn! for he knoweth not aright what it is to have; and it is all one unto him as if he had it not.

18 To slip upon a pavement is better than to slip with the tongue: so the fall of the wicked shall come speedily.

‖ Or, An unpleasant fellow.

19 ‖An unseasonable tale will always be in the mouth of the unwise.

B. C. cir. 200

20 A wise sentence shall be rejected when it cometh out of a fool's mouth; for he will not speak it in due season.

21 There is that is hindered from sinning through want: and when he taketh rest, he ‖shall not be troubled.

‖ Gr. shall not be pricked.

22 [g]There is that destroyeth his own soul through bashfulness, and by accepting of persons overthroweth himself.

[g] ch. 42. 1.

23 There is that for bashfulness promiseth to his friend, and maketh him his enemy for nothing.

24 [h]A lie is a foul blot in a man, yet it is continually in the mouth of the untaught.

[h] ch. 25. 2.

16. speak evil of me.] We should prefer rendering: are paltry [sorry] of tongue. Φαῦλος gives the idea of meanness rather than evil, and this suits the context very well, since a silly, boastful person who had an overweening opinion of himself would not complain that those who receive his benefits—eat his bread—speak evil of him, but that they do not make enough of him or of his good deeds, give him not sufficient public praise, are mean and sorry of speech.

17. Omit all after "laughed to scorn."

18. The subject of vv. 5 and following is now resumed, although tongue and speech have throughout been in the mind of the writer.

A slip [Slipping] on [because of, on account of] the ground rather than by [in] the tongue; so the fall of the wicked shall come speedily [quickly].] The idea seems to be: A slip on the ground brings a person to a sudden fall; but a slip as regards speech is far worse: he who committeth sins of speech may look for a sudden fall, far worse in every sense than the sudden downfall of a person who slips while he walks. The Syr. is quite different.

19. An ungracious man [is like] unseasonable talk [speech, saying]: in the mouth of the uncultured it will be continuous.] Viz. as unseasonable—not necessarily foolish or wrong—talk is continuous in the mouth of uncultured persons, so is an ungracious personage: even when in the right he is always mal à propos. This is followed out in the next verse.

20. A parable from the mouth of a fool shall be rejected [not necessarily because it is silly or false, but from this cause], for he speaketh it not in its season.] It is spoken unseasonably: so an ungracious person is always unseasonable in what he says and does, even if in itself it were right, and like an unseasonable saying he is rejected.

21. Silence from want of having anything proper to say may be preferable to unseasonable speech. This is illustrated by an analogous case.

There is that is hindered from sinning through want.] Lack of means prevents his sinning—just as a man may be silent because he has not anything to say. But what of that? So far from being a real disadvantage: and in his repose he shall not feel remorse. Once more the Syr. is, for one reason or another, not of any help to us.

22. On the other hand, there is false and wrong silence: "there is that through bashfulness destroyeth himself" (lit. his soul, נַפְשׁוֹ) = he is ashamed or afraid to speak out and ruins himself by such silence—"and through a silly face overthroweth himself." The Syr. has "by covering his face." This may be merely a Targum of the Hebrew, just as the Greek was probably a paraphrase of it—or there may have been a confusion of the roots כָּסָה, "to cover," and כָּסַל, "to be foolish."

23. Similarly bashfulness may lead a person by his silence to give the impression of having made a promise to a friend, and thereby turn him into an enemy "for nothing"—when there is really no cause for it.

24. in the mouth of the uncultured it will be continuous.] They will always tell and do lies.

B. C. cir. 200.

25 A thief is better than a man that is accustomed to lie: but they both shall have destruction to heritage.

26 The disposition of a liar is ‖dishonourable, and his shame is ever with him.

‖ Or, ignominy.

27 A wise man shall promote himself to honour with his words: and he that hath understanding will please great men.

28 [i]He that tilleth his land shall increase his heap: and he that pleaseth great men shall get pardon for iniquity.

Prov. 2. 11. & 28. 19.

29 [k]Presents and gifts blind the eyes of the wise, and ‖stop up his mouth that he cannot reprove.

[k] Exod. 23. 8. Deut. 16. 9.

‖ Or, as a muzzle in the mouth.

30 Wisdom that is hid, and treasure that is hoarded up, what profit is in them both?

B. C. cir. 200.

31 [l]Better is he that hideth his folly than a man that hideth his wisdom.

[l] ch. 41. 15.

32 Necessary patience in seeking the Lord is better than he that leadeth his life without a guide.

CHAPTER XXI.

2 Flee from sin as from a serpent. 4 His oppression will undo the rich. 9 The end of the unjust shall be nought. 12 The difference between the fool and the wise.

MY son, hast thou sinned? do so no more, but [a]ask pardon for thy former sins.

[a] Ps. 41. 4. Luke 15. 21.

2 Flee from sin as from the face

26. The Syr. has instead of what is rendered "disposition" the word "end." It has been suggested that the Heb. had אַחֲרִית, "the end," "what cometh after," and that the Greek misread it אֹרְחוֹת, "the paths;" in which case the Greek would have to be corrected: "The end of a liar is dishonour, and his shame is continuous with him." But it must be admitted that the Greek gives also a good sense and that it suits the context, while, on the other hand, the second clause in the Syr. shews that the rendering of the verse was paraphrastic, in which case we can understand the use of the word "end" for "paths," mode of life.

27. From sin and folly in speech, with their consequences, the writer again turns to wisdom in speech. The Vatican text has here again an inscription: "Sayings of Parables," or rather "Parabolic" or "Proverbial sayings." This has evidently crept into the text from the margin. It seems probable that these inscriptions represent an early attempt to arrange the somewhat loosely connected reasoning, especially in some parts, of this book under definite headings. "Shall promote himself" = make himself promoted.

and a prudent man will please the great [Bissell].] The morality of the sentiment is not very elevated. The Syr. is doubtful and at best paraphrastic.

28. and he that pleaseth the great shall atone for unrighteousness.] The point of comparison is successful labour: as regards the soil (comp. Prov. xii. 11) and as regards "the great"—in both cases it is not easy, but in both it will certainly yield a good return. The Syr. is quite different.

29. Presents [to guests—xenia, in Lat. as in Gr.] and gifts blind the eyes of the wise [all but the first word is a quotation from LXX. Deut. xvi. 19]; and, as a muzzle on the mouth, they turn away reproofs [Bissell].

30, 31. These verses occur again in xli. 14, 15. They may have been common sayings; but their repetition in the one or the other place is probably due to a marginal reference.

that is hoarded.] Rather, that is not seen, or, that does not appear. In either case, to be of use they must be brought forth.

he.] Lit. a man.

32. This verse in A. V. must be omitted.

CHAPTER XXI.

The writer returns in v. 1 to xix. 13 b. But it is difficult to perceive any orderly arrangement in this chapter, which is even more loosely strung together than others. It was perhaps on this ground that the marginal heading (see xx. 27) "Parabolic" or "Proverbial sayings" was chosen. We can, however, mark the antithetic description of the sinner and the righteous, and, side by side with it, of the wise and the fool. The best arrangement seems to be that of grouping the chapter into triplets of verses (v. 28 forming a general conclusion), in which case a progression of thought may be marked.

1. Comp. xix. 13 b. "Thy former:" viz. sins or else doings. Lit. entreat for thy former ones.

2. "As from the face of" = as from before, מִפְּנֵי נָחָשׁ. The danger of sin is illustrated by three figures: the serpent in its stealthy of a serpent: for if thou comest too near it, it will bite thee: the teeth thereof are as the teeth of a lion, slaying the souls of men.

B. C. cir. 200.

3 All iniquity is as a two edged sword, the wounds whereof cannot be healed.

4 To terrify and do wrong will waste riches: thus the house of proud men shall be made desolate.

[b] Exod. 3. 9. & 22. 23. Ps. 34. 6.

5 [b]A prayer out of a poor man's mouth reacheth to the ears of God, and his judgment cometh speedily.

B. C. cir. 200.

6 [c]He that hateth to be reproved is in the way of sinners: but he that feareth the Lord will [‖]repent from his heart.

[c] Prov. 12. 1. & 15. 10.

[‖] Gr. be converted.

7 An eloquent man is known far and near; but a man of understanding knoweth when he slippeth.

8 [d]He that buildeth his house with other men's money is like one and unobserved approach; the lion with his destructive teeth; and the two-edged sword with its incurable wounds.

[d] Jer. 22. 13.

too near.] Rather, near.

slaying.] Perhaps a somewhat too strong expression.

souls.] Here in the sense of the Heb. נֶפֶשׁ, and not in that which in English commonly attaches to the word. The Syr. text is corrupt.

3. Every transgression (is) as a two-edged sword: for the wound thereof there is not healing.

4. Second triplet. Terrifying and violence—the one perhaps referring to words, the other to deeds, or else: violence and outrage.

so the house of the proud shall be made desolate.] "The proud" are the Heb. גְּאִים, in the O. T. sense of "proud," which implies ungodliness. In fact, the clause is a reproduction of Prov. xv. 25, although the LXX. there renders בֵּית גְּאִים by οἴκους ὑβριστῶν.

5. The prayer of the poor (reacheth) from the mouth [viz. of the petitioner] to his ears [viz. those of the proud].] The A. V. and some interpreters refer the "his" to God, and would have us translate: "The prayer out of the mouth of a poor man reacheth to His ears," viz. those of God. But, first, "out of the mouth of the poor" would have been ἐκ στόματος πτωχοῦ; secondly, prayers that reach not "to" but "into" the ears of God are in the LXX. not rendered by ἕως, which cannot mean "to" in the sense of "into," but "up to," the loci terminus ad quem. The LXX. in such cases uses εἰς, as in LXX. Ps. xvii. 7, εἰς τὰ ὦτα αὐτοῦ, or else the writer would have chosen such an expression as in Ps. xxxiv. 15 (LXX. Ps. xxxiii. 16), with which his thought would have been strictly parallel. Lastly, the αὐτοῦ, "his," of v. 5 most naturally refers to "the proud" mentioned in v. 4. So also Grotius, Fritzsche, and Bretschneider. Accordingly the judgment spoken of in the second clause of v. 5 must be regarded as that of "the proud," unto but not into whose ears the prayer of the poor reacheth. The most curious attempt at interpretation is that of the Aethiop.: "When the poor man asketh, he gapes as far as his ears." [Here and in other references to the Aethiop.: Margoliouth.]

6. He that hateth reproof (is) in the track [in the wake] of the sinner.] Which perhaps is not the same as "he walketh in the way of the sinner" = in a sinful way, but rather that he walks in the footsteps, the track, which sinners who also refuse reproof have left.

reproof.] ἐλεγμός, "expostulation," "moral argument." The first clause of the verse evidently refers back to xix. 13–17, and the second clause to xix. 20.

but he that feareth the Lord will repent [turneth] in heart.] The same verb is frequently used in the N. T. to indicate conversion.

7. Third triplet. Known from afar is he that is mighty in tongue, and [not "but"] his slips [or "errors"] will not escape the man of understanding.] Generally, the "mighty in tongue" is supposed to mean an eloquent man who is known from afar,—as Fritzsche explains, easily. But μακρόθεν is not used in that sense, nor is it easy to perceive either the meaning of an eloquent man being known from afar or the fitness of introducing him in that connection. As the whole triplet is condemnatory in its character, we regard the expression "mighty in tongue" as used in an ironical or rather an evil sense, and as referring to "the tongue that speaketh great things," Ps. xii. 4. In fact, "the mighty in tongue" are the same as those in Ps. xii. 5, "who say, With our tongues we will prevail"—the δυνατὸς ἐν γλώσσῃ is the גִּבּוֹר בְּלָשׁוֹן מַגְבִּיר (this rather than the ל of Ps. xii. 5—see Delitzsch ad loc.), גִּבּוֹר being in the LXX. commonly rendered by δυνατός.

8. The last words in the second clause are

B. C. cir. 200.

that gathereth himself stones for the tomb of his burial.

[e] ch. 16. 6.

9 [e]The congregation of the wicked is like tow wrapped together: and the end of them is a flame of fire to destroy them.

10 The way of sinners is made plain with stones, but at the end thereof is the pit of hell.

[f] John 7. 17.

11 [f]He that keepeth the law of the Lord getteth the understanding thereof: and the perfection of the fear of the Lord is wisdom.

B. C. cir. 200.

[g] Prov. 1. 7.

[h] Eccles. 1. 18.

12 [g]He that is not [i]wise will not be taught: [h]but there is a wisdom which multiplieth bitterness.

[i] Or, witty.

[k] Or, subtilty.

13 The [k]knowledge of a wise man shall abound like a flood: and his counsel is like a pure fountain of life.

rendered in the A. V. according to Co., or rather 248, 106, which agree with the Syr. In this reading εἰς χῶμα is substituted for εἰς χειμῶνα, and the words ταφῆς αὐτοῦ ("of his burial") are added. But, according to the generally accepted reading, the second clause must be translated: as one that gathereth his stones for [unto] winter. To this it seems difficult, if not impossible, to attach any meaning. Fritzsche regards it as implying: like a fool that gathereth stones instead of wood for winter. The explanation is even more difficult than the illustration which it professes to explain. We would suggest that the Greek misread חֹרֶף, "winter," for חֹרֶב, "desolation," which was the word in the original. In that case the original would have been: "He that buildeth his house by goods [property] belonging to others is as he that gathereth his stones for desolation [for a ruin, for what is to be such]."

9. The congregation of transgressors (is as) tow gathered [heaped] together.] A word-play here between συνηγμένον, "gathered together," and συναγωγή, "the gathering," "congregation."

and their end a flame of fire.] The reference is probably to Is. i. 31. Omit the words "to destroy them."

10. Fourth triplet. but.] Rather, and.

hell.] Rather, Hades. The Syr. has: "The path of the wicked is a stumbling-block to him, because the end thereof is a deep ditch." Does the difference between the Greek "made plain with (by) stones" and the Syr. "stumbling-block" depend upon a different reading or misreading of the Hebrew—to which the Aethiop. seems to point by its rendering, "rough are the stones of the road of sinners"? Or did the Syr. alter what seemed a dangerous statement in the original?

11. Omit in first clause the words "of the Lord." Thus corrected, the A. V. expresses one mode of rendering or rather interpreting the first clause, in which case it would be parallel to St. John vii. 17. But, as Fritzsche rightly observes, the word ἐνώπιον could scarcely be used of "understanding" of the Law. The word does not occur in the LXX., and (besides this passage) is only used by Theodotion in the plural for תַּחְבֻּלוֹת, "the evil counsels" (of the wicked), Prov. xii. 5. We prefer therefore another rendering of the clause, which seems not only more easy, but entirely agrees with the Syr.: He that keepeth (נוֹצֵר) the Law getteth the mastery [rule] over his inclination [intent, mind, disposition, שַׁלִּיט בְּיִצְרוֹ, in the peculiar sense of יֵצֶר]. The next clause of the verse is so entirely Alexandrian that we prefer regarding the Syr. as representing the genuine Hebrew text. It reads: "and he that feareth the Lord shall not want anything," which is a reproduction of Ps. xxxiv. 9 (Heb. 10). In the Syriac Psalter this verse seems wanting, but the Syriac of Ecclus. xxi. 11 reproduces the wording of the Targum on Ps. xxxiv. 10.

12. wise.] Rather, prudent.

taught.] Here rather in the sense of moral teaching. The Alex. rightly inserts δέ, "but," at the beginning of the second clause. The Syr. wholly omits the verse; and if our conjecture be correct as to the Hellenistic alteration introduced in the Greek of v. 11 b, we can understand the motive for such a sentiment as v. 12, which seems an adaptation from xix. 22–25.

wisdom.] Rather, prudence; perhaps here in the sense of subtilty.

13. This verse begins another triplet—unless, indeed, we were to regard it as commencing with v. 14, the four lines of v. 15 being in that case two verses thrown together.

shall abound.] Rather, will increase, —swell, become more full.

counsel.] Probably, as generally in the LXX., עֵצָה (this rather than מַחֲשָׁבָה)—in the wider sense of "counsel" = resolve, purpose.

pure fountain of life.] Omit the word "pure." Generally the expression "fountain of life" is supposed to be = "living waters," מַיִם חַיִּים, but it rather corresponds to מְקוֹר חַיִּים in Prov. xiii. 14, xiv. 27, to both of which

B. C. cir. 200.

14 [i]The inner parts of a fool are like a broken vessel, and he will hold no knowledge as long as he liveth.

15 If a skilful man hear a wise word, he will commend it, and [k]add unto it: but as soon as one of no understanding heareth it, it displeaseth him, and he casteth it behind his back.

16 The talking of a fool is like a burden in the way: but grace shall be found in the lips of the wise.

17 They enquire at the mouth of the wise man in the congregation, and they shall ponder his words in their heart.

B. C. cir. 200.

18 As is a house that is destroyed, so is wisdom to a fool: and the knowledge of the unwise is as talk [l]without sense.

19 Doctrine unto fools is as fetters on the feet, and like manacles on the right hand.

20 [m]A fool lifteth up his voice

[i] ch. 33. 5.

[k] Prov. 9. 9.

[l] Or, not to be enquired after.

[m] ch. 19. 30.

this verse is strictly parallel, and where the LXX. translates πηγὴ ζωῆς. It is, indeed, not impossible that πηγὴ ζωῆς may represent the Heb. מְקוֹר כַּיִם חַיִּים, "fountain of living waters," not "fountain of life," since in one passage (Jer. xvii. 13) it is so rendered in the LXX.; but it is very improbable, considering that in three other passages כַּיִם חַיִּים is not so translated (Cant. iv. 15; Jer. ii. 13; Zech. xiv. 8).

14. Omit "as long as he liveth," which, however, is supported by 106, 248, Co., and is in the Syr.

he will hold no knowledge.] As a vessel that is broken cannot hold what is put into it, so are the inner parts of a fool as regards knowledge — ἔγκατα, קֶרֶב: so in the LXX. rendering of Ps. xlix. (LXX., l.) 12; Ps. cviii. (LXX., cix.) 18. It is not quite = לֵב (comp. Ps. xxxix. 4; lv. 5), but rather designates the seat of feeling and thinking. For "broken vessel" the Syr. has "broken cistern," which is both more apt and more biblical.

15. We suspect that in the original v. 15 a, b and c, d formed two verses (see above, vv. 12, 13).

a skilful man.] Rather, a man of understanding [knowledge], in the wider biblical sense, including, and in a sense identifying, moral and intellectual knowledge, ἐπιστήμων (in the N. T. only in St. Jas. iii. 13—which should be marked as farther shewing the correspondence between St. Jas. and Ecclus.); the Heb. נָבוֹן (so, with only one exception, in the LXX.), and generally combined with "wise."

but as soon as one of no understanding heareth it.] Rather, "he that liveth in pleasure [is given to pleasure] heareth it, and it displeaseth him." Clauses a and c, b and d are strictly antithetic. Opposed to "a man of knowledge" is ὁ σπαταλῶν, "he that is given to pleasure." The word occurs again in 1 Tim. v. 6; St. Jas. v. 5, but it is not used in the LXX., where we have, however, the compound καταστπαταλάω in Prov. xxix. 21; Amos vi. 4. Whereas the man of understanding addeth to a wise word, the man who liveth for pleasure casteth it behind his back. For the latter expression, see 1 Kings xiv. 9; Ezek. xxiii. 35; Nehem. ix. 26.

16. This verse begins another triplet.

talking.] Narrative (talk, here perhaps: explanation).

in the way.] I.e., while journeying—instead of lightening its difficulties and troubles, only increasing them.

grace.] Not in the commonly understood biblical sense, but in that of pleasantness; see the Syr., which also instead of "fool" has "the wicked," and "the pious" instead of "intelligent."

the wise.] Rather, of him who is intelligent—has understanding.

17. The mouth of the prudent will be sought.] Viz., his word or saying; comp. as to God Amos viii. 12. In the second clause we accept (as in the A. V.) the Alex. reading διανοηθήσονται instead of the Vat. διανοηθήσεται.

18. As a house destroyed.] Fritzsche explains: "as a house destroyed is not of any use, so is wisdom to a fool." The Syr. has: "as a prison." We believe that the Syr. read בַּיִת מְשֻׁכָּר (comp. Gen. xlii. 19) and the Greek בַּיִת מְשֻׁכָּד. More puzzling is the Syr. rendering in the second clause. Here the Greek has: as words that will not bear enquiry (A. V., "as talk without sense"); while the Syr. renders, "like coals of fire."

19. Another triplet. Fetters on the feet (so is) instruction to those without understanding.] Alike hindering and unpleasant, as preventing them from freely walking in their own ways.

on the right hand.] Which is mostly engaged in action.

20. with.] Rather, in.

B. C. cir. 200.

with laughter; but a wise man doth scarce smile a little.

21 Learning is unto a wise man as an ornament of gold, and like a bracelet upon his right arm.

22 A foolish man's foot is soon in his [neighbour's] house: but a man of experience is ashamed of him.

23 A fool will peep in at the door into the house: but he that is well nurtured will stand without.

24 It is the rudeness of a man to hearken at the door: but a wise man will be grieved with the disgrace.

B. C. cir. 200.

25 The lips of talkers will be telling such things as pertain not unto them: but the words of such as have understanding are weighed in the balance.

26 The heart of fools is in their mouth: but the mouth of the wise is in their heart.

a wise man.] Rather, a prudent man. Grotius quotes Seneca: "risus sit sine cachinno."

21. Instruction is to a man of understanding.] The verse is in antithesis to v. 19.

22. Another triplet. The foot of a fool (is) quickly into a house. We believe this to be the passage (hitherto not localised) which the Talmud has in view, when it quotes as from 'The Book of the Son of Sira': "Three I hate and four I do not love—a prince (leader) who goes about drinking-houses—some say, who is quarrelsome; some say, who is quick-tempered—a man who places his habitation in the high places of the city . . . [we omit the third], and a man who enters the house of his neighbour suddenly" (without knocking) (Nidd. 16 b; comp. Pes. 112 a).

but a man of experience will feel shame before the face.] So literally; and the question is whether we are to explain it as "the face of him," i.e. before him that is to be visited, or else as meaning "before the house." Fritzsche goes so far as to apply the expression πρόσωπον (face) to the inner walls of the antechamber, before which such a person is supposed to hesitate or feel reluctance (hat Scheu). The Syr. renders: "bends down the face." If we suppose the Greek text to be a correct rendering of the Hebrew, we should certainly explain it as meaning "the face of him" in the sense of being bashful when visiting a house. But may it not be that the Hebrew text was בּוֹשֵׁשׁ לְפָנָיו, "hesitates before it," which was misunderstood and mistranslated as above?

23. A silly person . . . but a man who is instructed [cultured, educated; the German gebildet].] While a silly person in his curiosity tries to get a peep of what is going on, a well-bred person purposely stands far away. The Syr. has a strange and certainly inapt rendering.

24. It is want of breeding [rudeness] . . . but he who is sensible [intelligent, prudent] will be weighed down [burdened] with the dishonour.] Viz., of doing such a mean thing.

25. Last stanza. The literal rendering of the Greek (both Vat. and Alex.) would be: "Lips of strangers will be burdened in these things." But as this yields not any intelligible meaning, we conclude that the text is corrupt rather than that the original had been mistranslated. For, although a man might mistranslate, there must at least be some meaning in his words. But apparently in the whole clause, χείλη ἀλλοτρίων ἐν τούτοις βαρυνθήσεται, only the first word (χείλη, lips) really forms part of the verse. Bretschneider suggests that the word ἀλλοτρίων, "of strangers," belongs to the first clause of v. 24, which should read "to hearken at the door of strangers," while similarly the ἐν τούτοις belongs to the second clause of v. 24, which should read, "is weighed down by the disgrace in these things." Lastly, the word βαρυνθήσεται, "will be weighed down," or "burdened," seems only a copyist's repetition from the previous verse. In the absence of any reliable text little can be learned from the Syr., "The mouth of the wicked talketh against his body;" i.e. his talk is really against himself, to his hurt and detriment. In these circumstances we seem restricted to the Complutensian reading, or rather that of 248, which is adopted in the A. V., "The lips of talkers will be telling such things as pertain not unto them" = as are not theirs, which concern them not and with which they have not anything to do. Fritzsche conjectures that the Hebrew read: "The lips of the proud [where he supposes זָרִים to have been misread זוֹרִים] are burdened with cursing" (בְּאָלָה, which he supposes to have been misread בְּאֵלֶּה). But, to waive other objections, this would not suit the context.

26. In the mouth of fools is their heart, but the heart of the wise is their mouth.] The Syr. is the same except that the preposition "in" is transferred from the first to the beginning of the second clause: "the

B. C. cir. 200.

27 When the ungodly curseth Satan, he curseth his own soul.

[m] ch. 28. 13. 28 [m]A whisperer defileth his own soul, and is hated wheresoever he dwelleth.

CHAPTER XXII.

1 Of the slothful man, 3 and a foolish daughter. 11 Weep rather for fools, than for the dead. 13 Meddle not with them. 16 The wise man's heart will not shrink. 20 What will lose a friend.

B. C. cir. 200.

A SLOTHFUL man is compared to a filthy stone, and every one will hiss him out to his disgrace.

mouth, but in the heart" The first part of the verse does not require any comment. "To wear one's heart on one's sleeve" indicates shallowness alike of feeling and of intellect. The second clause Fritzsche regards as meaning that the wise have first well pondered in their hearts what they utter with their mouths. But the antithesis seems to suggest more than this, viz. that the wise are reticent as to their deepest feelings: they do not parade them before all and every one—their heart is their mouth.

27. This verse is of the greatest interest, alike as regards the theology of the writer and indirectly the age of this book. When the writer speaks of cursing Satan as seducing a man unto sin, he refers to the person of the Devil. But the allusion implies not only belief in the personality of Satan on the part of the older Siracide, but that this belief was so general that the writer could put its expression into the mouth of the wicked. And not only so, but by the side of it we find also the rationalistic corrective that what men called Satan was really their own evil inclination. This certainly accords with an exceptional Rabbinic view, which identifies Satan with the Yetser ha-Ra, the evil inclination (Babh. Bathr. 16 a). But, as just hinted, this was not the common view, according to which Satan was also regarded as inciting man to sin (comp. the App. on Satanology in 'Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah,' vol. ii. p. 757). We have therefore here alike evidence of a general belief in Satan and its rationalistic modification. On the other hand, we also mark here a development (this rather than a progression) in the Old Testament standpoint on this subject. Its various stages in the later books of the Old Testament may be indicated in the following order:—Job i. 6–12, ii. 1–7; Zech. iii. 1, 2; and lastly, 1 Chron. xxi. 1, with which comp. 2 Sam. xxiv. 1. With these passages should be compared, on the other hand, the curious (later) Rabbinic comments (see 'Miqr. Gedol.,' ad loc.). Considering the developed Angelology in the Book of Daniel, it seems strange that no reference should be made in it to Satan. Indeed, the apparent generality of the belief as implied in Ecclus. seems incompatible with this silence in Daniel, if the authorship of the latter were posterior to that of Ecclesiasticus. In the later Apocrypha (Bar., Tob.) Demonology appears in a very developed and Judaic form. To Wisd. ii. 24 we do not refer, on account of the late composition of that book. The Syr. paraphrase for "Satan," "him that has not sinned against him," is both interesting and curious. In our view it implies not another Hebrew text, but the avoidance of its meaning by a paraphrase.

28. wheresoever he dwelleth.] Rather, in the neighbourhood, i.e. among his neighbours. The Syr. has: "The soul of the wise is grieved (oppressed, in anguish) on account of the fool, because he knoweth not what he should say unto him."

CHAPTER XXII.

This chapter is better connected than that which preceded. The subject seems still a warning against folly, in its various manifestations, specially as regards speech. In that respect the aspiration of the last verse forms an appropriate general conclusion. The first five verses refer to certain aspects of folly of conduct, especially as regards the young. From this the transition is natural to instruction, especially of the young, which is hopeless in cases where there is a certain disposition (five verses, vv. 6–12, as vv. 9, 10 must be omitted). This leads to the admonition to avoid all intercourse with such persons (three verses, but one of them a triplet, in six lines: vv. 13–15). Next, the steadfast purpose of a wise man is contrasted with that of the fool (three verses: vv. 16–18). Lastly, the difference is described between the speech and action of the fool in regard to others, with its sad consequences (four verses, the last of them double: vv. 19–22), and the speech and action of the wise in regard to others, with its happy results (four verses, the first of them double: vv. 23–26). The chapter closes with an aspiration after higher direction in this matter.

1. is compared.] I.e. is like.

a filthy stone.] The lapis latrinarum.

will hiss him out to his disgrace.] Rather, will hiss over his dishonour. Generally the clause is supposed to refer to the filthy stone which is looked upon as disgusting. And so the Syr., "every one runs away from

B. C. cir. 200.

2 A slothful man is compared to the filth of a dunghill: every man that takes it up will shake his hand.

3 An evil nurtured son is the dishonour of his father that begat him: and a [foolish] daughter is born to his loss.

[a] Prov. 13. 22. ‖ Or, shall be the heir of her husband.

4 [a]A wise daughter ‖shall bring an inheritance to her husband: but she that liveth dishonestly is her father's heaviness.

5 She that is bold dishonoureth both her father and her husband, but they both shall despise her.

6 A tale out of season [is as] music in mourning: but stripes and correction of wisdom are never out of time.

B. C. cir. 200.

7 Whoso teacheth a fool is as one that glueth a potsherd together, and as he that waketh one from a sound sleep.

8 He that telleth a tale to a fool speaketh to one in a slumber: when he hath told his tale, he will say, What is the matter?

9 If children live honestly, and have ‖wherewithal, they shall cover the baseness of their parents.

‖ Or, an art.

10 But children, being haughty, the smell of it." But it seems better to refer the clause to the idle man, over whom every one will hiss, יִשְׁרֹק עָלָיו, Job xxvii. 23, for which the Syr. may have read יִרְחַק, and then translated paraphrastically.

2. The βόλβιτον κοπρίων, "filth of a dunghill," is the LXX. rendering of גֶּלְלֵי צֵאָה in Ezek. iv. 12 (comp. Ewald, § 255 b, p. 639).

shake.] For the purpose of cleansing. The Syr. paraphrases, at the same time retaining the last words of the original: "will shake his hand." This is instructive.

3. (There is) shame to a father in the begetting of a son undisciplined, but a daughter [viz. of this kind; Syr. "a woman"] is born to loss.] There is progression here: an undisciplined son is a source of shame to his father, but an undisciplined daughter is a source of actual loss—of the one he may be ashamed, the other will cause him damage and hurt.

4. A prudent [sensible, mentally well conditioned] daughter shall obtain her husband (or are we to follow the Latin: hæreditas viro suo, and to suppose a misunderstanding on the part of the Greek translator?).] Bretschneider: "ἄνδρα αὐτῆς, maritum sibi destinatum"—and thereby she will bring honour to her father.

but a daughter that bringeth disgrace is unto grief to him [the grief of him] that begat her.] "That bringeth disgrace," in the Heb. no doubt מְבִישָׁה, but not in the sense of "disgraceful," as in Prov. xii. 4, but as in Prov. x. 5, xiv. 35, xvii. 2, in that of putting to shame. In these three passages מֵבִישׁ always stands antithetically to מַשְׂכִּיל, "prudent." Probably the same antithetic expressions may have been used in the Heb. of our verse, although the LXX. render מַשְׂכִּיל in Prov. x. 5, xiv. 35, by νοήμων. The Syr. wholly omits this verse.

5. The bold [viz. daughter] disgraceth father and husband, and by both will she be despised.] The term "bold" (ἡ θρασεῖα) is used in the sense of noisy self-assertion and impudence, as in Prov. ix. 13, which seems parallel, and where the LXX. render γυνὴ ἄφρων καὶ θρασεῖα—whatever meaning we may attach to the Hebrew phrase אֵשֶׁת כְּסִילוּת. The Syr. has "father and mother," instead of "father and husband."

6. Unseasonable speech.] Referring to instruction or admonition addressed to the young, but at that particular moment not in season: good in itself, but just then unsuitable. The second clause literally translated would be, "(but) stripes and discipline at all times (are) of wisdom," which is sometimes explained as meaning that the application of these at all times is the part of wisdom. But it is not easy to find this in the Greek text. The Syr. has: "is wisdom at all times." There can be little doubt that this represents the original Hebrew, בְּכָל־עֵת חָכְמָה, which the Greek mistranslated ἐν παντὶ καιρῷ σοφίας.

7. Whoso.] Rather, he that. Omit "and" in second clause.

sound sleep.] Rather, deep sleep. The point of comparison is the uselessness of the attempt in each case.

8. He that narrateth . . . narrateth to one that is nodding [slumbering], and upon the completion he will say: What is it?] The simile of v. 7 leads to that about slumber which is not inapt. The Syr. has in the first clause instead of our Greek: "like a man that eateth bread when he is not hungry."

9, 10. These verses must be omitted.

through disdain and want of nurture do stain the nobility of their kindred.

11 [b] Weep for the dead, for he hath lost the light: and weep for the fool, for he wanteth understanding: make little weeping for the dead, for he is at rest: but the life of the fool is worse than death.

12 [c] Seven days do men mourn for him that is dead; but for a fool and an ungodly man all the days of his life.

13 Talk not much with a fool, and go not to him that hath no understanding: [d] beware of him, lest thou have trouble, and thou shalt never be defiled ‖ with his fooleries: depart from him, and thou shalt find rest, and never be ‖ disquieted with madness.

14 What is heavier than lead? and what is the name thereof, but a fool?

15 [e] Sand, and salt, and a mass of iron, is easier to bear, than a man without understanding.

16 As timber girt and bound together in a building cannot be loosed with shaking: so the heart that is stablished by advised counsel shall fear at no time.

B. C. cir. 200.

[b] ch. 38. 16.

[c] Gen. 50. 10.

[d] ch. 12. 12.

B. C. cir. 200.

‖ Or, when he shakes off his filth.

‖ Or, wearied.

[e] Prov. 27. 3.

11. Weep for the dead, for light has failed [ceased, passed away] . . . for understanding has failed . . . Weep softly [Bissell] for the dead, for he is at rest.] The contrast is melancholy, as indicating absence of hope as regards an after-life. The Syr. modifies the last clause and adds: "for worse than death is an evil life."

12. Seven days.] The ordinary period of great mourning (Gen. l. 10; Judith xvi. 24). St. Augustine finds in the number seven for the period of mourning an allusion to the Sabbath of rest, indicative of this, that the dead were at sacred rest. The contrast is very forcible. While we mourn seven days for the pious who are at rest, the whole lifetime of the fool and the ungodly is a period of mourning.

13. Another stanza, in which progression from the former verses is clearly marked. Lit.: "With one void of intelligence do not multiply speech." The Syr. has "make not pleasant" for "multiply not." We are inclined to believe that the Heb. had אַל תְּשַׁבֵּר, and that the Greek took יְשַׁבֵּר in the sense of measuring — measuring words, — while the Syr. understood it in the more common use of the word. Or may there have been some confusion of the roots רבה and רצה? For the second clause the Syr. has: "and with a pig do not go in the way." Possibly the original had חֲזִיר, "a pig," and the Greek translator, regarding this as below the dignity of the argument, may have altered it in common Rabbinic manner of commentation, as follows: Read not חֲזִיר, a pig, but חָסֵר, wanting = חֲסַר־לֵב, wanting in understanding. The third clause seems to support the Greek rendering, but the fourth accords rather with the Syr. On the other hand, the simile of the pig is not only un-Jewish, but seems abruptly introduced. Clause d should be translated: and thou shalt not be defiled by that which he throws out. This, whether we understand it realistically, as of saliva or the like, or figuratively, seems a not inapt paraphrase of ἐν τῷ ἐντιναγμῷ αὐτοῦ.

The last two clauses of v. 13 read: Turn away from him, and thou shalt find rest, and not be overwhelmed by his senselessness. "Overwhelmed" with the additional idea of fainting or being weary in consequence, corresponding to the Hebrew עָטַף, for which it is used in LXX. Ps. lx. (Heb. lxi.) 2; ci. (Heb. cii.) 1; cxlii. (Heb. cxliii.) 4.

14. The Syr.: "for he is much heavier than lead;" the Greek and the Syr. rendering the מה differently.

15. Syr.: "than to dwell with a foolish man."

16. This verse begins a new stanza.

A tie-beam [comp. Hab. ii. 11: "cross-beam out of the wood"] bound into a building will not be loosed in a storm.] Lit. "commotion," like its Hebrew original סַעַר and סְעָרָה (or rather in that instance סַעֲרָה), for which it stands in LXX. Jer. xxiii. 19; 4 (2) Kings ii. 1. In one passage (LXX. 3 Kings xix. 11) it stands indeed for רַעַשׁ, "earthquake," but that word also bears the general meaning of "quaking." In any case, the rendering "storm-wind" suits the context far better than "earthquake."

so the heart stablished on advised [considered] thought [purpose] shall not be afraid at the time.] At the proper time — בָּעֵת, at the right time, that which is to be looked for — when thought must pass into action and dangers threaten around (as the hurricane that falls upon a house), he who is as here described shall not give way through fear nor even be perturbed.

B. C. cir. 200.

17 A heart settled upon a thought of understanding is as a fair plaistering ‖on the wall of a gallery.

‖ Or, of a polished wall.

18 Pales set on an high place will never stand against the wind: so a fearful heart in the imagination of a fool cannot stand against any fear.

19 He that pricketh the eye will make tears to fall: and he that pricketh the heart maketh it to shew her knowledge.

20 Whoso casteth a stone at the birds frayeth them away: and he that f upbraideth his friend breaketh friendship.

f ch. 41. 22.

21 Though thou drewest a sword at thy friend, yet despair not: for there may be a returning [to favour.]

22 If thou hast opened thy mouth against thy friend, fear not; for there may be a reconciliation: except for upbraiding, or pride, or g disclosing of secrets, or a treacherous wound: for for these things every friend will depart.

B. C. cir. 200.

g ch. 27. 17. & 41. 23.

23 Be faithful to thy neighbour in his poverty, that thou mayest rejoice in his prosperity: abide stedfast unto him in the time of his trouble, that thou mayest be heir with him in his heritage: for a mean estate is not always to be contemned: nor the rich that is foolish to be had in admiration.

24 As the vapour and smoke of a furnace goeth before the fire; so reviling before blood.

advised thought.] Considered purpose, διανόημα βουλῆς: the former word corresponds to מַחֲשָׁבָה, the latter to עֵצָה.

17. A heart settled upon a prudent [an intelligent] purpose is like the plastered adornment of a smoothed wall.] As we understand it, the reference is to a wall built of rough stones, but which becomes smooth and polished by being plastered—having the "plastered adornment." According to Grotius, Fritzsche, and others, the point of comparison lies in this, that the plaster does not fall off, but remains firm even in earthquake, storm, and rain. But such would certainly not be the case in an earthquake, while storm and rain could scarcely in any case affect the inside of a house. In our view the comparison lies in this: that as in a house of strong stones the "plastered adornment" gives firmness, beauty, and completion to what is now a polished wall, so the prudent purpose of a wise heart.

18. Pales set on a high place [rather, according to the Alex. reading: small stones laid on a high place] . . . so a fearful heart upon [i.e. caused by, the outcome of] the purpose of a fool shall not stand against any alarm.] For χάρακες, "pales" (palisades?), the Alex. reads χάλικες, "little stones," possibly in the sense of a heap of loose little stones. This reading is confirmed by the Syr., which has: "a pebble upon the top of a lofty stone."

19. Another stanza. He that presseth [hurteth] the eye [lit. pricketh, in the general sense of touching to hurt] . . . and he that hurteth the heart [the same verb as before] causeth feeling (viz. of pain?) to appear [brings it to light].] The point of the comparison lies in the making visible, bringing out the inward sensation or feeling. When you rub the eye, the visible effect is tears; if you similarly hurt the heart of another, the pain which you give will make itself outwardly apparent. This is further developed and illustrated in v. 20, where the "upbraiding" in clause b (ὀνειδίζειν) is, as it were, morally casting stones at a friend.

21. Omit "to favour."

22. If.] Rather, though. All direct and open attacks, whether by word or deed, are not necessarily offences which make a breach hopeless—there may be "return" or "reconciliation"—but the mean conduct mentioned in v. 22 c will for ever alienate a friend. Omit the word "for" in the last clause.

23. Last stanza. Win trust with the [thy] neighbour in (his) poverty.] Gain his confidence by the way in which thou actest towards him while he is poor. The Syr. paraphrases, although in the spirit of the sentence: "support thy companion in his poverty."

that thou mayest be heir with him in his heritage.] Probably rather, that thou mayest have part with him in his possession, i.e. when he attains to it. The rest of the verse in the A. V. must be omitted.

24. Before a fire smoke of the furnace and vapour . . . so reviling before blood.] Rather, "before bloodshed"—αἵματα bearing the same meaning as the Heb. דָּמִים. Bretschneider would place v. 24

B. C. cir. 200.

25 I will not be ashamed to defend a friend; neither will I hide myself from him.

26 And if any evil happen unto me by him, every one that heareth it will beware of him.

[h] Ps. 141. 3.

27 [h]Who shall set a watch before my mouth, and a seal of wisdom upon my lips, that I fall not suddenly by them, and that my tongue destroy me not?

CHAPTER XXIII.

B. C. cir. 200.

1 A prayer for grace to flee sin. 9 We may not use swearing: 14 but remember our parents. 16 Of three sorts of sin. 34 The adulterous wife sinneth many ways.

O LORD, Father and Governor of all my whole life, leave me not to their counsels, and let me not fall by them.

2 Who will set scourges over my thoughts, and the discipline of wisdom before v. 23. But v. 24 aptly precedes v. 25, if its meaning be: If bloodshed come, I will not be ashamed nor hesitate to protect a friend.

25. The Syr. paraphrases: "If thy friend become impoverished, put him not to shame."

26. The Syr. has instead of this: "If thy companion reveal to thee a secret, disclose it not, lest every one that heareth it beware of thee, and regard thee as an evil-doer." The Greek text expresses a sentiment by no means elevated, and which considerably detracts from the moral value of v. 25. The meaning seems to be: If harm comes, the blame will be imputed to the other who allows his friend to suffer for his sake; and thus he, not I, shall suffer in public esteem. Probably, however, the Syr. expresses what was the sentiment of the original.

27. Bretschneider and Fritzsche would connect this verse with the following chapter. But we have repeatedly observed that the close of one chapter prepares for the subject of the following, and in fact forms the connecting link with it.

Who shall set.] Rather, Oh that one would set, the Greek being only a literal rendering of a common Hebrew idiom (Ewald, § 329*c*). As the verse is evidently formed upon Ps. cxli. 3, we may conjecture the Hebrew to have been מִי יִתֵּן or מִי יָשִׂית לְפִי שְׁמִירָה (or point שָׁמְרָה).

a seal of wisdom.] Rather, of prudence—this for the elegant Hebrew in the corresponding clause of the Psalm.

that I fall not suddenly by them.] Rather, that I fall not from it, viz. the watch or guard upon his mouth: for that purpose he asks for the additional security of a seal on his lips. Generally it is translated "that I fall not by it" (ἵνα μὴ πέσω ἀπ' αὐτῆς), and the reference is supposed to be to the γλῶσσα, "tongue," in the last clause. But it is difficult to understand how the ἀπ' αὐτῆς can refer not to what precedes, but to what follows in the next clause.

CHAPTER XXIII.

The chapter opens (see xxii. 27) with a prayer against sins of the tongue, of the eyes, and of the flesh (vv. 1–6; v. 5 in the A. V. must be omitted). Then follows what is appropriately entitled in the LXX. text as "Discipline of the mouth" (vv. 7–15). Here, after a general introduction (vv. 7, 8), we have a warning against profane language (vv. 9–11), against loose language (vv. 12, 13), and against disrespectful language (vv. 14, 15). What may be called Part II. consists of two stanzas, each of six verses (vv. 16–21; vv. 22–27), respectively directed against male and female offenders against purity.

1. O Lord, Father and Ruler of my life, leave me not to their counsel [to what they suggest], suffer me not, &c. (Bissell).] The reference must be to "the lips" in ch. xxii. 27, since the "their" and "they" can scarcely be referred to the "adversaries" of v. 3.

2. Oh that one would put rods [chastisements] upon my thinking [purposing, διανόημα, מְזִמָּה; in the singular only used in Eccles., not in the LXX. nor in the N. T.] and the discipline of wisdom upon my heart [either wise discipline or that which leadeth to wisdom: probably the former]; in order that they [viz. the stripes] may not spare my mistakes ["spare" in the sense of "be indulgent to," "not punish;" "mistakes," מְשִׁגֶּה, both in the Heb. and in the LXX. only used in Gen. xliii. 12, but in our verse used in the plural], and that it [viz. the discipline of wisdom] may not pass by their transgressions]—viz. when the "mistake" or מִשְׁגֶּה leads on to actual transgression. Or else, if we follow the Latin and derive παρῇ not from παρίημι (I pass by) but from πάρειμι (I am present, I arrive), we shall have to translate: "and that their transgressions (those which are the outcome of our mistakes) may not appear," or "come out." The ultimate meaning is nearly the same in both cases. The text is so complicated that it gave rise to early attempts at over mine heart? that they spare me not for mine ignorances, and it pass not by my sins:

Digitized by Google

B. C. cir. 200.

3 Lest mine ignorances increase, and my sins abound to my destruction, and I fall before mine adversaries, and mine enemy rejoice over me, whose hope is far from thy mercy.

4 O Lord, Father and God of my life, give me not a proud look, but turn away from thy servants always

Or, a giant-like. ‖ a haughty mind.

5 Turn away from me vain hopes and concupiscence, and thou shalt hold him up that is desirous always to serve thee.

B. C. cir. 200.

6 Let not the greediness of the belly nor lust of the flesh take hold of me; and give not over me thy servant into an impudent mind.

7 Hear, O ye children, the discipline of the mouth: he that keepeth it shall never be taken in his lips.

8 The sinner shall be left in his foolishness: both the evil speaker and the proud shall fall thereby.

9 [a] Accustom not thy mouth to swearing; neither use thyself to the naming of the Holy One.

[a] Exod. 20. 7. ch. 27. 14. Matt. 5. 33, 34.

emendation. The most noteworthy of these is the omission of the μή, "not," from clause c, and the change of the verb from the plural to the singular. Thus the clause would read: "that he (viz. the Lord) would spare my errors"—the Syr.: "that the Lord would spare (not punish) my guilt." But the Syr. adds so much in the sequel that we must put it aside as a wide and not very apt paraphrase. Fritzsche not only corrects the number in clause c ("that he may not spare my follies"), but alters in clause d "their" into "my" ("that he may not let pass—durchliesse!—my sins"). This certainly is to cut the knot.

3. Omit from A. V. "to my destruction;" also the last clause, "whose hope," &c.

4. Sins and mistakes, the outcome of the heart, naturally lead to thoughts of the class mentioned in vv. 4–6.

a proud look.] Rather, lascivious (or lustful) eyes; comp. xxvi. 9: literally, "lifting up of eyes." This would correspond to the Hebrew usage of נְשֹׂא עֵינַיִם, as in Gen. xxxix. 7. But in the LXX. the latter passage is rendered, ἐπέβαλεν τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς αὐτῆς. Moreover the word used in our verse for "uplifting of eyes" (μετεωρισμὸς ὀφθαλμῶν) occurs either as a substantive or a verb, or in some derivative form, not less than twenty times in the LXX., but always in the sense of "high," or when connected with "eyes" for "proud;" so in LXX. Ps. cxxx. (cxxxi.) 1 and in Is. v. 15. Can there have been some misunderstanding, such as that עֵינֵי כִזָּבוֹת, "eyes of deceit," was misread עֵינַיִם רָמוֹת, "proud eyes,"—there being in the MS. neither vowel-points nor final letters, nor yet the separation of words? In that case a similar misreading would also have to be assumed in xxvi. 9. In the so-called 'Second Alphabet of Ben Sira' we read: "Woe to him who walketh after his eyes, and he knoweth that they are children of whoredom, and he has nothing from them,"—in the sense of not gaining anything by them (comp. in Jer. Ber. 3 c and in several Midrashim: "The heart and the eyes are the intermediaries of sin"). [On the figurative expression "whoredom of the face" for a bold and shameless look, comp. Hos. ii. 4 in the A. V. and R. V. ii. 2. Comp. also Prov. vii. 13; Jer. iii. 3.]

but turn away, &c.] Instead of this clause in the A. V. (which follows 248, Co.) read: and turn away lust from me. There is not, as some have supposed, anything in this prayer inconsistent with the fullest recognition of personal self-determination.

5. This verse in the A. V. must be omitted.

6. The somewhat realistic rendering of the A. V. had best be left. Omit from the A. V. "thy servant," and render: "and give me not over to a shameless mind."

7. This verse begins a new stanza. In the text of the LXX. we have here the inscription: "Discipline of the mouth"—originally, probably, a marginal note. In the second clause translate: "shall never be caught." For "caught" the Syr. has "exposed to infamy." The words following, "in his lips," or rather through his lips, must be joined to v. 8 a. So in the Alex. and in the Syr.

8. Through his lips shall the sinner be taken [we would read καταληφθήσεται, supported by 157]: both the railer and the proud shall be made to stumble by them.

9. St. James v. 12 seems different in spirit from this warning, which is rather against the habit of lightly swearing, as leading to profanity and profanation. "The naming of the Holy One" may refer to the invocation

B. C. cir. 200.

10 For as a servant that is continually beaten shall not be without a blue mark: so he that sweareth and nameth God continually shall not be faultless.

11 A man that useth much swearing shall be filled with iniquity, and the plague shall never depart from his house: if he shall offend, his sin shall be upon him: and if he acknowledge not his sin, he maketh a double offence: and if he swear in vain, he shall not be ‖innocent, but his house shall be full of calamities. B. C. cir. 200. ‖ Gr. justified.

12 [b] There is a word that is clothed about with death: God grant that it be not found in the heritage of Jacob; for all such things shall be far from the godly, and they shall not wallow in their sins. [b] Lev. 24. 15, 16.

of the name Jahveh in an oath. The uttering of that name was not prohibited at that time. "The Holy One:" a common mode of expression for God—the formula in later Hebrew being הקב"ה (הַקָּדוֹשׁ בָּרוּךְ הוּא): "The Holy One, blessed be He." The Syr. seems to have thought such a light use of the Holy Name impossible, and hence applies the passage to judicial investigations. It renders the second clause: "and be not sitting among judges" [or may the words have here slipped in from v. 14*b*?]. The Syr. accordingly continues in v. 10: "For every son of man who swears much (often) will not be free from stripes [shall not be without incurring, or deserving, the punishment of scourging]: similarly he who lyingly swears shall not be free from guilt." In this latter distinction the Syr. had perhaps in view the Rabbinic idea of the punishment "by the hand of God," or by "cutting off."

10. This verse seems rather to confirm the impression given by the Syr. (see above), that in the original the reference was to forensic swearing, and in that case the Syr. helps us to understand the otherwise difficult comparison in the Greek text.

For as a domestic slave that is continually being examined shall not be lacking in weals [he will bear the bodily marks of such investigation, which was by scourging], so he that sweareth and taketh the Name (viz. of God) at all times shall not be clean from sin.] Here in the sense of being free from guilt. As he lightly or lyingly resorts constantly to swearing, the invisible Hand lays on him the spiritual scourge, the weals and bruises of which are the defilement of sin, the guilt which he contracts.

11. The figure is continued and developed.

iniquity.] Rather, unrighteousness.

the plague.] Perhaps better, stroke, referring to the stroke of God. In the LXX. it is used for נֶגַע in LXX. Ps. xxxviii. (xxxix.) 11; lxxxviii. (lxxxix.) 33; xc. (xci.) 10; and repeatedly in the N. T. in the general sense of a Divine stroke.

if he shall offend, &c.] Rather, "if he offend [transgress], his sin (is) upon him." The first two clauses having laid down the general principle, its application is shewn in three possible cases. The first is that of swearing and not doing: this involves sin. The second is: and if he neglect, overlook—this meaning being established by the use of the word in Ecclus. (ii. 10; xxxv. 17 [in the Greek MSS. except in 248, ch. xxxii. 14]; and especially in xxxviii. 16)—that is, if he simply treat his oath as nothing, then "he sinned twofold"—once by breaking his oath, the other time by treating an oath as if it were nothing. The third case contemplated is not that of an oath which is broken, nor of an oath which is treated as if it were nothing, but of one which is needlessly taken: "and if he swear in vain" (without cause, חִנָּם, for which it stands four times in the LXX.: once for לָרִיק, Lev. xxvi. 16; once for רֵיקָם, Ps. xxiv. (Heb. xxv.) 3; and only once, in Ps. xxx. (Heb. xxxi.) 7, for יָשָׁוְא)—in such a case "he shall not be absolved," not be pronounced innocent, without guilt, not be so treated—lit. he shall not be justified. The expression in that sense is common in Hebrew. The Syr. paraphrases and alters, as it seems to us, purposely.

12. From swearing the writer passes to lewd speaking. Generally the verse is regarded as referring to blasphemy, but this does not accord with the third and especially not with the fourth clause. On the other hand, the reference to lewd speaking is borne out by v. 13. Such speech was only too common among the surrounding heathen nations, but happily not "in the heritage of Jacob."

There is a way of speaking [a speech] which over against it is surrounded by death.] The consequence of which is death on every side, ἀντιπεριβεβλημένη. The reading ἀντιπαραβεβλημένη, "the counterpart of which is death," is very attractive, but not necessary, and would only suit the context if the reference were to blasphemy.

God grant that.] Rather, may it not be

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

13 Use not thy mouth to intemperate swearing, for therein is the word of sin.

14 Remember thy father and thy mother, when thou sittest among great men. Be not forgetful before them, and so thou by thy custom become a fool, and wish that thou hadst not been born, and [c] curse the day of thy nativity.

Job 3. [c] &c.

15 [d] The man that is accustomed to opprobrious words will never be reformed all the days of his life.

[d] 2 Sam. 6. 7.

B. C. cir. 200.

16 Two sorts of men multiply sin, and the third will bring wrath: a hot mind is as a burning fire, it will never be quenched till it be consumed: a fornicator in the body of his flesh will never cease till he hath kindled a fire.

17 [e] All bread is sweet to a whoremonger, he will not leave off till he die.

[e] Prov. 9. 17.

found. For "shall" in the next two clauses, rather "will." Omit "their" before "sins."

13. To filthy [lewd] coarseness accustom not thy mouth.] Indulge not in that species of coarseness which consists in filthy talk. The last clause literally rendered would be: "for therein is word of sin," or perhaps "speech of sin." But this seems so inapt that we suppose the Hebrew דָּבָר, literally "a word," to have been here as frequently used in the sense of "matter of," as in עֲוֹנוֹת דָּבָר, or דָּבָר רָע (which, however, rather means something noxious) or דָּבָר רַע, or as the Rabbis have it: דָּבָר שֶׁל קְלוֹן. Accordingly, we would translate: "for therein is matter of sin." [It has been suggested that the λόγος ἁμαρτίας here may throw light on the difficult expression ratio peccati ("the nature of sin") in Article ix.: "Of original or birth-sin."] The Syr. once more gives something different—as we believe, of purpose.

14. The admonition in regard to the tongue is now applied in a different direction. Fritzsche supposes the writer to be still referring to the same subject as in v. 13. He proposes to alter the "for (γάρ) thou sittest" into "when thou sittest" (as in the A. V.), and explains: Let consideration for thy parents, as those who have educated thee, act as a deterrent against coarse speech, lest thou bring them to shame. But irrespective of the arbitrariness involved in this explanation, it is difficult to see how indulgence in coarse speech could lead a person to wish he had not been born (clause 5). Lastly, v. 15 forbids any reference of v. 14 to lewd speech. Bretschneider cuts the knot by regarding v. 14 as spurious, while Grotius proposes a number of alterations too arbitrary for serious consideration. In our view the author here refers to another class of sins of the tongue—those in breach of the fifth commandment. It is the latter which he has in view. "Remember thy father and thy mother, for thou sittest in the midst of great ones, that thou be not forgetful before them (see Winer, § 56, 2), and by thy custom [viz. with them, thy habituation, here = familiarity] thou behave foolishly"—when the consequences mentioned in the last two clauses would ensue, as threatened on breach of the fifth commandment. For ἐθισμός, "custom," see LXX. Gen. xxxi. 35 (תֶּרֶךְ) and 3 Kings xviii. 28 (מִשְׁפָּט).

15. A man who is accustomed [who accustoms himself] to words of reproach [viz. towards his parents, or else words of shame, viz. in regard to them—either גְּדוּפִים, as in LXX. Is. xliii. 28, or חֶרְפָּה] will not become instructed [in the high moral sense—trained, educated—and in this, its true meaning, gebildet] in all his days.] The Syr. paraphrases—again intentionally—vv. 14, 15 (the former rather according to our interpretation of it), and adds a clause at the end of v. 15 which raises the suspicion of a desire to obscure what was the real subject referred to in the original.

16. From words the author turns to deeds. The meaning is sufficiently brought out in the A. V. "Two sorts"—"of men" is understood, not expressed in the text. The two sorts of men referred to are: A soul, hot as burning fire (so better than in the A. V.); and, secondly, the man guilty of the sin "in the body of his flesh," of whom it is said: he will never cease till he have kindled fire (so, more correctly). Fritzsche understands the ἐν σώματι σαρκὸς αὐτοῦ just referred to of the שְׁאֵר בְּשָׂרוֹ of Lev. xviii. 6; xxv. 49: but this is quite differently rendered in the LXX., nor could such a sin have been ranked as less than the third class, described in v. 18, which is characterised as bringing down wrath (v. 16 b). The Syr. omits the first of the triad.

17. This verse is a parenthetic sentence referring to and explaining v. 16, and also preparing for the enormity of v. 18.

All bread.] Every kind of bread; "bread," a euphemism, for which the parallel in Prov. ix. 17 is doubtful (Prov. xx. 17 does

B. C. cir. 200.

18 A man that breaketh wedlock, saying thus in his heart, [f] Who seeth me? I am compassed about with darkness, the walls cover me, and no body seeth me; what need I to fear? the most High will not remember my sins:

[f] Job 24. 15. Ps. 10. 11. Isai. 29. 15.

19 Such a man only feareth the eyes of men, and knoweth not that the eyes of the Lord are ten thousand times brighter than the sun, [g] beholding all the ways of men, and considering the most secret parts.

[g] ch. 15. 19.

20 He knew all things ere ever they were created; [h] so also after they were perfected he looked upon them all.

[h] Gen. 1. 31.

21 [i] This man shall be punished in the streets of the city, and where he suspecteth not he shall be taken.

[i] Lev. 20. 10. Deut. 22. 22.

22 Thus shall it go also with the wife that leaveth her husband, and bringeth in an heir by ‖ another.

‖ Or, a stranger.

23 For first, she hath disobeyed the [k] law of the most High: and secondly, she hath trespassed against her own husband; and thirdly, she hath played the whore in adultery, and brought children by another man.

B. C. cir. 200.

[k] Exod. 20. 14.

24 She shall be brought out into the congregation, and ‖ inquisition shall be made of her children.

‖ Or, visitation.

25 Her [l] children shall not take root, and her branches shall bring forth no fruit.

[l] Wisd. 4. 3.

26 She shall leave her memory to be cursed, and her reproach shall not be blotted out.

27 And they that remain shall know that there is nothing better than the fear of the Lord, and that there is nothing sweeter than to take heed unto the commandments of the Lord.

28 It is great glory to follow the not refer to this). Prov. xxx. 20 is more parallel, and Ecclus. xxiii. 18 seems to have this verse in view. But the euphemism was adopted in later Hebrew parlance (as פַּת, "bread"), and is very coarsely carried into detail in Shabb. 62 b, last line.

19. The language is abrupt, but all the more striking.

And the eyes of men are his fear.] I.e. the object of his fear. It is difficult to reproduce the last clause. Perhaps this gives it most nearly: and fully looking into [perceiving] the secret places (lit., "parts"). This verse and that which follows are a very apt digression, which enhances the force of the admonition implied in the previous verses.

20. Before all things were [the All was] created they were known to Him, and so also after they were completed.] This is a bold Alexandrianism, for which the Syr. has what we believe correctly represents the original: "For before things are they are open before Him, nay and after the consummation of the world He judgeth it."

21. The writer returns to the subject in hand, and shews that although the adulterer may imagine that he can withdraw himself from the sight of God, yet He will bring his sin to light and punish it publicly by the hand of man.

22. From the male sinner the writer turns to the adulteress: Similarly also the wife. On the form παριστῶσα, see Winer, p. 72.

23. Instead of "her own husband," the Syr. has "the husband of her virginity." It has also only one verb, instead of the Greek: "she hath disobeyed . . . she hath trespassed." Probably the original had only the expressive בְּגֵרָה, which would equally apply to her sin before God and towards man.

24. In the first clause the Syr. has: "she shall be driven from the congregation." The Greek seems to contemplate the public inquisition into her crime, which appears more likely to be correct than the excommunication indicated by the Syr., or the Syr. may have had Deut. xxii. 21 in view. In the second clause it is added that the consequences of her sin shall be felt by her children, and upon her children shall be visitation, —probably יִפָּקֵד עֲוֹנָהּ. Syr.: "and upon her children shall her sins be remembered."

27. The Syr.: "and all the inhabitants of the earth shall know, and all that are left in the world shall understand." It seems scarcely likely that these two clauses were in the original. Was the first clause original, and was the second taken from a comparison with the Greek translation? [See the General Introduction, § VIII.] Or are we to regard it as a Christian addition or rather amplification?

Digitized by Google

B. C. cir. 200. Lord, and to be received of him is long life.

CHAPTER XXIV.

1 Wisdom doth praise herself, shew her beginning, 4 her dwelling, 13 her glory, 17 her fruit, 26 her increase and perfection.

B. C. cir. 200. The praise of Wisdom.

WISDOM shall praise herself, and shall glory in the midst of her people.

2 In the congregation of the most High shall she open her mouth, and triumph before his power.

28. This verse in the A. V. must be omitted.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Once more the closing lines of the preceding chapter form a transition to this, which is aptly headed in the LXX., "Praise of Wisdom." The beauty of this chapter has been generally acknowledged. Accordingly it has not only been separately translated into German (see the literature in Fritzsche, p. 124), but also repeatedly into Hebrew. Here we have to mention first the Hebrew translation by Lowth (in 'De sacra poesi Hebr. prælectiones,' ed. Oxon), reprinted by Fritzsche in his 'Comment. on Ecclus.' ('Kurzgef. Exeg. Handb. ü. d. Apokr.,' v., pp. 134–136), and furnished by him with Notes marking the alterations made by him in his own independent translation. While fully recognising the merits of this version, it must be admitted that it leaves not a little to be desired. Next, although not in the order of time, we have the version of Isaac Seckel Fränkel in his Hebrew translation of the Apocrypha (Leipzig, 1830). This elegant rendering is not open to some of the objections which have been made to that of Lowth. But it is far inferior in beauty of classical Hebrew to that of Ben Seebh (see General Introd.). The latter, however, follows to a great extent the Syriac, and often deviates from the Greek text. Passing from this to the subject-matter of the chapter, its general arrangement seems as follows. After an introduction in two verses, in which Wisdom places herself, as it were, in the midst of Israel, follow three stanzas in praise of Wisdom, each consisting of five verses. Stanza I. (vv. 3–7) presents Wisdom before Israel's history commenced; Stanza II. describes Wisdom as having taken root in the midst of Israel (vv. 8–12); Stanza III. sets forth the glory and beauty of the tree thus planted (vv. 13–17; v. 18 must be omitted). These three stanzas are followed, in a fourth stanza (of four verses, 19–22), by an admonition to accept that Wisdom. This stanza seems to form a transition to what we regard as the underlying thought in the rest of the chapter (two stanzas: 6 + 5 verses). Their purport may, for want of better terms, be described as prophetic and missionary—not in any controversial sense, nor even as directly referring or addressing itself to the heathen world, but as embodying the thought and hope that the river of Wisdom, swelling in the fulness of its waters, shall yet become a sea; that her morning light shall spread to the utmost bounds of earth, and that her teaching as prophecy shall sound in the ears of all and to all generations (vv. 30–34). The Syriac translation leaves no doubt that the chapter formed part of the original work of Sirach. Thus viewed, the chapter is of the greatest importance, as illustrating not only the religious views of the writer but, by implication, also the date of the composition of his book and the religious history of that period. For we mark a decided advance upon Prov. viii. That chapter itself is characteristic of the Chokhmah-literature of Israel, but of its biblical period, although of a late stage in it. But Ecclus. xxiv. goes much beyond it in the direction of admitting the influence of Grecian thought, and indicating a benignant attitude towards the world outside the bounds of Israel. The former appears even from the manner in which Wisdom is described; the latter, from the thoughts and hopes expressed of the ultimate universal prevalence and acceptance of Israel's Divine Wisdom in the happy future in prospect. Eichhorn regards this chapter as beginning the Second Part of Ecclesiasticus (to xlii. 14); Fritzsche, as opening Section III.

1. The meaning would probably be more accurately thus represented: "Let Wisdom praise herself, and in the midst of her people let her glory." The writer, as it were, calls upon Wisdom to open her mouth and to set forth her excellency before the whole people. The future tense is to be understood in this jussive sense. From v. 3 onwards Wisdom is introduced as responding to this call.

her people.] The Syr. has "the people of God." This, no doubt correctly. It also has "she will be honoured" instead of "let her glory."

2. In the congregation of the Most High [probably בְּעֲדַת אֵל, as in the Syr.] let her open her mouth, and let her glory [i.e. set forth her glory] before His Might [i.e. before God].] The most divergent opinions prevail as to the meaning of the expression "before His Might" (ἔναντι δυνάμεως αὐτοῦ). Lowth renders לִפְנֵי חֵילוֹ, "before His host," pre-

B. C. cir. 200.

3 I came out of the mouth of the most High, and covered the earth as a [1] cloud.

4 [a] I dwelt in high places, and [b] my throne is in a cloudy pillar.

5 I alone compassed the circuit of heaven, and walked in the bottom of the deep.

6 In the waves of the sea, and in all the earth, and in every people and nation, I got a possession.

7 With all these I sought rest:

B. C. cir. 200.

[1] Or, a mist.

[a] Job 22. 14.

[b] Ps. 104. 3.

sumably Israel; Fritzsche, לִפְנֵי עֻזּוֹ, "before His Might"; Fränkel, עֻזּוֹ. We believe that the original was לִפְנֵי הַגְּבוּרָה; literally, "before the Might," but a very common mode of expression in later Hebrew for "before God." Perhaps, however, the Hebrew may have been לפני גבורתו.

3. Wisdom responds to the appeal: "I came forth from the mouth of the Most High." This is the earliest identification of Wisdom with the λόγος, but as yet only as God manifesting, not as having manifested, Himself: hence not yet "the Word."

cloud.] The dark and misty cloud. The λόγος as the creative (or rather the formative) agency is brooding over the face of the dark chaotic deep. What in Gen. i. 2 is said of "the Spirit of God" is here attributed to Wisdom, with this additional difference, that this emanation of Wisdom from God as He is manifesting Himself is represented as immediately preceding that orderly arrangement of the world in which Wisdom is the agent. The older Church writers regarded this personification of Wisdom as the Christ. But the vital difference of thought in Ecclus. is apparent from the following verses (see especially v. 9). We find here, not the beginnings of Christianity, but of Alexandrianism; and the personification (?) or rather distinction of Wisdom as God manifesting Himself points forward to Philo, not to the Gospels.

4. I dwelt in the heights, and my throne (is, was?) on the pillar of cloud.] We cannot see in this any reference to the cloudy pillar in the wilderness. It is true that Philo ('Quis rer. Div. her.' § 42) regards the cloud which separated Israel and the Egyptians (Ex. xiv. 19) as an emblem of Wisdom, but the whole context forbids us to identify this allegorical combination with the passage before us (see Dähne, 'Jüd. Alex. Relig. Phil.' ii. pp. 134, 135). The figure of Wisdom as enthroned on a pillar of cloud is sublime.

5. The figure is further developed. Amidst the solemn silence and solitude prevailing Wisdom fills all and pervades all.

I compassed.] In the sense of "I circled," or of "I went round about," סַבּוֹתִי.

alone.] The Syr. has: "together with Him." The difference is great, and of serious importance if the inference which it suggests be well grounded. We can scarcely account for it merely by a different reading of the same or similar Hebrew letters. For the Syr. at least suggests the word עִמּוֹ. And, irrespective of this, the rendering of the Greek evidently suits the context, which the Syriac does not. It would therefore seem that the Syr. expression "together with Him" represents an intentional alteration on the part of the translator? If so, remembering that the ancient Christian writers identified "Wisdom" in Ecclus. with Christ, it suggests a Christian hand, either in the translation or the redaction of the text. Without claiming certainty for our inference, the alteration in this verse forms an important element in determining the question of the Christian authorship of the Syr. Version. In any case the expression "together with Him" goes much beyond the language of Prov. viii. 30, in which Wisdom presents herself as "an artificer by His side" (אָצְלוֹ—certainly not = "together with Him"). When the Siracide speaks of the all-pervading presence of Wisdom, he refers presumably to her formative agency in regard to our present world.

in the bottom of the deep.] Lit. in the depth of the abysses. The expression is interesting.

6. We advance another step. The rule of Wisdom is to be traced, not only in nature, but also among men.

I got a possession.] Fritzsche supposes the Greek to have misunderstood קָנִיתִי in the original; that the word here meant "I created" (as in Prov. viii. 22 and other places); and that it should have been translated by ἔκτισα. But this seems impossible. The underlying idea would not be Hebraic—in fact, it would be inconsistent with Prov. viii. 22. Nor yet would it be Alexandrian, as even the Greek translation of the verse shews. Still less would it belong to that intermediate period to which we ascribe the work of the Siracide. Lastly, what would be the meaning of a creative agency of Wisdom "in the waves of the sea, and in all the earth, and in every people and nation"? Our difficulty is rather increased than diminished by the Syr., which renders: "I was given rule [or control] over and in whose inheritance shall I abide?

B. C. cir. 200.

8 So the Creator of all things gave me a commandment, and he that made me caused my tabernacle to rest, and said, Let thy dwelling be in Jacob, and thine inheritance in Israel.

9 He [c] created me from the beginning before the world, and I shall never fail.

10 In the [d] holy tabernacle I served before him; and so was I established in Sion.

11 [e] Likewise in the ‖ beloved city

B. C. cir. 200.

[c] Prov. 8. 22.

[d] Exod. 31. 3.

[e] Ps. 132. 8, 13, 14.

‖ Or, holy.

the waves of the sea," &c. Did the Syr. purposely choose an expression that might mean one thing or another, or must we regard this as an emendation similar to that in v. 5?

7. With all these.] Viz. every people and nation. We can scarcely doubt that the question here propounded by Wisdom (although not necessarily addressed to God, as Fritzsche supposes) expresses what was afterwards formulated by the Rabbis in the legend that the Law had been offered to, and refused by, every nation before it was accepted by Israel at Mount Sinai ('Abh. Z.' 2 b, towards the end). The legend in the Talmud was supported by an appeal to Deut. xxxiii. 2 and Hab. iii. 2. Possibly the legend represents a survival of the fundamental thought of Alexandrianism, or rather of that more free thinking which in Palestine itself formed the root and source of what afterwards was developed in Jewish Hellenism as the idea of an original share of all mankind in that highest Wisdom which found its full expression in the Law. Long after such views had passed away in Palestine, and indeed evoked the bitter antagonism of the Rabbis, its leading idea may, all unconsciously to themselves, have survived in this legend. From its theological aspect that question ultimately resolves itself into the great problem which must engage every thoughtful student of Revelation: that of the universal Fatherhood of God. How differently it was solved in the Gospel and in Apostolic preaching, need not here be explained.

8. So.] Rather, then. The reference here is to the Revelation of God in Israel, and more particularly to the Law, wherein Wisdom, which is the emanation of God, restfully tabernacled upon earth.

and thine inheritance in Israel.] Lit. "and let thine inheritance be given thee in Israel."

9. from the beginning.] Fritzsche (objecting with reason to the מראשית of Lightfoot) suggests מִקֶּדֶם as the original Hebrew, but incorrectly, and his appeal to Mic. v. 1 only goes against him. We believe the Hebrew words were מֵעוֹלָם and מֵרֹאשׁ, as in Prov. viii. 23, which, indeed, the LXX. renders by the same words as in our passage (πρὸ τοῦ αἰῶνος . . . ἐν ἀρχῇ—in our passage ἀπ' ἀρχῆς). The verse reads as follows: Before the Aeon [i.e. before time began], from the beginning, He created me (the two terms are evidently not identical, as Fritzsche supposes); and to the Aeon [i.e. the end of time] I shall not ever fail. The Syr. has: "Before the world I was created, and to the Aeon of Aeons [eternity] my remembrance shall not fail." Here also we should perhaps note as significant the alteration "to the Aeon of Aeons" in the Syr. for the Greek "to the Aeon." The expression "Aeon of Aeons," or, more frequently, "the Aeons of Aeons," is frequent in the N. Test. It does not occur in the Gospels, where συντέλεια τοῦ αἰῶνος is peculiar to St. Matthew (there five times, once in Heb. ix. 26), but in the Pauline Epistles (Gal. i. 5; Eph. iii. 21; Phil. iv. 20; 1 Tim. i. 17; 2 Tim. iv. 18), in Heb. (i. 8; xiii. 21), in 1 Pet. (iv. 11), and especially in the Book of Revelation (there fourteen times). In the Old Testament it is only found in Dan. vii. 18 (there also in the LXX.). Besides this, it occurs in the LXX. (with the exception of 1 Esdr. iv. 38) exclusively, although frequently, in the version of the Psalms (there not less than twenty-eight times), and in Tob. vi. 18. Does this indicate that the LXX. version of the Psalms was made after Daniel, in which the expression was apparently introduced—but soon after it, as the frequency of its occurrence seems to suggest? It also occurs in the Targum Onkelos, and later on in that on the Psalms, which cannot date earlier than the second half of the 7th century. We regard it as characteristic of the anti-Hellenistic tendency of the Syr. that, while making the last clause of v. 8 a separate verse (v. 9), it adds to v. 9 (which in the Syr. is v. 10) the first clause of our Greek v. 10. For thereby what in the Greek exhibits Wisdom in a wider and universal aspect (v. 9) becomes strictly Judaic (comp. the note on v. 34). If the emendations, therefore, are Christian, they must be Judæo-Christian. To complete its re-arrangement of the verses, the Syr. adds the Greek v. 10 b to v. 11, which thus becomes a verse of three lines.

10. and so.] The Syr. has "and again." Had the original וְגַם, or did the Syr. wish to convey something special?

was I established.] In all probability the

B. C. cir. 200. he gave me rest, and in Jerusalem was my power.

12 And I took root in an honourable people, even in the portion of the Lord's inheritance.

13 I was exalted like a cedar in Libanus, and as a cypress tree upon the mountains of Hermon.

14 I was exalted like a palm tree in En-gaddi, and as a rose plant in Jericho, as a fair olive tree in a pleasant field, and grew up as a plane tree by the water.

Or, Cades.

Or, in the water.

15 I gave a sweet smell like cinnamon and aspalathus, and I yielded a pleasant odour like the best myrrh, as galbanum, and onyx, and sweet storax, and as the fume of frankincense in the tabernacle.

B. C. cir. 200.

f Exod. 30. 34, 36

16 As the turpentine tree I stretched out my branches, and my branches are the branches of honour and grace.

17 g As the vine brought I forth pleasant savour, and my flowers are the fruit of honour and riches.

g John 15. 1.

18 I am the mother of fair love, and fear, and knowledge, and holy hope: I therefore, being eternal, am given to all my children which are named of him.

Or, chosen.

19 h Come unto me, all ye that be

h Isai. 55. 1.

Hebrew had, as the Syr., קִנָּמִי, which bears the Greek rendering. The verse points to the presence of God and the Divinely instituted worship in the Tabernacle, which became permanent in the Temple. In the Tabernacle Wisdom became, as it were, the ministrant, and in this her office she was established in Zion. At the same time, this verse, when viewed in connexion with v. 9, is not by any means Judaic in the special sense of the term. For Wisdom, which in v. 9 was spoken of in relation to the world generally, is in v. 10 only presented as concentrating her agency: she has her ministration in the Levitical worship, and her Metropolis, so to speak, is in Zion. And this mode of viewing Wisdom is, as we have seen, characteristic of the theological standpoint of the older Siracide.

11. my power.] Rather, my authority, "rule," as in the Syr.

12. And I took root in an honoured people [one that attained honour, became distinguished through this very thing] in the portion of the Lord, (the portion) of His inheritance. (Comp. Deut. xxxii. 9, where the LXX. has the same two words.)

13. This verse begins a new stanza. I was exalted.] Rather, I grew lofty. Wisdom having thus taken root, her glory is next set forth under some figures.

14. I was exalted.] Rather, I grew lofty.

in En-gaddi.] The Vat. text has ἐν αἰγιαλοῖς, "by the sea-shores," but the reading of the A. V., found in one or another form in several MSS., must be preferred, as being confirmed by the Syr. and also generally more suitable, since palms are not supposed to attain any special height by the sea-shore, while Engedi was celebrated for its palms, as even its other name, Chatsatson Tamar, indicates. Omit "pleasant" before "field;" omit also "by the water." The Syr., however, has the words, "a rose plant," — no doubt in Heb., as in the Syr., וְרֶד, or else וְרֻדָּא. The word occurs in the Mishnah.

15. But there is not only glory: beauty also and sweetness, as well as rich fruit.

like cinnamon and aromatic aspalathos.] The latter is described by Pliny as of the height of a small tree, with flower of rose. Its root was used for making a precious ointment.

I yielded.] Rather, I spread, I diffused. The words "in the tabernacle" are omitted in the Syr. The omission further indicates the Christian authorship of this version.

16. Rather, and my branches (were) branches of glory and grace — "grace" here in the sense of beauty. For "terebinth" the Syr. has "rhododaphne," the rose-laurel, probably either a species of oleander or a rhododendron.

17. I, like a vine, budded forth beauty [adopting the Alex. reading, ἐβλάστησα], and my flowers (ripen into) fruit of glory and riches.] We are here reminded of St. John xv. 1.

18. This verse in the A. V. must be omitted. It is probably of Christian authorship. It is not found in the Syr., which in general arranges the previous verses somewhat differently.

19. This verse begins another stanza (see the introductory remarks to the chapter). On the ground of the previous description, Wisdom now makes her appeal to all men.

B. C. cir. 200.

desirous of me, and fill yourselves with my fruits.

Ps. 19. 10, 11.

20 For my memorial is i sweeter than honey, and mine inheritance than the honeycomb.

21 They that eat me shall yet be hungry, and they that drink me shall yet be thirsty.

22 He that obeyeth me shall never be confounded, and they that work by me shall not do amiss.

B. C. cir. 200.

23 All these things are the book of the covenant of the most high God, even the k law which Moses commanded for an heritage unto the congregations of Jacob.

k Exod. 20. 1. & 24. 3. Deut. 4. 1. & 29. 1. & 33. 4.

24 Faint not to be strong in the Lord; that he may confirm you, cleave unto him: l for the Lord Almighty is God alone, and beside him there is no other Saviour.

l Isai. 45. 21.

25 He filleth all things with his fruits.] Lit., products. The Syr. is somewhat paraphrastic.

20. For my remembrance [the memory, thought of me] is more sweet than honey, and mine inheritance [this suits the context better than "portion"] above the honeycomb.] We read with some MSS. and many authorities, κηρίον (Alex., 248, and cognate MSS. κηρίου); the Vulg. (which has Spiritus meus for "my remembrance") renders: super mel et favum; the Syr. has simply favus. More probably the Hebrew had צוּף־דְּבַשׁ, as in Prov. xvi. 24; and the word occurs again in נֹפֶת צוּפִים, "the forthpouring of the honey cells," Ps. xix. 11 (see Delitzsch, ad loc.). This verse and the following have this additional interest that they show the well-known hymn attributed (rightly, in its genuine parts) to St. Bernard of Clairvaux, to have been based on Ecclus. xxiv. [The hymn in Daniel, 'Thes. Hymnol.' i. p. 222; Mone, 'Hymni Lat.' i. p. 329; and again in Daniel, u. s. iv. p. 215. It is in parts translated in the well-known hymn, "Jesu, the very thought of Thee," 'Hymns Ancient and Modern,' 178; the first stanza more closely in Hymn 177. In its entirety it has been translated by the present writer: 'The Jubilee Rhythm of St. Bernard and other Hymns,' London, 1867.] The opening stanza of the hymn is an adaptation of Ecclus. xxiv. 20: Jesu dulcis memoria—dans vera cordis gaudia—sed super mel et omnia—dulcis ejus praesentia. Again Ecclus. xxiv. 21 reappears in lines 45, 46 (apud Mone; 77, 78, apud Daniel): qui te gustant, esuriunt—qui bibunt, adhuc sitiunt. And this settles a curious literary question. Mone gives the hymn from the oldest MS. (dating from the 14th cent.: see u. s. p. 330), in which it bears the title: Cursus de aeterna sapientia, and alike he and Daniel (u. s. t. iv.) are uncertain as to the origin of the superscription de aeterna sapientia, which so widely differs from those in other MSS. But in view of the connexion between this hymn and Ecclus. xxiv. its ancient title seems accounted for. The expression cursus is either = officium horarum, or else = the δρόμος τῆς πίστεως—in this instance more likely the latter, although the hymn is arranged for "the hours."

22. be confounded.] Rather, be ashamed.

not do amiss.] Rather, not sin. Syr.: "shall never fall, and all his works shall not be corrupted"—they shall be incorruptible, either in the sense of their being permanent in value and goodness, or in that of not becoming gradually perverted. The Syr. version gives, in our view, a better meaning than the Greek. In the original the first clause was probably, as in the Syr., שֹׁמֵעַ לִי לֹא יֵבוֹשׁ. Fritzsche explains: "he shall not be put to shame," viz. as regards his hope of happiness, by obedience to the Divine commandments. But the second clause is against this interpretation.

23. The Greek is here peculiarly interesting. Literally it reads: "All these [with reference to all that was previously said of Wisdom] the book of the covenant of the most high God." The sentence requires some verb. The Syr. has: "all these (things) are written in the book of the covenant of the Lord." We believe that the Hebrew had כָּל אֵלֶּה בְּסֵפֶר בְּרִית יְיָ, "all these things are in the book of the covenant of Jehovah," and that the Greek, by way of giving a Hellenistic turn to the statement, left out the בְּ, so as simply to identify Wisdom with the Law. We suspect a somewhat similar tendency in the next clause: "the law which Moses commanded, an [the?] inheritance to the congregations of Jacob" (we punctuate as Tischendorf and as in the Alex.). The plural "congregations" must refer to the Diaspora, and would scarcely have been in the original. The Syr. has: "the law which Moses commanded, it is an inheritance to the congregation of Jacob." The expression מַקְהֲלוֹת, Ps. xxvi. 12, and מִקְהָלוֹת, Ps. lxviii. 27—both rendered by the LXX. ἐν ἐκκλησίαις—certainly do not here afford a parallel so as to explain the plural. The accus. νόμον, by virtue of attraction (see Winer, u. s. § 66, 5, p. 552).

B. C. cir. 200.

wisdom, as [m] Phison and as Tigris in the time of the new fruits.

26 He maketh the understanding to abound like Euphrates, and as [n] Jordan in the time of the harvest.

27 He maketh the doctrine of knowledge appear as the light, and as Geon in the time of vintage.

28 The first man knew her not perfectly: no more shall the last find her out.

29 For her thoughts are more than the sea, and her counsels profounder than the great deep.

30 I also came out as a ‖brook from a river, and as a conduit into a garden.

31 I said, I will water my best garden, and will water abundantly my garden bed: and, lo, my brook became a river, and my river became a sea.

[m] Gen. 2. 11.

[n] Josh. 3. 15.

‖ Or, drain, or, ditch.

24. This verse in the A. V. must be omitted.

25. Which [viz. the Law] maketh wisdom full as Phison, and as Tigris in the time of the new fruits.] The Greek seems to convey the meaning that the Law gives the fulness of wisdom, which is again a Hellenistic turn for the Syr.: "which is full, as Phison, with wisdom." And this, as we suppose, the original had. The point of comparison is: when these rivers are most full of water.

in the time of the new fruits.] יְמֵי הַבִּכּוּרִים, Numb. xxviii. 26. The allusion here is not to Pentecost (as seems implied in v. 26 b), since the rivers would then not be in flood. St. Jerome (on Hagg. ii.) rightly describes Nisan (Abhibh)—March or April—as "the month of the new fruits" (mensis novorum). Very significantly the streams selected are those of Paradise: Pishon, Gen. ii. 11, and Hiddeqel (Tigris), Gen. ii. 14. The figure is continued in v. 26. The Syr. must have confused the lines. It has: "as Tigris in the days of field-products [harvest] . . . and as Jordan in the days of Nisan."

27. It [the Law] maketh instruction [viz. of the moral kind, παιδεία] to appear [brings it forth], like the Nile.] The Greek has "as the light," but this evidently from a misunderstanding of the Hebrew בָּאוֹר, which, as in Amos viii. 8, stands for בְּיָאוֹר, comp. Amos ix. 5 (see Hitzig-Steiner, 'Kurzgef. Exeg. Handb.' ad loc.; and Gutmann, 'd. Apokr.' p. 83, note). The Syr. renders the word correctly.

Geon.] Gen. ii. 13: afterwards regarded as the Nile (comp. LXX. Jer. ii. 18).

28. The first [viz. man, not, as Fritzsche supposes, the first searcher] knew her [viz., here again, Wisdom] not perfectly [did not complete to know her, did not finish knowledge of Wisdom]; and likewise the last (man) shall not search her out.] She is beyond the complete ken of man.

29. For her thought [thinking?] is full more than the sea, and her counsel more than the great deep.] So abundant that it cannot be all taken in (v. 28 a); so deep that it cannot be quite searched out (v. 28 b). Ἀπό—a well-known Hebraism (comp. Vorstius, 'de hebr. N. T.,' p. 352).

30. A new stanza. Wisdom being thus beyond the compass of unaided man, she made for herself a channel in Revelation, and specifically in the Law, by which to carry her fertilising waters in the first place to her "garden," viz. Israel. But this river is yet to become a sea: the blessings first communicated to Israel are to be shared by all mankind and to all ages, and so shall the final aim of Wisdom be realised and her true character appear.

And I came out as a channel from a river, and as a conduit into an orchard [garden, park, παράδεισος].] Mark that this channel and conduit issued from the paradisiac streams previously referred to. The underlying idea seems to be that these rivers had compassed all Paradise—that originally all mankind were intended to have share in that Divine Wisdom, but that in the course of time (comp. vv. 7–9) her waters passed through the channel of the Law into Israel, which thus became "a well-watered garden," Is. lviii. 11, κῆπος μεθύων—the two words actually occur in v. 31. It is therefore the Law which, as Wisdom residing in the midst of Israel, is once more the speaker.

31. Omit from the A. V. "best" before "garden."

my brook, &c.] Rather, the channel became to me a river. The last line is specially interesting: "and my river became a sea." For this the Syr. has: "and the river went down to the sea." It is scarcely possible to account for this difference either by a misreading or a mistranslation of the original. Nor can we suppose that the Syr. made an alteration of the original: first, because the thought which it expresses is much more Hebraic than the Greek version (we suppose both the Heb. and the Syr. to have referred to the Diaspora); secondly, because we cannot perceive any object for such an alteration

B. C. cir. 200.

32 I will yet make doctrine to shine as the morning, and will send forth her light afar off.

33 I will yet pour out doctrine as prophecy, and leave it to all ages for ever.

[a] ch. 33. 17.

34 [a]Behold that I have not laboured for myself only, but for all them that seek wisdom.

B. C. cir. 200.

CHAPTER XXV.

1 What things are beautiful, and what hateful. 6 What is the crown of age. 7 What things make men happy. 13 Nothing worse than a wicked woman.

‖ Or, gloried.

IN three things I ‖was beautified, and stood up beautiful both before God and men: the [a]unity of brethren, in the Syriac. For we cannot regard it as an allusion to the communication of Israel's Wisdom to the Gentiles by the Gospel (see next verse). On the other hand, if the alteration be on the part of the Greek translator, its object and meaning are obvious. The narrow channel of the Law becomes the wide river of prophetic declaration, of true Wisdom-lore, perhaps swelled by Grecian tributaries; and this again merges into the boundless sea, when Wisdom shall be no longer Hebraic nor yet Grecian, but universal, watering every shore. That such was the meaning of the Greek translator seems confirmed by the verses which follow.

[a] Gen. 13. 8. Ps. 133. 1. Rom. 12. 10.

32. I will yet light up instuction [in the moral and religious sense] as the dawn [ὄρθρος = שַׁחַר, Joel ii. 2 — כְּשַׁחַר פָּרֻשׂ עַל־הָהָרִים, possibly the figure may have been in the mind of the writer, although with very different application], and I will cause it [instruction] to shine forth [shew it] unto afar off.] Αὐτά: see Winer, u. s. § 22, 3, p. 128, for the combination of these pronouns in the plural with a noun in the sing. Fritzsche suggests that ῥήματα παιδείας was in the mind of the translator. The Syr. has: "Yet again shall I declare [tell] my doctrine in the morning and shall leave it to many ages." The latter clause appears in the Greek as v. 33 b. As regards the first clause, the בְּ—as the dawn or morning—has been evidently misread בָּ. Irrespective of this alteration, it must be left undetermined whether the Greek or the Syr. correctly represents the Hebrew original. Our view is in favour of the Syr.

33. I will yet pour forth teaching [instruction] as prophecy.] Possibly a Hellenistic adaptation of Joel ii. 28 may have been intended by the Greek translator. The Syr. has: "Yet again shall I declare [tell] my doctrine in prophecy" (once more—possibly though not probably—a confusion of בָּ and בְּ).

and leave it unto generations of Aeons = all generations, the εἰς marking the time, not the persons. For this clause the Syr. has: "and the end will be unto afar off." Possibly the original may have had (as in Talmudic usage) such a word as אוּרְיְתָא, "doctrines," "teaching," and the Syr. may have misread it אַחֲרִיתָהּ.

34. The final exclamation of the Jewish Law, thoroughly Hellenistic in spirit: "Behold that I laboured not for myself only, but for all them that seek her," viz. Wisdom: the Law laboured not only for the Jews, but for all who sought Wisdom. The Syr. omits this verse, nor do we believe that it was in the original Hebrew. We may perhaps suggest that the younger Siracide introduced it in this place from xxxiii. 17 (in the A. V.; xxx. 26 in the Greek MSS.), where the wording is similar, although not the connexion.

CHAPTER XXV.

From the height attained in ch. xxiv. the writer again descends to the general level of this book. In the chapter before us various proverbial sayings, the outcome of a not very elevated Oriental experience of life, are grouped under the headings of things desirable and undesirable. The first two verses are general. They are followed by a statement of what is desirable and honourable in old age, and specially in the eldership (four verses: vv. 3–6), and of what is generally desirable in life (five verses: vv. 7–11). Then follows what is undesirable in life (three verses: vv. 13–15; v. 12 in A. V. must be omitted); lastly, what is undesirable in that which forms the largest factor in life, the family and the relation between the sexes (eleven verses: vv. 16–26).

1. Interpreters have regarded the text as in a state of confusion, nor indeed is it easy to determine who is introduced as speaking in v. 1. The Syr. has: "Three things my soul desired, and they are beautiful before God and man." As regards the Greek text we are inclined to believe that the writer intended here to introduce universal Wisdom as speaking in her character of discipline or "instruction" (xxiv. 32, 33). In any case it seems difficult, without altering the whole text, to give it the meaning of the Syr., which the Vct. Lat. follows. Translate: concord among brethren (viz. of the same

B. C. cir. 200. the love of neighbours, a man and a wife that agree together.

2 Three sorts of men my soul hateth, and I am greatly offended at their life: a poor man that is proud, a rich man that is a liar, and an old adulterer that doateth.

3 If thou hast gathered nothing in thy youth, how canst thou find any thing in thine age?

4 O how comely a thing is judgment for gray hairs, and for ancient men to know counsel!

5 O how comely is the wisdom of old men, and understanding and counsel to men of honour! B. C. cir. 200.

6 Much experience is the crown of old men, and the fear of God is their glory.

7 There be nine things which I have judged in mine heart to be happy, and the tenth I will utter with my tongue: A man that hath joy of his children; and he that liveth to see the fall of his enemy:

8 Well is him that dwelleth with nation, Israel), affection among kindred, &c. We have thus an ascending climax of relationship.

2. But three sorts (of men) my soul hateth, and I greatly abhor [abominate, am vexed at?] their manner of life [ζωή—so probably, although possibly their life = the fact of their existence; the latter would be better Greek]: a poor man who is arrogant [ὑπερήφανος, not merely "proud," but arrogantly and insolently so], a rich man who is lying [as it were: a beggar who is a braggart, and a rich man who makes promises and breaks them. The bearing or conduct of these two "sorts" is utterly incongruous, absolutely inexcusable, nay unaccountable; it is of a character to evoke abhorrence, or else to make one wish such persons out of existence], and an aged adulterer [an adulterous old man] who is wanting in understanding.] The last clause must be regarded not as an apposition, but, as frequently in Hebrew, as generally applying to and describing the conduct of such an one. Like that of the other two, his conduct is utterly incongruous, inexcusable, nay unaccountable and abominable. For what we have rendered "arrogant," ὑπερήφανος, the Hebrew had no doubt נְאָה, as (four if not five times) in the LXX.; for "who is lying" it would have כֹּזֵב; כּוֹב with לְ meaning "to lie to a person," "to deceive him,"—more particularly "to break one's plighted word" (comp. Ps. lxxxix. 36). The Syr. does not specify the sin in the third clause, but has: "and an old man who is foolish and wanting in knowledge." Similarly the Vet. Lat. and the Syr. Hex. The Talmud mentions these three things as what "the mind cannot bear," adding as a fourth: a Parnas—official, administrator in the congregation—who exalts himself over the congregation: either in the sense of vanity or else of neglecting their wants (Pes. 113 b).

3. If thou hast not gathered in youth.] The Syr. adds "wisdom." Similar sentiments are expressed in Talmudic writings, the most closely resembling that of the Son of Sirach being the following quoted as a proverb: "If in thy youth thou hast not desired them (the words of the Law), how shalt thou attain them in thine old age?" (Ab. d. R. Nath. xxiv. about the middle).—The sentence is intended to prepare for the praise in the next verses of a wise old age, for which it is necessary to gather the stores in youth.

4. judgment.] מִשְׁפָּט, in the sense of "right, justice."

ancient men.] Rather, aged men.

to know counsel.] The Syr., "understanding." Only such old age as here described is desirable.

5. how comely is the wisdom of elders, and understanding and counsel to those placed in honour.] We believe the reference here to be to the official elders, the γέροντες, זְקֵנִים, the members of the γερουσία. This view is confirmed by the next verse; and in that case v. 6 also gains additional meaning. Similarly the Syr. has "dignitaries."

6. The crown of elders [again in the official sense] is much experience, and their glory (boast) fear the Lord.] See previous verse. This adorns and dignifies them in truth.

7. A new stanza: what is desirable in life: Lit. Nine suppositions [= cases supposed] I in heart [i.e. in my own unspoken thinking and wishing] deem happy—while as to the tenth he has no hesitation in uttering and declaring it. The Syr. has: "Nine (things) which have not entered into my heart I have praised, and ten which I have not uttered." This must depend on a misreading. We would suggest that the original had תִּשַּׁע עָלוּ אֶל־לִבִּי, and that the Syr., dropping out the second ע, read: תִּשַּׁע לוֹא

B. C. cir. 200.

a wife of understanding, and that hath not [b]slipped with his tongue, and that hath not served a man more unworthy than himself:

[b] ch. 14. 1. & 19. 16. James 3. 2.

9 Well is him that hath found [‖]prudence, and he that speaketh in the ear of them that will hear:

‖ Or, a friend.

10 [c]O how great is he that findeth wisdom! yet is there none above him that feareth the Lord.

[c] Prov. 3. 13.

B. C. cir. 200.

11 But the love of the Lord passeth all things for illumination: he that holdeth it, [‖]whereto shall he be likened?

‖ Or, to whom.

12 The fear of the Lord is the beginning of his love: and faith is the beginning of cleaving unto him.

13 [Give me] any plague, but the plague of the heart: [d]and any wick-

[d] ver. 19.

לְלִבִּי, or even לוֹא אֶל־לִבִּי. The sentiment of the last clause is certainly not of an elevated character. For the remaining part of the verse the Syr. has: "the man who rejoiceth in his end" (presumably, who looks forward trustfully and joyously to the final Divine vindication and retribution, whether in this life or the next) "while he yet liveth shall see the fall of his enemies." We may feel certain that this was not in the original. It is another question whether the alteration was intentional or not. We believe the former, and that the Syr. sought, by a perhaps slight change in the Hebrew text, to convert what was an objectionable into a pious sentiment.

8. Three further "beatitudes" follow (the third, fourth, and fifth): "Well is him"—rather, happy he—"that hath not slipped;" rather, that slippeth not. Last clause: "and that serveth not one unworthy of him"—a person whose character or folly renders it derogatory, or a trial, to have to do his bidding or to be his subordinate. To the first clause of the verse there are many parallels in Rabbinic writings. But the Syr. addition to this clause is, so far as we remember, the only source of what is an undoubtedly Jewish simile for an ill-assorted marriage. The verse in the Syr. version reads: "Well to the husband of a good wife, who draws not the plough with an ox and an ass together." May the apostolic injunction (2 Cor. vi. 14), "Be not unequally yoked together with unbelievers"—which seems, in the first place, to refer to religiously unequal marriages—have been derived from a Jewish proverb, preserved in this Syr. rendering, rather than from Lev. xix. 19; Deut. xxii. 10? Or is the opposite the case, and did the Syr. derive its simile from 2 Cor. vi. 14? Instead of "that slippeth not with his tongue," the Syr. has, "whose tongue does not overthrow [destroy] him."

9. Beatitudes 6 and 7. Happy he who findeth [=attaineth] prudence—φρόνησις, in the sense of knowledge of what should be done. "And he that speaketh," viz. it,—that is, in the prudent direction to duty. The A. V., although not literal, gives the meaning accurately. The Syr. has "mercy" instead of "prudence." Probably the original had דֵּעָה, "knowledge," "prudence," as in אִישׁ דַּעַת (Prov. xxiv. 5), which the LXX. renders: ἀνὴρ φρόνησιν ἔχων; and the Syr. read, instead of דֵּעָה, the word רעה—which means "a friend," or else by a different punctuation of the Syr. may mean "mercy." In point of fact, the Vet. Lat. has here "a true friend."

10. Beatitudes 8 and 9. "Yet is there none;" rather, yet is he not. The Syr. omits this verse, but curiously interposes the following: "well to the man whom poverty has not broken, nor yet want hath broken"—possibly to make up the number of the beatitudes. "Wisdom" in its theoretical aspect is here distinguished from practical Wisdom, or the fear of the Lord.

11. The writer now sets forth that "tenth" thing he had in v. 7 declared it his purpose to "utter" with his tongue; that is, to make matter of special and explicit praise without fear of contradiction.

The fear of the Lord surpasseth above every thing.] Thus, and not as in the A. V.: the ὑπέρ in the verb, in addition to that preposition, represents the Hebrew עַל עָלָה. The second clause of the verse is omitted in the Syr.

holdeth.] Rather, holdeth fast.

whereto.] Perhaps, rather, to whom? To this question no answer is returned, perhaps to indicate that comparison is here not possible, since the condition of such a person surpasseth all else.

12. This verse deserves special attention. It does not occur either in the Vat. or in the Sinait. Cod. but in H., 248, Co. We can scarcely doubt that it is a spurious addition, and due to a Christian hand. That we find it in the Syr., and in the Vet. Lat. and the Arab., does not surprise us, and confirms our impression of the Christian origin of the Syr. Version, and of the dependence upon it of the Vet. Lat.

B. C. cir. 200.

edness, but the wickedness of a woman:

14 And any affliction, but the affliction from them that hate me: and any revenge, but the revenge of enemies.

15 There is no head above the head of a serpent; and there is no wrath above the wrath of an enemy.

[e] Prov. 21. 19. & 25. 24.

16 [e]I had rather dwell with a lion and a dragon, than to keep house with a wicked woman.

B. C. cir. 200.

17 The wickedness of a woman changeth her face, and darkeneth her countenance ‖ like sackcloth.

‖ Or, like a bear.

18 Her husband shall sit among his neighbours; and when he heareth it shall sigh bitterly.

19 [f]All wickedness is but little to the wickedness of a woman: let the portion of a sinner fall upon her.

[f] ver. 13.

13. A new stanza. After the res expetendæ come the res fugiendæ.

Any wound but not a wound of the heart, and any wickedness but not the wickedness of a woman.] The Syr. has in both clauses, "but not as;" the Vet. Lat. either misunderstood or alters the wording. In the Talmud we have this (we italicise the parallel words): "Any disease but not disease of the bowels; any wound but not a wound of the heart; any ache but not ache of the head; any wickedness but not a wicked woman" (Shabb. 11 a). This is interesting, as shewing that many of these sayings of the Siracide must have been proverbial among the Jews.

14. Any affliction but not the affliction of them [= from them].

15. This verse is one of the most curious and interesting from the exegetical point of view. Since the time of Bretschneider, it has been generally held that what the Greek rendered "head" and "head of a serpent" (κεφαλή) was a mistranslation of ראשׁ, "poison," as in Deut. xxxii. 33. And the evidence of what in itself seems probable lies in this, that the word θυμός, which occurs in the second clause of our verse in Ecclus., is the word by which the LXX. render ראשׁ in Deut. xxxii. 33. The correct rendering of the Hebrew text of Ecclus. xxv. 15 would therefore be: There is not a poison above [more virulent than] the poison of a serpent, nor rage [vehemence of passion] above the rage of an enemy. But this is not all. Not only has the Syr. also mistranslated ראשׁ by "head"—unless the word means in Syr. also "poison"—but it has: "There is not a head [poison?] more bitter than the head [poison?] of a serpent, and there is not an enmity of more bitterness than that of woman." The Vet. Lat. has: et non est ira super iram mulieris: thus giving another evidence of its dependence upon the Syriac. As regards the clause itself, we have little doubt that the Syr. here purposely altered the original Hebrew, which was correctly given by the Greek, and the alteration is the more cunning that it fits so well into the context of the following verses. But what was the purpose of the alteration? We cannot help suspecting that it was intended to allude to the doctrine of the fall of man.

16. A new stanza. I would rather [I should prefer to] dwell together with a lion and a dragon than dwell in the house with a wicked woman.

17. her face.] Rather, her appearance. The meaning of the second clause seems to be that it makes her face, or herself, sinister instead of being bright as the day. The Syr. has: "makes pale the face of her husband, and makes it dark, &c." It is not easy to account here for the change of person in the verse, although the Syr. seems more natural than the Greek. The Alex. has, instead of "like sackcloth," "like a bear"—possibly some misreading. Curiously the Vet. Lat. has both the Vat. and the Alex. reading: tamquam ursus, et quasi saccum ostendit. We conjecture that a later hand had altered the original translation and put, either in the text or margin, both the Alex. and the Vat. readings —markedly, the Alex. first—and that then an attempt had been made to make sense out of the two: nequitia . . . obcæcat vultum suum tamquam ursus (in the nomin.), &c.

18. In the midst of his neighbours [possibly in the sense of relatives] her husband resteth; and as he heareth [viz. either what is said of her, or else the praise of good women], he sigheth bitterly.] Instead of ἀκούσας, "and as he heareth," other texts have ἀκουσίως, "involuntarily." As the Syr. has the same, we imagine that this must be the correct reading. The Syr.: "In the midst of his companions sitteth the husband of the foolish woman, and involuntarily he sigheth." The Vet. Lat. seems once more to combine the two different readings, slightly altering them.

19. All.] Better, any. The Syr. modifies: "Manifold is wickedness, but it is not like the smallest wickedness of a wicked woman." It seems needless to quote Rabbinic

B. C. cir. 200.

20 As the climbing up a sandy way is to the feet of the aged, so is a wife ‖full of words to a quiet man.

‖ Or, scolding.

21 [g]Stumble not at the beauty of a woman, and desire her not for pleasure.

[g] 2 Sam. 11. 2. ch. 42. 12.

22 A woman, if she maintain her husband, is full of anger, impudence, and much reproach.

B. C. cir. 200.

23 A wicked woman abateth the courage, maketh an heavy countenance and a wounded heart: a woman that will not comfort her husband in distress maketh weak hands and feeble knees.

24 Of [h]the woman came the beginning of sin, and through her we all die.

[h] Gen. 3. 6. 1 Tim. 2. 14.

parallels, but we may mention that which, on the basis of Eccles. vii. 26, prays for deliverance from that which is worse than death —a wicked woman (Yebam. 63 a).

20. A sandy (place of) ascent, &c.] Equally trying to a quiet man is a woman who always puts in her words. The Syr. has, "of a long tongue."

21. These things being so, a general warning follows. "Stumble not," &c.—let not the beauty of a woman cause thee to stumble while pursuing thy way—and bear not desire after a woman. The Alex. supplements after "woman" ἐν κάλλει, and Fritzsche adopts this; but the addition seems to us disturbing. The Syr. has: "be not allured by the beauty of a wicked woman; and even if she have wealth, do not desire after her." This seems rather an alteration than a different reading of the text. The Vet. Lat. repeats the tautology of the Alex. reading.

22. Anger, impudence, and great shame, when a woman supplies [viz. his livelihood—but the word is difficult] to her husband.] Such are the consequences when a husband depends upon his wife for his living. The Syr. has: "for hard servitude and evil shame (is) a woman who doeth harm to and lords over her husband, and with whom the heart is also covered [who dissembleth]." The last clause is an addition—unless it be a strange mistranslation of the opening Greek words of the next verse (καρδία ταπεινή). Putting aside this clause, we suppose that the original had עֲבֹדָה קָשָׁה, "cruel wrath," —a similar expression in Gen. xlix. 7—in which the Greek misunderstood קָשָׁה for "impudent," as in Ezek. ii. 4, קְשֵׁי פָנִים, and then resolved the substant. and adject. into two substantives, while the Syr. misread the substantive and misrendered the adjective as if it had been עֲבֹדָה קָשָׁה, "hard service" (taking קשה in the primary meaning of the word). In that case the original would have meant "cruel anger" (viz. on the part of the wife), "and great shame" (viz. on the part of the husband). But how are we to account for the difference between the "sustaining" of the Greek, and the "doing harm and lording" in the Syriac. Can it be that there was here a confusion between some form of סער (in the Greek) and סער (in the Syr.)?

23. A wicked woman [here follow the results]: a heart depressed, a countenance sullen, and a heart stricken [lit., stroke of heart]; hands relaxed [weak, that hang down], and knees palsied: such an one as makes not happy her husband [causes not his happiness.] Two kinds of wives are here distinguished: the wicked woman and, in the second part of the verse, one who does not actually secure the happiness of her husband. The influence of such a wife on his life is paralysing. It deserves notice that the quotation from Is. xxxv. 3, "relaxed hands and palsied knees," is not literally taken from the LXX. The passage is again quoted in Heb. xii. 12—and there the same difference from the LXX. obtains, while the words are adduced precisely as in Ecclus.

24. The verse is remarkable, as ascribing to Eve not only the introduction of death, but also the commencement, although not the introduction, of sin. The first of these two propositions is not inconsistent with Ecclus. xiv. 17 (mark there the word διαθήκη, and the pointed reference to LXX. Gen. ii. 17). But we must be careful not to identify the statement that "of woman [came, or was] the beginning of sin" with the N. T. doctrine of original sin. The Hebrew had probably ראשית, and the Syr. here reproduces it: "from woman began sins." We surmise that in 1 Tim. ii., culminating in vv. 14, 15, the Apostle had this verse in Ecclus. in view, although his reference was no doubt also to Gen. iii. 17. [We might almost conjecture that one of the objects in 1 Tim. ii. 14, 15 was to prevent any false inference as to the undesirableness of the married estate on the part of Christian women.] Apart from this, it is noteworthy that the Apostle emphasises the introduction of sin through woman. In Galilee it was the custom for the women to go before the bier, so as to mark that death came through woman (Ber. R. 17).

B. C. cir. 200.

25 Give the water no passage; neither a wicked woman liberty to gad abroad.

26 If she go not as thou wouldest have her, cut her off from thy flesh, [f] and give her a bill of divorce, and let her go.

[f] Deut. 24. 1. Mark 10. 4.

CHAPTER XXVI.

1 A good wife, 4 and a good conscience, do glad men. 6 A wicked wife is a fearful thing. 13 Of good and bad wives. 28 Of three things that are grievous. 29 Merchants and hucksters are not without sin.

B. C. cir. 200.

BLESSED is the man that hath [a] a virtuous wife, for the number of his days shall be double. [a] Prov. 31. 10, &c.

2 A virtuous woman rejoiceth her husband, and he shall fulfil the years of his life in peace.

3 [b] A good wife is a good portion, which shall be given in the portion of them that fear the Lord. [b] Prov. 18. 22.

25. neither to a wicked woman rule (perhaps better: authority or power).] Omit "to gad abroad," which is added in 248, Co. For ἐξουσίαν, "rule," Fritzsche would read with the Sin., Alex., 248, and six other MSS. παῤῥησίαν, "liberty," or rather "confidence." But this not only gives the impression of a later emendation, but is forbidden by the Syr., which has "rule" or "power," and therefore establishes the Vat. text. The A. V. follows 248, Co. Very curiously the Syr. has: "nor to a woman face and rule." Did the Syr. make some confusion with such an expression as וְאַף in the original, or may the latter have had נְשִׂיאוּת פָּנִים, "lifting up of the face," in the sense of special honour, distinction, which the Syr. misunderstood? The Syr. also adds: "for as the issue of waters as it proceeds becomes larger, so a wicked woman proceeds and sinneth." The Vet. Lat. is apparently emendated, but generally accords with 248, Co., which (as already indicated) have for ἐξουσίαν, παῤῥησίαν ἐξώδου. It renders: non des aquæ tuæ exitum, nec modicum; nec mulieri nequam veniam prodeundi (the latter also in A. V.).

26. If she go not according to thy hand]—that is, either "according to thy manner," כְּיָדֵךְ, or more probably עַלְיָדֵיךְ, "under thy leadership." The words "and give her"—viz. a bill of divorce—"and send her away" (more freely rendered in the A. V.) must be omitted. They are neither in the Vat., the Alex., nor the Sin. (which latter has in the first clause, instead of χεῖρά σου, χείρας σου). But the clause occurs in 248, Co., and also in the Syr. The wording of the latter (carnem tuam reseca) might lead us to suspect some indelicacy in the original which the Greek has modified (but see the note on xxvi. 1). The Vet. Lat. is paraphrastic or explanatory in the second clause.

CHAPTER XXVI.

The arrangement of this chapter presents special difficulties from the state of the text, since vv. 19–27, although found in 248, Co., and in the Syr., are not in either the Vat. or the Alex., while vv. 28, 29 evidently belong to ch. xxvii. (see the notes). The chapter as thus curtailed treats of the favourite subject of the Son of Sirach: woman. Four verses in praise of a good woman are followed by eight verses (vv. 5–12) which describe the ills entailed by evil women. Lastly, we have six verses in praise of a fair woman (vv. 13–18).

1. Happy the husband of a good wife, and.] This verse and v. 3 are quoted in the Talmud in two passages (Yebam. 63 b; Sanh. 100 b) as from Ben Sira. In Sanh. 100 b they are introduced as useful for preaching purposes. But although the two verses are quoted precisely alike in both Talmudic passages, and are the same as in the Greek version, their order is inverted, v. 3 (of the Greek text) preceding v. 1. Moreover, between these two sayings another is inserted, which represents the closing verse of the previous chapter; being, however, neither exactly like the Greek nor the Syriac version, but almost a compromise between the two. We can scarcely agree with Fritzsche that the second clause of our verse is explanatory of the first. The doubling of the number of days seems a continuation, rather than an explanation, of the first clause.

2. a brave [worthy] wife.] γυνὴ ἀνδρεία, by which the LXX. render the אֵשֶׁת חַיִל of Prov. xii. 4, xxxi. 10 (LXX. xxix. 28), while the same Hebrew expression in Ruth iii. 11 is rendered by γυνὴ δυνάμεως—another evidence that the translation of Prov. and that of Ruth were made by different hands and presumably at different periods.

his years.] Not "the years of his life," as in the A. V. after 248, Co. The Syr. interchanges vv. 2 and 3, and it has "in joy" instead of "in peace." Such a woman will be a defence from evil and strife.

3. As regards the second part of the verse, the repetition of the word "portion" shews that there must have been some misapprehen-

B. C. cir. 200.

4 Whether a man be rich or poor, if he have a good heart toward the Lord, he shall at all times rejoice with a cheerful countenance.

5 There be three things that mine heart feareth; and for the fourth I was sore afraid: ‖ the slander of a city, the gathering together of an unruly multitude, and a false accusation: all these are worse than death.

‖ Gr. an evil report.

6 But a grief of heart and sorrow is a woman that is jealous over another woman, and a scourge of the tongue which communicateth with all.

B. C. cir. 200.

7 An evil wife is ‖ a yoke shaken to and fro: he that hath hold of her is as though he held a scorpion.

‖ Or, a yoke of oxen.

8 A drunken woman and a gadder abroad causeth great anger, and she will not cover her own shame.

9 The whoredom of a woman may be known in her haughty looks and eyelids.

10 [c] If thy daughter be shameless, keep her in straitly, lest she abuse herself through overmuch liberty.

[c] ch. 42. 11.

sion on the part of the translator. The mistake is rectified by the quotation in the Talmud, which has in the second clause בְּחֵיק, "in the bosom," misread by the Greek בְּחֵלֶק, "in the portion." Thus the original Heb. text would have been: she shall be given [or it shall be given, viz. the gift: כִּיתָּנָה, as in the Talmud] in the bosom of them that fear the Lord. The Syr. puts it thus: "a good wife shall be given to the man who feareth the Lord in return for good works" —a somewhat bold emendation, probably in order to avoid the appearance of fatalism. The Vet. Lat. here once more shews alike its dependence on the Syr. as well as on the Greek by combining the Syr. and the Greek, as follows: in parte (this from the Greek) timentium Deum debitur viro (this from the Syr.) pro factis bonis (this again from the Syr.).

4. The heart of the rich and also of the poor (is) happy, at all times [here = under any circumstances] the countenance cheerful.] Viz. if he have such a wife. The A. V. follows 248, Co.

5. There is some difficulty about the second clause. The text of the A. V. is here also that of the Alex. and S^2. But this reading seems almost impossible (see Fritzsche). On the other hand, the Vatic. has: "with the face I have prayed," which is no doubt the better text, but gives no meaning, since "to pray with the face" can scarcely be regarded as = "to pray humbly," i.e. with down-turned face. We imagine that the confusion originally arose from the expression פֶּן, "lest" (of course our present final letters were not in use), which the Greek translator misread פָּנַי, or even פָּנִים, "face," and thus bunglingly turned into προσῶπῳ, "with the face." But as the reading "with the face I have prayed" gave no meaning, it was next emended into "I have feared." The original had probably neither one nor the other, but something that would give this meaning: "Of three things my heart is afraid, and over the fourth, lest (פֶּן) it befall me"—or something of that kind.

the gathering together of the multitude [presumably, mob-rule and mob-law] . . . all these are more wretched than death.] The Syr. combines into one sentence the first two causes of fear in a manner similar to what we have noted in xxv. 7 (see the note).

6. This verse states that fourth object which inspired him with such dread. Omit "but." The last clause we propose rendering: and a scourge of tongue which (equally) gives a share to all—is equally administered to all: the sense being that one of the (three) things connected with a jealous woman is that her evil speaking—the scourge of her tongue—equally falls upon all, however unreasonable and uncalled-for the promptings of her jealousy may be. The Syr. omits this verse.

7. a yoke shaken to and fro.] Rather, "an ox-yoke moved to and fro," i.e. unsteady in its movement, one of the animals pulling in the other direction. The Syr. renders it by "a hard yoke," perhaps reading מוֹטָה, while the Greek derived the word from the verb מוּט.

he that layeth hold of her is as one that seizes a scorpion.] Which turns round to inflict a poisonous bite.

8. A woman drunken [and roaming about, which the A. V. falsely softens].] The italicised words within brackets, which are not in the Vat. nor Alex. but in 248, Co., are also represented in the Syr. The idea suggested is sufficiently plain.

9. in the upliftings of the eyes and in her eyelids.

10. Three warnings follow.

shameless.] ἀδιάτρεπτος; lit. "over a

B. C. cir. 200.

11 Watch over an impudent eye: and marvel not if she trespass against thee.

12 She will open her mouth, as a thirsty traveller when he hath found a fountain, and drink of every water near her: by every ‖ hedge will she sit down, and open her quiver against every arrow.

‖ Or, stake.

13 The grace of a wife delighteth her husband, and her discretion will fatten his bones.

14 A silent and loving woman is a gift of the Lord; and there is nothing so much worth as a mind well instructed. B. C. cir. 200.

15 A shamefaced and faithful woman is a double grace, and her continent mind cannot be valued.

16 As the sun when it ariseth ‖ in the high heaven; so is the beauty of a good wife in the ‖ ordering of her house.

‖ Gr. in the highest places of the Lord.

‖ Or, ornament.

17 As the clear light is upon the holy candlestick; so is the beauty of the face ‖ in ripe age.

‖ Or, in constant age.

18 As the golden pillars are upon the sockets of silver; so are the ‖ fair feet with a constant ‖ heart.

‖ Or, comely.

‖ Or, breast.

daughter that cannot be turned aside —here from lust (this, rather than "headstrong," see Fritzsche) — keep a strait watch."

through overmuch liberty.] Rather, "lest finding relaxation," i.e. of the watchfulness advised. Fritzsche tries to explain the sin referred to in a better sense than that implied in the A. V.; but in our opinion with little success.

11. (To go) After an impudent eye, be on thy guard (beware, have a care).] It is scarcely worth discussing the meaning to be attached to these words, nor whether the reference is to a daughter, as in v. 10, or to another woman — probably the latter. If the warning of the first clause be neglected, marvel not if she leads thee into sin.

12. As a thirsty traveller will open his mouth and drink of every water that is near, so will she sit down before every peg, &c.

13. A new stanza, in praise of woman. The antithesis to the previous verses which described the bad woman is not difficult to trace. The expression "make fat the bones," as in Prov. xv. 30.

14. Omit from the A. V. the words "and a loving" — evidently a later emendatory addition.

and there is nothing so much worth.] καὶ οὐκ ἔστιν ἀντάλλαγμα, there is not an exchange—here, best: equivalent in value. Instead of "as a mind well instructed" of the more polite Greek, the Syr. has "as continence [exiguity, parsimony] of throat."

15. Omit from the A. V. the words "and faithful" (see v. 14). Lit., is grace upon grace = utmost grace.

cannot be valued.] A good paraphrase of οὐκ ἔστι σταθμὸς πᾶς ἄξιος. Instead of "a continent mind" the Syr. has "continence [exiguity, n. s.] of the mouth;" but the allusion of the Greek is to something different, and marks a progression on the first clause of the verse.

16. in the high heaven.] Rather, in the heights (the highest places, ἐν ὑψίστοις) of the Lord.

in the ordering of her house.] More correctly, according to the Vat., "the ordering of his house," viz. that of her lord. The comparison is between the sun in the heights, or high places, of his lord, and woman in the house of her lord: both have a lord, and both are beautiful in the effectual discharge of the functions assigned to them. What the sun is in the house above, woman is in that upon earth. The Syr. has: "so is the beauty of a good woman when she abideth in her house." This probably represents the original more accurately.

17. As the lamp that shineth forth upon the holy candlestick, so is beauty of face upon a steadfast age [life].] The word ἡλικία is always used in that sense in the Apocr., and the meaning would be: so is matronly beauty after a constant, steadfast life.

18. Another figure, no doubt also derived from the furniture of the Temple, and equally designed to exhibit the combination of beauty with goodness.

As golden pillars upon a silver base, so fair feet with [lit., upon] the heart [lit., breasts] of one who is stable [quiet].] Or, adopting the reading εὐσταθέσι, "with a stable [quiet?] heart." The antithesis to vv. 8–12, as well as the parallelism with the previous verse, are clearly marked. At the same time it should be mentioned that commentators following the lead of S^1, the Vet. Lat., and the Syr. propose to alter στέρνοις into πτέρναις, and to translate "so are fair feet upon firm soles." But this not only destroys the parallelism, but does not yield any good, scarcely an intelligible, meaning.

B. C. cir. 200.

19 My son, keep the flower of thine age sound; and give not thy strength to strangers.

20 When thou hast gotten a fruitful possession through all the field, sow it with thine own seed, trusting in the goodness of thy stock.

21 So thy race which thou leavest shall be magnified, having the confidence of their good descent.

22 An harlot shall be accounted as ‖spittle; but a married woman is a tower against death to her husband.

‖ Or, a swine.

23 A wicked woman is given as a portion to a wicked man: but a godly woman is given to him that feareth the Lord.

24 A dishonest woman contemneth shame: but an honest woman will reverence her husband.

25 A shameless woman shall be counted as a dog; but she that is shamefaced will fear the Lord.

B. C. cir. 200.

26 A woman that honoureth her husband shall be judged wise of all; but she that dishonoureth him in her pride shall be counted ungodly of all.

27 A loud crying woman and a scold shall be sought out to drive away the enemies.

28 There be two things that grieve my heart; and the third maketh me angry: a man of war that suffereth poverty; and [d] men of understanding that are not set by; and [e] one that returneth from righteousness to sin; the Lord prepareth such an one for the sword.

[d] Eccles. 9. 15.
[e] Ezek. 18. 24.

29 [f] A merchant shall hardly keep himself from doing wrong; and an huckster shall not be freed from sin.

[f] ch. 27. 2.

19–27. These verses, which are not found either in the Vat. or in the Alex., are an interpolation, although probably an old one. They occur in H., 248, and Co. They are also found in the Syr. (though not in the Vet. Lat.), but with expressions so strange and divergent from the Greek as to raise the suspicion of a later addition. We entertain the less doubt as to the spuriousness of these verses, since they often contain repetitions of what had been previously said.

28. This verse evidently begins a subject totally different from that hitherto discussed. We can scarcely doubt that this and the following verse form part of ch. xxvii. The new subject is introduced in a manner similar to Ecclus. xxvi. 5. The object of the writer in thus introducing a new theme seems to be, by first stating three things on which all are agreed, to prepare for, and to conciliate, the favourable consideration of his readers in regard to the new subject which he is about to bring before them.

Over two things has my heart been grieved, and over [for] the third strong feeling cometh upon me . . . and men of understanding if they are not set by.] As the fifth line is not introduced in any of the Greek texts by καί, we propose beginning with it a new sentence, and combining it with the last line: He that returneth from righteousness to sin, the Lord prepareth him [such an one] for the sword. [So also Bissell, although not as to punctuation.] The Syr. has "and." In this it is followed by the Vet. Lat., although not in the somewhat peculiar rendering of the three cases instanced: "a free man" for "a man of war;" "men of celebrated fame who fall from their glory," and "over him who turneth from adherence to God [apostatises from the true religion]."

29. The sentence is in strict accordance with Rabbinic sentiment. The ἔμπορος is here the תַּגָּר (as in the Syr.) of the Targumim and Talmud, the larger, resident, or else the importing merchant (even the dealer en gros), while the κάπηλος is either the travelling hawker, the סַחְרָן of the Talmud, or more probably the חֲנָוָנִי, "huckster" or "shopman." But in the LXX. the ἔμπορος is alike the סֹחֵר, although even so a travelling merchant, and the רֹכֵל of biblical Hebrew—resident merchants being apparently unknown. The word κάπηλος occurs only in the LXX. modification of the last clause of Is. i. 22 ("thy hawkers mix the wine with water"—the introduction of the term seeming to imply different authorship and perhaps laterdate than other parts of the LXX. The LXX. in Ezek. has only ἔμπορος). The Talmud ranks the חֲנָוָנִי, "huckster" or "shopkeeper" (by which the Syr. renders the κάπηλος of our text among those whose occupation involves robbing (Qidd. 82 a, b—altogether a curious passage). In Ab. ii. 5 we are told that he who trafficks much (multiplieth merchandising, סְחוֹרָה) cannot become a sage, while in Erubh. 55 b Deut. xxx. 13 is thus explained: "Thou shalt not find it [the Law] either with hawkers or

B. C. cir. 200.

CHAPTER XXVII.

1 Of sins in selling and buying. 7 Our speech will tell what is in us. 16 A friend is lost by discovering his secrets. 25 He that diggeth a pit shall fall into it.

[a] Prov. 28. 21.
Or, a thing indifferent.
[b] Prov. 23. 4.
1 Tim. 6. 9.

MANY [a]have sinned for [‖]a small matter; and he that [b]seeketh for abundance will turn his eyes away.

2 As a nail sticketh fast between the joinings of the stones; so doth sin stick close between buying and selling.

B. C. cir. 200.

3 Unless a man hold himself diligently in the fear of the Lord, his house shall soon be overthrown.

4 As when one sifteth with a sieve, the refuse remaineth; so the filth of man in his [‖]talk.

‖ Or, thought.

5 [c]The furnace proveth the potter's vessels; so the trial of man is in his reasoning.

[c] Prov. 27. 21.

with merchants" (לֹא בַסֹּחֲרִים וְלֹא בְּתַגָּרִים). The Syr. curiously adds explanatively: "for if he stumbles not in this, he stumbles in that." But "the shopkeeper" or "hawker" is absolutely given up—he "is not free from sin."

CHAPTER XXVII.

The subject begun in the two closing verses of ch. xxvi. is continued in the three opening verses of ch. xxvii. From "commerce" the writer proceeds to that other "commerce," the intercourse of daily life. This forms the general subject of the chapter. First, the source of conversation is traced to the condition of mind and heart (stanza 2, four verses: 4–7). This gives rise to a parenthetic stanza of three verses on righteousness and truth (vv. 8–10). Then follows an antithetic stanza about the discourse of the wise and that of the fool (stanza 4 of five verses: 11–15). Next we have a stanza (the fifth) on unwarrantable and dangerous speech (six verses: 16–21); and then a sixth stanza of three verses on deceitful speech and action (vv. 22–24). The last stanza (six verses: 25–30) —on malice and anger—follows up that which had preceded, and intimates the righteous retribution of God on conduct such as that referred to. This stanza also serves as a transition from ch. xxvii. to xxviii.

1. a small matter.] Rather, a thing indifferent, which has no real value and for which he perhaps little cares. Comp. Note on vii. 18.

seeketh for abundance.] To increase = to accumulate wealth.

will turn away the eye.] Viz., either from that which is right, or else in the sense of an obliquity of vision. The Syr. curiously has: "he that seeketh to multiply sins turneth away his eyes."

2. As a peg is driven in [made fast] between the joinings of stones, so is sin crushed in between buying and selling.] There is some difficulty about the meaning of συντριβήσεται ("crushed in"). It is simply arbitrary on the part of Fritzsche to change the word into συνθλιβήσεται—by way of following (?) the Vet. Lat., angustiabitur. The Syr. renders: "is made strong." This, as has been suggested, would represent תֶּחֱזַק, or it might be תֶּחָזִיק, which the Greek, however, read תֶּחֱזַק, "layeth hold of." And although συντριβήσεται properly means "is crushed," yet the figure in the first clause about the peg driven in might naturally suggest this free, but substantially correct, rendering of the Greek for the Hebrew: "layeth hold of."

3. The previous verse is followed by a general warning, which in the Syr. and the Vet. Lat. is cast in the form of a personal address. The meaning is: Such being the temptations of daily life, take care lest instead of building your house by your gains you destroy it in consequence of your sin. The Syr. rendering of the second clause is both inapt and unaccountable.

4. A new stanza. talk.] Rather, thinking. As in the LXX. generally, we must regard λογισμός, as = כִּיהַשְׂבָּה. The object of the writer is to shew that the real character of a man will ultimately appear in his discourse. The lighter substances may be shaken out of a sieve, but the heavier remain. So it is with a man. The vile remains in his thinking and purposing, and it will manifest itself. This is the real test of what a man is and of what he will do or say.

5. in his reasoning.] Rather, in his consideration—in his balancing of what course to take, and in his consequent choice. This meaning seems to suit the whole context and also best to fit in with vv. 8–10. The expression δοκιμάζει κάμινος, "the furnace proveth," reminds us of LXX. Prov. xvii. 3 (δοκιμάζεται ἐν καμίνῳ) rather than of LXX. Prov. xxvii. 21. Nevertheless, we suspect that the gloss (perhaps originally marginal) found in LXX. Prov. xxvii. 21 may be based on Ecclus. xxvii. 5, 6, rather than on LXX. Prov. xvii. 3 or on xii. 8.

B. C. cir. 200.

6 [d] The fruit declareth if the tree have been dressed; so is the utterance of a conceit in the heart of man.

[d] Matt. 7. 17.

7 Praise no man before thou hearest him speak; for this is the trial of men.

8 If thou followest righteousness, thou shalt obtain her, and put her on, as a glorious long robe.

9 The birds will resort unto their like; so will truth return unto them that practise in her.

10 As the lion lieth in wait for the prey; so sin for them that work iniquity.

11 The discourse of a godly man is always with wisdom; but a fool changeth as the moon.

B. C. cir. 200.

12 If thou be among the indiscreet, observe the time; but be continually among men of understanding.

13 The discourse of fools is irksome, and their sport is the wantonness of sin.

14 [e] The talk of him that sweareth much maketh the hair stand upright; and their brawls make one stop his ears.

[e] ch. 23. 9.

15 The strife of the proud is bloodshedding, and their revilings are grievous to the ear.

16 Whoso discovereth secrets los-

6. The cultivation of a tree its fruit sheweth forth [mark the similarity with, and yet difference from St. Matt. vii. 16, 20, and comp. especially St. Jas. iii. 12, 17], so the matter [λόγος = דבר, in the sense of "object"] of desire [or of cogitation] the hearts of men (taking καρδίας as the accus. plur., not the gen. sing.).] It would be extremely difficult, and perhaps scarcely worth the labour of the attempt, to explain the divergences in the Syr.

7. This verse, which forms the conclusion of this part, is omitted in the Syr. Translate: Praise not a man irrespective of (his) thinking,—viz. before thou knowest what that is—"for this is the trial [the test] of men."

8. This stanza follows naturally upon what had preceded. "If thou followest the right, thou shalt obtain [attain] and put it on," &c. The "long robe," ποδήρης, as in Rev. i. 13, especially the robe of the High Priest (Ecclus. xlv. 8), and also in the LXX. O. T. (where its use in Ezek. ix. 2, 3 for בַּדִּים deserves notice). Here it indicates holy beauty and glory as of the raiments of the High Priest.

9. Birds will resort [turn in to lodge with] unto their like.] Comp. our note on xiii. 16; "similarly truth will return," &c.: will ultimately appear on the side of the righteous and vindicate them, however they may have suffered or been misrepresented. On the other hand, sure destruction will ultimately overtake those who do the wrong (v. 10). Omit "as" in the A. V.

11. The Syr. here interposes what in the Greek is v. 12. A new stanza.

always with wisdom.] According to the better reading, always wisdom. The constancy of his wisdom, as the outcome of piety within, is contrasted with the phases of a fool, changing like those of the moon. The Vet. Lat. has this peculiar rendering: homo sanctus in sapientia manet sicut sol, which gives a better antithesis than either the Greek or the Syr. text. This may have suggested the alteration—perhaps with some (Christian?) reference to Ps. lxxii. 17. It has indeed been argued that the Vet. Lat. has here preserved the correct Hebrew text, כַּחַמָּה תָמִיד, "as the sun perpetual," which the Greek misread: חָכְמָה תָמִיד, "wisdom perpetual = is always." But it is difficult to understand either the supposed sentiment or that it should be so expressed (comp. Ps. lxxii. 17); still more whence the Greek could have derived the word διήγησις, the genuineness of which is attested by its occurrence in the antithetic v. 13. Lastly, the Syr. has the verse as in the Greek.

12. Into the midst of [among] those of no understanding: have heed to the time—choose the proper season, the proper moment for going among them; into the midst of those of understanding: be continuous.

13. The discourse of fools is an offence, and their laughter in the wantonness of sin —in wanton sin.

14. The profanities and blasphemies in their brawls are such that one stops his ears.

15. The strife of the audacious [insolent, proud, ὑπερηφάνων] is shedding of blood —leads to it—and their angry railing a grievous sound.] This and the two preceding verses evidently constitute a climax. The Syr. text is here confused, and seems corrupt.

B. C. cir. 200.

eth his credit; and shall never find friend to his mind.

17 Love thy friend, and be faithful unto him: but f if thou bewrayest his secrets, follow no more after him.

f ch. 22. 22.

18 For as a man hath destroyed his enemy; so hast thou lost the love of thy neighbour.

19 As one that letteth a bird go out of his hand, so hast thou let thy neighbour go, and shalt not get him again.

20 Follow after him no more, for he is too far off; he is as a roe escaped out of the snare.

21 As for a wound, it may be bound up; and after reviling there may be reconcilement: but he that bewrayeth secrets is without hope.

B. C. cir. 200.

22 He g that winketh with the eyes worketh evil: and he that knoweth him will depart from him.

g Prov. 10. 10.

23 When thou art present, he will speak sweetly, and will admire thy words: but at the last he will ‖ writhe his mouth, and slander thy sayings.

‖ Or, alter his speech.

24 I have hated many things, but nothing like him; for the Lord will hate him.

16. Another stanza, and another instance of "discourse" which betrayeth an unworthy soul.

discovereth.] Rather, revealeth.

17. bewrayest.] Rather, revealest.

follow no more after him.] It will be useless trouble, for he will not be reconciled. The Syr. deserves special notice: "Try thy friend, and then trust him [this probably correctly according to the Hebrew, although perhaps interpolated from vi. 7]; but if he reveal the secret of the faith, go no more after him." The subtle alteration in the second clause betrays the Christian emendator. He must have been later than the Arabic translator, who made his version from the Syr., and yet does not reproduce this alteration. Similarly, the addition is not found in the Vet. Lat.

18. lost.] Rather, destroyed. The meaning of the Greek would be: thou hast completely destroyed all friendship as one completely destroyeth an enemy. But the Syr. has, for "his enemy," "has lost his portion;" the Vet. Lat., "loseth his friend." Bretschneider conjectures that the original had צֵידוֹ, "his prey" (in hunting), for which the Greek read צָרְרוֹ, "his enemy." But although this would accord with the following verses, it does not explain the Syr. nor yet the Latin rendering. Horowitz (in Frankel's 'Monatsschrift,' xiv. p. 197) adopts the Syr. reading, and supposes that the original had חֶבְלוֹ, "his portion," which the Greek misread חֹבְלוֹ, "him that hurts or ill-treats him." In that case it might be further conjectured that the Vet. Lat., if it had the Hebrew before it (which is certainly not impossible), read חֶבְרוֹ, "his friend." But the whole combination is very doubtful.

19. As one that letteth.] Rather, and as thou lettest.

get him again.] θηρεύσεις—a hunting term, "catch him in the hunt."

20. he is too far off.] Better, he has withdrawn himself far off.

as a roe.] Rather, "as a gazelle," or antelope, known for its fleetness. The Syr. has here the addition: "and as a bird out of the snare," evidently taken from Prov. vi. 5.

21. Omit "as" in the A. V.

wound.] For the Vat. θραῦμα, "breaking," which may represent the Hebrew שֶׁבֶר, we adopt the Alex. reading τραῦμα. There are hurts which can be healed, but not that here supposed.

22. A new stanza, describing another manifestation of the same sin. The A. V. here follows the reading of H., 248, Co. (which is also adopted by the Armen.), καὶ ὁ εἰδὼς αὐτὸν ἀποστήσεται ἀπ' αὐτοῦ. This is certainly preferable to the Vat., καὶ οὐδεὶς αὐτὸν ἀποστήσει ἀπ' αὐτοῦ = and no one will be able to get rid of him. A., C., and eight MSS. have αὐτὰ ἀποστήσει—referring to the "evil" in the first clause.

winketh with the eye.] Indicating malicious plotting; comp. Prov. vi. 13, x. 10.

23. The writer proceeds to give a description of such a person. Lit., before thine eyes he will make his mouth sweet, &c.; adopting the reading στόμα αὐτοῦ with A., C., 55, 106, 157, 248, 307, Co., Vet. Lat. (the Syr. here is throughout corrupt). This evidently suits the context better than the Vat., which has στόμα σου, "thy mouth."

but afterwards he will turn about his speech.] The last clause, literally rendered, reads: "and will put in thy words an offence;" that is, he will pur-

B. C. cir. 200.

25 Whoso casteth a stone on high casteth it on his own head; and a deceitful stroke shall make wounds.

[h] Ps. 7. 15. Prov. 26. 27. Eccles. 10. 8.

26 [h]Whoso diggeth a pit shall fall therein: and [i]he that setteth a trap shall be taken therein.

[i] Ps. 9. 15. & 35. 8.

27 He that worketh mischief, it shall fall upon him, and he shall not know whence it cometh.

28 Mockery and reproach are from the proud; but [k]vengeance, as a lion, shall lie in wait for them.

[k] Deut. 32. 35. Rom. 12. 19.

29 They that rejoice at the fall of the righteous shall be taken in the snare; and anguish shall consume them before they die.

B. C. cir. 200.

30 Malice and wrath, even these are abominations; and the sinful man shall have them both.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

1 Against revenge, 8 quarrelling, 10 anger, 15 and backbiting.

HE [a]that revengeth shall find vengeance from the Lord, and he will surely keep his sins [in remembrance.]

[a] Deut. 32. 35. Rom. 12. 19.

posely attach to them a meaning which will cause offence.

24. I hate many things, but nothing like him.] Literally, but I do not make them equal to him, &c., i.e. I do not put other things hateful to me on the same level with this.

for.] Rather, also, the Heb. גַּם. The Syr. adds: "and will curse him." The Arab. omits this, which proves that it is a later emendation of the Syr. Version, which the Arab. throughout follows.

25. A new stanza, describing the righteous retribution on such a course.

shall make wounds.] Rather, shall distribute wounds; an obscure phrase, which from the context we suppose to mean that the consequence of a deceitful stroke will be to wound him that deals it, as well as him to whom it is dealt.

26. The Syr. is different, and the Vet. Lat. has an explanatory addition.

27. We are once more carried back to Prov. vi.: see above, v. 13. The expression ὁ ποιῶν πονηρά, "he that worketh evil," is preserved in the Syr. in its Hebrew form, as in Prov. vi. 14. There the person described in Ecclus. xxvii. 23 as "turning about his speech" is characterised by הַהֹפְכוֹת בְּלִבּוֹ, "turnings about in his heart" (comp. Prov. viii. 13, x. 32, תַּהְפֻּכוֹת פִּי; Prov. x. 31, תַּהְפֻּכוֹת לָשׁוֹן). Again (as in the Syr.) the ποιῶν πονηρά is = חֹרֵשׁ רָע, "he that forgeth evil" (comp. xiv. 22, iii. 29), or in Prov. vi. 18, לֵב חֹרֵשׁ מַחְשְׁבוֹת אָוֶן.

whence it cometh.] Add: upon him.

28. This verse is not found in the Syr. (although in the Vet. Lat.), and reads like an interpolation.

29. The Syr. here has a different and certainly erroneous rendering, probably due to a misreading of the Hebrew, which it is scarcely worth the labour to trace in detail, although in part it is evident.

30. even these.] Rather, these also. Omit from the A. V. the final word "both."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

This chapter stands in close internal connexion with the preceding. It deals with that to which the sins previously referred to give rise, and finally returns to these sins themselves. The special topics of the chapter may be grouped as follows: Revenge (stanza 1, of seven verses); strife (second stanza, of five verses: vv. 8–12); calumny (third stanza, of four verses: vv. 13–16); its baneful effects (fourth stanza, of five verses: vv. 17–21—although this and the previous stanza may possibly be combined into one). Lastly, we have a stanza which on the one hand promises to the righteous safety from the consequences of backbiting, and on the other admonishes to watchfulness (five verses: v. 22 to the end).

1. The words italicised, "keep his sins in remembrance," are inadequate. The verb is used here as in Ps. cxxx. 3: "if Jehovah keep sin;" that is, not only remember, but reserve it for punishment (comp. the figure in Job xiv. 17), only that here it must have been יִשְׁכֹּר יִשְׁכּוֹר, which the Greek preserves, as well as the Vet. Lat. (servans servabit). We need scarcely here remind ourselves of Rom. xii. 19. But the whole sentiment seems so unlike the spirit of the book, and so Christian in its conception, that we suspect an interpolation. The Syr. is quite different, and perhaps preserves the Hebrew original. It begins the verse with what seems a modification of the second clause of the last verse in the previous chapter: "And the deceitful man destroyeth his way" (perhaps the

B. C. cir. 200.

2 [b] Forgive thy neighbour the hurt that he hath done unto thee, so shall thy sins also be forgiven when thou prayest.

3 [c] One man beareth hatred against another, and doth he seek pardon from the Lord?

4 He sheweth no mercy to a man, which is like himself: and doth he ask forgiveness of his own sins?

5 If he that is but flesh nourish hatred, who will intreat for pardon of his sins?

B. C. cir. 200.

6 Remember thy end, and let enmity cease; [remember] corruption and death, and abide in the commandments.

7 Remember the commandments, and bear no malice to thy neighbour: [remember] the covenant of the Highest, and wink at ignorance.

[b] Matt. 6. 14. Mark 11. 25. Luke 6. 37.
[c] See Matt. 18. 23, &c.

original had something like Ps. i. 6: וְדֶרֶךְ רְשָׁעִים תֹּאבֵד, "and will receive retribution [vengeance] from God, because all his sins shall be carefully preserved to him."

2. Forgive the unrighteousness [the wrong, injury] of thy neighbour, and then when thou prayest thy sins shall be loosed [λυθήσονται; comp. St. Matt. xviii. 18].] The latter expression, but chiefly the addition "when thou prayest"—which makes the verse parallel with St. Mark xi. 25—indicates Christian alteration. In Talmudic writings we find indeed such statements as "To whom is sin pardoned? To him who forgiveth injury" (Rosh Hash. 17*a*, and in other places); and again: "every time that thou art merciful, God will be merciful to thee; and if thou art not merciful, God will not shew mercy to thee" (Jer. Babha Q. viii. 10, and other places). Other similar passages might be quoted, to which St. Jas. ii. 13 forms the N. T. parallel. But so far as we know there is not any ancient Jewish saying strictly parallel to this verse in Ecclus. We therefore regard it as a later Christian alteration. The Syr. Christian emendation goes even further. It has: "Remit what is in thy heart and afterwards pray, and all thy sins shall be remitted thee." The Vet. Lat. follows the Greek.

3. (One) Man keepeth anger against (another) man, and doth he seek healing from the Lord?] "Healing," like רָפָא, or rather here מִירְפֵּא, in the sense of forgiveness. We are here again on strictly Jewish ground. The N. T. also offers well-known parallels. Fritzsche quotes from the Pastor of Hermas, B. iii., Similit. ix. 23. But that passage rather recalls St. Jas. iv. 12. A better parallel would have been u. s., B. ii., Comm. ix.: "For He is not like men who remember evils done against them; but He Himself remembers not evils, and has compassion on His own creatures." This seems based on the following from Yoma, 86*b*: "Come and see that the measure [manner of dealing] of the Holy One, blessed be He, is not like that of flesh and blood. A man makes his neighbour angry [offends him] by words, there is a doubt whether or not he will be assuaged by him; and if thou sayest, he will be assuaged by him, there is doubt whether or not he will be assuaged by words, but the Holy One, blessed be His Name: a man committeth a sin in secret—He [God] is assuaged of him by words (see Hos. xiv. 2)."

4. Rather, he hath not mercy.

doth he ask forgiveness.] Rather, "does he entreat (viz. mercy) on account of his sins?" The Syr. omits the verse.

5. He that is flesh keepeth resentment [μῆνιν], who will atone for [expiate] his sins?] (Bissell.) The Syr. has: "he who is a son of man is not willing to remit, and who shall remit his sins?" These verses are intended to mark the incongruity of his position. But v. 5 seems also to indicate that works of mercy were regarded as a kind of atonement.

6. The writer now proceeds to positive admonition.

thy end.] Rather, the end. For "abide in the commandments," the Syr. has "abstain from sinning"—probably correctly representing the original, since the first clause of the next verse is as in the Greek. Verses 6 and 7 mark a progression, which the Greek probably wished to make more emphatic by this "abide in the commandments," to be immediately followed by "remember the commandments," &c.

7. bear no malice to.] Rather, be not angry against.

wink at.] Rather, overlook.

ignorance.] ἄγνοια, as in the LXX., always in the sense of guilt or sin of weakness, שְׁגָגָה, or else אָשֵׁם and אַשְׁמָה. The Syr. has: "Remember the commandment and hate not thy neighbour before God, and give him what lacketh to him." It has been ingeniously suggested that the Syr. for "before" (ܩܕܡ) is corrupt, and that we should read (ܩܝܡ) "covenant"—"the covenant of God"—while

B. C. cir. 200.

8 [d] Abstain from strife, and thou shalt diminish thy sins: for a furious man will kindle strife.

[d] ch. 8. 1.

9 A sinful man disquieteth friends, and maketh debate among them that be at peace.

10 [e] As the matter of the fire is, so it burneth: and as a man's strength is, so is his wrath; and according to his riches his anger riseth; and the stronger they are which contend, the more they will be inflamed.

[e] Prov. 26. 21.

11 An hasty contention kindleth a fire: and an hasty fighting sheddeth blood.

B. C. cir. 200.

12 If thou blow the spark, it shall burn: if thou spit upon it, it shall be quenched: and both these come out of thy mouth.

13 [f] Curse the whisperer and doubletongued: for such have destroyed many that were at peace.

[f] ch. 21. 28.

14 A backbiting tongue hath disquieted many, and driven them from the other differences between the Greek text might be explained by supposing that the Greek read נָשָׂא לוֹ עֲוֹנוֹ, while the Syr. read עָנְיוֹ.

8. A new stanza: strife.] Omit from the A. V. "thy" before "sins." If we abstain from strife, there will be fewer sins on our part; but this will not be the case if a man is wrathful. The Syr. omits the last part of the verse.

9. Rather, And a sinful man — the expression being general, to indicate that other sins besides fury may lead to strife.

disquieteth.] ταράξει, perturbs, stirs up. The manner of it is immediately explained: and casteth in calumny [possibly, ill-feeling—so the Syr. and Vet. Lat.] among them that are at peace. Instead of "disquieteth friends," the Syr. has, what seems more apt: "loveth litigation." If we suppose that the original had אֹהֵב מְרִיבָה, "loveth strife," we might conjecture that the Greek read אֹהֵב מְרִיב, which he interpreted as above.

10. The clauses of this verse are evidently misplaced in the Vat. The Sin., Alex., and many other Codd. make the fourth clause the second; and as this is also the order in the Syr.—as well as the natural order—we conclude that such was the arrangement in the original. The Vet. Lat. omits the second clause. Possibly, it was only inserted in the Vat. (and there in the wrong place) by a later corrector. Correcting the order of the clauses (as above), the first two would read as follows: According to the fuel of a fire so it burneth [the Syr.: "whatever thou castest into the fire will burn"], and according to the firmness [strength?] of a strife will it burn up. The Syr.: "the more thou increasest litigation, the larger will it grow." The original may have been כְּעֻצְמוֹת רִיב, which the Greek understood as = according to the strength, the Syriac as = according to the amount; (clause c) "according to a man's strength is his wrath;" the Syr., "as is the glory of a man's hands, so is his wrath;" in the Hebrew original perhaps כְּכֹחַ יָדָיו (in the LXX. ἰσχὺς is mostly the translation of כֹּחַ)—"and according to his wealth his anger riseth."

11. The Syr. evidently read the original differently: "Pitch and naphtha kindle fire, and frequent quarrels spill blood." This seems more apt than the Greek text.

fighting.] Rather, strife.

12. All depends on the disposition of men. What in the one case issues in fire, in the other is quenched: it is the individual not the thing which causeth the mischief. The twofold simile of fire and water in connexion with disputes (the latter simile brought out more fully in the Syr. than in the Greek) recalls St. Jas. iii. 6 and 10, 11. The Syr. is interesting as shewing that, even where it and the Greek are evidently renderings of the same Hebrew words, there may be slight differences between them, because each translator would deem himself at liberty to translate freely. The following is quoted in Vayyk. R. 33 (beginning) as from Ben Sira: "Is there a coal before thee—blow upon it, and it will kindle up; spit upon it, and it will be extinguished."

13. A new stanza (see introductory remarks). The Syr. renders: "also 'the third tongue,' let it be cursed, for it has laid low many corpses." The expression "third tongue" is of post-biblical Jewish usage. It means the calumnious, babbling tongue, and its designation "third tongue" is explained by this, that it kills three: the person who speaks the calumny, the person who listens to it, and the person concerning whom it is spoken (Ar. 16 b; Jer. Peah, 16 a; Vayyk. R. 26 an instance of this is given; in Jer. Peah it is added that in the time of Saul it killed four). The Syr. translator seems to have had this in mind in his paraphrastic rendering of the verse.

B. C. cir. 200.

nation to nation: strong cities hath it pulled down, and overthrown the houses of great men.

15 ‖ A backbiting tongue hath cast out virtuous women, and deprived them of their labours.

‖ Or, third.

16 Whoso hearkeneth unto it shall never find rest, and never dwell quietly.

17 The stroke of the whip maketh marks in the flesh: but the stroke of the tongue breaketh the bones.

18 Many have fallen by the edge of the sword: but not so many as have fallen by the tongue.

19 Well is he that is defended from it, and hath not passed through the venom thereof; who hath not drawn the yoke thereof, nor hath been bound in her bands.

B. C. cir. 200.

20 For the yoke thereof is a yoke of iron, and the bands thereof are bands of brass.

21 The death thereof is an evil death, the grave were better than it.

22 It shall not have rule over them that fear God, neither shall they be burned with the flame thereof.

23 Such as forsake the Lord shall fall into it; and it shall burn in them, and not be quenched; it shall be sent upon them as a lion, and devour them as a leopard.

14. A third [a calumnious] tongue hath tossed many to and fro.] Before "strong cities" insert "and." The last clause gains in emphasis by restoring its order as in the Greek: and houses of great men (μεγιστάνων) hath it overthrown. It is very interesting to find that not only the later Syriac but the Greek translator knew the Jewish expression "third tongue," explained in the previous note, and therefore in all probability the popular interpretation recorded in the Talmud. Indeed, the reference to the influence of a calumnious tongue in regard to other lands (clause b) recalls the Talmudic legend (told immediately after the explanation of the term "third tongue"), in which, in reply to a question of R. Samuel b. Nachman, the serpent explains that if its poisonous bite in one member extends to all the members, a calumnious tongue speaks in one place and its killing stroke falls in Rome, or else it speaks in Rome and its stroke falls in Syria. The Syr. translates somewhat differently, but is probably only a free version.

15. virtuous women.] Better, perhaps, brave women, γυναῖκας ἀνδρείας: comp. xxvi. 2.

deprived them of their labours.] I.e. of the fruit of them.

16. He who giveth heed to it shall never find rest, nor yet shall he dwell tranquilly.] The Syr. omits this verse.

17. marks in the flesh.] Better, weals.

19. Well.] Rather, happy.

and hath not passed through the venom thereof.] Rather, who has not entered into the passionate fury thereof; "who hath not drawn the yoke thereof" (Deut. xxi. 3, מֹשְׁכָה בָּעֹל; in the LXX. εἵλκυσε ζυγόν), —a Hebraism, meaning, who does not experience it.

21. The death thereof.] I.e. the death which it—viz. the calumnious tongue—worketh is evil, being a moral death (comp. Juvenal, viii. 192, and the note of Mayor).

and the grave.] Rather, and Hades is profitable rather than it, viz. Hades is more profitable, serves a better purpose, were rather to be chosen than such a tongue.

22. Possibly a new stanza: of promise and admonition. "It"—viz. such a tongue, not Hades—"shall not have rule." The use of the genit. here (κρατήσῃ εὐσεβῶν) shews that it refers to a continuous hold (see Winer, l. l. p. 182). The Syr. renders our verse, "burn not:" in the optative form, "mayest thou not burn upon the righteous," &c.

23. burn in them = among them.

devour them as a leopard.] Rather, mutilate them as a leopard (or panther). For "it shall be sent upon them as a lion," the Syr. has "it shall rule over them;" evidently reading (as has been suggested) תִּישְׁלַט, while the Greek read תִּשְׁלַח. If even in the Greek the wording of the first two lines (referring to the flame—although, from the context, that kindled by the tongue) raises the suspicion of a Christian modification, so that the words about the flame that would burn without quenching might be understood of Hades; this suspicion is increased by the Syriac, which seems to go much further in the same direction. It has: "All that forsake the fear of God shall fall into it [the flame]; upon them shall the fire kindle and not be extinguished, it shall rule over them as a lion, and as a panther tear them in pieces."

24, 25. The four lines of which these two

B. C. cir. 200.

24 Look that thou hedge thy possession about with thorns, and bind up thy silver and gold,

25 And weigh thy words in a balance, and make a door and bar for thy mouth.

26 Beware thou slide not by it, lest thou fall before him that lieth in wait.

CHAPTER XXIX.

1 We must shew mercy and lend: 4 but the borrower must not defraud the lender. 9 Give alms. 14 A good man will not undo his surety. 18 To be surety and undertake for others is dangerous. 22 It is better to live at home than to sojourn.

B. C. cir. 200.

[a] HE that is merciful will lend unto his neighbour; and he that strengtheneth his hand keepeth the commandments. [a] Ps. 37. 26.

2 [b] Lend to thy neighbour in time of his need, and pay thou thy neighbour again in due season. [b] Deut. 15. 8. Matt. 5. 42. Luke 6. 35.

3 Keep thy word, and deal faithfully with him, and thou shalt always find the thing that is necessary for thee.

4 Many, when a thing was lent verses consist are misplaced in the Vat. (although Origen—Hom. i. in Ps. xxxviii. and Hom. Cant. vii. 8—favours the Vat. arrangement). The natural, and no doubt correct, succession of the lines is preserved in H., 248, Co., as well as in the Syr. and the Vet. Lat. It is as follows:—

v. 24 Lo, surround thy possession [referring to land] with thorns [a hedge] (25 b) And make a door and bar for thy mouth;
v. 25 (24 b) Bind up thy silver and thy gold, (25 a) And make for thy words a beam and weight [an accurate balance].

The latter illustration is the more forcible because silver and gold, so tied up, were weighed —money going by weight. The two verses express the same thought—only the one in a negative, the other in a positive form. The hedge round the field, and the door and bar to the mouth, are to keep out evil; the balance is to weigh out the precious metals. Instead of "thy possession" in 24 a the Syr. has "thy vineyard," and the Vet. Lat. aures tuas (thine ears), adding the explanative clause: "linguam nequam noli audire." The aures of the Lat. instead of the "possession" of the Greek is strange. The Syr. rendering, "vineyard." has its parallel in the LXX., where כרם is repeatedly translated by κτῆμα.

26. Beware lest by any means thou slip by it, &c.

CHAPTER XXIX.

This chapter is only loosely connected with that which preceded. Generally we might say that we have in these chapters a succession of prudential counsels, conceived in a quasi-religious spirit, grouped under different headings, and bearing on different aspects of daily life. Possibly there may be some connexion between what was said at the close of the previous chapter about the binding up of silver and gold, and the admonition to mercy in this chapter; and again between the previous admonition to have a care over our words and the present warning against suretiship for another. The topics of the present chapter are: (1) an admonition to mercy in lending, one stanza of six verses, v. 7 forming the transition to the next stanza, which (2) presents another phase of Mercy: that which is not discouraged by misuse, but bestoweth freely (vv. 8–13). (3) The next stanza presents yet another aspect of Mercy: Suretiship (vv. 14–19—six verses). Lastly (4), the opposite point of view is taken, and we are shewn how desirable it is not to seek nor to accept Mercy (vv. 21–28).

1. He that is merciful.] Lit. he that doeth mercy, עֹשֶׂה חֶסֶד, or גֹּמֵל חסד.

he that strengtheneth his hand [similarly the Vet. Lat.: prævalet manu].] Rather, "and he that maketh strong with [by] his hand;" that is, supporteth another by helping him. The Hebrew would be: מְחַזֵּק בְּיָדוֹ, or מַחֲזִיק, or חֹזֵק, the construction as in Ezr. i. 6. As for "the commandments" thus "kept," see Lev. xxv. 35 (וְהֶחֱזַקְתָּ בּוֹ); Deut. xv. 7, 8; comp. Ps. xxxvii. 26 (there חוֹנֵן וּמַלְוֶה, and in the next verse עֲשֵׂה־טוֹב). Comp. St. Matt. v. 42.

2. The duty of lending in such a spirit has for its correlative the obligation of punctual repayment. The Syr. is explanative rather than literal.

3. A further admonition to him who has contracted the obligation.

Keep thy word.] Lit. make strong, confirm it—a Hebraism.

always.] Lit., at every season, בְּכָל־עֵת, viz. whenever thou shalt need it. Observance of duty will in that case bring its own reward.

B. C. cir. 200.

them, reckoned it to be found, and put them to trouble that helped them.

5 Till he hath received, he will kiss a man's hand; and for his neighbour's money he will speak submissly: but when he should repay, he will prolong the time, and return words of grief, and complain of the time.

‖ Or, If he be able.

6 ‖ If he prevail, he shall hardly receive the half, and he will count as if he had found it: if not, he hath deprived him of his money, and he hath gotten him an enemy without cause: he payeth him with cursings and railings; and for honour he will pay him disgrace.

B. C. cir. 200.

7 Many therefore have refused to lend for other men's ill dealing, fearing to be defrauded.

8 Yet have thou patience with a man in poor estate, and delay not to shew him mercy.

9 Help the poor for [c] the commandment's sake, and turn him not away because of his poverty.

[c] Deut. 15. 11.

4. Lit. Many consider a loan as a find—they treat a loan as if they had found something on the road, which they may appropriate and think no farther of him who lost it. In the second clause the simile is continued: the lender is represented as having the labour and trouble of searching after what he had lost. It has been ingeniously suggested that in the first clause the original may have had a word-play between שְׁאֵלָה, "a thing asked," and שָׁלָל, "a spoil" or "gain."

5. The description of the dishonourable borrower is true to the life—only it applies also to those of a like character who ask and obtain any favour.

Till he hath received.] Rather, until he obtain.

kiss a man's hand.] Lit. "kiss his hand." and for his neighbour's money he will speak submissly.] Rather, "about his neighbour's property he will speak humbly" (lit. humble the voice). The meaning seems to be: he will refer in very humble language to the wealth of another—how easily he could help him, perhaps what liberal use he was wont to make of it. The Syr. gives the same impression. But afterwards matters are quite changed. "When he should repay," lit. at the time of giving back (ἀποδόσεως), then there is postponement: he will protract the time, the payment is delayed for the future, while what he does "give back" (ἀποδώσει) are "words of sorrow (regret):" he is very sorry—but the times are so bad.

6. If he prevail [that is, if the creditor succeed in getting back any money from the debtor] he shall hardly recover the half, and he will regard it [esteem it] as a find [something that he had considered absolutely lost]. But if not [that is, if the creditor does not get back anything at all, then] he [the debtor] hath deprived him [the creditor] of his property, and [viz. at the same time] he [the creditor] hath gotten him [the debtor] an enemy without cause [δωρεάν, חִנָּם—for nothing].

> "Neither a borrower nor a lender be,
> For loan oft loses both itself and friend."
> Hamlet, Act i., Sc. 3.

The writer then looks back upon v. 5 a, b, c, d, and marks the contrast. This is the repayment made: Cursings and revilings will he "give back" to him (ἀποδώσει αὐτῷ—comp. v. 5 d)—such is the coin in which he pays him back—and instead of glory [as when he kissed his hand and spoke so humbly about the other's property] he will "give back" to him (ἀποδώσει αὐτῷ) dishonour.

7. Lit. Many turned away [viz. from lending—this, rather than they who came to borrow] on account of wickedness [viz. such as that above described]: they feared to be deprived [viz. of their property] for nothing. The Syr. has: "Many have refused to lend, not from [without its being from] wickedness, but because they were afraid of a useless quarrel." There can be little doubt that the Greek and not the Syr. translator here rightly understood the Hebrew original. It is therefore all the more deserving our attention that the Vet. Lat. follows the interpretation of the Syr. It has: multi non causâ nequitiae non foenerati sunt.

8. This verse begins the admonition not to be discouraged in well-doing, to which v. 7 formed the transition from the previous stanza. The first clause of the verse refers to a case in which the delay—blamed in vv. 5, 6—may not be culpable, and the creditor should be patient and forbearing: and in regard to charity [in the sense of bestowing alms or benefits, ἐπ' ἐλεημοσύνῃ; the Alex. and others read: ἐπ' ἐλεημοσύνῃ, "in charity"] do not defer [delay] him—put him not off to another time; let him not wait.

9. For the commandment's sake

B. C. cir. 200.

10 Lose thy money for thy brother and thy friend, and [d]let it not rust under a stone to be lost.

11 [e]Lay up thy treasure according to the commandments of the most High, and [f]it shall bring thee more profit than gold.

12 [g]Shut up alms in thy storehouses: and it shall deliver thee from all affliction.

13 It shall fight for thee against thine enemies better than a mighty shield and strong spear. B. C. cir. 200.

14 An honest man is surety for his neighbour: but he that is impudent will ‖forsake him. ‖ Or, fail.

15 Forget not the friendship of thy surety, for he hath given his life for thee.

16 A sinner will overthrow the good estate of his surety:

17 And he that is of an unthank-

[d] ch. 20. 30.
[e] Dan. 4. 27. Matt. 6. 20. Luke 11. 41. & 12. 33. Acts 10. 4. 1 Tim. 6. 18, 19.
[f] Matt. 19. 21.
[g] Tobit 4. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11. ch. 17. 22.

assist [Syr.: "relieve"] a poor man, and according to his lack [need, want] turn him not away empty.] As we understand the second clause, it may probably point in the direction of the Rabbinic rule that the poor should be assisted in a manner conformable to their former condition—according to their lack (Kethub. 67 b). The Syr. rendering depends either upon a misreading or is a mistranslation.

10. Lose money through a brother and [or] a friend, and let it not rust under the stone unto loss.] "The stone:" the definite stone that marks the place where the money is buried. The meaning is: better to lose money through a friend than by letting it rust. It is a secondary point that such an expression as loss by rust is scarcely applicable to silver. For there might be loss in such manner, or at any rate considerable deterioration. On the other hand, the figure of rust as affecting metals might be transferred from one metal to another (see the same about rust as affecting the gold of the idols: Ep. of Jer. vv. 12, 24). It is of much greater importance and interest to notice that this verse affords fresh evidence of the use which St. James made of Ecclus. For the figure in St. Jas. v. 3 of the rust as affecting the unused gold and silver is not found in any other part of Scripture, and seems derived from our passage. Moreover, of the two expressions for "rusted" and "rust" in St. Jas. v. 3, the one (ἰός, "rust") which in this signification occurs only in that place in the N. T. is used in our passage in Ecclus. (ἰωσθήτω), while the other word in St. Jas. v. 3 (κατίωται—"your gold and your silver are rusted") does not occur in any other place in the N. T. nor yet in the LXX., but only in Ecclus. xii. 11. This also indirectly shews in what general use our book must have been among the Jews—a fact confirmed, as we have seen, by the numerous Talmudic quotations from Ecclus. The Syr. has, instead of "let it not rust under a stone unto loss," this: "rather than thou hide it under the stone or wall." The difference in the two versions, "wall" (in the Syr.) and "loss" (in the Greek), we would account for by the latter reading שֵׁחַת, while the Syr. read שְׁרוֹת (Jer. v. 10), "walls." For the divergence—the Greek reading "rust," the Syr. "hide"—it is not easy to offer a satisfactory explanation. Possibly the Greek translation was not intended to be literal.

11. than gold.] Rather, "than the gold." We remember here the better and far higher direction in St. Matt. vi. 19, 20. The Rabbis speak of certain things of which a man enjoys the fruit or interest in this world, while the capital itself remaineth for the next (Peah i. 1, and in other places). Among them—although the study of the Law is said to outweigh all the others—the bestowal of mercy is mentioned (גְּמִילוּת חֲסָדִים—in Shabb. 127 a this is applied to hospitality and visiting of the sick). The Syr. paraphrases this verse.

12, 13. What a man is to lay up in his storehouses is not grain, nor fruits, nor any other source of wealth—but alms. This will prove a preventive against or else a deliverance from the ill that would otherwise befall him. The simile is farther developed in v. 13. When the Vet. Lat. thus paraphrases v. 12: conclude eleemosynam in corde pauperis, et haec pro te exorabit ab omni malo —it may have had St. Luke xvi. 9 in view.

14. A new stanza: Suretiship. Translate: "A good man will be surety . . . but he who has lost shame will leave him," in the sense of deserting him: such an one will leave the person who has become surety for him to bear the consequences of his rash kindness.

15. the friendship.] Rather, the favours —the kindness.

he hath given his life.] Lit., his soul, in the sense of "himself." The Syr. omits the verse.

16. the good estate.] Rather, the possessions. The Syr. omits this verse, and paraphrases v. 17 in a manner which raises suspicion of a later revision.

B. C. cir. 200.

ful mind will leave him [in danger] that delivered him.

18 Suretiship hath undone many of good estate, and shaken them as a wave of the sea: mighty men hath it driven from their houses, so that they wandered among strange nations.

19 A wicked man transgressing the commandments of the Lord shall fall into suretiship: and he that undertaketh and followeth other men's business for gain shall fall into suits.

20 Help thy neighbour according to thy power, and beware that thou thyself fall not into the same. B. C. cir. 200.

21 The [h] chief thing for life is water, and bread, and clothing, and an house to cover shame. [h] ch. 39. 26.

22 Better is the life of a poor man in a mean cottage, than delicate fare in another man's house.

23 Be it little or much, [i] hold thee contented, that thou hear not the reproach of thy house. [i] 1 Tim. 6, 8.

24 For it is a miserable life to

18. of good estate.] Rather, that were in a prosperous condition.

shaken them.] Rather, tossed them.

driven from their houses.] Rather, made to emigrate [to remove].

strange nations.] Rather, foreign nations.

19. This verse is found in its simplest and, no doubt, original form in the Vat. Cod. It reads: The sinner [the addition in the A. V., "transgressing," &c. occurs in H., 248, Co., Syr., Vet. Lat., and is no doubt a later gloss] who falleth into suretiship [perhaps in the sense of purposely incurring it, throwing himself into it—or else even in the sense of "rashly" doing so] and who pursueth after improper gains shall be thrown into judgments [law-sentences]. There is probably not a more difficult expression in Ecclus. than διώκων ἐργολαβείας, which we have rendered: "who pursueth improper gains"—although with great doubt. For, assuredly, it does not suit the context, whether of the previous clause or of the preceding verses, which throughout refers to suretiship. If therefore we have not the courage to give up the usual meaning of either διώκων or ἐργολαβείας, the latter must at least be taken sensu malo (which it sometimes bears), so as in some way to fit into the context. But we would venture to suggest that διώκων might here be taken as a law-term—"a prosecutor"—and ἐργολαβείας as in the genitive. In that case the words might be rendered: and who prosecutes [another] for a contract—referring to a man who first wrongfully or foolishly became surety, and then by a law-process tried to get rid of his engagement. This, if admissible, would suit the context well. The Syr. seems from its paraphrastic language to have had difficulty about this verse, and it inserts between the two clauses what reads like a later interpretation. The Arab. omits it.

20. On the preceding verse this follows as a general conclusion and summary: "Assist thy neighbour according to thy power, and (but) take heed to thyself that thou fall not." The Syr. has instead of the words in the second clause: "and deliver thyself from double." The "take heed to thyself" (Greek) and "deliver thyself" (Syr.) may well represent the same Hebrew word—probably (as in the Syr.) the word פַּצֵּה, perhaps with the addition of another verb as in Ps. cxliv. 7, פְּצֵנִי וְהַצִּילֵנִי; perhaps it read פְּצֵה וְהַצֵּל נַפְשֶׁךָ. As to the Syr. rendering "double" for the Greek "that thou fall not," the former may be a paraphrastic reference to the punishment into which such an one might fall, or (as has been suggested) it may depend on a confusion between מִנְּפֹל (the Greek) and מִכֶּפֶל (the Syr.).

21. A new stanza. Utmost moderation is recommended, so as to be independent of others.

to cover shame.] Rather, "which covereth shame,"—conceals what decency forbids to be in public.

22. Better is the state of life.] Or, the mode of living, βίος.

in a mean cottage.] Rather, under a roof of beams, the opposite of a "ceiled house."

in another man's house.] Rather, "among strangers."

23. The second clause, "that thou hear not," &c. (or rather, and thou shalt not hear, &c.), does not occur in the Vat., the Sin., nor the Alex., but is found in 248, Co. The Syr. has: "Whether he (live on) much or little, no one knoweth: and what he doeth within his house man does not see it." The Vet. Lat. has a confused paraphrase.

24. Lit., A wretched life: from house to house—and where one so-

B. C. cir. 200.

go from house to house: for where thou art a stranger, thou darest not open thy mouth.

25 Thou shalt entertain, and feast, and have no thanks: moreover thou shalt hear bitter words:

26 Come, thou stranger, and furnish a table, and feed me of that thou hast ready.

27 Give place, thou stranger, to an honourable man; my brother cometh to be lodged, and I have need of mine house.

28 These things are grievous to a man of understanding; the upbraiding of houseroom, and reproaching of the lender.

CHAPTER XXX.

B. C. cir. 200.

1 It is good to correct our children, 7 and not to cocker them. 14 Health is better than wealth. 22 Health and life are shortened by grief.

Of children.

HE [a] that loveth his son causeth him oft to feel the rod, that he may have joy of him in the end.

[a] Prov. 13. 24. & 23. 13.

2 He that chastiseth his son shall ‖ have joy in him, and shall rejoice of him among his ‖ acquaintance.

‖ Or, good by him.

‖ Or, kinsfolk.

3 He that [b] teacheth his son grieveth the enemy: and before his friends he shall rejoice of him.

[b] Deut. 6. 7.

4 Though his father die, yet he is as though he were not dead: for he journeth [as one not forming part of the household but admitted to it: παροικήσει] he cannot open the mouth.

25. Although all the Codd. have, as in the A. V., ξενιεῖς καὶ ποτιεῖς, "thou shalt entertain and feast," it seems absolutely necessary to adopt the emendation of Bretschneider: ξενισθεὶς καὶ ποτισθεὶς: Thou shalt be entertained as a guest, and be given to drink unto ungraciousness = with ungraciousness, or else, till at last it is made ungracious — "and besides [afterwards?] thou shalt hear bitter things about them," viz. about thy entertainment and drink. The Syr.: "thou art a sojourner (= ξενιεῖς?), and thou shalt drink contumely."

26. The verse expresses what is virtually said to such an one: "Go bye (along), sojourner, prepare a table, and if there is anything in thy hand (if thou hast anything) give me to eat" (entertain me). It is thy turn now,—"give and take," as men say.

27. Lit.: Go out, sojourner, from the face [or presence] of glory; probably in the sense of the A. V. Fritzsche explains: "Go away from this glory, which is not meant for thee [this seems strained]—my brother has been received as a guest. (I have) need of the house."

28. Lit.: upbraiding of a house—that is, as Fritzsche explains, connected with one's being in a house—"and reproach [or disgrace] of a creditor." These are the two things which a man of sensibility feels grievous: the one inside the house, when things are cast up to him and he has intimation to leave; the other outside the house, when he is harassed and importuned and put to shame by a creditor. The reference, it need scarcely be said, is to a poor man—but one of intelligence and education.

CHAPTER XXX.

This chapter, which in its present position in the Vat. and other Codd. is misplaced (see the remarks in the sequel), naturally arranges itself under the two headings: "About Children" (vv. 1–13) and "About Health" (vv. 14–20). Each of these sections begins with the heading just mentioned. But there is a third stanza added (vv. 21–25) on joy of the heart, which belongs to the second section, and is connected with v. 16 b.

1. Lit., "will continue to him strokes." in the end.] Rather, "at last." Comp. Prov. xiii. 24, xxiii. 13, xxix. 15.

2. He that chastiseth.] Perhaps better, correcteth, or disciplineth.

shall have joy [or advantage]; and shall rejoice of him.] Better, and shall glory in him. For the construction comp. LXX. Ps. xlviii. (xlix.) 6; Prov. xxv. 14; Rom. v. 2.

3. grieveth.] Rather, "maketh jealous." The second clause differs only slightly from v. 2 b.

4. Lit., "his father died, and as if he had not died," &c. The Syr. has: "and he is companion (associate, fellow = חָבֵר; the expression is = the Heb. אָח לְ, which the Targum renders: חברא לְ) to him that is not dead." The Syr. seems to represent the Hebrew more faithfully than does the Greek. The meaning is: the father is hath left one behind him that is like himself.

B. C. cir. 200.

[c] Ps. 128. 3, 6.

5 While he lived, he [c]saw and rejoiced in him: and when he died, he was not sorrowful.

6 He left behind him an avenger against his enemies, and one that shall requite kindness to his friends.

7 He that maketh too much of his son shall bind up his wounds; and his bowels will be troubled at every cry.

B. C. cir. 200.

8 An horse not broken becometh headstrong: and a child left to himself will be wilful.

9 Cocker thy child, and he shall make thee ‖afraid: play with him, and he will bring thee to heaviness.

‖ Or, astonished.

10 Laugh not with him, lest thou have sorrow with him, and lest thou gnash thy teeth in the end.

[d] ch. 7. 23.

11 [d]Give him no liberty in his youth, and wink not at his follies.

12 Bow down his neck while he is not really dead, for he continues in his son. This and the following verse cast light on one of the great consolations and hopes which the writer entertained in regard to death: continuance in one's children.

5. The words "in him," omitted in the Vat., are found in 248, Co. The Syr. has: "saw him and rejoiced." The Vet. Lat. has: vidit, et laetatus est in illo. We may therefore conclude that the pronoun was in the original, although probably in the same order as in the Syr. The omission in the Vat. may have been due to a wish to give the statement a more general form.

6. Compare here the previous remarks in the note on v. 4. The Syr. — probably rightly—inverts the clauses.

7. He that maketh too much of.] Better, he that treateth him indulgently (molliter et leniter): περιψύχων—which the Vet. Lat. curiously resolves into two words, pro animabus (filii). The Syr. rightly reproduces what probably was in the original: מְפַנֵּק, as in Prov. xxix. 21 (a verse which is differently understood in the LXX.). In Ber. R. 22 (on Gen. iv. 6) we read that he who in his youth indulgently treats (indulgeth) his (evil) inclination (שמפנק את יצרו בנעוריותו), his end (will be) that it will rule over him in his old age; referring to Prov. xxix. 21.

From this it would appear that when the LXX. translated Prov. xxix. 21 by ὃς καταστραταλᾷ ἐκ παιδός, "he that liveth wantonly from a child," they only followed an ancient Jewish tradition in their identification of עַבְדּוֹ, "his servant," with יִצְרוֹ, "his inclination," since the same explanation as in Ber. R. 22 also occurs in Sukk. 52 b. The other mistranslation in the LXX.: "and in the end shall grieve over himself," for the Hebrew יִהְיֶה מָנוֹן (erroneously rendered both in the A. V. and the R. V., following Jewish commentators: "shall have him become a son") is the same as in the Syr. (which agrees with the LXX. in the whole clause). The Targum has: "he that indulges [his inclination?] from his youth shall become a servant [to it?]." But in later Hebrew the word מנן was understood as meaning: "to lift oneself up," "to be lord or master." The interest of the subject will excuse this digression.

shall bind up his wounds.] I.e. he shall have such wounds to bind up. Hence the Syr. paraphrastically: "his wounds shall increase." The subject is the indulging father (so also in the Syr.) and not the indulged son.

and his bowels.] The Syr. rightly explains, "the heart."

is troubled at every cry.] Whether of his son, or more probably, that caused by him. The Syr. has: "shall empty out." Perhaps the Hebrew had נִבְקָה רוּחַ בְּקִרְבּוֹ, as in Is. xix. 3, where the LXX. renders ταραχθήσεται (as in our verse) τὸ πνεῦμα ἐν αὐτοῖς.

9. Cocker thy child.] Rather, tend as a nurse thy child. The Syr. has "instruct." Possibly the Hebrew word was אמן, which the LXX. renders by our Greek word in Lament. iv. 5 (comp. Heb. Numb. xi. 12), and which means "to tend," "to bear" (as a child is borne; comp. Is. lx. 4), and also "to train," "educate," "guide" (so repeatedly in the O. T.). The second part of clause 1 the Syr. translates: "lest thou be put to shame," —possibly a paraphrastic rendering dependent upon the translation of the first word. The Greek means that by such dealing on the part of a father the son will come to bring terror and shame upon him. Fritzsche quotes from Solon: liberis ne arrideas, ut in posterum non fleas.

11 b and 12 a are placed in the Vat. after v. 13, probably by mistake of a transcriber. They are omitted in the Alex., C., and other Codd. They must be restored from H., 248, Co. They are also in the Syr. and the Vet. Lat. Verse 12 d is wholly omitted and restored from H., 106, 248, Co., Vet. Lat.

B. C. cir. 200.

young, and beat him on the sides while he is a child, lest he wax stubborn, and be disobedient unto thee, and so bring sorrow to thine heart.

13 Chastise thy son, and hold him to labour, lest his lewd behaviour be an offence unto thee.

Of health.

14 Better is the poor, being sound and strong of constitution, than a rich man that is afflicted in his body.

15 Health and good estate of body are above all gold, and a strong body above infinite wealth.

16 There is no riches above a sound body, and no joy above the joy of the heart.

17 Death is better than a bitter life or continual sickness.

B. C. cir. 200.

18 Delicates poured upon a mouth shut up are as messes of meat set upon a grave.

19 [e]What good doeth the offering unto an idol? for neither can it eat nor smell: so is he that is [‖]persecuted of the Lord.

[e] Bel and Dragon 7.

[‖] Or, afflicted.

20 He seeth with his eyes and groaneth, [f]as an eunuch that embraceth a virgin and sigheth.

[f] ch. 20. 4.

21 [g]Give not over thy mind to heaviness, and afflict not thyself in thine own counsel.

[g] Prov. 12. 25. & 15. 13. & 17. 22.

22 The gladness of the heart is the life of man, and the [‖]joyfulness of a man prolongeth his days.

[‖] Or, exultation.

23 Love thine own soul, and comfort thy heart, remove sorrow far from thee: [h]for sorrow hath [h] 2 Cor. 7. 10.

13. Chastise.] Better, "discipline thy son;" "hold him to labour." Gaab and De Wette: "labour with him," "take pains with him;" see xiii. 4.

lewd behaviour.] Rather, shameful behaviour: "be an offence to thee," Vat. προσκόψῃ; A., C., and other Codd., προσκόψῃς. The alterations in the Syr. seem of little importance.

14. This verse begins the second stanza, "concerning health." The first clause lit.: "better one poor, sound and strong of constitution."

15. and good estate of body.] Rather, a good constitution. The Syr. differs slightly—perhaps correctly, perhaps explanatively. In the second clause it has: "and a good spirit above pearls" (viz. "I have loved" —this in the first clause).—The sentiment expressed in this verse is farther developed in 16 b, where the Syr., however, has: "a good heart."

17. After "a bitter life," H., the Syr., and Vet. Lat. insert: "and eternal rest then." This was undoubtedly in the original. Possibly the words were omitted for dogmatic reasons. The construction κρείσσων ὑπέρ, which in Ecclus. occurs only in this passage, is found in the LXX., in 3 Kings xix. 4, and in Ps. xxxvi. 16, lxii. 4, lxxxiii. 10. These are the only passages in the Psalms in which the word occurs. In the other twenty-eight passages in the LXX. the construction with κρείσσων is different, as also in the other three passages in Ecclus. in which it occurs = טוֹב מִן. In the N. T. this construction does not occur.

18. For "poured" (better, "poured out") the Syr.—which the Vet. Lat. follows —reads "covered." May there have been a confusion between כסה and נסך? At the same time 248 (which Co. follows) has also κεκλεισμένα.

19. That the second clause of v. 18 refers to heathen practices, appears from v. 19 a, b. In clause c the marginal rendering, "afflicted" (viz. by sickness), gives the right meaning. The Syr. paraphrases it: "so is he who has wealth and [but] does not use it."

20. At the close of the verse the Syr. adds: "But the Lord shall avenge it with His hand,"—perhaps a marginal gloss. But H., 23, 55, 68, 106, 253, 254 have (perhaps after the Syr.?): οὕτως ὁ ποιῶν ἐν βίᾳ κρίματα, interpolated, not unnaturally, from xx. 3.

21. This verse begins the third stanza, which connects itself with v. 16 b (if not, according to the Syr., with 15 b). From what directly affects the body the writer passes to what influences it through the mind. It is probably to this verse that the Talmud refers when it quotes as from Ben Sira (what we also find—although there probably from Prov. xxvii. 1—in St. Matt. vi. 34): "Sorrow not the sorrow of the morrow, for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth; perhaps to-morrow he is no more, and so he shall be found sorrowing over a world which is no longer his" (Sanh. 100 b; Yebam. 63 b). Similarly we read (Ber. 9 b), "Suffice sorrow in its hour" (i.e. when it comes); and (Jer. Abh. Z. 39 b), "The sorrow of the hour (immediate sorrow) is sorrow."

23. thine own soul = thyself. The Talmud quotes here as from Ben Sira: "Let not care killed many, and there is no profit therein.

24 Envy and wrath shorten the life, and carefulness bringeth age before the time.

25 ‖A cheerful and good heart will have a care of his meat and diet.

‖ Or, A noble.

CHAPTER XXXI.

1 Of the desire of riches. 12 Of moderation and excess in eating, or drinking wine.

[anxiety, sorrow] come into thy heart, for care [anxiety, sorrow] hath killed strong men" (in another place, "hath killed many"). (Sanh. 100 b.)

24. From sorrow the writer passes to other noxious affections of the mind.

25. The chapter closes with what in all the Greek MSS., except 248, which has it in its right place, stands as xxxiii. 13. In the Syr., which is followed by the Vet. Lat., it is in its right place. Translate: "A heart noble [liberal?—probably in contrast to v. 24] and good [cheerful?] at [over: see Winer, pp. 349–351] meat [meats] will give heed to [attend to—have a care of] the food." As we understand it, a man free from envy and anger and cheerful at table will enjoy his food, and it will do him good. Thus this sentence is not abrupt, but in strict connexion with the preceding context, which treats of health and how to promote it. Fritzsche (whose interpretation alone we will mention) understands it to mean that a liberal heart and one that feels cheerily disposed at meat will have a care for the food—in the sense of seeing to it that there be not any stint—he will not be niggard as regards meat. But this would abruptly introduce what is in no way connected with the preceding context. Fritzsche himself refers to the use of ἐπιμελοῦμαι αὐτοῦ for אָשִׂימָה עֵינִי עָלָיו in Gen. xliv. 21 [and the expression is not used in the LXX. in that sense in any other place: in Ecclus. it occurs only in our verse]. But this surely means, "I will pay attention to him," and cannot in any wise lead to the interpretation which Fritzsche would give to our verse. The Syr. has: "(he that is of) a good heart has much meat, and all that he eats mounts into body." This phrase represents the Rabbinical עלים על גופו ('Abhoth de R. Nathan,' ed. Schechter, p. 82 a). The Vet. Lat. seems to have been ambitious of imitating this, although it omits the second clause of the Syr., which indeed may have been only a gloss. It has: "splendidum cor et bonum in epulis est: epulae enim illius diligenter fiunt." We mark that the Syr. is here not followed by any Greek MS.—not even by 248.[1]

As regards the inversion and wrong order in the Greek MSS., not only of v. 25, but in the following chapters, a few remarks may here be in place.

The Greek MSS. (with the exception of 248, the "unus vetustus codex" cited by Nobilius) proceed from ch. xxx. 24 to ch. xxxiii. 16, "as one that gathereth." This is continued till xxxvi. 11, "Gather the tribes of Israel together;" after which follow xxx. 25 to xxxiii. 16, "I awaked up last of all," when the rest of xxxvi. 11 is taken up, slightly altered. It is evident that this must have proceeded from a misplacement of the sheets in the archetype of our Greek MSS. Such an accident was more likely to remain uncorrected in a book like the present, than in any of which the matter was more strictly continuous. Hence it happens that a similar case has occurred in the Greek of the Book of Proverbs; that another transposition is found in many of the MSS. of the Aethiopic version of Ecclesiasticus; and yet another in a British Museum MS. of the same version. On a similar transposition in the 'Mostellaria' of Plautus see Ritschl, 'Parerga Plautina.' There, as here, the copyists endeavour by a slight alteration to conceal the abruptness of the transition. While the transposed order is found in the versions clearly derived from the Greek (Syr. Hexaplaris, Aethiopic, Armenian, and Coptic), with the exception of the Old Slavonic, the Vetus Latina and Peschitto-Syriac exhibit that followed by the A. V., and clearly shewn by internal evidence to be correct. This was also exhibited in the Complutensian edition. Owing doubtless to the authority of the Vulgate (into which the Vetus Latina had been received), it was followed in early editions of the LXX., and in the versions of Castalio and Tremellius. It is a sign of the general neglect into which the book had fallen that Fritzsche (p. 169) can claim to be the first person who, on critical grounds, has adopted this as the right order.

CHAPTER XXXI.

This chapter naturally connects itself with the last stanza of ch. xxx. The somewhat Epicurean tone of the latter is now to a certain extent modified, although rather by the moral which prudence would suggest than by the higher principles which true religion would inspire. The general subject of the chapter is the wise use of wealth and of what it procures or offers. A stanza of seven verses in depreciation of too great a desire for wealth, since most serious dangers are often

[1] In regard to what follows after this, see the note on p. 32 of the General Introduction.

B. C. cir. 200.

[a] 1 Tim. 6. 9, 10.

WATCHING for [a]riches consumeth the flesh, and the care thereof driveth away sleep.

2 Watching care will not let a man slumber, as a sore disease breaketh sleep.

3 The rich hath great labour in gathering riches together; and when he resteth, he is filled with his delicates.

4 The poor laboureth in his poor estate; and when he leaveth off, he is still needy. B. C. cir. 200.

5 He that loveth gold shall not be justified, and he that followeth corruption shall have enough thereof.

6 [b]Gold hath been the ruin of many, and their destruction was present. [b] ch. 8. 2.

7 It is a stumblingblock unto them involved in its acquisition (vv. 1–7), is followed by another of four verses (vv. 8–11) in praise of him who, while in the possession of wealth, has escaped its perils. The temptations of wealth, especially in the pleasures of the table—or else thoughts of the greed after wealth and the other greed to which it so often leads—suggest stanzas 3 and 4, again respectively of seven and four verses (vv. 12–18 and 19–22). In the first of these moderation at table is recommended, while in the second the wisdom of such temperance is shewn. Similarly, in a stanza of six verses (25–30), moderation in wine is enjoined. This stanza is prefaced and followed by what together forms a stanza of three verses (vv. 23, 24 + v. 31), of which the object is not advice as to our own conduct in regard to food and drink, but as to our conduct towards others in these respects (vv. 23, 24), and as to liberality in providing banquets, and in v. 31 as to our bearing towards others at wine-parties.

1. Watching for riches.] Rather, "the sleeplessness of wealth" (Arm., Lat.), i.e. the sleeplessness which is caused by it. So Anacreon (Stobaeus, 'Flor.' iii. 241) called a talent a "gift which necessitates sleeplessness" (δωρεὰν ἣ ἀναγκάζει ἀγρυπνεῖν). Similarly the Syr., "watching consumeth the flesh of the rich." Apparently עֹשֶׁר and עָשִׁיר were different punctuations.

2. The second clause in the Greek should be rendered: and sleep waketh up a sore disease; or (with a few MSS.) "and a sore disease waketh up sleep." The Syr. rendering, "rejecteth," makes it likely that the Heb. here was יקיין ישנה. We believe the reading of the best MSS. to have been original. Probably the whole sentence was a descriptive clause of the ἀγρυπνία πλούτου (or rather πλοῦτος) which forms the subject of the last verse: "it is a watching care which driveth away sleep; a sore disease which refuseth slumber." We thus avoid the tautology of the present rendering of the first clause. The Syriac rendering for ἀγρυπνία, "food," seems difficult to account for, except as a corruption of māmūn, "wealth."

3, 4. A contrast between the labours of the poor and rich. The parallelism suggests that ἐν συναγωγῇ χρημάτων is not "to collect wealth" (Syr., Fritzsche), but, "owing to the accumulation of his property," he had to pull down his barns to build greater ones (De Wette). Compare Marcus Aurelius, v. 12. The latter half of the verse represents the time when he says to his soul, "Eat, drink, and be merry." On the other hand, the poor labours, "owing to the decrease of his living," for the opposite reason; and at the end, "after sparing and labouring leaves not even enough for his burial" (Aristophanes, 'Plutus,' 557). The following verses are quoted from Ben Sira in the Talmud: "All the days of the poor are evil, Ben Sira says, even his nights. His roof is amongst the lowest of the rooves; and his vineyard at the top of the mountains; the rain of other rooves [flows] down upon his; and the soil of his vineyard [falls] down to other vineyards" (Babh. B. 146*a*; Sanh. 100*b*; Kethubh. 110*b*).

5. he that followeth corruption shall have enough thereof.] For "thereof" (Alex.) the best MS. has "himself." "Corruption" is variously taken to mean "the corruptible" (Luther, Fritzsche), or "that which leads to corruption" (Baduellus, who compares Gal. vi. 8). In both cases the parallelism is lost. The Syriac has: "he that pursueth wealth shall be led astray thereby;" whence Grotius conjectured διάφορον — ὀλισθήσεται. The first of these corrections (which perhaps should rather be ἀδιάφορον) we are inclined to accept. Instead of the second, we think it more probable that שבע was a false reading for ישגה, of which, perhaps, the last letter was lost in the Greek translator's copy. Αὐτοῦ was perhaps altered variously to αὐτός and αὐτῆς when διαφθορᾶν was written; compare the Coptic rendering, "he that pursueth it shall be filled with corruption."

6. Gold hath been the ruin, &c.] Rather, "many have been delivered unto ruin for the sake of gold, and their destruction came in their face." The verse (as the Syriac shews) means, they perished for all their gold could do; it could

B. C. cir. 200.

that sacrifice unto it, and every fool shall be taken therewith.

[c] Luke 6. 24.

8 [c]Blessed is the rich that is found without blemish, and hath not gone after gold.

9 Who is he? and we will call him blessed: for wonderful things hath he done among his people.

10 Who hath been tried thereby, and found perfect? then let him glory. Who might offend, and hath not offended? or done evil, and hath not done it?

B. C. cir. 200.

11 His good shall be established, and the congregation shall declare his alms.

[d] Ps. 141. 4. Prov. 23. 1, 2, 3. ch. 37. 29.

12 If thou sit at a bountiful table, [d] ‖ be not greedy upon it, and say not, There is much meat on it.

‖ Gr. open not thy throat upon it.

13 Remember that [e] a wicked eye is an evil thing: and what is created more wicked than an eye? therefore it weepeth ‖ upon every occasion.

[e] Matt. 6. 23. & 20. 15.

‖ Or, before every thing that is presented.

14 Stretch not thine hand whithersoever it looketh, and thrust it not with him into the dish.

not prevent the most direct and obvious evils happening to them. Cp. Prov. xi. 4, 28.

7. unto them that sacrifice unto it, &c.] With this expression commentators compare Ephes. v. 5, "nor covetous man who is an idolater." The Syriac gives us an easier figure: "Riches are a stumbling-block to fools, and whosoever strays therein stumbles" (or "is overthrown thereby"). The words representing "them that sacrifice" and "fool" have changed places. It is probable that the Syriac order is right, and that the Hebrew word was עֹבֵר, misread by the Greek עֹבֵד; the literal meaning would then be, "Riches are a stumbling-block in the way of fools, and every [one] that passeth by stumbles thereon." "Servus fit rei cui imperare debet" (Grot.).

8. hath not gone after gold.] Has guided it instead of being guided by it.

10. then let him glory.] Lit., let it be for a glory unto him. In the first clause the Greek seems to be more correct than the Syriac: "who has clung to it and hath peace?" The author probably used the Aramaic verb בדק for "to try," misread by the Syrian דבק, "to cleave;" while the rest may be explained from the various punctuations, יְשֻׁלַּם and יְשֻׁלָּם.

11. His good.] The possession thereof will be secured him.

his alms.] Here more probably his righteousness.

12. Third stanza: on moderation at table. The Latin has the heading de continentia. The author has in mind Prov. xxiii. Compare the precepts on eating in 'Massekheth Kallāh,' p. 17*b*; 'Derekh Erets' (ed. Tawrogi), p. 29; and Musonius ap. Stobaeum, i. 369, 45.

12–18. On temperance.

12. bountiful.] Rather, plenteous. ἐπὶ τραπέζης is a Semiticism; cf. the Syr. here and Wright, 'Arabic Grammar,' ii. p. 179 ("because a person sitting at table rises above the level of it").

be not greedy.] Lit., open not thy throat. The author seems to be merely interpreting the phrase in Prov. l. c. 2, "put a knife at thy throat." The warning is probably not so much against greediness, as against making any remark.

There is much [meat] on it.] The γέ is idiomatic, and represents our "What a lot!" (Kühner, 'Grammar,' ii. 733.) The Syriac, "it is not enough for me," is characteristic. The praising of the food in Oriental countries is done by the host; the mere act of admiration by anyone else would be regarded as dangerous. See Lane, 'Modern Egyptians,' i. 315: "When a person expresses what is considered improper or curious admiration of anything, he is generally reproved by the individual whom he has thus alarmed;" and especially ibid. 183, when any one is invited to partake of a meal, "he must reply if he do not accept the invitation, 'Heneeän' ('may it be productive of enjoyment'), or use some similar expression; else it will be feared that an evil eye has been cast upon the food." Various remedies for the effects of such a phrase as "how pretty!" (καλόν γε) are given in the former passage.

13. Remember that a wicked eye is an evil thing.] Syr., "that God hates (יִשְׂנָא אֱלָהִים) an evil eye." The Greek text has perhaps toned down this powerful expression.

therefore it weepeth upon every occasion.] Rather, of the whole countenance. The thought is rightly explained by Fritzsche: as a sign of its wickedness, or in punishment of it, it alone of the whole countenance weeps. In Greek and some other languages δακρύω, κλάω are identified with being punished.

14. whithersoever it looketh.] "Whatever thou seest," according to one MS. and the Syr.; and this would be a more natural expression than that in the text. It is not unlikely, however, that we should render (with Grotius) "wherever he looketh" [i.e. the master of the feast]; and with this agrees

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

15 Judge of thy neighbour by thyself: and be discreet in every point.

16 Eat, as it becometh a man, those things which are set before thee; and devour not, lest thou be hated.

17 Leave off first for manners' sake; [f] and be not unsatiable, lest thou offend.

[f] ch. 37. 29.

18 When thou sittest among many, reach not thine hand out first of all.

19 A very little is sufficient for a man well nurtured, [‖] and he fetcheth not his wind short upon his bed.

‖ Or, and lieth not puffing and blowing.

20 Sound sleep cometh of moderate eating: he riseth early, and his wits are with him: but the pain of watching, and choler, and pangs of the belly, are with an unsatiable man.

B. C. cir. 200.

21 And if thou hast been forced to eat, arise, go forth, vomit, and thou shalt have rest.

22 My son, hear me, and despise me not, and at the last thou shalt find as I told thee: in all thy works be quick, so shall there no sickness come unto thee.

23 [g] Whoso is liberal of his meat, men shall speak well of him; and the latter part of the verse: and press not with him [i.e. come not into conflict with him] in the dish (as it should be rendered).

[g] Prov. 22. 9.

15. Judge of thy neighbour.] Lit., the things of thy neighbour, i.e. his wishes. Compare Tob. iv. 15 (Fritzsche), and the phrase מיחייש דעתו של חברו (Kallâh, l. c.).

and be discreet in every point.] Rather, on all occasions. The clause is omitted by the Syr. and Vet. Lat., but seems half-apologetic for the minuteness and apparent triviality of these precepts.

16. as it becometh a man.] Lit., like a human being; but the original was probably כאיש, "like a man." Lat. quasi homo frugi; rather, a grown man, ἀνήρ (Barhebraeus). Διαμασᾶσθαι (devour) must refer to some childish and offensive way. The word is used by the comedian Apollophanes (Kock, 'C. A. F.' p. 798; compare Aristophanes, 'Vespae,' 780) of a prolonged mastication. The opposite vice would be καταπιεῖν. Similar precepts in Kallâh, l. c.: "ne comedat cunctis digitis; ne ingerat manum ori suo; ne bibat dum os eius plenum est." The first of these is to avoid the appearance of gluttony; the latter two, to avoid giving offence.

17. Leave off first for manners' sake.] A most successful translation.

18. These precepts will be illustrated by Lane, l. c., 183: "The master of the house first begins to eat; the guests or others immediately follow his example: . . . when only one dish is placed upon the tray at the time, each takes from it a few mouthfuls, and it is quickly removed to give place to another."

19. The gloss vinum, which appears in the Vet. Lat. ("a little wine"), apparently at an early period supplanted the text; since Clem. Alex. 'Paed.' 2, 2, quotes the verse with οἶνος only. Comp. Prov. xiii. 24.

20. Sound sleep.] Lit., sleep of health.

of moderate eating.] Lit., upon a moderate stomach. Similar observations in Horace, 'Sat.' ii. 2, 81 (Fritzsche). Syr.: "with a man that is of moderate habits;" and the word "man" seems recommended by the second clause.

21. arise, go forth, and vomit.] According to the better reading, rise up in the middle, i.e. of the banquet; μεσοπορῶν = μεσῶν, "being in the middle of a meal" (so Arm.). Syr., "remove thyself from the midst of the throng;" and so the Vet. Lat., surge e medio. Which of these two was the meaning of the original, "Rise from the midst of the party" or "of the meal," is not certain; nor is the difference very great. Compare Lane, l. c., p. 187: "Each person as soon as he has finished says, 'Praise be to God,' and gets up without waiting till the others have done." Fritzsche's paraphrase, "rise up and take a good walk," can scarcely be a serious explanation. The addition "vomit" (248, Co., and Lat.) is a suggestion of the purpose for which any one would rise; a suggestion drawn, we may hope, from Roman rather than from Hebrew customs. Compare the well-known place, Cic. 'ad Att.' xiii. 52, 1, of Caesar: ἐμετικὸν agebat; itaque et edit et bibit ἀδεῶς ("he intended to take an emetic after dinner," Watson). Yet it may be merely a dittography.

22. quick.] Rather, active. Syr., "humble;" probably an improvement. Fritzsche connects this activity with the supposed advice of the last verse.

23. liberal of his meat.] "Qui laute vivit seu largiter dat epula," Schleusner. Syr., "A good eye that is good upon bread is blest," perhaps "contaminating" the text from Prov. xxii. 9.

men shall speak well of him.] Lit., lips shall bless. 'Abhoth de R. N.,' p. 68 b:

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

the report of his good housekeeping will be believed.

24 But against him that is a niggard of his meat the whole city shall murmur; and the testimonies of his niggardness shall not be doubted of.

[h] Isai. 5. 22.
[i] Judith 13. 2, 8.

25 Shew not thy [h]valiantness in wine; [i]for wine hath destroyed many.

26 The furnace proveth the edge by dipping: so doth wine the hearts of the proud by drunkenness.

B. C. cir. 200.

27 [k] Wine is as good as life to a man, if it be drunk moderately: what life is then to a man that is without wine? for it was made to make men glad.

[k] Ps. 104. 15. Prov. 31. 6, 7.

28 Wine measurably drunk and in season bringeth gladness of the heart, and cheerfulness of the mind:

29 But wine drunken with excess maketh bitterness of the mind, with brawling and quarrelling.

30 Drunkenness increaseth the rage

"Three things endear a man to the world: an open hand, a spread table, and levitas capitis."

of his good housekeeping.] Rather, of his goodness (lit., "beauty"). Syr., "and a good witness," mistaking טוּבָה for טֻבָּה.

24. Omitted in the Syr., owing to the homoeoteleuton.

him that is niggardly.] Mistaken by the Vet. Lat. in nequissimo pane, somewhat naturally. The verse is a reminiscence of Prov. xi. 25. Cp. sup. xiv. 10.

25–31. On wine.

25. Shew not thy valiantness.] From Isa. v. 22.

wine hath destroyed.] Syr., "old wine;" the original therefore varied the word in the clauses (e.g. יין and חמר).

26. The furnace proveth the edge by dipping.] The interpretation of this verse offers some difficulties. Commentators seem to confuse two processes,—the testing of gold and silver (with which the effect of wine is compared by Theognis, v. 499, ed. Bergk), and the dipping of red-hot iron in water to give it temper. As described in 'Encycl. Metropol.' viii. 408 b, in the latter process the steel is first heated and immersed to give it hardness, and a second time to give it temper. The degree of hardness attained is judged of (in the second process) by the colour which the metal takes in the several stages of the heating (ibid.). The verse might allude to this latter fact, and we might construe, "The furnace tests the hardness by colouring," with which the latter clause, "so doth wine the hearts of the proud by fighting" (v. infra), might be brought into agreement. At the same time it is very improbable that any such technicality is alluded to; and we have reason to suspect some mistranslation. The Syriac has: "As the furnace trieth the work of the goldsmith, even so is wine the provoker of sin." The second clause in the Greek is variously read, καρδίαν ὑπερηφάνων (Clem. Alex.); καρδίας ἐν μάχῃ ὑπερηφάνων (Vat.); ἐν καρδίας καὶ ἐν μάχῃ (155); ἐν καρδίᾳ ὑπερηφάνων ἐν μέθῃ (248, Co.). It would appear that καρδίας and ἐν μάχῃ are various translations of בקרב (or מקרב); and that the Syriac as well as the Greek versions go back to an original כן יין קרב זדין, "so doth wine the heart of the proud." As the colour of the steel is brought out by the furnace, so the inherent pride is brought out by wine. In 'Abhoth.' p. 68 b (ed. Schechter), wine is mentioned as one of the three things by which men are tested.

Fritzsche interprets the second clause (which he renders "so doth wine the hearts in the strife of the proud"), "according as the person who has drunk keeps cool or otherwise."

27. as good as life.] Syr., "like living water." כמו חים for כמו חים?

what life is then.] Rather, is there. Similarly Panyasis (ap. Stob. 'Flor.' i. 364) says, "That man seems not to me to live who, abstaining from wine, drinks another beverage."

These sentiments were perhaps natural at a period when there were practically no drinks known save wine and water; comp. Virg., 'Georg.' i. ad init.

28. bringeth.] Lit., is. The Syriac transposes ἐν καιρῷ into the first clause, rendering it "good times."

29. bitterness of the mind.] The Syr. has "pain, poverty, and headache." The verse should rather have been rendered, Bitterness of soul is wine that is drunk with excess mid brawling. The meaning of the last word, ἀντιπτώματι ("quarrelling"), is not clear; in xxxii. 30 it can be rendered "stumbling." Arm. (here), "opposition;" Fritzsche, "mutual assaults." In 'Abhoth de R. N.,' p. 109, wine is reckoned among the seven things of which a little is good, and a large amount harmful. Compare Theognis, vv. 509, 10.

30. Drunkenness increaseth the rage of the fool till he offend.] Syriac, "Too much wine

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

of a fool till he offend : it diminisheth strength, and maketh wounds.

31 Rebuke not thy neighbour at the wine, and despise him not in his mirth : give him no despiteful words, and press not upon him with urging him [to drink.]

CHAPTER XXXII.

1 Of his duty that is chief or master in a feast. 14 Of the fear of God. 18 Of counsel. 20 Of a ragged and a smooth way. 23 Trust not to any but to thyself, and to God.

B. C. cir. 200.

IF thou be made the master [of a feast,] lift not thyself up, but be among them as one of the rest ; take diligent care for them, and so sit down.

2 And when thou hast done all thy office, take thy place, that thou mayest be merry with them, and receive a crown for thy well ordering of the feast.

3 Speak, thou that art the elder, for it becometh thee, but with sound judgment ; and hinder not musick.

maketh a stumbling to the fool." This we accept, supposing the Hebrew of the last words to have been עֶבְרָה לכסיל מכשול, misread by the Greek translator עֶבְרַת כסיל למ׳.

and maketh wounds.] Lit., and addeth wounds (יֹסֵף), almost "and multiplieth wounds" (Syr.).

31. at the wine.] Lit., at the wine-party.

with urging him to drink.] Rather, with a demand for repayment (Lat., Arm.). Cp. xxix. 28. As, however, the Syriac has "before men," it would seem that we must accept ἀπαντήσει (248, Co.) as the true reading: rendering "and wrangle not with him openly."

CHAPTER XXXII.

The admonitions of ch. xxxi. in regard to feasts naturally lead to others concerning the bearing of those who either preside at a feast —the hegemon or symposiarch—or at least occupy a prominent position in it (vv. 1–6). This again gives rise to admonitions as to the conduct of younger men (in another stanza of six verses: vv. 7–12). The more serious tone which the writer has gradually adopted leads, in a third stanza of six verses (vv. 13–18), to the admonition to be guided by the fear of the Lord and the counsel of wise and experienced men. Substantially the same is the subject of the last stanza (also of six verses: vv. 19–24), although it is presented in a more epigrammatic form. Thus the chapter consists of four stanzas, each of six verses. The transition from the First Part of the chapter (vv. 1–12) to the Second Part, which embodies both the more general and the more religious part of these admonitions, is clearly marked (see the note on v. 13).

1. the master [of a feast].] Appointed by lot or election in the companies described by the Classics (e.g. Pollux, vi. 11). See Wetstein on St. John ii. 9, who cites from Plutarch's 'Symposiaca' similar precepts. The mention of the office would seem to be rare in the Rabbinic writings.

be among them as one of the rest.] The Syriac adds the precept "sit not down at the head of the rich." Perhaps these words are genuine, the last word being slightly corrupted in the original (עָשִׁיר for עָרִיס), and meant "sit not down at the head of the couch."

take diligent care for them.] This, according to Plutarch, l. c., would refer to the nature and quantity of the wine to be given to each.

2. that thou mayest be merry with them.] Rather, through them. "Ut gaudeas cum videbis illis placere quae ordinasti." Grot.

and receive a crown for thy well-ordering of the feast.] Fritzsche finds a reference to a supposed custom of crowning the successful symposiarch,—a custom to which the ancients, perhaps, make no allusion. He seems to us rightly to reject the explanation of the older critics, who thought of the crowns which were worn at drinking-parties by the Greeks and Romans, and perhaps also by the Hebrews (Wisdom ii. 8 ; Isaiah xxviii. 1–5 ; Riehm, s. v. Kranz). The Syriac has here "that thou mayest receive honour at the table;" the Vet. Lat., "ut dignationem consequaris corrogationis." The agreement of these two important witnesses seems to shew that the original had not "crown," but only "honour;" although, if the word אֵאר was used, it might reasonably have been construed in both senses, though employed only in the latter. It is rather more difficult to arrive at a conclusion about the last word, which the Latin renders so strangely by corrogationis; probably = "of the club" (Grotius; see the last edition of Ducange). But the Greek (which is well rendered in the A. V.) gives an excellent meaning.

3. and hinder not musick.] It is remarkable that Chrysostom cites this passage (xii. 395, Ben.) with the word "not" expressly omitted: τί ἐστιν καὶ ἐμποδίσεις μουσικά ; δείκνυσιν ἐκ

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

4 [a] Pour not out words where there is a musician, and shew not forth wisdom out of time.

[a] Eccles. 3, 7. ch. 20. 7.

5 A concert of musick in a banquet of wine is as a signet of carbuncle set in gold.

6 As a signet of an emerald set in a work of gold, so is the melody of musick with pleasant wine.

7 Speak, young man, if there be need of thee: and yet scarcely when thou art twice asked.

B. C. cir. 200.

8 Let thy speech be short, comprehending much in few words; be as one that knoweth and yet holdeth his tongue.

9 [b] If thou be among great men, make not thyself equal with them; and when ancient men are in place, use not many words.

[b] Job 32. 6.

10 Before the thunder goeth lightning; and before a shamefaced man shall go favour.

11 Rise up betimes, and be not τούτου ὅτι οὐχ οὕτως αὐλὸς καὶ κιθάρα καὶ σύριγγες ἡδὺ τοῖς ἀκούουσιν ὡς πρεσβύτου διδασκαλία . . . διὸ καί φησιν · ἐμποδίσεις μουσικά · τοῦτ' ἐστίν, οὐκ ἐάσεις αὐτὰ φαίνεσθαι, ἐπισκοτίσεις αὐτοῖς, συσκιάσεις αὐτά ("hence he says thou wilt hinder the music; i.e. thou wilt not suffer it to appear, but wilt obscure it, throw it into the shade"). The same reading is found in 248, Co.; and it is not impossible that it is right. The text has in other ways got into some confusion, for vv. 3, 7, 8, which deal with the same subject, are all omitted in the Syriac. Clemens Alex. (173 B, ed. Potter) quotes the verse again in a different form, but more like that of Chrysostom than our text.

4. Pour not out words.] Rather, "prattle;" late Heb. שיחה.

where there is a musician.] Rather, an entertainment; since the word ἀκρόαμα includes the performances of jesters, story-tellers, and acrobats, as well as those of musicians, vocal and instrumental, "all of whom were employed to entertain the guests at the end of the banquets" (Casaubon on Athenaeus, bk. xiv., the first half of which contains a lengthy description of these performances). The Latin version, "where there is no attention," is characteristic; one Greek MS. has the same mistake; the Arm. also renders "attention," but is otherwise faithful. The Syr. renders "where wine is being drunk."

and shew not forth wisdom out of time [Syr. "at all times;" בלא עת would be less ambiguous than בכל עת.] I.e. do not play the sage when others are laughing. Compare Athenaeus, l. c., p. 613 d.

5. A concert of musick.] Nearly "a band."

a signet of carbuncle set in gold.] Lit., upon golden ornament. Syr., "like a seal upon a purse of gold." On this stone, probably the ruby, see Riehm, 'Hdw.' s. v. Edelsteine, i. p. 296 b. The sentiment is very like Od. ix. 7; it is scarcely improved by the transformation of the "concert" into the "praise of God" (Syr.). Comp. Prov. xxv. 11.

6. As a signet of an emerald set in a work of gold.] Syr. "like a necklace of gold, precious stones, and emeralds;" to which reading we are inclined to give the preference, supposing that the Greek is merely a second rendering of 5 a, which had been repeated by error in the translator's copy.

so is the melody of musick.] Syr. "good words."

7, 8. These verses are omitted by Syr.

7. and yet scarcely when thou art [rather, hast been] twice asked.] The verse is similarly rendered in the Vet. Lat. and Arm. Fritzsche translates, "yet scarcely twice even if it be desired" (after Baduellus).

8. comprehending.] Literally, multum in parvo. Compare Aeschylus, 'Suppl.' 200, καὶ μὴ πρόλεσχος μηδ' ἐφολκὸς ἐν λόγῳ γένῃ: and for the effect described in b, Hor. 'Sat.' ii. 6, 57, "iurantem me scire nihil mirantur ut unum scilicet egregii mortalem altique silenti." Compare generally Riehm, l. c., s. v. Gastmahl, and 'Derekh Erets,' p. 10 (ed. Tawrogi).

9. make not thyself equal with them.] Syr. "play not the ruler:" Heb., perhaps תמשל, which might be pointed so as to give either sense.

and when ancient men are in place.] The better MSS. read: when another is speaking. The reading of the A. V. is that of Co., supported by Syr., Lat., and Copt.; whereas 248 and Arm. represent a middle stage, "where there are speakers." To us it seems evident that the received reading is correct; and a miswriting of the Greek will probably be the simplest account of the variant.

use not many words.] Lit., prate not much.

10. goeth.] Rather, hasteneth. This verse is omitted in the Syr., and was considered by Bretschneider as an interpolation,

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200. the last; but get thee home without delay.

12 There take thy pastime, and do what thou wilt: but sin not by proud speech.

13 And for these things bless him that made thee, and hath replenished thee with his good things.

14 Whoso feareth the Lord will receive his discipline; and they that seek him early shall find favour.

15 He that seeketh the law shall be filled therewith: but the hypocrite will be offended thereat. B. C. cir. 200.

16 They that fear the Lord shall find judgment, and shall kindle justice as a light.

17 A sinful man will not be reproved, but findeth an excuse according to his will.

18 A man of counsel will be considerate; but a strange and proud but on insufficient grounds. The meaning is thus given by Fritzsche (after Grot.): "A modest and graceful manner precedes the speech of a young man, just as regularly as the lightning precedes the thunder." With this we might compare such a description as that in Plato's 'Charmides,' p. 158 c (Jowett's translation, i. p. 14): "Charmides (there the model of a νεανίσκος σώφρων) blushed, and the blush heightened his beauty, for modesty is becoming in youth; he then said very ingenuously," &c. We should, however, prefer to regard χάρις as the favour which he inspires, nor do we perceive any allusion to his speech.

11. Rise up betimes.] Compare Philostratus v. Apollon. p. 26, ed. Kayser: οἱ παρ' ἡμῖν νύκτωρ τε καὶ οὐκ ἐν ὥρᾳ ἀναλύοντες.

and be not the last.] Lit., and lead not the rear. The Vet. Lat. has "at the time of rising hinder not thyself;" pointing בְּעֵת קוּם for בְּעֵת קוּם; and this seems to have been the punctuation of the Syriac, which, however, is slightly corrupt. Οὐρώγει probably represents the Heb. תְּאַסֵּף, which the Latin (if it had the Hebrew) might have pointed תְּאָסֵף.

without delay.] Lit., and be not idle. Syr. "while there is memory in thee;" Lat. et illic avocare.

12. but sin not by proud speech.] "But not with sin and proud speech" (Lat., Arm.). Syr. "in the fear of God and not with loss," in the last words of which we recognise the common confusion between חסר and חסד. Drusius and Grotius suppose some bodily exercise or game referred to.

13. for these things.] Rather, after or upon these things.

replenished thee.] Lit., inebriateth thee. Perhaps the Heb. original had כִּישְׁבִּיעֲךָ, of which the Greek translation would be a somewhat unfortunate rendering. Drusius cites an observation of Jerome that the Hebrew language puts "ebrietas pro satietate."

14. The Syriac connects this paragraph with the last by introducing the words "in the fear of the God" into v. 12 b.

His discipline.] Omit "His." For the expression compare xviii. 14. Syr. "he that seeketh the service of God will receive instruction; and when he prayeth before Him, He will answer him;" omitting v. 15.

15. He that seeketh the law.] According to Fritzsche, "endeavours to fulfil it." We incline rather to the older view, according to which it means "seeketh its real meaning."

but the hypocrite will be offended thereat.] The passage reminds us of St. John vii. 17, "If any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God." The difficulties of the purport of the Law will only be experienced by those who have no serious desire to put it in practice. See Westcott, ad l. c.

16. shall find judgment.] They will discover that true purport.

shall kindle justice as a light.] Syr. "shall produce much wisdom from their heart." The Hebrew would seem to have been יְצִיאוּ = يضيئون, which the Syrian translator pointed יְצִיאוּ; a curious vestige of this familiar Arabic verb. ("From their heart" (Syr.) is probably therefore an explanation; compare with the phrase Pindar, 'N.' iv. 8, ὅτι γλῶσσα φρενὸς ἐξέλοι βαθείας, and the Rabbinical מוציאים מלבם, e.g. Midr. 'Schochar-Tob,' p. 3 a.) Grotius thinks of their good deeds shining forth throughout the world; perhaps having in mind the technical use of כיצוה for "almsgiving," &c. But more probably "righteous sentences" are meant (Fritzsche).

17. will not be reproved.] Lit., declines (or parries) reproof.

but findeth an excuse.] The Greek word is the same which was used for "concert" in v. 5. It is interpreted in the Arm. version as "models;" i.e. cases in which others have acted as he; by Grotius and Fritzsche, as "an interpretation," viz. of the Law. Plainly

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200. man is not daunted with fear, even when of himself he hath done without counsel.

19 Do nothing without advice; and when thou hast once done, repent not.

20 Go not in a way wherein thou mayest fall, and stumble not among the stones.

21 Be not confident in a plain way.

22 And beware of thine own children. B. C. cir. 200.

23 In every good work trust thy own soul; for this is the keeping of the commandments.

24 He that believeth in the Lord taketh heed to the commandment; and he that trusteth in him ‖shall fare never the worse. ‖ Or, shall not be hurt.

the "interpretation" of the dream in Dan. ii. 25, where the word is used by the LXX., would be quite different to that implied in the present case. We believe the sense to be rightly expressed by the Syriac, "and shall make his path according to his will." He will find out his own rules and take no guidance.

18. will be considerate.] Lit., will not disregard an idea. There are many difficulties in this verse.

(a.) "A strange and proud man" seems an improper expression. Gaab (followed by Fritzsche) writes ἀλλοτρίου [better ἀλλότριον], and renders "will not disregard the suggestion of a stranger." We believe ἀλλότριος and ὑπερήφανος to be both translations of the same word זָר, which by the first translator was read זָר; the correction of the reviser, ὑπερήφανος, was introduced as an addition.

(b.) "Even when of himself he hath done without counsel" is unsatisfactory as a rendering of μετ' αὐτοῦ ἄνευ βουλῆς, out of which no meaning can easily be obtained. Fritzsche supposes the original to have been עמו לא עצה, and thus evolves the thought: "The proud man pays no attention to the opinion of another; and when he has acted, has no counsel, i.e. is completely at a loss." We believe ἄνευ βουλῆς to be a false repetition of the commencement of the next verse; and μετὰ τὸ ποιῆσαι μετ' αὐτοῦ to be a gloss upon ἐν τῷ ποιῆσαι of the second clause of v. 19. These conjectures are confirmed by MS. 157 and partly by the Armenian version, which reads as follows: 19. ἄνευ βουλῆς μηθὲν ποιήσῃς . . . μεταμέλου. 18. ἄνευ βουλῆς μὴ παρίδῃς διανόημα. ἀλλότριος καὶ ὑπερήφανος οὐ καταπτήξει φόβον. The version, however, breaks off here. After the ejection of these there remains: "A man of counsel will not overlook an idea, and a proud man will feel no terror." If we compare the Syriac rendering of clause a, "leaves not wisdom hidden," it will appear probable that the original had לא יעלים עצה (Job xlii. 3)—"to darken counsel." According to Gesenius, 'Thes.' s. v., עלם means to censure it, to endeavour to present it in an unfavourable light. The second clause is satisfactorily Targumed by the Syriac: "but the wicked man hath no control over his tongue." Compare Prov. xii. 15.

19. advice.] Rather, counsel, or deliberation.

and when thou hast once done.] "With deliberation," as glossed by the Greek (v. supra).

repent not.] I.e. thou shalt not repent. Cp. Ewald, 'Lehrb.' p. 602.

20. and stumble not among the stones.] Rather, stony places. The Syriac renders "lest a second time thou stumble." The warning conveyed, according to Fritzsche, is to avoid courses which may easily lead to difficult situations.

21. Be not confident in a plain way.] The meaning of the original is not very clear. The usage of the Greek of this period seems in favour of the rendering in the A. V., which is also that of S. H. The warning will then be not to trust too much to the apparent ease and simplicity of a course. The Syriac, "the path of the wicked," and the Latin laboriosae, are probably bold alterations.

22. And beware of thine own children.] An illustration, according to Fr., of the last warning: even children must not be trusted, however natural an object of confidence they might seem. The sentiment, however, seems to us here so unnatural and inappropriate that we incline to the Syriac text, "and be of good heed in thy paths;" supposing the Greek to represent the corruption of ארחותיך into אחריתך, which has occurred already.

23. trust thy own soul.] I.e. "be self-confident;" or we might render it "believe with thy soul:" but in either case the thought would be unsatisfactory; for surely self-confidence cannot be said to be a way of keeping the commandments. The Syriac renders: "keep thy soul:" שְׁמֹר נַפְשֶׁךָ = "be cautious" (Prov. xvi. 17, xxii. 5, &c.), which not only gives an intelligible phrase, but also restores the play on the two senses of the word "keep" intended by the author. Πίστευε comes from v. 21 or v. 24.

24. He that believeth in the Lord.] So Lat. and late MSS.; Vat., Alex., in the law.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

1 The safety of him that feareth the Lord. 2 The wise and the foolish. 7 Times and seasons are of God. 10 Men are in his hands as clay in the hands of the potter. 18 Chiefly regard thyself. 24 Of servants.

B. C. cir. 200.

[a] THERE shall no evil happen unto him that feareth the Lord; [b] but in temptation even again he will deliver him.

[a] Prov. 12 21. 1 Pet. 3. 13.

[b] 2 Pet. 2. 9.

2 A wise man hateth not the law;

CHAPTER XXXIII.

The structure of this chapter is somewhat difficult. It evidently treats of two different subjects, rather loosely strung together. The first section closes with v. 18. Its occasion seems to be taken from the second part of ch. xxxii. (see introductory remarks to it). As we have it in the Greek version, Part I. of ch. xxxiii. contains five stanzas, consisting respectively of three verses in the first and second stanza (vv. 1–3, 4–6); then of a third stanza of six verses (vv. 7–12), which is followed again by two stanzas, each of three verses (vv. 13–15 and 16–18). In this arrangement the central (third) stanza of six verses (vv. 7–12) is evidently the most important, and contains the main theme of discussion. This, if we understand it rightly, is kindred to the problem which partly formed the topic of discussion in the Book of Ecclesiastes—viz. the seeming arbitrariness in the dealings of Providence, the chance or else fatality which appears to attach to earthly things. A problem this, which—as we can readily understand—would naturally, almost inevitably, engage later Jewish thinking, not untinged by scepticism, when its ancestral religious teaching was—not without the influence of Grecianism—brought face to face with the moral problems presented in life. This great question, prompted perhaps by the second part of ch. xxxii., the writer seeks to answer. He prepares for it in the two stanzas (vv. 1–3 and 4–6) which precede its statement in the central stanza (vv. 7–12); he finds a solution for it in the stanza which follows (vv. 13–15), and he gathers up his life-experience with its struggles and its victory in the attainment of that solution, in the stanza with which the section concludes (vv. 16–18).

Before proceeding, we mark that the Syr. version omits vv. 2–4. To the question whether they really existed in the Hebrew original of the older Siracide and were omitted for dogmatic reasons by the Syriac translator (or his redactor), or whether they must be considered as a Hellenistic addition by the younger Siracide, it is not easy to give an answer. On the one hand, the stanza introducing and preparing for the main question in vv. 7–12 would give good sense even if we were to omit (as in the Syr.) vv. 2–4. In that case v. 1 would set forth the general and comforting assurance, in view of the seeming prevalence of mere fate or else accident, that all shall be well with him who feareth the Lord. Verses 2 and 3 would next set forth in warning the influence of this great problem of life on the two classes differing from the pious servant of God: the fool—on whom all has simply a bewildering effect (v. 5), and the mocking sceptic who laughs at everything, even as a stallion who neighs under every rider (v. 6). Thus far the argument in favour of the omission of vv. 2–4 in the Syr. But, on the other hand, there are dogmatic and other reasons which might prompt the Syr. translator to omit these verses from his rendering of the Hebrew original. Thus v. 3 might seem a dangerous and rationalistic depreciation of the ancient Mosaic oracle by the Urim. And if that verse was to be left out, it would be natural to omit a whole triplet for the sake of symmetry; and in that case it must be vv. 2–4, since neither v. 1 nor yet vv. 5 and 6 could have been omitted.

On the whole, we are inclined to decide in favour of the originality and authenticity of the verses (2–4) omitted in the Syr., and for the following reasons:—(1) They are requisite for the symmetrical structure of the whole section (two stanzas of three verses, one of six verses, and again two of three verses each); (2) they occur in the Vet. Lat.—and there apparently not from the Greek, but either directly from the Hebrew or corrected by it (see the notes); (3) a sentiment such as in v. 3 entirely accords with the theological standpoint of the older Siracide, however objectionable it might seem to a later translator, zealous for orthodoxy as he understood it.

No special difficulties attach to the second part of ch. xxxiii. (vv. 19-end). It consists of three stanzas, respectively of five, five, and three verses. The subject is so different from that treated in the first part that we might be tempted to regard this part as displaced, if it were not that we call to mind that such sudden, almost capricious, transitions seem in character with the disguised discussion of a problem such as in the previous verses. The first stanza (vv. 19–23) bears on the favourite subject of family life; the second stanza (vv. 24–28) gives advice on the treatment of slaves; the third (vv. 29–31) enjoins the cautions of religion and prudence in the matter.

1. in temptation.] Rather, trial.

even again he will deliver him.] Heb. (cf.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

but he that is an hypocrite therein is as a ship in a storm.

3 A man of understanding trusteth in the law; and the law is faithful unto him, ‖ as an oracle.

‖ Or, as the asking of Urim.

4 Prepare what to say, and so thou shalt be heard: and bind up instruction, and then make answer.

‖ Gr. bowels.

5 The ‖ heart of the [c] foolish is like a cartwheel; and his thoughts are like a rolling axletree.

[c] ch. 21. 14.

B. C. cir. 200.

6 A stallion horse is as a mocking friend, he neigheth under every one that sitteth upon him.

7 Why doth one day excel another, when as all the light of every day in the year is of the sun?

8 By the knowledge of the Lord

Syr.) ושב ומלט, "He will turn and deliver him;" i.e. He will reverse what is apparently His present purpose: the καί represents the Hebrew sign of the apodosis. We might supply "even in trials [no evil will happen to him but]."

2–4. These verses are wanting in the Syr. (see introductory remarks).

2. the law.] Lat. mandata et justitias. On the assumption that vv. 2–4 were in the original Hebrew, we would suggest that the term rendered "the law" had been מוּסָר, which should rather have been rendered "chastening." The wise man does not repine at the Divine chastening, but "kisses the rod;" the half-hearted, however, is thrown out of his course by it. For clause b the Lat. has "and will not founder like a ship in a storm." The Heb. was probably וכישל, variously interpreted as וְכָשַׁל and וּכְסִיל. We believe the Latin interpreter to have been right.

3. as an oracle.] See margin. For the readings (which do not interfere with the sense), see Fritzsche.

4. bind up.] The metaphor is from provisions for a journey that are packed up. Lat. conservabit. The imperatives (or imperfects) of צרר and נצר have perhaps been confounded as elsewhere.

then make answer.] "Then" is omitted in the best MSS.

5. The heart.] Lit. bowels.

like a cartwheel.] Syr. "like a swift wheel." The point of comparison, according to some, is their unsteadiness; according to others, the fact that they move always in the same groove. The latter, which is Fritzsche's suggestion, seems to us very improbable; whereas in support of the former interpretation we might quote Virgil's comparison of the frenzied Amata to a top ('Æn.' vii. 378), and the well-known lines of Tibullus (I. v. 2):

"Namque agor ut per plana citus sola verbere turbo Quam celer adsueta versat ab arte puer."

and his thoughts are like a rolling axle-tree.] "In waggons of the kind called plaustra the axle-tree was not a fixture, but revolved together with the wheels" (Rich, 'Dict. of Antiq.' p. 72). The same author makes axis versatilis (Lat. huius loci) "a revolving cylinder, such as is worked by a windlass, for drawing up weights." In either case the point of comparison will be the impossibility of fixing it. The Syriac has "a swine:" we can scarcely doubt (with Linde and Bendtsen) that the original had a derivative of the Aramaic verb חזר, "to revolve:" compare חֲשַׁרִים and חִשְׁקִים.

6. A stallion horse.] Lat. emissarius, a low Latin word, on which see Ducange. Syr. "a ready horse;" pointing to an original מוּזִין, as in Jer. v. 8. The primum and secundum comparationis are inverted.

a mocking friend.] Syr. "the friend of the wicked;" suggesting an original אהב לצון, "one that loveth mockery."

he neigheth under every one that sitteth upon him.] I.e. on all occasions, whatever the circumstances (Fritzsche). צהל, "to neigh," is used in the later Hebrew for "to giggle," e.g. Midrash on 'Proverbs,' p. 21 a. One is tempted to see an allusion to the story of Darius' horse (Herod. iii. 87), which the author may have learned from some other source. The mockery spoken of, if it represent the Hebrew word suggested, means "scoffing;" i.e. at religion and morality (Prov. ix. 12, &c.). He can never be serious.

7. Why doth one day excel another.] I.e. as a good day, or else as a holy day.

when as.] "This combination lasted till 1670" ('Old and Middle English,' p. 253). Maetzner, 'English Grammar,' iii. 430, quotes Shakspere, '3 Henry VI.' v. 7, "So Judas kissed his Master and cried, 'All hail,' when as he meant 'All harm.'" Marlowe, 'Jew of Malta,' v. 2, "What boots it thee to be the governor when as thy life shall be at their command?"

8. The answer is, they were separated by a Divine decree.

he altered.] Rather, He made divers seasons and feasts.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

they were distinguished: and he altered seasons and feasts.

9 Some of them hath he made high days, and hallowed them, and some of them hath he ‖made ordinary days.

‖ Or, ordained for the number of days.

10 And all men are from the ground, and [d] Adam was created of earth.

[d] Gen. 1. 27. & 2. 7.

11 In much knowledge the Lord hath divided them, and made their ways diverse.

12 Some of them hath he blessed and exalted, and some of them hath he sanctified, and set near himself: but some of them hath he cursed and brought low, and turned out of their ‖places.

B. C. cir. 200.

‖ Or, standings.

13 [e] As the clay is in the potter's hand, to fashion it at his pleasure: so man is in the hand of him that made him, to render to them as liketh him best.

[e] Isai. 45. 9. & 64. 8. Jer. 18. 6. Wisd. 15. 7, 8. Rom. 9. 20, 21.

14 Good is set against evil, and life against death: so is the godly against the sinner, and the sinner against the godly.

15 So look upon all the works of the most High; and [f] there are two and two, one against another.

[f] ch. 42. 24.

16 I awaked up last of all, as one that ‖gathereth after the grapegather-

‖ Or, gleaneth.

9. Some of them.] I.e. the days.

he made high days.] Syr. "he blessed," ברך.

he made ordinary days.] Lit. He put into the number of days; i.e. days distinguished by nothing further than their number (in the month or year). In this use of the word signifying "number," the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin languages agree.

10. The Latin translator rendered the second clause, "and from the ground whence Adam was created." Cp. Job xxxi. 18.

11. In much knowledge.] I.e. by a plan too deep for our comprehension. Naturally, we should have expected that they would all have been equal.

made their ways diverse.] Syr. "and he made the inhabitants of the earth."

12. The verse gives specimens of these diversities rather than a classification of them. The first clause may refer to worldly dignities (Fritzsche); the second, to spiritual dignities; the third and fourth, to the destitute and ruined.

and set near himself.] ואליו הקריב, according to Fritzsche; with which compare Jer. xxx. 21. The Syr., however, renders "and they came near to him," which reminds us of the far more common phrase ויגישו אליו; and since ἐγγίζω is rarely transitive, ἤγγισαν may have been originally in the Greek text.

brought low, and turned out of their places.] Syr. "overturned, and rooted out of their dwellings." The author has in mind Isa. xxii. 19. For ἀνέστρεψεν we must read with Co. ἀνέτρεψεν (cp. Cobet, 'Misc. Crit.' p. 382).

13. to fashion it at his pleasure.] The old Greek MSS. have, instead of this, all his ways are according to his pleasure. The reading exhibited by the A. V appears only in H. and seems to be a conjecture (πλάσαι αὐτό for πᾶσαι αἱ ὁδοὶ αὐτοῦ). The Syr. Version omits it altogether.

to render to them as liketh him best.] Lit. according to his judgment. Syr. "to set him over (?) all his works." The Hebrew was very likely לפקדו, which would bear either meaning.

14. Then follows a list of συστοιχίαι.

so is the godly against the sinner.] Syr. "and against the light was created the darkness." The list of the συστοιχίαι of Pythagoras given by Aristotle, 'Metaphys.' p. 986 (ed. Bekker), contains φῶς καὶ σκότος, ἀγαθὸν καὶ κακόν, but not "life and death:" cp., however, Plato, 'Phaedo,' p. 71; and Zeller, 'Philosophie der Griechen,' i. 325, 4th edit.

15. look upon.] Syr. "has exhibited." Either can be supported from Eccles. vii. 14.

16. I awaked up last of all.] Rather, I lay awake, or "lucubrated;" Syr. "I came." We suggest, to account for this curious difference, that the original had בתי, intended for בָּאתִי, but pointed by the Greek translator בַּתִּי, from בות, pernoctare, in Chald. and Syr. "In the feeling," says Fritzsche, "that he has uttered something of importance, the author begins to reflect upon his position, and to feel that, though late in time, he has not laboured in vain." Still, this verse strikes us as singularly abrupt, if we compare the somewhat similar thought in xxiv. 30. The great transposition in the Greek MSS. and the versions derived from the Greek occurs in the middle of this verse. Is it possible that some paragraphs have been lost?

as one that gathereth.] Lit. one that gathereth straws, מְקוֹשֵׁשׁ, but used more generally in Isa. xxiv. 14, &c.

B. C. cir. 200.

ers: by the blessing of the Lord I profited, and filled my winepress like a gatherer of grapes.

17 [z] Consider that I laboured not for myself only, but for all them that seek learning.

[z] ch. 24. 34.

18 Hear me, O ye great men of the people, and hearken with your ears, ye rulers of the congregation.

19 Give not thy son and wife, thy brother and friend, power over thee while thou livest, and give not thy goods to another: lest it repent thee, and thou intreat for the same again.

20 As long as thou livest and hast breath in thee, ‖ give not thyself over to any.

B. C. cir. 200.

‖ Or, sell not.

21 For better it is that thy children should seek to thee, than that thou shouldest ‖ stand to their courtesy.

‖ Or, look to their hands.

22 In all thy works keep to thyself the preeminence; leave not a stain in thine honour.

23 At the time when thou shalt end thy days, and finish thy life, distribute thine inheritance.

24 Fodder, a wand, and burdens, are for the ass; and bread, correction, and work, for a servant.

Of servants.

I profited.] Lit. I got ahead; Syr. "I rose;" Lat. "I hoped" (קִמְתִּי and קִוֵּתִי? The Lat. is perhaps an error for properavi). The thought that he had got before others (Fritzsche) is scarcely hinted.

like a gatherer of grapes.] The whole verse implies that Ben Sira had predecessors in the class of literature to which this book belongs, and that he made use of or incorporated a number of their sayings (comp. Gen. Introd. p. 19).

17. This verse is omitted in the Syr. Version.

18, 19. The Syriac transposes 19 b after 20. This gives a more natural order, unless indeed 19 and 18 are parallel sentiments.

19. power over thee.] Rather, authority over thee,—become not their dependant.

and thou intreat for the same again.] Compare Lysias, p. 638 (ed. Reiske): βούλονται γὰρ πάντες ὑπὸ τῶν παίδων θεραπεύεσθαι μᾶλλον ἢ ἐκείνων δεῖσθαι ἀποροῦντες. The rendering in the A. V. follows the Syriac more nearly than the Greek, which has: lest it repent thee, and thou intreat for them. The Hebrew may have had לְשׁוּב. The meaning "repent" for this word and its derivatives is late; and the original may have meant no more than "lest afterwards thou be compelled to beg of them."

20. give not thyself over to any.] The literal meaning may be, either "barter not thyself with any body" (Arm., Fritzsche), so that the other person assume thy place, or else "sell not thyself to any body." The Heb. (Fritzsche) was אל תמר, which the Syrian may have interpreted from the Aram. מר, a "lord" or "master," rendering "make no flesh lord over thee."

21. stand to their courtesy.] Lit. look to the hands of thy sons: cp. Ps. cxxiii. 2. The Arm. omits σοῦ, giving the meaning "that thy children should be in want." The same version (with Syr.) substitutes "their hands" for "the hands of thy sons." The author may have intended to emphasise the difference between "children" in clause a, and "sons" in clause b. But this is one of the cases in which ancient scribes allowed themselves considerable liberty in dealing with authors' texts. For the phrase compare Aristophanes, 'Vespae,' 613 (of an old man in these circumstances): κεἰ μή με δεήσει ἐς σὲ (τὸν υἱόν) βλέψαι καὶ τὸν ταμίαν ὁπότ' ἄριστον παραθήσει, and 'Abhoth de R. N.,' p. 90 a: "If a man eat of the property of his father or of his mother or of his children, his mind is not established; much more when he eateth of the property of others."

22. keep to thyself the preeminence.] We prefer the reading of C. and Arm., ὑπεράνω, "have the upper hand;" למעלה.

leave not.] Rather, set not.

23. The substance of this verse is quoted in the so-called 'Second Alphabet of Ben Sira' in the following form:—"Hide, my son, thy wealth in thy life, and conceal it; and give it not to thy heirs to the day of thy death."

At the time when thou shalt end thy days, and finish thy life.] Lit. on the day of the completion of the days [om. Arm.] of thy life, and at the time of the end. Syr. "at the time when the number of thy days shall be completed, on the day of thy death, bequeath thy goods to thy son." Arab. "at the end of thy life bequeath thy goods to thy son;" assuredly all that is required to express the thought.

ON SLAVES.

24. a wand.] Lit. a rod. Some have regarded this verse as a quotation (L. D.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

25 If thou set thy servant to labour, thou shalt find rest: but if thou let him go idle, he shall seek liberty.

26 A yoke and a collar do bow the neck: so are tortures and torments for an evil servant.

27 Send him to labour, that he be not idle; for idleness teacheth much evil.

28 Set him to work, as is fit for him: if he be not obedient, put on more heavy fetters. B. C. cir. 200.

29 But be not excessive toward any; and without discretion do nothing.

30 [h] If thou have a servant, let him be unto thee as thyself, because thou hast bought him [‖] with a price. [h] ch. 7. 20. [‖] Gr. in blood.

31 If thou have a servant, intreat him as a brother: for thou hast need of him, as of thine own soul: if Cramer, 'Moral der Apocryphen,' 201). Fritzsche finds in the proverbial form of the sentence the excuse for its coarseness.

correction.] Probably a euphemism for "the lash," as the Arm. renders it. Compare Prov. xxvii. 3, which in Gesner's 'Stobaeus,' p. 604, is quoted with virga servo insipienti.

25. The Syr. is here different: "Thou shalt give him no rest; and if thou raise his head, he desireth liberty." The Latin version has also a very interesting rendering: operatur in disciplina et quaerit requiescere: laxa manus illi et quaerit libertatem. The variations in the second clause will be explained if we suppose the original to have been הרף לו, otherwise read הרם לו; the "hands" and "head" are the supplements (doubtless correct ones) of the translators. The Greek and Latin of clause 1 may imply an original עבד בעבד ובקש מנוחה, of which the Greek translator rightly understood the first two words, while the Latin translation might be explained by pointing וּבַקֵּשׁ rather than וּבִקֵּשׁ: "make a slave work, and he will seek rest; relax his discipline, and he will seek liberty." The Syriac Version perhaps represents a guess at the general meaning of the passage rather than an accurate rendering.

26. a collar.] Rather, strap; referring to the reins. The Syriac omits this verse; and as the Hebrew language apparently possesses no words for the "rack" and the "torture," any more than it possesses one for the "cross," we may hope that it is an interpolation.

27. be not idle.] Syr. "that he may not rebel." We believe the Greek to be right.

28. Set him to work.] Syriac, "give him authority in thy house," apparently deriving מלאכה from מלך, and thinking of the history of Joseph. The point is only worthy of notice orthographically.

put on more heavy fetters.] Lit. make heavy; with which comp. Lament. iii. 7.

29. But be not excessive toward any.] Lit. be not excessive in any flesh; explained to mean, punish not too severely. The verb is used by the LXX. to represent the Heb. הותיר, so that אל תותר may be restored with considerable certainty for the first words. The Syriac has: "but not so upon any man." The verse is apparently a warning against excessive ill-treatment, μηδὲν ἀνίατον ποιεῖν. (Aeth. reads πιστεύσῃς.) On the condition of slaves among the Israelites, see the interesting Art. in Riehm, 'Hdw.'

without discretion do nothing.] Rather, "without judgment." The Vet. Lat. rightly glosses, nihil facias grave.

30, 31. The Syriac transposes 30 b and 31 b; while the Lat. omits 31 entirely. The Syr. makes the sense much clearer by adding one: "if thou have one servant." Compare Prov. xii. 9.

with a price.] Greek, in blood. The A. V. follows Drusius (who is followed by Böttcher and Fritzsche) in giving the assumed original the sense of the Aram. דמין, "price." It is, however, by no means certain that this is right; for the minor premise of the argument involved would not necessarily be true; while the major can scarcely be imagined. The fact, too, that the Syriac and Latin agree in rendering in sanguine animae tuae makes it highly probable that the original was בדם נפשך. The Syr. renders the whole clause: "and fight not with the blood of thy soul [i.e. thine own blood; compare Hofmann, 'Julian der Abtrünnige,' 169, 3]; because, if thou afflict him, he will go away and perish: and with what spirit [Lag.: but "by what way," Pol.] shalt thou find him." The thought is here intelligible, though the language is somewhat strange. The Arabic translator glosses, "thine own blood;" i.e. "thy goods."

as a brother.] So Alex. C., Arm., Lat., Syr.

for thou hast need of him, as of thine own soul.] The Greek should mean, for thou shalt need him as thine own soul (needeth him). Fritzsche would correct the

B. C. cir. 200. thou intreat him evil, and he run from thee, which way wilt thou go to seek him?

CHAPTER XXXIV.

1 Of dreams. 13 The praise and blessing of them that fear the Lord. 18 The offering of the ancient, and prayer of the poor innocent.

B. C. cir. 200. THE hopes of a man void of understanding are vain and false: and dreams lift up fools.

Of dreams.

2 Whoso ‖ regardeth dreams is like him that catcheth at a shadow, and followeth after the wind.

‖ Or, hath his mind upon.

3 The vision of dreams is the resemblance of one thing to another,

Greek ἐπιδήσεις αὐτόν, "thou shalt bind him to thee" (a conjecture apparently confirmed by the Copt.). But the text is sufficiently supported by the Syr.: "because as thou art thyself, so is thy want."

The Syriac is evidently right in the transposition noticed above, because by its order it offers some personal reason for treating a [single] slave as oneself, and some reason based upon ties of blood for treating him as a brother. To find out what these are we must attempt, at least conjecturally, to restore the Hebrew, as in the following two paragraphs:—

"If thou have one servant, let him be as thyself—כי כמוך כמיחסוריך, for like thyself so is thy need of him." Perhaps we should correct כמיחסוריך, "in thy poverty," "he is like thee in thy poverty;" i.e. he is but little poorer than thou art; he is dependent on thee entirely, and thou no less upon him.

"If thou have one servant, regard him as thy brother—אל תקנא בדם נפיטך, be not jealous against thine own blood." תקנא was perhaps read תקנה by the Greek translator, as in Prov. iii. 31, and the word "not" omitted arbitrarily. The reason why he is compared to a brother is that once lost he cannot be replaced; whereas other relations (e.g. husbands, sons) may be. This conceit is familiar to us in the story of Intaphernes (Herodotus, iii. 119), but it is also employed by Sophocles ('Antigone,' v. 905) and in Flügel's 'Gefährte des Einsamen.'

and he run from thee.] We should render: and he start to run away. Arm. "he take umbrage and flee."

CHAPTER XXXIV.

The religious problems referred to in the central part of the previous chapter are, as it seems to us, here once more taken up. Our author had travelled (v. 11), and his mind was greatly enlarged by what he observed and learned in foreign countries. In the first stanza of the present chapter (vv. 1–8) he now expresses his view of the manner in which heathenism attempted to solve the question how earthly affairs are determined or may be influenced. Although the Siracide speaks of heathenism in a liberal manner—as it were, from a philosophical standpoint,—he discards its views and practices without hesitation or reserve. Alike his conclusions and his liberality, he hastens to inform us—not without righteous self-consciousness — had been the result of his travels. The reference to this forms the introduction (vv. 9–13) to his own solution of these great problems (vv. 14–17). This constitutes the subject of the second stanza in the chapter. Lastly, in a third stanza, consisting, like stanza 2, of nine verses (vv. 18–26), the writer turns to another aspect of the subject. He had in the first stanza been repudiating heathenism, and in the second expressed the assured conviction of his own religion. The perversion and the misunderstanding of that religion form the subject of the third stanza (vv. 18–26). As before he had censured heathenism, so now a spurious Judaism—a Pharisaism before the Pharisees, a legal literalism and zeal for outward observances, combined with impenitence and sin. The glimpse which the chapter affords into the religious condition of the period is as important, as, on the other hand, it is interesting to hear the views of a travelled, enlightened, liberal Jew who discourses on the heathen and the Jewish world.

1. The hopes of a man, &c.] Rather, a man without understanding hath vain and lying hopes. Syr. "He that looks for vanity shall find delusion."

and dreams lift up fools.] Rather, elate. Syr. (Lag.) "and a dream is a vain delight."

2. followeth after the wind.] Cp. Hos. xii. 2. Syr. "who scareth a bird." Both correspond to Greek proverbs, ἀνέμους θηρᾶν ἐν δικτύοις, and διώκειν ποτανὸν ὄρνιν, doubtless, however, common to most nations. The Syriac, however, seems to be an interpolation from xxvii. 18; cp. Prov. ix. 12 (LXX.).

3. the resemblance of one thing to another, &c.] Lit. this against this; the resemblance of a face opposite a face. The reading in the text is not quite certain: for τοῦτο κατὰ τούτου some MSS. have τοῦτο κατὰ τοῦτο, which the Lat. represents. The Syr. and Arm. omit the first τοῦτο, wh ch may be a correction of τούτου, inserted in a wrong place. Accepting the reading of the Syr.,

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

even as the [a] likeness of a face to a face.

[a] Prov. 27. 19.

4 [b] Of an unclean thing what can be cleansed? and from that thing which is false what truth can come?

[b] Job 14. 4.

5 Divinations, and soothsayings, and dreams, are vain: and the heart fancieth, as a woman's heart in travail.

6 If they be not sent from the most High in thy visitation, ‖ set not thy heart upon them.

B. C. cir. 200.

‖ Or, regard them not.

7 For dreams have deceived many, and they have failed that put their trust in them.

8 The law shall be found perfect without lies: and wisdom is perfection to a faithful mouth.

9 A man that hath travelled knoweth many things; and he that we obtain "even so is the vision of dreams;" which is more intelligible than that of the Lat., which would mean, "dreams are each exactly like the other."

the resemblance of a face opposite a face.] The phrase seems to be taken from Prov. xxvii. 19, a very obscure passage. Baduellus interprets our passage as an account of the origin of dreams; signifying that the "fancy" reproduces images to the "intellect" in the same way as a mirror. Grotius, on the other hand (followed by Fritzsche), finds the point of comparison in the unreality of the image: ut imago in spectro visa nihil post se relinquit, ita nec somnia. This is more probably right. Compare 'Julian der Abtrünnige,' 177, 15: "while thine eyes are on them they are gone."

4. Of an unclean thing what can be cleansed?] The Syriac Version seems at first sight very different: "and over the head of his people he will gain the victory." This, however, means only that the Syrian divided the words before him wrongly, reading for מרשע מה יצדק, מרוש עמה יצדק. The Arab. gives the following version of the Syriac: "he that gives them the lie and relies not on them winneth the victory more than the greatest of his people." The Syriac Version seems to imply that the words "unclean" and "cleansed" should rather have been rendered "evil" and "righteous." Just as righteousness does not spring out of evil ("Do men gather grapes of thorns?"), so the truth does not come out of the false and unsubstantial. The Greek text would have referred to the unclean thing rendering everything else unclean,—a striking comparison, though not a very appropriate one.

5. Divinations, &c.] In this opinion the author is far in advance of the later Rabbinical schools.

and the heart fancieth, as a woman's heart in travail.] Syriac, "he that believeth them, there is his heart." Lat. et somnia malefacientium vanitas est. The Greek seems evidently correct. The physical phenomenon alluded to is sometimes mentioned by the ancients.

6. in thy visitation.] Rather, as a visitation; the Vet. Lat. and Armen.: "unless a visitation be sent." Apparently we have not here the genuine words of the author. The Syriac has: "even though it be ordained of God that men go astray with the fancies of the night." Combining the Syr. and Greek, we obtain a text like אם מאת יה תפקד, "even though thou be visited from God;" and it is almost clear that the next verse requires some such saying. So many have been led astray by dreams that it is best to distrust them all, even at the risk of some one being really inspired. The verse well illustrates the methods of the two translators.

7. and they have failed, &c.] Rather, and [many] have failed.

8. The law shall be found perfect without lies.] Rather (Fritzsche), is perfected or realised without the help of false things (such as dreams). Syr. "Where there is no sin, God is pleased;" Lat. consummabitur verbum.

The second clause is difficult: "Wisdom is perfection to a faithful mouth." Syr. "the wisdom of the wicked is believed in the night." Evidently there was a word in the original read by the one בליל, by the other בליל. "The wicked" of the Syriac need not be considered. Probably the original meant "wisdom is perfected in a faithful mouth;" i.e. wisdom when combined with sincerity is perfect.

Arguing back from this, we may interpret the first clause: "By not lying, the law is accomplished;" i.e. the telling of the truth is so important that by keeping this rule a man observes the whole law. The Syriac translator apparently was offended by this sentiment and diluted it. The author was led up to these remarks on truth by the falsehood of dreams.

9. A man that hath travelled knoweth many things.] So a few MSS., S. H. and Arm. The best Greek MSS., however, have πεπαιδευμένος, "a man that is educated, &c." The Syriac is here very different: "A wise man examines much." This seems to shew that the late Hebrew word, בָּקִיא, exercitatus, was

B. C. cir. 200. hath much experience will declare wisdom.

10 He that hath no experience knoweth little: but he that hath travelled is full of prudence.

11 When I travelled, I saw many things; and I understand more than I can express.

12 I was ofttimes in danger of death: yet I was delivered because of these things.

13 The spirit of those that fear the Lord shall live; for their hope is in him that saveth them.

14 Whoso feareth the Lord shall not fear nor be afraid; for he is his hope. B. C. cir. 200.

15 Blessed is the soul of him that feareth the Lord: to whom doth he look? and who is his strength?

16 For [c]the eyes of the Lord are upon them that love him, [d]he is their mighty protection and strong stay, a defence from heat, and a cover from the sun at noon, a preservation from stumbling, and an help from falling. [c] Ps. 33. 18. & 34. 15. [d] Ps. 61. 2, 3, 4. & 91. 1, 2, 3, 4.

17 He raiseth up the soul, and lighteneth the eyes: he giveth health, life, and blessing.

used here; the Syriac inverted the order of the words and read בְּקָא.

he that hath much experience will declare wisdom.] Syr. (as rendered by Dr. Payne Smith, col. 1147): qui prosperat omnia examinat (perhaps, however, we should correct ܣܟܠ for ܣܟ, obtaining some later Hebrew word like רָגִיל). The verse, according to the most probable readings, refers merely to practice in the arts or sciences.

10. but he that hath travelled is full of prudence.] Syriac again, "he that hath had experience;" perhaps misreading נָסָה for נָסָע, with which the author may have intended a jingle. Lat. qui in multis factus [qu. iactus or iactatus?] est.

11. When I travelled, I saw many things.] An interesting notice of the author's personal experience: cp. chap. li. 13. It is much to be regretted that he does not enter into fuller details concerning his journeys.

and I understand more than I can express.] Syr. "and many things have passed over me;" Lat. et plurimas verborum consuetudines. The Hebrew to which these three renderings seem to lead up is ורבים דברים עלוני; the Greek represents a slightly different division of the first words, ורב מדברי; while the last seems almost to have been interpreted from the Arab. معلوم, confirming Hitzig's conjecture about chap. vi. 22. The true reading may possibly be represented by the Syriac, "and many things have passed over me;" which would fitly prepare for the next verse. Attempts to obtain a satisfactory meaning from the Greek will be found in Fritzsche.

12. yet I was delivered because of these things.] Syr. "on account of them." This phrase is obscure. The Greek might conceivably mean "for all that." Aeth. "and withal God saved me;" but this the Syriac seems to forbid. The same difficulty applies to Fritzsche's explanation, "on account of the following things;" which is also not in the manner of our author. We must therefore follow Bretschneider in making the "things" his prudence and skill; unless we might suppose a mistranslation of the Hebrew, e.g. בעברם (read בַּעֲבָרָם), by which the author had intended "when they passed over [me];" sc. the "things" mentioned in the previous verse.

13. The spirit of those that fear the Lord shall live.] Cp. Isa. xxxviii. 16: "the life of my spirit." Syr. "The Lord doeth the business of them that fear him;" perhaps רעות יראי י״י for רוח יראי י״י תחיה תהיה.

for their hope is towards their Saviour.] Syr. "for great is his hope and he saves."

14. This verse is omitted in Syr. It may be a reminiscence of such passages as Ps. lvi. 12.

15. to whom doth he look?] A question employed for the purpose of introducing the reason of the beatitude: like those at the end of the Twenty-fourth Psalm.

strength.] Rather, support or stay. Heb. מִשְׁעַן.

16. The highly poetical metaphors of this verse are all diluted in the Syriac Version.

17. Raising up the soul, and lightening the eyes.] Syr. "the joy of the soul." Heb. probably מְיַשֵּׁחַ: which the Greek translator would seem to have interpreted from the Arabic مشمخ.

he giveth health, life, and blessing.] Syriac, "medicine of life and blessings." Perhaps in the original "health, life, and blessing"

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

18 [e]He that sacrificeth of a thing wrongfully gotten, his offering is ridiculous; and ‖ the gifts of unjust men are not accepted.

[e] Prov. 21. 27.

‖ Or, the mockeries.

19 [f]The most High is not pleased with the offerings of the wicked; neither is he pacified for sin by the multitude of sacrifices.

[f] Prov. 15. 8.

20 Whoso bringeth an offering of the goods of the poor doeth as one that killeth the son before his father's eyes.

21 The bread of the needy is their life: he that defraudeth him thereof is a man of blood.

22 He that taketh away his neighbour's living slayeth him; and he that [g]defraudeth the labourer of his hire is a bloodshedder.

B. C. cir. 200.

[g] Lev. 19. 13. Deut. 24. 14, 15.

23 When one buildeth, and another pulleth down, what profit have they then but labour?

ch. 7. 20.

24 When one prayeth, and another curseth, whose voice will the Lord hear?

25 [h]He that washeth himself after the touching of a dead body, if he touch it again, what availeth his washing?

[h] Num. 19. 11, 12.

26 [i]So is it with a man that fast-

[i] 2 Pet. 2. 20, &c.

were used as epithets, the word "giveth" being a gloss.

18. See introductory remarks. The long passage which follows contains interesting suggestions, but displays that want of continuous thinking, which prevented the Jewish Chokhmah ever developing into a system of philosophy. The author vacillates between different points of view, but follows neither to its legitimate consequences.

He that sacrificeth of a thing wrongfully gotten, his offering is ridiculous.] Fritzsche's suggestion that זבח, "a sacrifice," has been wrongfully read זֹבֵחַ, is confirmed by Syr. For "ridiculous" Alex., with some other MSS., has "culpable" or "contaminated;" so, too, Lat. and Cyrill. Alexandr. vi. 311, who quotes this passage with Job viii. 20 and the end of Isaiah. We believe this (last) reading to be right, and (comparing it with the Syriac) suppose that the author must have intended some play on the words עוֹלָה and עֲוָלָה.

the gifts of unjust men are not accepted.] So 248, Co., Syr., Arm. The best Greek MSS. (and Lat.) have "mockeries." We venture to suggest that the author here has another play on a word: for זבח, "sacrifice," he substitutes בוז ("scorn," "mockery," a Syriac word), זבחי רשעים for בזחי רשעים. This sort of witticism has always had peculiar attractions for the Jewish mind. So in the Qaraite-Arabic writings Mohammad is called Pasûl ("unclean") for Rasûl ("Apostle"), Mekka Makkōth ("plagues"), &c. The substitution of Bosheth ("shame") for Baal ("lord") in the biblical text affords an early example of this. The Syriac, which has here "offerings," may have simply "corrected" the text. Comp. Prov. xv. 7; xxi. 27.

20. that killeth.] Lit. that slaughtereth. The point of comparison lies in the impossibility of conciliating the father with such a sacrifice. The words remind the reader of Virgil's Priam, "qui nati coram me cernere letum fecisti et patrios foedasti funere vultus."

21. The bread of the needy is their life.] Rather, is the life of the poor; by no means a lucid sentiment. Syr. "the bread of mercy," לֶחֶם חֶסֶד, misread by the Greek, לְחֶסֶד. "The bread of mercy," i.e. "the bread of charity;" the abuse referred to being the diversion of means intended for charitable purposes, or more properly to be spent in charitable objects, for more ostentatious employment in sacrifice.

22. He that taketh away, &c.] The original apparently was יִגֵּשׂ, "takes violently away." The Syr. misunderstood this, and rendered "inherits;" the Arabic translator improves this into "makes him the heir of his goods." Συμβίωσις is a very unusual expression for victus, "substance." Either the Aeth. rendering, "who separates a man from his wife," or Grot. "takes away social intercourse," would be more literal than the A. V. But in favour of the A. V. we have the obvious sense of the passage, as well as Arm. and S. H. The Lat. in sudore panem is remarkable, and seems to be an allusion to Gen. iii. 19.

23. The order of thought is satisfactorily explained by Fritzsche. In the case of such a sacrifice as that described, while one prays (i.e. the sacrificer), the other (the poor man whom he has robbed) curses; how then can such a sacrifice profit any more than the operation described in this verse?

25, 26. Those, too, who approach God must do so seriously; He cannot be trifled with. It is not exactly said that the outward observance of fasts can only be of meaning or eth for his sins, and goeth again, and doeth the same: who will hear his prayer? or what doth his humbling profit him?

B. C. cir. 200.

CHAPTER XXXV.

1 Sacrifices pleasing to God. 14 The prayer of the fatherless, of the widow, and of the humble in spirit. 20 Acceptable mercy.

B. C. cir. 200.

HE [a]that keepeth the law bringeth offerings enough: he that taketh heed to the commandment offereth a peace offering.

[a] 1 Sam. 15. 22. Jer. 7. 3, 5, 6, 7. Hos. 6. 6. Mic. 6. 6, 7, 8.

2 He that requiteth a good turn Mark 12. 33.

value in so far as it is symbolic of an inward process, but that a fast for sin and prayer for its forgiveness can only attain the object sought, if combined with the abandonment of sin—just as a bath of purification cannot avail if a dead body is immediately touched again. The sentiment seems almost to have become proverbial in Jewish theology. Thus we read (Taan. 16 a, line 10 from bottom) that a man who is guilty of a sin and confesses, but does not turn from it, is like one who holds an unclean reptile in his hand, who, even if he immersed in all the waters of the world, his immersion (bath of purification) would not profit him; but if he casts it from him, when he immerses in forty Seah (the bare legal measure of water for such a bath), immediately his immersion profiteth (obtains the object of purification)—the references in proof being to Prov. xxviii. 13 and Lam. iii. 41 (comp. also Yalkūt on the passage in Prov. and the Midr. R. on that in Lam.). In 'Abhoth,' ut sup. p. 116, constant repentance with constant sinning is reckoned among the five unpardonable offences.

CHAPTER XXXV.

The reference in chap. xxxiv. to heathenism and to Judaism, whether pure or corrupt, leads to a farther and, in many respects, most interesting discussion. The main subject is that of sacrifices, on which the writer propounds his own more liberal views, insinuating rather than stating them, artfully slipping them in between other sayings irreprehensible to Jewish orthodoxy—thus finding a place for what he might scarcely have dared openly and broadly to teach. Equally interesting is it to notice how the Syriac translator modifies and alters in a Christian sense. Not only does he eliminate all references to sacrificing in the strict sense, substituting expressions which a Christian writer might employ, but his references to the words used by our Lord are so evident as at once to be obvious to every reader (comp. the notes on vv. 2–9). Thus the chapter may be regarded as adding important evidence on the Christian authorship of the Syr. Version. On the other hand, it does not seem likely that the Greek translation contains important Hellenistic alterations by the younger Siracide. Of such we should probably have had more distinct expression than the Greek text contains. Indeed, the reference to sacrifices is exactly in the spirit which, as we have all along observed, is characteristic of the elder Siracide. It is the Grecianism of Palestine rather than of Alexandria—a mild Sadduceeism, before there were either Pharisees or Sadducees: the influence of Greek thinking and life upon the more liberal spirits of Judæa, the effect upon them of contact with the great world without.

It is difficult to arrange the chapter into other than two sections, of which the one treats of sacrifices in their real import and value (vv. 1–11), the other of sacrifices unrighteous and unacceptable (vv. 12–15). The mention of the cry of distress addressed to the Lord (v. 15) leads to a more detailed reference to all such appeals, which assuredly will bring their answer in the Divine interposition, whether for deliverance or for judgment. But the greatest wrong was that which heathen persecution inflicted on the people of God; and the loudest cry for Divine judgment, that for vengeance on them and for smiting into fragments the sceptres of the unrighteous (v. 18). Thus the appeal for answer to prayer and for Divine interposition merges into a strong anti-heathen passage, while for Israel a season of refreshing mercy is asked in the interval before the judgment on their oppressors. We infer that the elder Siracide must have written in a time of anticipated persecution and suffering (see General Introduction).

1. bringeth offerings enough.] Syr. "If thou doest what is written in the Law, thou hast multiplied service." If the Greek Version may be regarded as expressing the views of a Jew who attached not any absolute value to the ritual observances of the Law, the Syr. translator seems purposely to have omitted all reference to sacrifices and to occupy a totally different (Christian) standpoint.

he that taketh heed to the commandment offereth a peace offering.] Syr. "blessed be his spirit,"—alteration of text in the same spirit as in the first clause.

2. He that giveth a good turn.] I.e. "requiteth a benefit." The Syriac of this verse is rendered by Dr. Payne Smith, col. 1179, "qui donum obfert id facit quod optimam retributionem s. usuram sibi refert." The

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. 200.

offereth fine flour; and he that giveth alms sacrificeth praise.

[b] Dan. 4. 27.

3 [b]To depart from wickedness is a thing pleasing to the Lord; and to forsake unrighteousness is a propitiation.

[c] Exod. 23. 15. Deut. 16. 16.

4 [c]Thou shalt not appear empty before the Lord.

5 For all these things [are to be done] because of the commandment.

6 The offering of the righteous maketh the altar fat, and the sweet savour thereof is before the most High.

7 The sacrifice of a just man is acceptable, and the memorial thereof shall never be forgotten. B. C. cir. 200.

[d] Prov. 3. 9.

8 [d]Give the Lord his honour with a good eye, and diminish not the firstfruits of thine hands.

[e] 2 Cor. 9. 7. ‖ Or, set apart.

9 [e]In all thy gifts shew a cheerful countenance, and ‖dedicate thy tithes with gladness.

[f] Tobit 4. 8.

10 [f]Give unto the most High according as he hath enriched thee; and as thou hast gotten, give with a cheerful eye.

[g] Prov. 19. 17. 2 Cor. 9. 8.

11 [g]For the Lord recompenseth, and will give thee seven times as much.

‖ Or, Diminish nothing of thy offerings.

12 ‖Do not think to corrupt with Hebrew was probably גְּמוּל גְּמוּל. The Syriac alteration here involves a meaning almost the opposite of that conveyed by the Greek. The translator seems to have wished to convey some of the N. T. directions and promises about the gracious retribution to those who give.

sacrificeth praise.] זבח תודה. Syr. "keepeth the law." Had he read תורה for תודה?

3. is a propitiation.] The Syr. once more alters in the same spirit as before: "and restrain thy strength that thou do what is abominable." If the Greek represented repentance as real propitiation, the Syr. omits all reference to it, and so avoids what might sound either Jewish or Judaising.

4–11. Nevertheless, though the best sacrifice is good conduct, still for the sake of the commandment, actual sacrifices must be offered also. This deserves special attention as expressive of views afterwards more fully developed in Hellenism.

4. before the Lord.] Syr. "before Him." For the phrase (or rather quotation), see references in marg.

5. For all these things are to be done.] Apparently not of absolute and internal necessity, but simply because ordered in the Law, and therefore to be observed. The Syriac translator once more alters the statement into "every one that doeth well keepeth the commandment."

6. maketh the altar fat.] Perhaps מדשן, which should have been rendered "is thought fat," i.e. rich, savoury, "the altar" being a gloss. The Syr.: "is the prayer of their mouth,"—a very significant alteration.

and the sweet savour thereof.] Syr. "and their works cleave open the heavens."

7. the memorial.] Fritzsche suggests that this may have meant the אזכרה or memorial-sacrifice of Lev. ii. 2, 9, &c. But this seems not likely. The Syr. seems to shew that the word is used in our ordinary English sense.

8. Give the Lord his honour.] Lit. glorify the Lord. Syr. "give to the poor," &c.

and diminish not the firstfruits of thine hands.] Syr. "and vacillate not in thy gifts." He may have read תמעט for תמעט: but the alteration of "firstfruits" into "gifts" can only have been intentional. On the "firstfruits," see 'The Temple, its Ministry and Services,' ch. xix.

9. and dedicate thy tithes.] Syr. "lend to him that will not pay thee." The alteration here is not only bold, but the reference to St. Luke vi. 34, 35 is so clear that we can scarcely doubt the Syr. intended to put the words of Christ into the mouth of the Siracide. Very significantly the Syr. next reverses the order of the verses that follow, placing v. 11 of the Greek in immediate juxtaposition to v. 9 and v. 10 after our Greek v. 11. The entire elimination of allusion to sacrifices and the reference to the words of our Lord seem to establish the Christian authorship of the Syriac Version.

10. and as thou hast gotten, give with a cheerful eye.] Lit. according to the finding of thy hand, כמצא ידך; Syr. "with an ample hand" (מְלֵא for מצא?).

11. seven times as much.] Syr. "ten thousand times." The addition in the Syr., "he that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord, and who shall recompense but He Himself?" is an interpolation from Prov. xix. 17.

12. Do not think to corrupt with gifts.] Rather, Think not to bribe. For this the Syriac has a most interesting variant, putting simply "hesitate not," without further

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

gifts; [h] for such he will not receive: and trust not to unrighteous sacrifices; for the Lord is judge, and with him is [i] no respect of persons.

13 He will not accept any person against a poor man, but [k] will hear the prayer of the oppressed.

14 He will not despise the supplication of the fatherless; nor the widow, when she poureth out her complaint.

15 Do not the tears run down the widow's cheeks? and is not her cry against him that causeth them to fall?

16 He that serveth the Lord shall be accepted with favour, and his prayer shall reach unto the clouds.

17 The prayer of the humble pierceth the clouds: and till it come nigh, he will not be comforted; and will not depart, till the most High shall behold to judge righteously, and execute judgment.

[h] Lev. 22. 20, 21, 22. Deut. 15. 21. Mal. 1. 8, 13, 14.
[i] Deut. 10. 17. 2 Chron. 19. 7. Job 34. 19. Wisd. 6. 7. Acts 10. 34. Rom. 2. 11. Gal. 2. 6. Eph. 6. 9. Coloss. 3. 25. 1 Pet. 1. 17.
[k] Exod. 22. 23, 27.

18 [l] For the Lord will not be slack, neither will the Mighty be patient toward them, till he have smitten in sunder the loins of the unmerciful, and repayed vengeance to the heathen; till he have taken away the multitude of the ‖ proud, and broken the sceptre of the unrighteous;

B. C. cir. 200.

[l] 2 Pet. 3. 9.

‖ Or, cruel oppressors.

19 Till he have [m] rendered to every man according to his deeds, and to the works of men according to their devices; till he have judged the cause of his people, and made them to rejoice in his mercy.

[m] Rom. 2. 6.

20 Mercy is ‖ seasonable in the time of affliction, as clouds of rain in the time of drought.

‖ Gr. fair.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

1 A prayer for the church against the enemies thereof. 18 A good heart and a froward. 21 Of a good wife.

addition. This suits the train of alterations in the Syr. But possibly שוחד has been misread שוחר. Whether the corruption here is in the Syriac or Hebrew, it is not easy to determine, though the former seems more likely. We are inclined to think, however, that the Hebrew had some denominative of שוחד. The Greek word δωροκοπεῖν also occurs in 3 Macc. iv. 19: δωροκοπία is more common. The Lat. renders offerre munera prava. Arm. "bring not as a bribe;" and so Aeth. Syr. Hex. "labour not with offering."

13. He will not accept any person.] Rather, respect any person, according to the well-known Hebraism. The Syr. has characteristically: "the prayer of the poor comes before him." This can scarcely be regarded as a paraphrase; still less as the true reading. The "accepting of persons" comes in from the end of the previous verse.

14. when she poureth out her complaint.] Lit. "prattle;" a contemptuous word, of which the original was doubtless purposely employed. Gemitus, which the Lat. adds at the end of the verse, seems to be a vestige of an old reading (which would correspond with the Syriac) at the commencement of the verse, afterwards altered to preces, to correspond with ἱκετεία of the Greek.

15. The verse is omitted by the Syr. translator, but probably genuine.

17. till it come nigh.] Syr. "till he examine it."

18. The writer rapidly passes to an anticipation of judgment upon those tyrannical heathen rulers whose sway rested upon Israel with such terrible weight of persecution (see introductory remarks). The Syriac does not offer any variety of importance in this verse, though it renders none of the six clauses exactly as the Greek. Perhaps we may find a vestige of the old word מְחֹקֵק, "a sceptre," in σκῆπτρα, for which the Syr. offers "rulers." The Lat., too, in v. 19 has preserved a vestige of the Hebrew in its rendering "according to the works of Adam."

20. His mercy is seasonable.] Syr. "the hater will be ashamed."

of drought.] בצרת, which the Syrian interpreted from his own language.

The verse indicates an apprehension of national suffering, when those under the yoke of the foreign rulers would long for some seasonable relief in the present, and earnestly look for the final deliverance assured to them in the righteous judgment of the God to whom they appealed.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

The same abrupt transition as in ch. xxxiii. (v. 19), from a subject, sublime and of deepest interest, to another trivial if not almost repulsive, appears again in this chapter at v. 18. Once more we might be tempted to think of a misplacement in the text; but of this there is not any ex-

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

HAVE mercy upon us, O Lord God of all, and behold us:

2 And send thy fear upon all the nations that seek not after thee.

[a] Jer. 10. 25. ‖ Or, upon.

3 [a] Lift up thy hand ‖ against the strange nations, and let them see thy power.

[b] Ezek. 20. 41. & 28. 25. & 36. 23. & 39. 27.

4 As thou wast [b] sanctified in us before them: so be thou magnified among them before us.

[c] 1 Kings 8. 43, 60.

5 And [c] let them know thee, as we have known thee, that there is no God but only thou, O God.

B. C. cir. 200.

6 Shew new signs, and make other strange wonders: glorify thy hand and thy right arm, that they may set forth thy wondrous works.

[d] Ps. 79. 6.

7 Raise up indignation, and [d] pour out wrath: take away the adversary, and destroy the enemy.

8 Make the time short, remember the ‖ covenant, and let them declare thy wonderful works. ‖ Gr. oath.

9 Let him that escapeth be consumed by the rage of the fire; and let them perish that oppress the people.

ternal evidence. The first part of the chapter (vv. 1–17) connects itself with the concluding part of ch. xxxv.—both as regards Israel and the Gentile world. It is a prayer, at times sublime, for the deliverance of Israel, the fulfilment of the prophetic promises, and the advent of the Messianic kingdom, even although there is not any mention of a personal Messiah. As points of subsidiary interest we note, on the one hand, the tone of sadness as regards the condition of Israel at the time the chapter was written, pointing back to a period of persecution and suffering; and, on the other hand, the variations introduced in the Syriac translation, which, although sometimes seemingly slight, are of great significance as regards the religious views of the translator.

Of the second part of the chapter (vv. 18–26) it is neither easy nor pleasant to speak, especially when following on such sentiments as in Part I. The connexion between the verses is not very obvious, although the whole may perhaps be summed up under the general heading "Discernment." Possibly also v. 21 may mark the beginning of a sub-section on the relation of the sexes. We can only add that the part as a whole descends from antithetic sayings, neither very wise nor very elevated, to what may be euphemistic allusions to the dangers threatening married life from the presence of unmarried acquaintances (vv. 25, 26).

1. Have mercy upon us, &c.] Syr. "Redeem us, O God, all of us."

behold [us].] Lat. respicere.

2. send thy fear upon all the nations that seek not after thee.] The last words must be omitted as not found in the original MSS. of the Greek, but only given by the Vet. Lat. and Syr. The addition may be an interpolation from Jer. x. 25 or Ps. xxxix. 6. The Vet. Lat. and Syr. also omit "all."

3. the strange nations.] Syr. (perhaps corruptly) in the singular.

4. As thou wast sanctified.] נקדשת, Ezek. xxviii. 22, &c. God is sanctified either by rewarding the well-doer or punishing the evil-doer: here the latter is indicated.

6. Shew new signs.] The reference seems to the former miraculous deliverances, especially to that from Egypt.

and make other strange wonders.] This should be rendered: and do fresh wonders, שנה (Grot., Fritzsche). This is confirmed by the Syriac.

glorify.] Perhaps "strengthen" (Syr.), חזק, was intended.

8. the covenant.] ὁρκισμοῦ; Sin. ὁρισμοῦ, confirmed by Syr. Lat. finis; Arm. and S. H., "term." We should therefore substitute the end. "Bring near" (Syr.) seems a more suitable verb than "remember."

and let them declare thy wonderful works.] Syriac, "because there is none that sayeth unto thee, What doest thou?" Whoever was the author of this phrase, it is very remarkable. It is intended to excuse the prayer "hasten on the time." The writer is represented as pleading that, if the Divine term were brought somewhat nearer, no one could find fault with such a change.

9. Let him that escapeth.] Syr. "In wrath and fire destroy the hater." We are not likely to find any easier reconciliation of this with the Greek than הנושע and השונא. The expression is like 1 Kings xix. 17.

and let them perish that oppress thy people.] Lit. find destruction. Syr. "and all the lords and princes of the people." Probably the וכל of the original meant "and destroy" (וְכַלֵּה), misread by both translators. The violence of the sentiment may have led the Greek to substitute for it the milder prayer in the text. A literal translation might have been dangerous to the Jewish community in Alexandria.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

10 Smite in sunder the heads of the rulers of the heathen, that say, There is none other but we.

[e] Jer. 31. 10.

11 [e] Gather all the tribes of Jacob together, and inherit thou them, as from the beginning.

[f] Dan. 9. 18, 19. [g] Exod. 4. 22. [h] 2 Chron. 6. 41. Ps. 132. 14.

12 O Lord, [f] have mercy upon the people that is called by thy name, and upon Israel, [g] whom thou hast named thy firstborn.

13 O be merciful unto Jerusalem, thy holy city, [h] the place of thy rest.

‖ Or, that it may magnify thine oracles.

14 Fill Sion ‖ with thine unspeakable oracles, and thy people with thy glory.

B. C. cir. 200.

15 Give testimony unto those that thou hast possessed from the beginning, and raise up ‖ prophets that have been in thy name.

‖ Or, prophecies.

16 Reward them that wait for thee, and let thy prophets be found faithful.

‖ Or, supplicants. [i] Numb. 6. 23. [k] 1 Kings 8. 60.

17 O Lord, hear the prayer of thy ‖ servants, according to the [i] blessing of Aaron over thy people, [k] that all they which dwell upon the earth may know that thou art the Lord, the eternal God.

18 The belly devoureth all meats, yet is one meat better than another.

10. the heads.] Cp. Ps. cx. 6. Syr. "the crown," perhaps softening the expression. The verse contains a further appeal against the tyrannical oppressors of the people of God—those heathen rulers referred to in ch. xxxv. 18.

of the heathen.] The better reading is of the enemy (best Greek MSS., Syr., Lat.).

11. and inherit thou them.] Probably meaning "give them their inheritance." The Greek MSS. have "and I inherited," to adapt the syntax to that of xxxiii. 16 (v. supra). Lat. et hereditabis eos, following the Hebrew idiom והנחלתם.

as from the beginning.] Syr. "and let them inherit, as thou saidst from the beginning."

12. the people that is called by thy name.] ἐπ' ὀνόματί σου. Better Greek would perhaps be ἐπ' ὀνόματος. They were the "people of Jahveh."

whom thou hast named.] Best Greek MSS. which thou hast likened to. The other reading is supported by the Syr., and is probably correct, the reference being to Ex. iv. 22.

13. the place of thy rest.] The expression is strictly biblical (Ps. cxxxii. 14), and here very significantly used to point to the final fulfilment of the good promises of God concerning Israel and Jerusalem.

14. Fill Sion with thine unspeakable oracles.] Rather, with the talk of thy deeds. The passage has been admirably restored by Tischendorf from the Vat. ἀρεταλογίας. The former editions had ἆραι τὰ λόγιά σου, which Fritzsche endeavours to construe. The Latin in enarrabilibus verbis, translated in A. V., stands for ἀρρητολογίας, which S. H. also represents. The Syriac seems to point to a Hebrew גדולותיך. This is apparently the only place in Greek literature in which a derivative of ἀρεταλόγος is used with its original meaning. Ordinarily it means a "buffoon" or "jester." See Mayor on Juvenal xv. 16. The ἀρεταί (in Pindar especially, "great deeds") will in this case be real and not exaggerated.

and thy people.] Emend from the Syriac, and thy temple (ναόν).

15. Give testimony unto those that thou hast possessed.] Rather, to thy creations, i.e. "works from the beginning." Prove the truth of the record of them by doing others like them. But the Syr., which renders "confirm the testimony of thy servants," is far simpler: and indeed עֲבָדֶיךָ (cf. Eccles. ix. 1, ἐργασίαι) may mean either, but more naturally: "thy servants." Perhaps the phrase "which were of old" led the translator astray.

and raise up prophets.] Rather, and raise up the prophecies uttered in thy name. "Raise them up" in the sense of waking them out of their sleep—fulfil them. Syr. "let them come." Similarly κινεῖν is used of waking up an obsolete story.

16. The fulfilment of God's promises is described as the reward of the patience and faith of those who now suffer, and the confirmation of the truth of prophecy.

17. according to the blessing of Aaron.] Syr. "according to the will of thy people." The blessing of Aaron is recorded Numb. vi. 23. With the Syriac cp. Ps. cvi. 4 (with Peshitto). It seems to us clear that the Greek is a gloss, and a remarkable one.

the eternal God.] Syr. "that thou alone art God for ever."

18–20. The general subject is that of "discernment"—in matters relating to the senses, as regards the speech, and, lastly, the deeds of men.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

19 [l] As the palate tasteth divers kinds of venison: so doth an heart of understanding false speeches.

[l] Job 34. 3.

20 A froward heart causeth heaviness: but a man of experience will recompense him.

21 A woman will receive every man, yet is one daughter better than another.

22 The beauty of a woman cheereth the countenance, and a man loveth nothing better.

23 If there be kindness, meekness, and comfort, in her tongue, then is not her husband like ‖ other men.

‖ Or, common.

24 He that getteth a wife beginneth ‖ a possession, [m] a help like unto himself, and a pillar of rest.

B. C. cir. 200.

‖ Or, to thrive.

[m] Gen. 2. 18.

25 Where no hedge is, there the possession is spoiled: and he that hath no wife will wander up and down mourning.

26 Who will trust a thief well appointed, that skippeth from city to city? so [who will believe] a man that hath no house, and lodgeth wheresoever the night taketh him?

CHAPTER XXXVII.

1 How to know friends and counsellors. 12 The discretion and wisdom of a godly man blesseth him. 27 Learn to refrain thine appetite.

18. The belly.] Syr. "the soul" or "appetite;" and "sweeter" for "better."

19. tasteth [divers kinds of] venison.] Omit the words within brackets. The English rendering follows a different interpretation from that of Fritzsche, which is that the palate distinguishes venison from other kinds of flesh. The Hebrew expression (which it is hard to recover) may have signified "high" meat. It is this which the palate can distinguish, whereas in v. 18 the difference is discovered during digestion.

20. A froward heart causeth heaviness.] Syr. "a hidden heart — great is the care thereof."

but a man of experience will recompense him.] Syr. "understands these things.'

The difference between the two translations proves the original to have been obscure. The sentiment intended was very likely that of Prov. xx. 5.

21. Omitted by the Syriac.

22. the countenance.] "Her husband's" (Vet. Lat.); cp. xxvi. 2. The Syriac has "praiseth," reading מְשַׁבַּחַ for מְשַׂמַּחַ, and makes the countenance the woman's. The idea is that of love being kindled by the eyes, often dwelt on by the Greek poets.

a man loveth nothing better.] Lit. it surpasseth all human desire. Syr. "every desire of the eyes;" possibly an intentional sobering down of the expression.

23. and comfort.] Omit these words (found in Vet. Lat., Co., 248; = וכורפא according to Fritzsche).

is not . . . like other men.] His lot far surpasses theirs. οὐ κατ' ἀνθρώπους is a very common Greek phrase, always used in the sense of "better" or "higher than man." The verse is wanting in the Syriac.

24. getteth.] Fritzsche, "by purchase or otherwise."

beginneth a possession.] Commences possessing. But there is little doubt that we should read (following the guidance of the Syriac): "As the beginning of thy possessions, obtain a wife,"—ראשית קנין קְנֵה אשה, a verse modelled on Prov. iv. 7, ראשית חכמה קנה חכמה. The Greek translator here pointed קְנֵה for קְנֵה; but ἐνάρχεται is very likely an error of the transcribers for ἐν ἀρχῇ. Hesiod in the well-known lines makes a wife the second possession.

a help like unto himself.] See margin.

and a pillar of rest.] Compare the Latin phrase acquiescere in aliquo.

25. the possession.] Rather, the vineyard. Cp. Syr. here, and note on xxviii. 24.

will wander up and down mourning.] "Is taken captive and dispersed," Syr. The original may have been obscure; the A. V., however, suits the context sufficiently. S. Ephraem ('Opp. Gr.' i. 92 d) quotes this verse, substituting however ὑπομονή, "patience," for γυνή.

26. well appointed.] Syr. "like an antelope."

that skippeth.] The better reading (Lat. exilicus). The Vat. has "that tumbleth."

hath no nest.] Syr. "wife," interpreting.

and lodgeth.] Syr. "and dieth;" but we should perhaps emend נלכד for נלכד.

wheresoever the night taketh him.] Lit. wheresoever he happens to be at eventide. The verb represented is one of a class of Semitic verbs signifying "to be somewhere at a certain time." Fritzsche suggests הערב (1 Sam. xvii. 16).

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

EVERY friend saith, I am his friend also: but there is a friend, which is only a friend in name.

2 Is it not a grief unto death, when a companion and friend is turned to an enemy?

3 O wicked imagination, whence camest thou in to cover the earth with deceit?

B. C. cir. 200.

4 [a] There is a companion, which rejoiceth in the prosperity of a friend, but in the time of trouble will be against him.

[a] ch. 6. 10.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

The three main divisions of the chapter are well marked. Advice in regard to friends (substantially the same as that given in c. vi.), whether untrustworthy or otherwise (vv. 1–6), is followed by directions with reference to counsel (vv. 7–15)—when and with what limitations it should be sought and taken. This naturally leads to general remarks on the need of reflection and the character of real wisdom (vv. 16–26). The stanza is very artistically arranged. Three classes of wise men who are not really such (vv. 19, 20, 22) are contrasted with three who are really wise (vv. 23, 24, 26). In each case an explanatory verse is added after mention of the second class (v. 21, and again v. 25). The concluding stanza (vv. 27–31)—if here in its right place—once more diverges, as in previous chapters, to a subject not worthy of treatment. The "counsel," "reflection," and "wisdom" are to discretion in the choice of food and moderation in it. The only link of connexion between this chapter and the first seventeen verses of the preceding is in v. 25. Most probably the last stanza forms part of the following chapter.

1. Every friend saith.] We can here observe that the Syriac has lost a letter at the beginning of the line; for ܠܟܠ ܡܚܒ we should perhaps read ܡܚܒ ܟܠ.

I am his friend also.] אהבתי or אהבתי, meaning "I love him;" cf. Böttcher, 'Lehrb.' § 948; Driver, 'Hebrew Tenses,' § 11. For the expression compare Prov. xx. 9; and for the sentiment, ibid. 6.

but there is a friend which is only a friend in name.] Syr. "whose name is friend." Comparing Prov. xxi. 24, it would seem that the Greek interpretation of this is wrong; the author meaning "there is a friend who deserves the name," i.e. out of the whole number of self-styled friends there are a few who really belong to that class.

2. Is it not a grief unto death.] The Syriac (continuing the last verse), "who cometh not unto death." Heb. הֲלֹא עַד מָוֶת נָגַע, "Cometh it not nigh unto death?" The Syrian therefore wrongly pointed הֲלֹא for הֲלֹא, whereas the Greek read נָגֵע for נָגַע; but the latter, by punctuating correctly, came nearer the sense of the original. Compare with the phrase Euripides, 'Heracl.' 247, καὶ τάδ' ἀγχονῆς πέλας, &c. The omission of the word "nigh" caused the insertion of the glosses "is therein" (ἔνι) and "remains" (μένει) in different recensions.

when a companion and friend is turned to an enemy.] Lit. (according to the better reading) to enmity. Syr. "a true friend should be to thee as thyself." The original would seem to have contained the word נהיה, and also the word צדק, curiously interpreted in one of its Arabic meanings (الصديق) by the Greek, and in another (الصدق) by the Syrian.

3. The expression is so bitter that we might fancy the author to be speaking from his own experience. "O wicked imagination:" possibly we should take this phrase generally, comparing Gen. vi. 9. But it may be (as Fritzsche thinks) an apostrophe of the horrible idea of the friend becoming unfaithful.

whence camest thou in.] Lit. whence wast thou rolled in,—like an unexpected figure on a stage by a machine; compare F. V. Fritzsche's note on 'Thesmophoriazusae,' p. 97, where phrases like ἀπορά γ' ἡμῖν πράγματα δαίμων τις εἰσκεκύκληκεν are collected and explained. As the Syriac and Latin both render "wast thou created," we think the translator responsible for the Grecism. The rolling of water, however, may have been also in the translator's mind.

4. There is a companion which rejoiceth in the prosperity of a friend.] (Cp. vi. 8–12.) The Greek, as Fritzsche observes, admits of three constructions: of which he prefers that by which ἑταῖρος φίλου are combined, "a companion of the friend." But this seems a very unnatural expression, especially if we consider the fondness of the ancient languages for repetition of the same word in such cases. The Syriac has: "Evil is the friend who approacheth the table." Evidently we have the same confusion between רֵעַ and רָע which was noticed in xiv. 9; whereas the last words in both versions are apparently translations of בִּשְׂמְחָה קָרֵב, שִׂמְחָה in the later Hebrew meaning "a feast." The criticism of this verse is very closely con-

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

5 There is a companion, which helpeth his friend for the belly, and taketh up the buckler ‖ against the enemy.

‖ Or, in presence of the enemy.

6 Forget not thy friend in thy mind, and be not unmindful of him in thy riches.

7 Every counsellor extolleth counsel; but there is some that counselleth for himself.

8 Beware of a counsellor, and know before ‖ what need he hath; for he will counsel for himself; lest he cast the lot upon thee,

B. C. cir. 200.

‖ Or, what use there is of him.

9 And say unto thee, Thy way is good: and afterward he stand on the other side, to see what shall befal thee.

10 Consult not with one that susnected with that of the next, which commences with the same words in the Greek, but with "good is the friend" in the Syriac. The probability seems to us in favour of the latter being right, the Hebrew text before the Greek translator having been corrupted in a very common manner. Probably, however, רע אהב and טוב אהב should have been rendered "an evil friend" and "a good friend." The rule for the postposition of the adjective may be broken in the case of רע (Prov. xxix. 6; Ewald, 'Lehrb.' p. 751; compare Nöldeke, 'Syr. Gramm.' p. 150). The translation of the first clause should then have been "an evil friend approacheth in prosperity." It is remarkable that the Aethiop. retains "approacheth."

will be against him.] Heb. כְּמִנֶּגֶד (cp. Syr.), meaning rather, "will stand aloof."

5. There is a companion which helpeth his friend for the belly.] (Cp. vi. 10.) I.e. "out of sordid motives" (Fritzsche). If we adopt the corrections of the Syriac Version (see last note), it will be evident that the friend described in this verse must be the opposite of the former, and that the parasite cannot be referred to. The Syr. renders: "Good is the friend who fights against the enemy and takes a shield." It would seem that this represents the sense of the original. The parallelism, however, makes it probable that some words had been omitted, which the Greek χάρω γαστρός represent. We suggest that the Hebrew was טוב אהב נלחם בעד רחם, "a good friend fighteth on behalf of a friend," the word רחם (by a rather violent Aramaism) being used for "a friend," for the sake of the assonance with נלחם. The Greek wrongly pointed this word רֶחֶם, "the belly" (cp. Ps. cix. 4), while the homoeoteleuton caused the omission of the words in the Syrian's copy.

taketh up the buckler.] Cp. Ps. xxxv. 2.

6. Forget not thy friend in thy mind.] Syr. "praise not (אל תִּשְׁבַּח for אל תִּשְׁכַּח) thy friend lightly" ("at the beginning of the friendship," Barhebraeus).

and be not unmindful of him in thy riches.] Syr. "make him not ruler over thy house;" perhaps אל תישאהו, read variously with שׁ and שׂ. Though the Hebrew text may be restored with some certainty, it is by no means easy to detect the original purport of the clauses. As, however, the tone of most of these precepts is that of warning rather than of exhortation, it is probable that the Syriac is nearer the truth than the Greek. We venture to suggest (assuming מ twice corrupted to ב) that the author meant, "praise not thy friend above a kinsman, and exalt him not over thy household;" and, if so, as a corrective to a misapplication of Prov. xxvii. 10. The Aeth. translator conjectures (?) τύχῃ for ψυχῇ, "forget not thy friend in thy wealth,"—an attractive suggestion, which, however, would be certainly misleading.

7. Every counsellor extolleth counsel.] (Cp. vi. 6.) Lat. prodit; "considers his own counsel best," Schleussner. Fritzsche regards the text as corrupt. Our simplest course will be to read ἐξερεῖ for ἐξαίρει, though so obvious a suggestion can scarcely have been left to us to make. The verse will then apparently be modelled on v. 1 (πᾶς φίλος ἐρεῖ Ἐφιλίασα αὐτῷ κἀγώ), and the original meaning have been "every counsellor will say: Counsel," i.e. will call the course he suggests counsel, and therefore properly for the benefit of the person to whom it is given; whereas in some cases the counsellor himself is the person intended to profit thereby. The Syriac, "Behold every counsellor; yet there is counsel that is well made," seems to be a loose paraphrase rather than a translation. Compare 'Derekh Erets,' p. 38: "beware of him that counselleth according to his own way (for his own interest)."

8. what need he hath.] I.e. what is his real purpose or design.

lest he cast the lot upon thee.] It is useless inquiring what this can mean, since the Syr., by its rendering "an evil plot," seems to have interpreted חֶבֶל rightly as "a net:" "lest he entangle thee in his net." Fritzsche finds this meaning in ne forte mittat sudem in terram of the Lat.

10. Examples of the persons whose advice

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

pecteth thee: and hide thy counsel from such as envy thee.

11 Neither consult with a woman touching her of whom she is jealous; neither with a coward in matters of war; nor with a merchant concerning exchange; nor with a buyer of selling; nor with an envious man of thankfulness; nor with an unmerciful man touching kindness; nor with the slothful for any work; nor with an hireling for a year of finishing work; nor with an idle servant of much business: hearken not unto these in any matter of counsel.

B. C. cir. 200.

12 But be continually with a godly man, whom thou knowest to keep the commandments of the Lord, whose mind is according to thy mind, and will sorrow with thee, if thou shalt miscarry.

13 And let the counsel of thine should not be taken. First, one that suspecteth thee; rather, one that looketh upon thee with ill-favour: cp. L. and S. s. v. ὑποβλέπω. The Syriac Version paraphrases this "thy enemy;" but the Lat. in some MSS. retains a remarkable variant, "thy father-in-law," which has indeed no value in itself, but points to an original חמיך, rightly derived by Syr. and Greek from the Aramaic verb חמא, "to see," which apparently was used with the same specialization as the Hebrew עין and Lat. invideo. This verse comes in the Vet. Lat. between 5 and 6; see on v. 11.

11. Neither consult.] Necessary to the sense, but omitted in the Vet. Lat. and Syr. The Lat. commences with the words, "With an irreligious man treat about holiness, and with an unjust man about justice;" probably interpolated, when, owing to the transposition of v. 10, the sentence was left without a natural commencement.

with a woman touching her of whom she is jealous.] ἀντίζηλος. Lagarde, 'Mittheilungen' (Göttingen, 1884), 133, says: "The thing to be ascertained by further investigation is the signification of ἀντίζηλος. We can only guess that it is fellow-wife, we do not know it; from Steph. 'Thes.' i. 2, 908, it cannot be proved." Syr. "lest thou commit adultery with her;" probably through some misunderstanding, though even in the Greek the subject of deliberation here is not strictly parallel to the rest. Compare 'Derekh Erets,' p. 19.

neither with a coward in matters of war.] Syr. "with an enemy lest thou fight."

with a merchant concerning exchange.] I.e. about goods, and more particularly about his goods (Syr.). His advice should not be asked on such matters as the article to be taken. In all these cases the reader is warned not to ask counsel of any person directly interested in the result of the deliberation.

with a buyer of selling.] I.e. about the price, as Syr. "his price,"—the price which he ought to pay. In the East it would seem that these precepts are by no means unnecessary.

Then follows a class of counsellors who, from their character, are incapable of being judges of the matter to be discussed.

with an envious man of thankfulness.] Rather, with an ill-natured man (cf. Syr.; Lat. viro livido).

with the slothful for any work.] The habitually timid and shrinking must not be consulted about taking any important step.

with an hireling for a year of finishing work.] Lit. with a domestic servant. The readings, however, vary; and Alex. has "for a yearly servant," which is supported by Lat. Syr. "with an evil hireling bind not up [i.e. confide not] a secret." A man hired by the time would be a bad counsellor concerning the point at which the work was finished; since it would be to his interest to protract the period as long as possible (Bretschneider). Since no similar disqualification can be urged against the "domestic servant," we prefer the reading ἐπετείου.

with an idle servant of much business.] Rather, "work." Syr. "with a servant who seeks to harm his master," in which we recognize ברע, but scarcely anything more. The opinion of a lazy servant must not be asked on the question whether there is much work to be done. (Cp. Prov. xviii. 9.)

12. The attributes of the good counsellor follow.

a godly man, whom thou knowest to keep the commandments of the Lord.] Whose advice will therefore be uniformly on the side of right.

whose mind is according to thy mind.] Whose advice will therefore be disinterested. The first qualification is wanting in the second class of counsellors mentioned above; the second in the first.

and if thou stumblest, will grieve with thee.] For this the Syr. has: "and who, when thou art hurt, is hurt himself, and with whom it goes well when it goes well with thee." Both are explanations of the previous clause.

13. Yet self-reliance is, after all, better.

And let the counsel of thine own heart

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

own heart stand: for there is no man more faithful unto thee than it.

14 For a man's mind is sometime wont to tell him more than seven watchmen, that sit above in an high tower.

15 And above all this pray to the most High, that he will direct thy way in truth.

16 Let reason go before every enterprize, and counsel before every action.

17 The countenance is a sign of changing of the heart.

18 Four manner of things appear: good and evil, life and death: but the tongue ruleth over them continually.

B. C. cir. 200.

19 There is one that is wise and teacheth many, and yet is unprofitable to himself.

20 There is one that sheweth wisdom in words, and is hated: he shall be destitute of all ‖ food.

‖ Or, wisdom.

21 For grace is not given him from the Lord; because he is deprived of all wisdom.

22 Another is wise to himself; and the fruits of understanding are commendable in his mouth.

stand.] Rather, And call the council of thine own heart; a figure curiously like that of Plautus, 'Mostell.' 688, "huc concessero dum mihi senatum consili in cor convoco." The Syrian probably had a mutilated original before him.

14. And men's instinct ordinarily tells them what to do. A similar sentiment to that in the text occurs in the so-called 'First Alphabet of Ben Sira:' "Let there be to thee sixty counsellors; yet desert not thine own soul." Syr. "the heart of a man rejoices in his way." Perhaps the renderings represent יגיד כדרכו and יגיל בד respectively; and the original meant "tells him concerning his way."

than seven watchmen that sit above in an high tower.] Syr. "than the useless wealth of the world."

15. And after self-reliance, prayer is of primary importance. The counsellors are given in the inverse order of importance,—one's friends, oneself, God.

16. Third stanza (see introd. remarks).

Let reason go before every enterprize.] Rather, perhaps, a word is the beginning of every act. The Syriac here follows a mutilated original: "before all men and before everything," לפני כל . . . ולפני כל . . . דבר.

17. The countenance is a sign of changing of the heart.] The words "the countenance is" are a gloss from 155, 248, and Co., and must be omitted. The words remaining, "a sign of changing of the heart," are in apposition with μέρη, according to Fritzsche, "four things come to light as the signs of the changing of the heart;" a sense which seems obviously inappropriate. Lat. verbum nequam immutavit cor. The Syriac omits the words. We believe them to be inexplicable in their present condition; and suggest that they are part of xiii. 21, 22, written by some one on the margin.

18. Four manner of things appear.] Lit. four parts. One may compare Deut. xxx. 19, "I have set before you life and death, the blessing and the curse." The Syriac has: "the Lord created all things."

but the tongue ruleth over them continually.] Compare Prov. xviii. 21. Syr. "and he that ruleth over his tongue shall be saved from evil." This reminds us very temptingly of the Arabic يبرح (Wright, ii. p. 113, Rem. b.).

19. The commentators quote from Menander, μισῶ σοφιστὴν ὅστις οὐχ αὑτῷ σοφός. The passage cannot have been understood by the Syr.

20. he shall be destitute of all food.] Syr. "depriveth himself of all honour;" Lat. "of everything." The original, however, may have contained some vigorous phrase.

21. This verse is omitted by Syr., and may be an explanation of the fact mentioned in v. 20.

22. the fruits of [add his] understanding are commendable in his mouth.] "Commendable" is an emendation of 248, Co., Lat., for "faithful," which, as Bretschneider and Fritzsche have seen, is an interpolation from the end of the next verse. The Syriac order is somewhat confused here. It would seem, however, that the clause corresponding to this is 23 b, "and the fruits of his works are from the appearance of his face." The combination of these two renderings suggests an original like ופרי ערמתו מקבל פיו, "and his own mouth receives the fruit of his understanding." The Syrian and the first Greek translator both took מקבל as a preposition, whereas ἐπαινετοί,

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

23 A wise man instructeth his people; and the fruits of his understanding fail not.

24 A wise man shall be filled with blessing; and all they that see him shall count him happy.

25 The days of the life of man may be numbered: but the days of Israel are innumerable.

[b] Prov. 3. 35. ‖ Or, credit.

26 [b] A wise man shall inherit ‖ glory among his people, and his name shall be perpetual.

27 My son, prove thy soul in thy life, and see what is evil for it, and give not that unto it.

28 For all things are not profitable for all men, neither hath every soul pleasure in every thing. B. C. cir. 200.

[c] ch. 31. 12, 17.

29 [c] Be not unsatiable in any dainty thing, nor too greedy upon meats:

‖ Or, variety of meats.

30 For ‖ excess of meats bringeth sickness, and surfeiting will turn into choler.

31 By surfeiting have many perished; but he that taketh heed prolongeth his life.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

1 Honour due to the physician, and why.
16 How to weep and mourn for the dead.
24 The wisdom of the learned man, and of the labourer and artificer: with the use of them both.

"praiseworthy," represents a view which made it a passive participle.

23. A wise man instructeth his people.] These words remind us of x. 1. The Syr. has: "there is a wise man that is wise at all times," i.e. reading לעלם for לעם (=לעמו), and יש for איש. If we consider (1) the parallelism, (2) the frequent omission of letters, we shall perhaps decide in favour of the Syriac reading. The division implied in these verses is into (1) the wise to others but not to themselves; (2) neither to themselves nor others; (3) to themselves and not to others; (4) to both. The Syr. has misunderstood the second clause. Comp. 'Abhoth de R. Nathan,' p. 87.

25. And that reputation will last, in spite of the wise man's death. This verse is omitted by Syr. On the second clause, see the introductory remarks.

26. shall inherit glory.] So 248, Co., Lat., Syr. The better Greek MSS. have "faith." The original probably meant "shall have a perpetual inheritance."

27. People should find out their particular weaknesses, and avoid yielding to them.

28. all things are not profitable for all men.] Syr. "all food is not good." There has been a confusion between לכל and אכל. We believe the Greek text to be right.

neither hath every soul pleasure in everything.] "Pleasure in a little," Syr. This seems clearly corrupt; ܨܠܝܠ for ܟܠ. The Arabic translator makes of this: "and a little sufficeth for the soul."

29. Be not unsatiable in any dainty thing.] The Syriac has again אכל for כל.

nor too greedy upon meats.] Lit. be not poured out, a very elegant Grecism: compare Aristoph. 'Vespae,' 1469. The Syr. should be rendered "let not thine eye be evil over," i.e. be not envious of. This points to a Hebrew אל תרע, a transposition of אל תער of the Hebrew (cf. Is. xxxii. 15).

30. will turn into choler.] Lit. will approach near to. Cp. xxxi. 20 for the sentiment, and v. 2 (with note) for the expression.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

The concluding stanza of ch. xxxvii. naturally leads to what forms the subject of the first twenty-three verses of this chapter. But when taken in connexion with the second part of the chapter (vv. 24–end), it seems as if the first part formed a portion of a larger train of thought. The subject of the second part is sufficiently set forth, or at least introduced in v. 24. It is the pre-eminence of Wisdom—to which Alexandrians and Palestinians would attach different ideas—as that which alone was worthy of a man's life, but to which a man's whole life must be devoted if it was to be attained. As regards this general proposition, both Alexandrians and Palestinians would agree. But when the Son of Sirach proceeds to compare with such pursuits all other occupations as not only inferior to, but incompatible with the pursuit of wisdom, the Palestinians would have agreed with him in regard to agriculture, vv. 25, 26, but not as to handicrafts, the praise of which is very frequent in Talmudic writings. Indeed, it was a principle (Qidd. iv. 14; comp. 29 a), although not universally admitted (see in Qidd. iv. 14, the views of Simeon b. Elazar, but especially those of R. Nehorai), that every parent should teach his son some trade or craft. In accordance rather with Hellenic than Palestinian ideas, the writer declares all

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200. HONOUR a physician with the honour due unto him for the uses which ye may have of him: [a] for the Lord hath created him. B. C. cir. 200.

[a] ver. 12.

such occupations needful indeed for ordinary life, vv. 31, 32, but excluding a man from those higher distinctions and that higher work which are sketched in truly Palestinian fashion.

With this train of reasoning the subject of the first part of the chapter may be in this wise connected that it excludes the occupation of a physician from the general disparagement of all other pursuits than study. For the physician has a direct appointment from God; his medicaments are directly from God; and the exercise and success of his profession are directly dependent upon God. When we enter into further details, the various topics in the first part (vv. 1–23) appear well connected, although their connexion is rather that of succession of thinking than strictly logical, when one thought springs from the other. This, indeed, is the case throughout Ecclesiasticus—we had almost said in much of Jewish Wisdom-literature, though certainly not in the canonical Ecclesiastes. The fundamental position of the writer is indicated in the two opening verses of the chapter. It is twofold: the physician is to be honoured—the physician is from God. In the first stanza (vv. 1–8) it is emphasised that the physician and his medicaments are from God; in the second (vv. 9–15), that healing is from God, and that it implies repentance and good works on our part. Throughout the writer does not seem quite clear how to combine the skill of the physician with absolute help from God. A very curious instance of rationalistic interpretation of the miracle recorded in Ex. xv. 23–25 occurs in v. 5, which seems to imply that the healing was in the wood. (Comp. the same view in Philo, 'de vita Moys.' i. 33; and another rationalistic explanation of the miracle in Jos. 'Antiq.' iii. 1, 2.) The apparent depreciation of the physician in v. 15 is not inconsistent with the honour previously ascribed to him. It only presents another aspect of the subject, and the reference in v. 15 is not so much to the physician as to the sick who require his aid—dangerous illness being regarded, according to Jewish ideas, as the judgment of the Lord.

From such reference to dangerous sickness the transition in the third stanza (vv. 16–23) to death and mourning is easy and natural. The writer enjoins the duties towards the dead, and the usual practice of mourning, but tempers the latter with the caution that while too little of it would give offence, too much is unadvisable, as alike hurtful unto oneself and foolish. We have here that mixture of selfishness and Eastern world-wisdom with religion which forms one of the characteristics of the book (see General Introduction). Alike its philosophy and its theology are far from elevated—a kind of fatalism not unmixed with a constant regard for self underlying all. Yet even here what may be designated as the "ground-tone" in the previous two stanzas is not changed. The two ideas are still present to the writer: on the one hand, what men will think of us; and, on the other, that all is from God.

We feel tempted to note a few Rabbinic parallels to this chapter. In regard to the honour due to the physician (see note on v. 1) we have the exact parallel in Aramaic in Jer. Taan. 66 d and in pure Hebrew (though with different application) in Shem. R. 21 (see our note on Ecclus. xviii. 19). On the other hand, we read also: "The best of physicians deserves Gehenna" (Qidd. iv. 14). The dependence of healing upon God, and the need of humiliation, prayer, and good works in such cases, were generally acknowledged Rabbinic principles. In connexion with v. 12 we might quote this: "He that suffers pain goes to the physician" (Babh. Q. 46 b)—although the proverb has a wider and general application in the Talmud. In regard to v. 15 we read this as "a proverb": "The door that is not open to charity (the poor) shall be open to the physician" (Bemid. R. 9, and Midr. on Cant. vi. 11). The duties in reference to the dead are often insisted upon by the Rabbis. As regards excessive sorrow, referred to in v. 18, we read: "Every one who mourns over the dead beyond measure weeps over another dead" (viz. he will himself die), Moed Q. 27 b. On the subject of trades and occupations, we have already given parallels. But as regards the infinite superiority of the student to all others, referred to in vv. 31-end, we recall the contemptuous answer of Jochanan b. Zakkai to the workman who claimed equality with the Rabbi, since both laboured for the public good, and to whom the Rabbi would apply Eccles. iv. 17 (see the Midrash on the passage). And although (Ber. 17 a) the Rabbis are said to have placed on the same level the work of the labourer in the field and that of the student in the city, provided only his heart be directed towards God—by which, however, we are to understand that he engaged in study of the Law according to his ability—yet the immense superiority of the professed student of the Law to all other classes of men is too well known to require illustration. Lastly, as regards the miracle recorded in Ex. xv. 25, it may be interesting to know that the rationalistic explanation

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

2 For of the most High cometh healing, and he shall receive ‖ honour of the king.

‖ Or, a gift.

3 The skill of the physician shall lift up his head: and in the sight of great men he shall be in admiration.

4 The Lord hath created medicines out of the earth; and he that is wise will not abhor them.

B. C. cir. 200.

5 [b] Was not the water made sweet with wood, that the virtue thereof might be known?

[b] Exod. 15. 25.

6 And he hath given men skill, that he might be honoured in his marvellous works.

7 With such doth he heal [men,] and taketh away their pains.

8 Of such doth the apothecary given by the Son of Sirach (in v. 5) occurs also in the Targum Onkelos. (For the views of Philo and Josephus, see above.)

1. which ye may have of him.] These words must be omitted, as not in the Greek. Syr. "Honour a physician before thou needest him;" with which the quotation in the Talmud and Midrash, אוקיר לאסייך עד דלא תצטרך ליה, exactly agrees (Jer. Taan. 66 d; Shem. R. 21). We learn, therefore, that in the Greek text (1) we must emend πρὸ τῆς χρείας αὐτοῦ for πρὸς τὰς χρείας; and (2) we must omit τιμαῖς. This last may be merely a copyist's error; or it may have been inserted by some one who desired a more natural connexion between clauses a and b, and imagined the word τιμαῖς ("his natural" or "proper honours") would give this. We do not think "honour" is here used in the sense of "pay," in spite of the interesting Latinism ut medico honos haberetur, cited by Baduellus. The subject of ill-health probably suggested to the author the remarkable character of the medical art, which even those who are not afflicted with illness ought, he thinks, to appreciate. The sentiment, therefore, is wholly different from that of xviii. 19, but does not imply "either that people were in the habit of employing medical aid too seldom, nor that the medical profession was insufficiently respected" (Fritzsche).

for the Lord hath created him.] Syr. (and perhaps Greek): "for him, too, the Lord hath created." Like the poet, nascitur, non fit. Even the vast advances in the science made since the author's time do not prevent this observation still holding good. Yet the meaning may be simply that God hath appointed the healing art, "which is as necessary to the human body as cultivation to plants" (Midrash on Samuel, p. 28 b).

2. For of the most High cometh healing, &c.] Syr. "for by God is a physician taught." It is probable that both translators are wrong in supplying a verb in the first clause. The original (probably כי מי"י רפאות ומלך יקח תפארת) may have meant: "For from a king one can receive honour; but from God only the art of healing;" the phrases being (as sometimes in the Proverbs) inverted probably to call attention to the play on the roots פאר and רפא; with which compare Isa. lxi. 3. The author is not alluding to the custom of maintaining state-physicians (which is well attested), but to the nature of his distinction, which, coming from a higher source, entitles its recipient to higher respect than any title bestowed by kings. If the reading "gift" of the best authorities (for "honour") be correct, this note will have to be modified only in respect of the play on words suggested.

3. The skill of a physician shall lift up his head.] The author means that this eminence of the medical profession is as a matter of fact generally recognised, and that there is no position of honour to which a physician of unusual skill may not aspire. The case in Gen. l. 2 (cited by Delitzsch, s. v. Arzneikunst, in Riehm, 'Handwörterbuch') is perhaps to be explained by the special ideas of the Egyptians.

and in the sight of great men he shall be in admiration.] Syr. "he shall be brought." The latter seems a more likely expression than the Greek rendering.

4. And no suspicion should attach to the instruments of the art. A paraphrase of the original is here preserved: אלוה העלה סמים מן הארץ. The word for "medicines" is adopted by the Syr. and S. H.

will not abhor them.] Perhaps some sects then, as in our times, disliked the employment of natural agency in the healing of the sick. (See Midrash, l. c.)

5. A scriptural argument in proof of the last assertion.

that the power thereof might be known.] Syr. "the power of God," perhaps a religious emendation on the part of the Syrian translator. Fritzsche (after Bretschneider), thinking that it is the virtue of the simples which is here being insisted on, prefers the reference to the wood; and this seems the correct view (see the introd. to the chapter).

7. With such doth he heal men, and taketh away their pains.] Syr. "doth the physician relieve;" similarly Lat., in his curans mitigabit

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200. make a confection; and of his works there is no end; and from him is peace over all the earth.

9 My son, in thy sickness be not negligent: but [c] pray unto the Lord, and he will make thee whole.

[c] Isai. 38. 2.

10 Leave off from sin, and order thine hands aright, and cleanse thy heart from all wickedness.

11 Give a sweet savour, and a memorial of fine flour; and make a fat offering, ‖as not being.

‖ Or, as a dead man.

12 Then give place to the physician, [d] for the Lord hath created him: let him not go from thee, for thou hast need of him. B. C. cir. 200.

[d] ver. 1.

13 There is a time when in their hands there is good success.

14 For they shall also pray unto the Lord, that he would prosper that, which they give for ease and ‖remedy to prolong life.

‖ Or, curing.

15 He that sinneth before his Maker, let him fall into the hand of the physician.

16 My son, [e] let tears fall down over the dead, and begin to lament, as if thou hadst suffered great harm dolorem; and Ben Sira, בהם הרפא מרפא את המכה. The Qal participle having become a substantive, that of Piel is employed instead. The Greek original must have been corrupted.

[e] ch. 22. 11. 1 Thess. 4. 13.

8. Of such doth the apothecary make a confection.] Rather, the perfumer. Heb. preserved as above in Ber. R. 10, בהם הרוקח מרוקח את המרוקחת.

and of his works there is no end; and from him is peace over all the earth.] This means, according to Drus., Grot., Fritzsche, that before the drug is made, the patient is already healed—a hyperbolical description of the excellence and rapidity of the effects of these simples. Syr. "that work may not fail, nor wisdom from the face of the earth;" representing the same text with the single alteration of "wisdom" for "peace." In spite of the ingenuity of the explanation quoted, we believe the Syr. rendering to be right; for the perfumer's concoction can have no such effect, nor were the trades of physician and chemist distinct in those days. Though all these artists are inspired by God, yet they are made to employ certain simple means. The reason for which, the philosopher thinks, is a Divine design to encourage science; which otherwise would vanish, being useless. "Miraculous" healing would never have suggested a study of botany or mineralogy. "Peace" in the Greek text is probably a false repetition of שלם (συντελέσῃ) from the foregoing clause.

9–15. Second stanza. See introductory remarks.

9. be not negligent.] The word παράβλεπε is difficult. Lat. non despicias te ipsum. Fritzsche, with many others (as A. V.), "Neglect not to pray;" but it is doubtful whether the word can bear the meaning. The Syr. omits it. May it be a marginal variant from the last verse representing ܢ of Syr. there?

but pray unto the Lord, and he will make thee whole.] Syriac, "because he is the healer;" and either this, or "that he may heal thee," must have been the meaning of the original.

10. Leave off from sin, and order thy hands aright.] Lit. straighten thy hands. Bretschneider compares such phrases as "pure hands" (Job xvii. 9, &c.). Fritzsche thinks guilt is symbolized by crooked hands (compare with this Propertius, iii. 7, 60). The expression is in any case a strange one. The Syriac omits it. Bretschneider remarks on the Jewish theory that bodily pain was a punishment for sin.

11. as not being.] "He who regards himself as lost will assuredly give the best thing in his possession to God" (Fritzsche). The whole verse is omitted in the Syr., and the last clause of it in the Vet. Lat.

12. for the Lord hath created him . . . go from thee.] These words are omitted in the Syr., and may contain an interpolation from v. 1.

14. that he would prosper that, which they give for ease and remedy to prolong life.] Rather, for the sake of life; i.e. to make a living (Fritzsche). Syr. "and by his hand there may come healing and life."

15. The Armenian Version here recommences. The Syr. renders: "because he that sinneth . . . is given . . . ," which would transform what might seem an attack on physicians generally into a reason why prayer should be employed. The sentiment in the Greek form would seem at first sight unlike what we have had in the previous verses; but see the remarks on the subject in the introduction to this chapter. On the other hand, the Syriac gives an unnatural expression. For the language, comp. Prov. xxii. 14 b.

16. let tears fall down.] Cp. Jer. ix. 17.

begin to lament.] Probably שא קינה.

as if thou hadst suffered great harm.] The Hebrew (e.g. וירע לך) probably meant "feel

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

thyself; and then cover his body according to the custom, and neglect not his burial.

17 Weep bitterly, and make great moan, and use lamentation, as he is worthy, and that a day or two, lest thou be evil spoken of: and then comfort thyself for thy heaviness.

f ch. 30. 23. 2 Cor. 7. 10.

18 f For of heaviness cometh death, and the heaviness of the g heart breaketh strength.

g Prov. 15. 13. & 17. 22.

19 In affliction also sorrow remaineth: and the life of the poor is the curse of the heart.

20 Take no heaviness to heart: drive it away, and remember the last end.

21 Forget it not, for there is no turning again: thou shalt not do him good, but hurt thyself.

‖ Or, the sentence upon him.

22 Remember ‖ my judgment: for thine also shall be so; yesterday for me, and to day for thee.

h 2 Sam. 12. 20.

23 h When the dead is at rest, let his remembrance rest; and be comforted for him, when his spirit is departed from him.

B. C. cir. 200.

24 The wisdom of a learned man cometh by opportunity of leisure: and he that hath little business shall become wise.

25 How can he get wisdom that holdeth the plough, and that glorieth in the goad, that driveth oxen, and is occupied in their labours, and whose talk is ‖ of bullocks?

‖ Gr. of the breed of bullocks?

26 He giveth his mind to make furrows; and is diligent to give the kine fodder.

27 So every carpenter and workmaster, that laboureth night and day; and they that cut and grave seals, and are diligent to make great variety, and give themselves to counterfeit imagery, and watch to finish a work:

28 The smith also sitting by the anvil, and considering the iron work, the vapour of the fire wasteth his that thou hast suffered," and the Greek implies the same.

according to the custom.] Rather, according to his due. כמשפטו — perhaps, in graveclothes suited to his station; compare Herodotus, ii. 139.

neglect not his burial.] This may refer to some abuse of the time, but more probably is only a solemn injunction of what was regarded as a religious duty.

17. Weep bitterly, and make great moan.] The Syr. has a very different sentiment: "Wine and refreshment for mourners;" alluding to the customary funeral-feast mentioned by Jer. xvi. 7, Tobit iv. 18 (Riehm, 'Handwörterbuch'). Yet such an allusion should have been made later on in the chapter.

24–end. Part II. (see the introd.).

24. The wisdom of a learned man cometh by opportunity of leisure.] Rather, of a scribe. The Syriac, "shall increase his wisdom," seems to be a wilful alteration. As the Atticists tell us that εὐκαιρία is late Greek for σχολή, perhaps one of these words should be omitted.

and he that hath little business.] And therefore can enjoy the leisure necessary for study. Drusius quotes from Hillel, "qui multum negotiatur non evadet sapiens;" and from R. Meir, "minue occupationes et vaca legi." (The former is a quotation from Abh. ii. 5; the latter from Abh. iv. 10.)

26. to make furrows.] The expression is a rare one. The Coptic seems to have read εὐθῦναι or ἐκτεῖναι, "to straighten." On the Syriac here, see Payne Smith, 'Thes.' p. 1891.

to give the kine fodder.] Syr. "to finish his work." Heb. perhaps לכפות, derived by Syr. from כפה instead of כפא. This mistake may have led to the other.

27. So.] I.e. cannot become wise.

that laboureth, &c.] Rather, that spends the night as the day.

and are diligent to make great variety.] I.e. to invent fresh and fanciful patterns.

to counterfeit imagery.] I.e. to make the image resemble the thing counterfeited.

28. considering the iron work.] So the inferior MSS., Sin., and Alex., Lat., Arm., S. H., Aeth., but Vat. ἀργῷ σιδήρῳ, a difficult phrase. Fritzsche's conjecture that this means unwrought iron, and that ידע was a false reading for יגע, does not seem supported by the Syr., "considering vessels of weight."

wasteth.] Syr. "splitteth." The Vat. reading is "stiffeneth." The Heb. יבקע would correspond with the Syr., and is rendered "waste" by the LXX. of Micah i. 4. Both τήξει and πήξει might be used for the flesh, and he fighteth with the heat of the furnace: the noise of the hammer and the anvil is ever in his ears, and his eyes look still upon the pattern of the thing that he maketh; he setteth his mind to finish his work, and watcheth to polish it perfectly:

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

29 So doth the potter sitting at
[i] Jer. 18. 3. his work, and [i] turning the wheel about with his feet, who is alway carefully set at his work, and maketh all his work by number;

30 He fashioneth the clay with his arm, and [ll] boweth down his strength before his feet; he applieth himself to lead it over; and he is diligent to make clean the furnace:

B. C. cir. 200.

[ll] Or, tempereth it with his feet.

31 All these trust to their hands: and every one is wise in his work.

32 Without these cannot a city be inhabited: and they shall not dwell where they will, nor go up and down:

effects of fire; see Sext. Empir. p. 329, 14 (ed. Bekker).

and he fighteth with the heat of the furnace.] A remarkable phrase. Syr. "he burneth" or "is burnt with." The original was probably יתחרה, which is almost exclusively employed of mental warmth, and was probably intended by the author to refer to the excitement produced by the heat.

is ever in his ears.] Lit. renews his ears, explained by Grotius as "pleases with its freshness;" an idea which the context assuredly does not confirm. Arm. "excites" (κινεῖ?); S. H. "empties" (κενοῖ?); Aeth. "annoys" = κναίει (conjectured also by Grabe), or rather ἀποκναίει, which may be right; ἀποκναίειν τὰ ὦτα, "to wear away the ears," is a Greek phrase, of which Philo in particular is fond, applied to persons who are for ever harping on the same string. No less ingenious, however, is the conjecture of Fritzsche that "renews" is a translation of יְחַדֵּשׁ, itself a misreading of יְחֵרֵשׁ, "deafens," a word formed like יְעַוֵּר. The Syriac has "towards the conception he inclines his hand;" a remarkable rendering, the discussion of which would lead to conjectures not suitable for this place, but which suggests the correction φωνῇ σφύρης κλινεῖ τὸ οὖς αὐτοῦ.

of the thing that he maketh.] Lit. of a vessel.

The last clause, "he setteth his mind . . . perfectly," is omitted in the Syr.

29. On the process described in this and the following verse, see Riehm, 'Handwörterbuch,' s. v. Töpferei.

who is alway carefully set at his work.] Omitted in the Syr.

and maketh all his work by number.] I.e. makes it to order in definite numbers.

30. He fashioneth the clay with his arm.] Heb. יצר; the Syr. seems to have read יִרֹץ, "he breaketh."

and boweth down his strength before his feet.] The clay is prepared by stamping; cp. Isa. xli. 25. The Syriac version, "before his death he is bowed and bent," suggests that they took "before his feet" as a euphemism (compare the Latin rigidas calces extendere), scarcely to be found elsewhere.

he applieth himself to lead it over.] "Lead" must here mean to "glaze," white lead being employed in certain glazes. On the materials employed by the ancients in making glazes, see 'Dict. of Antiq.' s. v. Fictile. The Hebrew was probably מִשְׁחָה (cp. Payne Smith, 'Thes. Syr.' p. 2240, s. v. ܡܫܚܐ ܕܚܣܡ). The Syrian, who renders "his work," may have either confused this with מַעֲשֶׂה, or made a mere guess at the meaning, as the Aeth., who also translates "work," seems to have done.

and he is diligent [lit. and his sleeplessness is] to make clean the furnace.] So that no improper materials may spoil the pottery. Syr. "to build" (perhaps corrupt; cp. Arab.). Perhaps the phrase in Hos. vii. 4 may suggest that the Siracide had intended לְבַעֵר, "to heat," miswritten לְבָרֵר.

31. All these trust to their hands.] Not, like the wise man, to their minds. Syr. "all these for the sake of their profit;" reading, perhaps, בידי כשרו for בידו שברו. (Lat. speraverunt.) Yet there may have been a play on the words אֱמֶן and אֱמֶן.

and every one is wise.] They have then a wisdom, which is confined to the narrow groove of their respective arts; unlike that described in xxxix. 1. Both the Greek and Heb. (יתחכם) mean rather "plays the wise man" than "is wise."

32. These are all essential elements of a civilised community.

they shall not dwell where they will.] I.e. men shall not establish any kind of community (Bad., Drus., Fri.). But the interpretation of Grotius, "they shall not sojourn," i.e. these artisans will easily find employment

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

33 They shall not be sought for in publick counsel, nor sit high in the congregation: they shall not sit on the judges' seat, nor understand the sentence of judgment: they cannot declare justice and judgment; and they shall not be found where parables are spoken.

34 But they will maintain the state of the world, and [all] their desire is in the work of their craft.

B. C. cir. 200.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

1 A description of him that is truly wise.
12 An exhortation to praise God for his works; which are good to the good, and evil to them that are evil.

in their native country, seems more natural. The Syriac renders: "and wherever they dwell they shall not hunger." This suggests that for οὐ in the Greek we should read οὗ; while "they shall not walk about" (Gr.) and "they shall not hunger" (Syr.) probably represent different readings, יעברו and יִרעבו, of which we should prefer the latter.

33. They shall not be sought for in publick counsel.] This clause is not found in any Greek MSS. except 248 and the second hand of Sin.; into the former of which it might seem to have been introduced from the Syriac. On the other hand, MS. 248 helps us to correct the Syriac text (ܠܐ ܢܬܒܥܐ ܒܟܢܫܐ ܠܐ ܢܬܒܥܐ ܒܡܬܠܐ), in which ܢܬܒܥܐ, "they shall not be wanted," is clearly required for "they shall not sit"), and also preserves apparently a trace of independence in the preposition ἐν (Sin. εἰς). The true form of the clause would seem to have been, "they shall not be inquired of (their opinion shall not be asked) for public counsel." That the clause forms a genuine and necessary part of the text is shewn by the context and the parallelism so forcibly, that even Fritzsche, ordinarily no friend of either Syr. or 248, admits it.

nor sit high in the congregation.] Lit. "overleap." Commentators here think either of "septa intra quae habetur senatus" (Grotius) or of "their coming forward into the front benches" (Arm., Bretschn., Fri.). Syr. (followed by S. H.): "they shall not be exalted," perhaps representing a variant יגדלו for ידלגו, the latter of which, as the more difficult, should be preferred; compare also the uses of ܢܣܩ in Syriac (Payne Smith, 'Thes.' p. 945), "gradatim ascendit ad honores, ad thronum regni promovit."

they shall not sit on the judges' seat.] Cp. Riehm, s. v. Gerichtswesen; Job xxix. 7.

nor understand the sentence of judgment.] Lit. the covenant of judgment; representing, according to Fritzsche, ברית משפט, a phrase which he supposes to mean "the law covenant," i.e. the principles of justice. No doubt the moral and civil codes were not separated in those days. Syr.: "covenants and judgments."

declare.] This requires the alteration of ἐκφανῶσι to ἐκφάνωσι (Fritzsche).

justice.] Most authorities: "discipline." they shall not be found where parables are spoken.] Lit. they shall not be found in parables; which Grotius interprets of their not being found quoted among authors of parables. The Syrian seems to have pointed ימצאו actively, "they shall not find;" i.e. "they shall not attain to any portion of," which he paraphrastically renders they shall not "understand." This is probably the better interpretation. The suggestion that מְשָׁלִים, "parables," is a mistake for מוֹשְׁלִים, "rulers" (Gaab), deserves mention.

34. But they will maintain the state of the world.] Grotius quotes the Hebrew phrase שיש בהן ישוב של עולם, "people by whom the world is rendered habitable," applied to artisans, &c. Our author's words, however, would seem to have been כי אם ברית עולם יכינו (Syr. יבינו). The following clause (in which their "desire" seems to represent a word meaning "business," רנה, Syriace) would appear to give a slight probability to the Syriac reading "they understand."

and their desire.] The original (probably) "their meditation:" v. supra.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

This is, perhaps, one of the most interesting chapters in the book. It gives insight into the views and philosophy of the author, and into one of the main objects of his work. Perhaps more clearly than any other it connects itself with the general drift of our canonical Ecclesiastes in discussing the great problems of life and the connexion between the (moral) government of God and the events and incidents of this world. It sets forth, from the standpoint of the writer and presumably of the Chokhmah or religious philosophy of that period, how the Jewish sage—the philosophic believer—solved the great problems of religious thinking. He is no longer narrow, exclusively Judaic, ignoring other men and other thought, bigoted

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200. BUT he that giveth his mind to the law of the most High, and is occupied in the meditation thereof, will seek out the wisdom of all B. C. cir. 200.

and prejudiced. He has learned abroad; he has made personal experience of what is foreign. But, above all, he has been nourished at the fount of his ancestral religion (v. 1). And from a wider consideration of men and things he returns a firm believer in the God of Revelation, the God of Israel (vv. 8, 14*d*, 15). Alike the main object and the main result of his thinking and of his investigations was that which also formed the topic of Chokhmah-literature — presented in Proverbs and Parables (vv. 2, 3, 6, 7). This was the outcome of a proper understanding of the deeper meaning of the Law, with which we must here combine the history of Israel, as the practical application of the fundamental principles contained in the Law (v. 8), and of which the full bearing appeared in prophecy (vv. 1, 22, 23). The great problem of Chokhmah was to vindicate the ways of God with man. The thesis itself (or the final conclusion) is propounded in v. 16*a*, and the manner of its demonstration as well as its limits are indicated in v. 16*b*. Nature, the history of the world, and the experience of each individual force upon us—in view of what seems sometimes unmitigated evil, at other times like mere accident, or else as if it were fate—such questions as these: "What means all this? wherefore is it?" (v. 17)—that is, if there be a God, such as Revelation has set Him forth. The Book of Ecclesiastes had in part treated the same questions, though chiefly from the subjective standpoint (as it were of the laughing philosopher). And it had answered them by pointing from self, and seeming accidentalness or fate—in short, away from moral indifferentism—through eternal, absolute right and truth, to personal moral responsibility as the final solution (Eccles. xi. 9; xii. 13, 14). But our writer answers them rather from the objective standpoint. The progression of thought may be thus marked. We accept the position that all these seemingly incongruous things, so full of difficulty when viewed separately, are of and from the Lord. And we maintain that all His works are exceeding good—nay, we regard them as His commands (v. 16): for God reigneth. But we err and go astray when we view them separately: we must view them in their nexus—as integral parts of God's government—each "in its season," v. 16*b*; each "for their use," v. 21. And so we reach the conclusions expressed in vv. 33, 34. This, in our view, will help us to understand alike the structure and the contents of this chapter, on which (as so often) the variations in the Syr. throw additional light.

The praise of the sage in the previous chapter leads our author to describe the ideal representative of Hebrew Chokhmah (Wisdom) in v. 1. In two stanzas, each of three verses (vv. 2–4; 5–7), his intellectual and then his spiritual qualifications are described. [We omit as spurious the first clause in v. 6. The pious gloss—omitted in the Syr.—is worthy of the Greek translator.] In a third stanza of three verses (vv. 8–10) the activity and final success of this sage are detailed, the whole appropriately closing with an encomium in v. 11 which may well be fitted on to v. 1. We infer that in the view of the writer the main object and topic of Revelation was Chokhmah or Wisdom. This Wisdom was alike based upon and the outcome of the Law, as properly understood; and it was also fully indicated and vindicated in prophecy, v. 1. Thus Ben Sira had evidently passed beyond the merely external and literal view of the Law, and occupied the standpoint of the Old Testament Chokhmah-literature. He continues and further developes that direction; but he also imports into it not indeed Hellenistic ideas, but the results on his own mind of the influence of foreign, Grecian, thinking and intercourse. Similarly, he connects prophecy with the problems of Chokhmah. In his view it points to the full vindication of the results of Chokhmah. The future kingdom of God, as set forth in prophecy, would be anti-heathen; but chiefly he regarded it as the vindication of the moral government of God, the restoration of moral equilibrium in the world (vv. 22–25).

The second part of the chapter (beginning with v. 12) is intended fully to set forth the great topic which engages the thinking and teaching of the Hebrew sage — in other words, the object and the results of true Chokhmah. This is introduced in stanza iv. (vv. 10–15; six verses) by a solemn appeal, of which the outcome is that true Chokhmah will lead to the worshipful acknowledgment of God. Then follows in the fifth stanza, also of six verses (vv. 16–21), the statement of the theme itself (as previously described). Next we have an analysis of the thesis of Chokhmah. In stanza vi. of four verses (vv. 22–25) the subject is: the ways of God. These are described in a threefold antithesis: vv. 22 and 23, v. 24*a* and b, and v. 25*a* and b. The seventh stanza, consisting of eight verses (vv. 26–33), deals with the problem of the order and phenomena of Nature as affecting man, and shews that what from one aspect is good (vv. 26, 27) may from another aspect prove evil. Yet all cometh from God, exhibits His wise purposes, and the ancient, and be occupied in prophecies.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

2 He will keep the sayings of the renowned men: and where subtil parables are, he will be there also.

3 He will seek out the secrets of grave sentences, and be conversant in dark parables.

4 He shall serve among great men, and appear before princes: he will travel through strange countries; for he hath tried the good and the evil among men.

5 He will give his heart to resort early to the Lord that made him, and will pray before the most High, and will open his mouth in prayer, and make supplication for his sins.

6 When the great Lord will, he shall be filled with the spirit of understanding: he shall pour out wise sentences, and give thanks unto the Lord in his prayer.

B. C. cir. 200.

7 He shall direct his counsel and knowledge, and in his secrets shall he meditate.

8 He shall shew forth that which he hath learned, and shall glory in the law of the covenant of the Lord.

9 Many shall commend his understanding; and so long as the world endureth, it shall not be blotted out; his memorial shall not depart away, and his name shall live from generation to generation.

10 [a] Nations shall shew forth his wisdom, and the congregation shall declare his praise.

[a] ch. 44. 15.

11 If he die, he shall leave a executes His behest. The whole concludes with two verses (vv. 34, 35), of which the first returns to the original theme (vv. 16, 17), while the second reiterates the acknowledgment and praise of God in all things on the part of true Chokhmah (comp. vv. 14 d, 15 a, b, c).

1. But he that giveth.] The Greek means lit. "except him that giveth." There can, however, be no doubt that the A. V. rendering is what the author intended.

of all the ancient.] Independent literary effort would seem to have ceased for some time. At the same time the writer is desirous of connecting the thinking of his ideal sage with the results of the previous development, of which it forms only another and further link.

and be occupied in prophecies.] Cp. Eccles. i. 13.

2. He will keep the sayings.] Treasure them up. Syr. "learn."

and where subtil parables are, he will be there also.] The phrase in the Greek (or in the Hebrew) is taken from Prov. i. 3. The Syriac has: "and he will reflect on whatever is deep." We suppose that this represents an original מעמקים, corrupted in the copy of the Greek to מעקמים, derived from עקם (Chald. and Syr.), "perverse," "crooked." For στροφή in this sense, a rich collection of parallels is given by Schleussner, s. v.

3. the secrets of grave sentences.] I.e. the deeper meaning of wise sayings, which is secret; that is, hidden from superficial view.

4. Further ways in which he qualifies himself.

He shall serve among great men.] Syr. "he shall go."

and appear before princes.] Vat. "a prince." Syr. this time: "he shall serve among kings and rulers." The Greek is preferable.

Also he must travel.

he hath tried.] Doubtless the original meant "he must try," or "is sure to try." The opening lines of the Odyssey will occur to every reader.

5. He will look for still higher guidance.

6. And when all these conditions are fulfilled, a special grace is required to produce the result. But the words ἐὰν . . . θελήσῃ are omitted by Syr.

he shall pour out wise sentences as showers.] Syr. "parables twofold;" corrected, however, in the Arab.

and give thanks unto the Lord in his prayer.] The Syriac renders it: "people will praise him for his thoughts." Probably the original was ambiguous.

7. He shall direct his counsel.] Lit. "he himself."

8. that which he hath learned.] Rather, wise doctrine.

9. Many shall commend.] Syr. "many shall learn from;" perhaps יוֹדוּ and יורו. The latter in the active could give no satisfactory sense.

11. If he die.] The Greek MSS. seem all to have the opposite order: If he persist,

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

greater name than a thousand: and if he live, he shall ‖ increase it.

‖ Or, gain unto it.

12 Yet have I more to say, which I have thought upon; for I am filled as the moon at the full.

13 Hearken unto me, ye holy children, and bud forth as a rose growing by the ‖ brook of the field:

‖ Or, rivers of water.

14 And give ye a sweet savour as frankincense, and flourish as a lily, send forth a smell, and sing a song of praise, bless the Lord in all his works.

15 Magnify his name, and shew forth his praise with the songs of your lips, and with harps, and in praising him ye shall say after this manner:

B. C. cir. 200.

16 [b] All the works of the Lord are exceeding good, and [c] whatsoever he commandeth shall be accomplished in due season.

[b] Gen. 1. 31. ver. 33. Mark 7. 37. 1 Tim. 4. 4. [c] Numb. 23. 19.

17 [d] And none may say, What is this? wherefore is that? for at time convenient they shall all be sought out: [e] at his commandment the waters stood as an heap, and at the words of his mouth the receptacles of waters.

[d] Rom. 9. 20. [e] Ps. 33. 6, 7. & 147. 15, 18.

he shall leave a greater name than a thousand; and if he cease, he increases it. The inversion is found very early, although it does not appear on what authority. Evidently it was introduced by some one who hoped thereby to render this extremely difficult verse easier. The Syriac renders: "If he will, he shall be praised among a thousand: and if he be silent, among a small people." Clearly we have to deal with a text that has been either corrupted or misunderstood, for the restoration of which we venture the following suggestions:—(1) The verbs עמד and חמד might easily be confused, owing to the indistinct pronunciation of the gutturals in some parts of Palestine. Between אם יעמד, "if he stand," and אם יחמד, "if he desire," the preference seems to be for יעמד, on account of "if he cease" in the second clause. (2) The phrases "he shall leave a name" and "he shall be praised" perhaps represent יִשָּׁאֵר and יְאֻשַּׁר; doubtless of the two the latter is the more appropriate. (3) The phrases ἐμποιεῖ αὐτῷ and "in a small people" offer no obvious original which would account for them both; we suggest, however, that the original contained words signifying "without number" (e.g. לא מספר or בלי מספר, read by the Greek לוֹ מְסַפֵּר). The whole verse then, we suppose, may have meant: "If he remain alive, he will be praised by (or 'more than') a thousand; and if he die, by people without number." Omnia post obitum fingit majora vetustas.

12. I am filled as the moon at the full.] Syr. "as the moon on the twelfth day;" Heb. כַּסֵּא of Prov. vii. 20. The Latin Version has quasi furore, perhaps having the σεληνιαζόμενοι in mind.

13. The verses refer, according to Fritzsche, to the spiritual blooming and blossoming which will proceed from hearing his hymn.

bud forth as a rose.] The Syriac, "lilies and cedars," seems to represent different attempts at rendering וְרָד.

by the brook of the field.] Better, the water-brook, as A, C, S, Lat., Arm., S. H.

14. send forth a smell.] Syr. "lift up your voices."

and sing a song of praise.] Lit. praise a song; compare Ps. lv. 11. As the translator is maintaining the schema etymologicum of the original, he would seem to have derived ἔσμα from αἰνέω.

15. Magnify his name.] הבו גדל.

17. And none may say . . . that.] These words are omitted in the T. R., but found in the Greek MSS. (cf. Nestle, p. 127). Their omission would necessitate the throwing out of the second clause; and, as a matter of fact, both are omitted in the Latin, which substitutes the second clause here for the second clause of v. 21. The Syriac, on the other hand, while omitting v. 21, has our verse in an enlarged form. Plainly the verse cannot be original in both places; the question is only for which place the author is more likely to have intended it. Now such a sentiment seems more natural at the commencement of the following enumeration than in the middle of it. We believe, therefore, that the true text is preserved by the Syriac.

at time convenient they shall all be sought out.] The Syriac (v. supra) renders: "No one can say, Wherefore is this and wherefore that? for all are created appropriately; nor can he say this is good and that evil; for all shew themselves men at their time." The Syriac expression is peculiar, but probably represents the Heb. יִפְקְדוּ (cp. Symm. 1 Sam. xx. 18), which might well mean "will appear on the muster-roll."

at his commandment the waters stood as an heap.] I.e. at the Creation, before the separation of the waters into their receptacles; so

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

18 f At his commandment is done whatsoever pleaseth him; and none can hinder, when he will save.

f Ps. 135. 6.

19 g The works of all flesh are before him, and nothing can be hid from his eyes.

g Hebr. 4. 13.

20 He seeth from everlasting to everlasting; and there is nothing wonderful before him.

21 A man need not to say, What is this? wherefore is that? for he hath made all things for their uses.

22 His blessing covered the dry land as a river, and watered it as a flood.

23 As he hath turned the waters into saltness: so shall the heathen inherit his wrath.

h Hos. 14. 9.

24 h As his ways are plain unto the holy; so are they stumblingblocks unto the wicked.

B. C. cir. 200.

25 For the good are good things created from the beginning: i so evil things for sinners.

i ch. 40. 10.

26 k The principal things for the whole use of man's life are water, fire, iron, and salt, flour of wheat, honey, milk, and l the blood of the grape, and oil, and clothing.

k ch. 29. 21.

l Gen. 49. 11. Deut. 32. 14. ch. 40. 20. & 50. 15.

27 m All these things are for good to the godly: so to the sinners they are turned into evil.

m Rom. 8. 28. 1 Tim. 4. 4

28 There be spirits that are created for vengeance, which in their fury lay on sore strokes; in the time of destruction they pour out their force, and appease the wrath of him that made them.

29 n Fire, and hail, and famine,

n ch. 40. 9

Gutmann, Fritzsche. The older interpreters thought of the Red Sea or the Jordan. The Syr. has a different verse.

18. At his commandment is done whatsoever pleaseth him.] The Greek means literally, in his commandment is all pleasure. The Syriac renders: "with joy is his will performed."

and none can hinder, when he will save.] Syr. "and none retards his command." Here a question of some interest arises, which, owing to the Aramaising character of our author's Hebrew, is hard to solve. It is quite clear that the words פקדן, "command," and פרקן, "salvation," have been confused, but it is not clear whether that confusion took place in the Hebrew of the Siracide, or in the Syriac of the translator. "His command" seems to us a more natural word in this verse than "his salvation;" on the other hand, we have some hesitation in crediting the Siracide with so decided an Aramaism as the first hypothesis requires.

20. The Syriac has a different verse: see also on v. 16.

22. covered the dry land.] "The dry land" occurs in the second clause in the Greek. Lat. inundavit; Syr. "riseth;" perhaps we should read ἐπέκλυσεν for ἐπεκάλυψεν.

23. As he hath turned the waters into saltness: so, &c.] Probably Bretschn. and others are right in referring "so" to the previous verse, with the meaning "similarly," "on the contrary," or "as powerfully." The Syriac has: "so doth his wrath judge the nations." Clearly the author meant "his wrath" to be the subject of the sentence, in antithesis to his blessing, which is the subject of the previous verse. The Hebrew then was probably כן רגזו יוריש גוים, "so doth his wrath drive out (exterminate) nations;" and "his wrath" will also be the subject of the second clause, which perhaps contains a reference to the Cities of the Plain. Cp. Ps. cvii. 33.

24. A favourite sentiment with our author.

25. so evil things for sinners.] Lat. "good and evil;" Syr. "for sinners also whether for good or evil." The agreement of these two versions might seem a strong argument in favour of this having been the original text. But the Greek rendering suits the context far better, and the Syr. and Latin reading may only represent a later Christian emendation.

26. The place of iron in this list is certainly remarkable. The Syriac list adds "fat" and "raiment."

28. The question whether these "spirits" are angels or winds is discussed by Fritzsche, who decides for the latter; yet vv. 29, 30 seem to contain a list of these "spirits." Unless, therefore, it is a poetical phrase for "forces," we must regard it as embodying the same idea as in later Rabbinism, which personified as Angels certain natural phenomena and eventualities.

lay on sore strokes.] Syr. "uproot mountains." The expression עקר הרים was in common Rabbinic usage to denote the accomplishment of the seemingly impossible or incredible (see the passages in 'The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah,' vol. ii. pp. 109, 376, notes).

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

and death, all these were created for vengeance;

30 [o] Teeth of wild beasts, and scorpions, [p] ‖ serpents, and the sword, punishing the wicked to destruction.

31 [q] They shall rejoice in his commandment, and they shall be ready upon earth, when need is; and when their time is come, they shall not transgress his word.

32 Therefore from the beginning I was resolved, and thought upon these things, and have left them in writing.

33 [r] All the works of the Lord are good: and he will give every needful thing in due season.

B. C. cir. 200.

34 So that a man cannot say, This is worse than that: for in time they shall all be well approved.

35 And therefore praise ye the Lord with the whole heart and mouth, and bless the name of the Lord.

o Deut. 32. 24.
p Wisd. 16. 5.
‖ Or, vipers.
q Job 38. 35. Ps. 148. 8.
r Gen. 1. 31. ver. 16.

CHAPTER XL.

1 Many miseries in a man's life. 12 The reward of unrighteousness, and the fruit of true dealing. 17 A virtuous wife and an honest friend rejoice the heart, but the fear of the Lord is above all. 28 A beggar's life is hateful.

29. famine and death.] Syr. "and deadly stones." Here a somewhat similar difficulty occurs to that noticed at v. 18; for clearly we have a confusion between כַּפִּין, "stones," and כָּפָן, "hunger," and the confusion may have been either in the Hebrew or the Syriac. Fewest difficulties will be offered by the supposition that the Greek translation is correct.

30. Teeth of wild beasts.] Syr. "beasts of teeth," i.e. wild beasts, a very common Syriac phrase; and this the order of the Greek words makes it probable that the Siracide himself employed.

32. Therefore from the beginning I was resolved.] "Against temptations which might shake his faith in God's providence" (Grotius). In that case, for "I thought" we should probably substitute "I perceived" the true state of the case. The verse makes the author cite his words above (16, 17), which the intervening verses have proved. The Syrian, not seeing this reference, has a rendering which is very plainly wrong.

33. he will give.] Rather, supply or "furnish."

34. in time they shall all be well approved.] On the occasion for which they were created. The Syriac adds, "for they are all stored up in his treasuries."

CHAPTER XL.

The connexion of this with the preceding chapter is both external and internal. As regards the former, the mention of the evils which afflict us in the world leads to the discussion of human sorrow and of its causes. This forms the first part of the chapter, ending with v. 17; while in the second part, by way of contrast, the happiness that is in the world is described, and its real source indicated as in the fear of the Lord. The internal connexion with the previous chapter lies in this, that here the object is once more to shew that the good as well as the evil that befals men is from the Lord, and thus again to vindicate the ways of God.

The discussion is introduced by a prefatory verse, of which the burden is that somehow sorrow seems the lot of all men. Some of these sorrows are caused by the conditions of our existence, by the evil that comes to us through care, or lastly by our own needless or foolish apprehensions. This is the theme of the first stanza of six verses (vv. 2–7). But if this be the common lot of humanity, it falls sevenfold on the wicked, and theirs are also real evils—and these come to them from God in punishment of their sins. This is the subject of the second stanza (comprising four verses: vv. 8–11). A more detailed exposition of this follows in the third stanza (vv. 12–17). The first and the last verse in it are antithetic, and may be regarded as introductory and concluding, while the intermediate four verses form two couplets: the first (vv. 13, 14) shewing what becomes of their ill-gotten goods, the second what becomes of their children (vv. 15, 16); these two—property and children—being the chief objects of desire. And the stanza appropriately closes with the antithesis of v. 17.

With v. 18 begins the second part of the chapter. If there be sorrow in the world—and real sorrow is the consequence of sin—there is also much real good and joy, and the truest and best is the result of fear of the Lord. This is beautifully set forth in a stanza of ten verses (vv. 18–27), in eight of which the second clause always forms a counter-climax to the first, while the ninth verse leads up to the final conclusion, fully expressed in the concluding verse (v. 27), which sets forth the blessedness resulting from fear of the Lord.

The concluding stanza of three verses

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

GREAT [a] travail is created for every man, and an heavy yoke is upon the sons of Adam, from the day that they go out of their mother's womb, till the day that they return to the mother of all things.

[a] Gen. 3. 19. Eccles. 1. 3.

2 Their imagination of things to come, and the day of death, [trouble] their thoughts, and [cause] fear of heart;

3 From him that sitteth on a throne of glory, unto him that is humbled in earth and ashes;

4 From him that weareth purple and a crown, ‖ unto him that is clothed with a linen frock.

‖ Or, to the porter.

5 Wrath, and envy, trouble, and unquietness, fear of death, and anger, and strife, and in the time of rest upon his bed his night sleep, do change his knowledge.

B. C. cir. 200.

6 A little or nothing is his rest, and afterward he is in his sleep, as in a day of keeping watch, troubled in the vision of his heart, as if he were escaped out of a battle.

7 When all is safe, he awaketh, and marvelleth that the fear was nothing.

8 [Such things happen] unto all flesh, both man and beast, and that is sevenfold more upon sinners.

(vv. 28–30) is somewhat loosely connected with the subject-matter of the chapter, being apparently a practical application in the nature of advice how to avoid an unhappy life by industry, frugality, and piety.

1. till the day that they return.] The Greek of the best MSS. here is difficult, and indeed unconstruable. Even if we render "till the day of their being buried into the mother of all things" (Lat., Aeth.), we obtain an unnatural expression. We should expect the word אסף or הֶאָסֵף, "their being gathered in," and some word meaning this we believe the Greek to have had originally; e.g. ἐπιστροφῆς of MS. 157 (rendered in the A. V.). The Syriac Version has: "and so long as they grasp the land of the living."

2. Their imagination, &c.] The text starts with a remarkable accusative, which the Lat., S. H., and Arm. versions, beneficio linguarum, faithfully represent. To Bretschn. is due the suggestion that the original had את, "with," which the translator mistook for the sign of the accusative. However, the Syriac translation makes the words contained in this verse the subject of which the substantives in v. 5 are the predicate, verses 3 and 4 forming a parenthesis, which construction seems obviously right. The translation should be emended as below.

their thoughts.] Syr. "their glory."

and the fear of their heart.] Syr. "and the occupation of their heart."

the imagination of expectation.] Syr. "and the end of their words."

the day of death.] Syr. "till the day of their death."

4. a linen frock.] Syr. "the garment of poverty."

5. According to the punctuation as altered in agreement with the Syr. (see v. 2), a stop should be placed at "strife," and "do" altered to "doth." The objects of his thought enumerated are seven: perhaps the last two seem to be nearly the same as the first; the first is rather passion, the sixth rankling hatred (Lat. furor and iracundia perseverans; similarly Arm.).

change his knowledge.] Alter his state of mind.

6. as in a day of keeping watch.] Rather, of watch, or of watching. Just as the watcher, says Fritzsche, is alarmed by everything which he sees, so is the dreamer. But "a day of watching" seems a very unintelligible expression. It is unfortunate that the Syriac deserts us here. The Armenian Version gives two very satisfactory emendations, ἐννυπνίοις and κοπιᾷ, and after that he toils with dreams as in the day. The period during which he really rests is short, scarcely lasting a moment; during the rest of the time he is as hard at work as in the daytime. Had the Armenian translator been less faithful, it would not have been so easy for us to see what he read.

the vision of his heart.] Syr. "of the night," the more ordinary expression.

7. When all is safe, he awaketh.] So Grotius. Bretschneider renders: "at the moment when he is rescued from this troubled dream." Fritzsche, "at the moment of his supposed rescue;" i.e. at the critical moment in the vision, when he fancies himself out of reach, he wakes up. The expression, however, is sufficiently strange to indicate either corruption or mistranslation. The Syr. renders: "according to the desire in his heart." It is not easy to suggest any words which would have given rise to both interpretations. Perhaps the verse began with words signi-

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

9 [b] Death, and bloodshed, strife, and sword, calamities, famine, tribulation, and the scourge;

10 These things are created for the wicked, and for their sakes came the [c] flood.

11 [d] All things that are of the earth shall turn to the earth again: and that which is of the [e] waters doth return into the sea.

12 All [‖] bribery and injustice shall be blotted out: but true dealing shall endure for ever.

13 The goods of the unjust shall be dried up like a river, and shall vanish with noise, like a great thunder in rain.

14 While he openeth his hand he shall rejoice: so shall transgressors come to nought.

15 The children of the ungodly shall not bring forth many branches: but are as unclean roots upon a hard rock.

16 [f] The weed growing upon every water and [g] bank of a river shall be pulled up before all grass.

17 Bountifulness is as [‖] a most fruitful garden, and mercifulness endureth for ever.

18 To labour, and [h] to be content with that a man hath, is a sweet life: but he that findeth a treasure is above them both.

[b] ch. 39. 25, 29, 30.

[c] Gen. 6. 13. & 7. 11.

[d] Gen. 3. 19. ch. 41. 10.

[e] Eccles. 1. 7.

‖ Gr. bribes.

[f] Job 8. 11. & 18. 16.

[g] Gen. 41. 3.

‖ Or, a garden that is blessed: as ver. 27.

[h] Phil. 4. 11. 1 Tim. 6. 6.

fying "he wakes up with . . . and a cry" (וישועה, misread by Greek ישועה"). The phrase καιρῷ σωτηρίας occurred in iv. 22.

8. [Such things].] As those about to be described.

[happen] unto all flesh.] Rather, are with all flesh. The verse would seem to have been corrupted at an early period. The Syriac omits ver. 9, 10.

9. Fritzsche would omit as a gloss the word "tribulation(s)," partly with the view of gaining a group of seven, partly because the word is too general, as he thinks, to occur in the middle of such a list. The same difficulties may have been felt by those copyists who put all the words following ἐπαγωγαί in the genitive, and make them depend on it; compare also Schleussner s. v. In rhetorical enumerations of this sort, however, we must not be too critical.

11. that which is of the waters doth return into the sea.] Syr. "that which is from the height to the height," reading מָרוֹם for מַיִם. Between these variants there cannot be any difficulty in choosing. For the sentiment of the Greek not only occurs in Eccles. i. 7, but forms a very appropriate conclusion of the stanza (see introd. remarks); while that of the Syriac would scarcely be biblical.

12. All bribery and injustice.] Syr. "every sinner and ungodly man," perhaps paraphrasing. For the general reasoning see the introductory remarks.

13. shall be dried up like a river.] Like an אכזב or stream which fails in the summer.

and shall vanish with noise.] Rather, shall roar themselves out, i.e. exhaust their power, like the thunder in summer; a remarkable comparison. Fritzsche thinks of the noise of the thunder being overpowered by that of the rain.

14. While he openeth his hand he shall rejoice.] Rather, In the opening of his hands one shall rejoice (Bissell)—probably in the sense of: when such an one is made to restore his ill-gotten gains, or is emptied of his riches, there is general joy.

15. The children of the ungodly shall not bring forth, &c.] They will therefore be unable to fully enjoy their possessions.

but are as.] Lit. "and" (i.e. nor). Syriac: "the root of sinners is like an ear which springs up on a rocky crag;" which, because it hath no depth of earth, must soon wither away. It seems as if the Syrian were thinking of the familiar parable in St. Matt. xiii.

16. The weed.] The Hebrew אחו is transliterated as in other places of the LXX. It seems to us that v. 14 b should be transferred hither. Cp. Job viii. 11, 12.

17. is as a most fruitful garden.] Lit. a garden in blessings. The Syriac has: "the works of the just shall be blest in time." It is difficult to tell whether the Hebrew כְּעֵדֶן, "like Eden," was mistaken for בְּעֵדֶן, or whether the error is no older than the Syriac Version itself.

18. Here begins the second part of this chapter (see introductory remarks). The Syriac Version adds at the end of v. 17, "and he that approacheth unto them is like one that findeth a treasure;" while for this verse it gives "majesty and honour establish the name; yet better than both is he that findeth wisdom." The first of these clauses seems identical with the second in the Greek, with a

Digitized by Microsoft ®

B. C. cir. 200.

19 Children and the building of a city continue a man's name: but a blameless wife is counted above them both.

20 Wine and musick rejoice the heart: but the love of wisdom is above them both.

21 The pipe and the psaltery make sweet melody: but a pleasant tongue is above them both.

22 Thine eye desireth favour and beauty: but more than both corn while it is green.

23 A friend and companion never meet amiss: but above both is a wife with her husband.

24 Brethren and help are against time of trouble: but alms shall deliver more than them both. B. C. cir. 200.

25 Gold and silver make the foot stand sure: but counsel is esteemed above them both.

26 Riches and strength lift up the heart: but the fear of the Lord is above them both: there is no want in the fear of the Lord, and it needeth not to seek help.

27 The fear of the Lord is [i]‖a fruitful garden, and [k] covereth him above all glory.

28 My son, lead not a beggar's life; for better it is to die than to beg.

[i] ver. 17.
‖ Or, a garden that is blessed.
[k] Isai. 4. 5.

slight corruption of מישניהם to some derivative of נגש; while the remaining two bear most of the traces of interpolation. The Latin Version substitutes in ea for ὑπὲρ ἀμφότερα.

19. Children and the building of a city.] Syr. "building and planting." The word בנין might be pointed so as to mean either "building" or "children." The second word "building" represents more than once in the LXX. the Hebrew בנות, which might also mean "daughters." A comparison with the Syriac shews us that πόλεως is a gloss. The true text may therefore have been, "Sons and daughters continue a man's name; but nevertheless a blameless wife surpasses them." We suppose the Aramaising form suggested to have given rise to the error of the translators. The S. H. Version has here a marginal note to prevent the misunderstanding in the case of the first word.

20. Wine and musick.] Syr. "old wine."

the love of wisdom.] If this be correct, the words must represent the Greek φιλοσοφία, and correspond with similar makeshift renderings of that word in Syriac and other languages. For that which rejoices the heart must be something acting on it objectively, not subjectively, corresponding therefore with "philosophy," but not with the "love of wisdom." Syr. "the love of a friend."

22. favour.] Old English for "grace." Cp. "young though thou art, thine eye hath staid upon some favour that it loves" (Shakespeare, 'Twelfth Night,' ii. 4).

corn while it is green.] Lit. the green of the sown-land. Compare M. Aurelius, x. 35: "The healthy eye must not say τὰ χλωρὰ θέλω, I want only green;" Viridia enim oculis grata sunt visumque reficiunt (Gataker). Among the "ingenious sayings" of Mohammad (Freytag, 'Proverbia Arabum,' iii. 1, 608) is this: "Aspectus rerum viridium videndi facultatem auget."

23. never meet amiss.] It might be suggested from a comparison with the Syriac that the Hebrew was here מְבָרְכִים, meaning "greet" rather than "meet." "Greetings" or good wishes from friends come never amiss; and yet more timely are those paid by a wife to her husband (את אישה; את being falsely interpreted as "with." This, in accordance with a later Rabbinic exegetical rule. Comp. Jer. Ber. 14 b, Ber. R. 1, and other passages). The Arm. and Aeth. agree with Syr. in substituting "a good wife" for the last words.

24. Brethren and help are against time of trouble.] The Heb. עזר, probably employed in the original, should have been pointed (with Syr.) עֵזֶר and rendered "ally:" "A brother and an ally [save] in time of trouble." The sentiment of the verse is common in our author and elsewhere (e.g. Prov. xvii. 17).

25. make the foot stand sure.] Cp. Ps. xxxi. 9.

counsel.] Sagacity.

26. it needeth not.] Rather, one needeth not in it: i.e. armed with it, a man requires no other help.

27. a fruitful garden.] See v. 17. The Syriac renders similarly in both places.

and covereth him above all glory.] The authorities vary between the sing. and plur. for "covereth." Fritzsche decides for the singular, on the ground that the subject must be "God," who covers his fear [with glory] more than all greatness. The original must have been difficult, for the Syrian hesitates between "is raised" and "is praised."

28–30. Begging. Cp. xxix. 21 sqq.

28. lead not a beggar's life.] The Syriac

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

29 The life of him that dependeth on another man's table is not to be counted for a life; for he polluteth himself with other men's meat: but a wise man well nurtured will beware thereof.

30 Begging is sweet in the mouth of the shameless: but in his belly there shall burn a fire.

CHAPTER XLI.

B. C. cir. 200.

1 The remembrance of death. 3 Death is not to be feared. 5 The ungodly shall be accursed. 11 Of an evil and a good name. 14 Wisdom is to be uttered. 16 Of what things we should be ashamed.

O DEATH, how bitter is the remembrance of thee to a man that liveth at rest in his possessions, unto the man that hath nothing to entirely perverts this very simple sentiment: "refuse not him that asketh thee; be not good to kill, but be good to preserve alive."

29. that dependeth.] Lit. that looketh to. The phrase corresponds with the Rabbinical המצפה לשלחן חברו; "Three lives are no lives: he that looketh to the table of another," &c. (Bets. 32 b; Abh. de R. N. 25).

for he polluteth himself.] Rather, who polluteth himself. Fritzsche takes this literally, on the ground that the meat given him might very well be unclean; we prefer to take it figuratively.

but a wise man well nurtured.] I.e. well educated.

30. Fritzsche would understand this of the contrast between his sweet manner and his internal feeling of degradation. The "begging" is more frequently interpreted of the morsel which he receives, while Grotius makes the "fire" that of hunger. The author is apparently thinking of Job xx. 12.

CHAPTER XLI.

The chapter consists of two parts (the first ending with v. 13), which are connected by succession in thinking rather than by a logical nexus. The first part of the chapter, however, is closely bound to the argument in the previous chapter. There the writer had treated of the evils that afflict man, among which "fear of death" was the most real and common to all (xl. 1–5). Besides, this was an evil the source of which must be traced to the Creator Himself. But in the first part of ch. xli. the writer endeavours to prove even in this respect his previous thesis by shewing in the first stanza (vv. 1–4) that death is not such an evil as men represent or imagine it; and, in the second stanza (vv. 5–13), that it only becomes a real evil to the ungodly (comp. also xl. 8). Throughout we notice in the treatment of this subject a melancholy absence of the hope of another and better life. In the first stanza consolations are offered derived from the welcome release which death brings under certain circumstances, and from its general incidence, so that after all it was ultimately of little consequence how many years a man might have to live, while, on the other hand, it was right to submit to the will of God. Such being the case, the second stanza (vv. 5–13) shews that death had real terrors for the sinner. The three things upon which a man set value and which would remain, as reward or otherwise, after his death, are described in an ascending climax as property, children, reputation. In all these three would the sinner suffer after his decease. Of these three the most precious and most enduring was a good name, after which we should chiefly strive.

This latter statement naturally leads in the second part to an enumeration of the things which were shameful, and should therefore be avoided. The three introductory verses (vv. 14–16) bear particular reference to this, that to be proud or else ashamed of a thing it must appear outwardly and publicly: in other words, that the reputation of which we are to have such care depends upon this. Nineteen things are then enumerated of which we should be ashamed. These apply to the various circumstances of life, and they are arranged in a certain order and connexion. We mark that, in accordance with the purpose of the writer, only such offences are mentioned as may permanently injure a man's reputation. Some difficulty may be felt as regards the offence mentioned in v. 19 c. We have little doubt that (as Fritzsche suggests) the expression was proverbial. Nor can we doubt that it referred to an unwillingness to give to the poor from the abundance of one's table (comp. St. Luke xvi. 20, 21). And here, indeed, we have a parallel Rabbinic saying (Sanh. 92 a): "He that does not leave a piece of bread (פת) upon his table shall never see a sign of blessing" (סימן ברכה = no good shall ever come to him). [In Jer. Teram. 45 d it is interdicted to put bread under one's arm. Levy ('Neuhebr. Wörterb.' iv. 154 a) regards this as directed against superstition, but the context shews that it was forbidden because perspiration, except from the face, was regarded as poisonous.]

1. Drusius compares Seneca's words: "O vita misero longa, felici brevis."

the remembrance of thee.] Probably the original had "art thou" (cf. Syr.).

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

vex him, and that hath prosperity in all things: yea, unto him that is yet able to receive meat!

2 O death, acceptable is thy sentence unto the needy, and unto him whose strength faileth, that is now in the last age, and ‖ is vexed with all things, and to him that despaireth, and hath lost patience!

‖ Or, to whom every thing is troublesome.

3 Fear not the sentence of death, remember them that have been before thee, and that come after; for this is the sentence of the Lord over all flesh.

4 And why art thou against the pleasure of the most High? there is no inquisition in the grave, whether thou have lived ten, or an hundred, or a thousand years.

B. C. cir. 200.

5 The children of sinners are abominable children, and they that are conversant in the dwelling of the ungodly.

6 The inheritance of sinners' children shall perish, and their posterity shall have a perpetual reproach.

7 The children will complain of an ungodly father, because they shall be reproached for his sake.

8 Woe be unto you, ungodly men, which have forsaken the law of the most high God! for if ye increase, it shall be to your destruction:

9 And if ye be born, ye shall be liveth at rest in his possessions.] Compare Dan. iv. 4, with which the expression in the text may agree.

that hath nothing to vex him.] The word in the text is condemned by the Atticists as late Greek. Perhaps it represents שאנן (Job xii. 5).

to receive meat.] Compare the opening verses of Eccles. xii. The words perhaps meant rather to "enjoy the taste (of food);" the Heb. טעם being interpreted by the Greek after the Arab. طعام.

2. thy sentence.] Also apparently a paraphrase for "thou." MS. 155 further adds "and thy remembrance."

that is now in the last age.] Fritzsche's proposed alteration of ἐσχατογήρῳ to ἐσχατόγηρῳ would introduce an impossible accentuation; see Kühner, 'Ausf. Gr.' i. 249, 2nd edit.

is vexed with all things.] There is no reason for preferring the marginal variant.

that despaireth.] Rather, is disbelieving, אין אמון. Syr. (Lag.), "without money," perhaps אין מכון.

3. Fear not the sentence of death.] In the sense that it is the law and common lot of humanity. Grotius compares a fragment of Aristophanes, τὸ γὰρ φοβεῖσθαι τὸν θάνατον λῆρος πολύς· πᾶσιν γὰρ ἡμῖν τοῦτ' ὀφείλεται παθεῖν. The Syr. makes it probable that "the sentence of" is an insertion by the Greek translator.

remember them that have been before thee, and that come after.] Comp. Eccles. i. 10, לראשנים וגם לאחרנים. "Remember that they are in the same case with thee" (Syr.).

4. And why art thou against.] Lit. why dost thou decline? Evidently this clause belongs to the preceding verse.

there is no inquisition in the grave.] That question is not asked there; it makes no difference, as regards our condition when we are dead, whether our life has been short or long.

5. and they that are conversant in the dwelling of the ungodly.] "The reason why they are abominable" (Fritzsche). But this explanation does not seem satisfactory. Syr. "and a race of misery (lit. woe to it!) is the generation of the wicked." Compare Aeth. "and their houses shall be overturned." Ἀναστρέφομαι is employed in Ezek. iii. 15 to represent מושבים. It might be suggested that the original had here ומושֻׁמֵם מושב רישעים, "and the dwelling-place of the wicked is loathsome."

6. inheritance.] Syr. "sovereignty;" Heb. (perhaps) רישת, which might be pointed so as to mean either רֵישֶׁת or רִשׁוּת. The latter would indeed be a Chaldaism, but not out of place in our author; while the former could scarcely be used in this way. We believe, therefore, that the Syr. version is here correct.

7. will complain of.] I.e. will have cause to do so. Syr. "shall curse;" if this be right, the Hebrew probably contained a jingle יקללו and יקלו.

8. which have forsaken the law of the most high God.] Syr. "to whom misery clings till the day of their death."

for if ye increase, it shall be to your destruction.] This clause must be omitted, as only found in 248, Co., and probably a correction or interpretation of the next clause, "and if ye be born."

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

born to a curse: and if ye die, a curse shall be your portion.

[a] ch. 40. 11.

10 [a] All that are of the earth shall turn to earth again: so the ungodly shall go from a curse to destruction.

11 The mourning of men is about their bodies: but an ill name of sinners shall be blotted out.

12 Have regard to thy name; for [b] that shall continue with thee above a thousand great treasures of gold.

[b] Prov. 22. 1.

13 A good life hath but few days: but a good name endureth for ever.

14 My children, keep discipline in peace: for [c] wisdom that is hid, and a treasure that is not seen, what profit is in them both?

[c] ch. 20. 30.

[d] ch. 20. 31.

15 [d] A man that hideth his foolishness is better than a man that hideth his wisdom.

B. C. cir. 200.

16 Therefore be shamefaced according to my word: for it is not good to retain all shamefacedness; neither is it altogether approved in every thing.

17 Be ashamed of whoredom before father and mother: and of a lie before a prince and a mighty man;

18 Of an offence before a judge and ruler; of iniquity before a congregation and people; of unjust dealing before thy partner and friend;

19 And of theft in regard of the place where thou sojournest, and in regard of the truth of God and his

9. Your birth and death will both be misfortunes.

a curse shall be your portion.] תֵּחָלְקוּ.

10. The first clause occurred above (xl. 11); and as the Syriac omits it, there is grave reason for doubting its genuineness here. See below.

so the ungodly shall go from a curse to destruction.] In the event of the first clause being genuine, the application will be found in the sequence from that with which they began to that in which they end.

11. The mourning of men is about their bodies.] I.e. the main object of sorrow with most men is that their bodies die, but there is a worse fate than this, which does not excite their apprehension—the loss of their name. In the case of the sinner that name will perish.

but an ill name of sinners shall be blotted out.] The second hand of S has here ὄνομα δὲ ἀγαθὸν οὐκ ἐξαλειφθήσεται, "but a good name shall not be blotted out." This is supported by the Arm. Very similar is the reading of the Syr. "and the name of them that do good," and of the Copt. "and the name of good men." This last, ἀνθρώπων ἀγαθῶν, is the reading of MSS. 155, 308; ἁμαρτωλῶν (which appears exclusively in Aeth. and Lat.) is perhaps a false interpretation of ανων. From the agreement of the Syr. and the Greek, it seems probable that "the name of good men" was clearly expressed in the original.

12. above.] Rather, longer than. From Prov. xxii. 1. The Midrash on that passage substitutes "a thousand Dinārs of gold" for the "silver and gold" of the text.

Verses 13–xlii. 8 are omitted by the Syriac, which substitutes for them a short and curious sentiment. Some of the verses before us look like centos or quotations from previous chapters in the book.

13. A good life hath but few days.] Lit. a number of days, to which the Arm. boldly adds "hath not."

14. in peace.] Proleptically, "and enjoy peace therefrom."

The second half of this verse occurred word for word in xx. 30, while v. 15 occurred in xx. 31.

16. Therefore be shamefaced according to my word.] So Fritzsche and others; it may, however, mean only "be heedful of my word."

it is not good to retain all shamefacedness.] Rather, to observe.

neither is it altogether approved in every thing.] This implies the reading οὐ παντάπασιν ἐν παντὶ (for ἐν πίστει), recorded by Hoeschel, and supported by the Copt.; and this we believe to be correct. The best Greek MSS., however, offer οὐ πάντα πᾶσιν ἐν πίστει, a difficult expression variously interpreted ("nor is everything appreciated truly by all," Fritzsche). The Arm. renders "nor at all to please every one by faith." A more intelligible explanation would be "nor is the rule 'everything to every one in confidence' approved."

17. The list of cases of shame now given amounts rather to an enumeration of the persons on whom one should reflect when tempted to commit any crime, being those whom the crime most deeply hurts.

before father and mother.] "And mother" is omitted by the Arm., perhaps accidentally.

19. of theft in regard of the place where

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

covenant; and to lean with thine elbow upon the meat; and of scorning to give and take;

20 And of silence before them that salute thee; and to look upon an harlot;

21 And to turn away thy face from thy kinsman; or to take away
e Matt. 5. 28. a portion or a gift; or e to gaze upon another man's wife;

22 Or to be overbusy with his maid, and come not near her bed; or of upbraiding speeches before friends; and f after thou hast given, upbraid not;

B. C. cir. 200.

23 Or of g iterating and speaking f ch. 20. 15. again that which thou hast heard; g ch. 19. 7. and of revealing of secrets.

24 So shalt thou be truly shamefaced, and find favour before all men.

CHAPTER XLII.

1 Whereof we should not be ashamed. 9 Be careful of thy daughter. 12 Beware of a woman. 15 The works and greatness of God.

thou sojournest, and in regard of the truth of God and his covenant.] It seems evident that a word has here dropped out, since the rhythm of the sentence is otherwise lost. Various attempts have been made to correct the sentence, among which we may mention Bretschneider's supplement "of disbelief," and Fritzsche's conjecture that "of the truth" was a translation of a false reading for "of the curse." Strangely, the true reading is here supplied by the Armenian Version, which gives "of lying in regard of the truth of God and His covenant," omitting the words "of a lie before a prince and a mighty man" in the second clause of v. 17. We believe that the Armenian translator cannot be conjecturing, but must have found this reading in his text. Besides settling the difficulty to which we have referred, it is recommended as doing away with the tautology of κριτοῦ καὶ ἄρχοντος following upon ἡγουμένοι καὶ δυνάσται. For any difference between them would be difficult to substantiate. Lastly, this reading arranges the crimes in a natural order, ranging from the most deadly to the lightest. The history of the interpolation of v. 17 in the Greek would be an important contribution to our knowledge of the vicissitudes through which the text of this book has passed.

and to lean with thine elbow upon the meat.] Lit. to fix the elbow: according to the commentators, holding it tight, allowing no one else to obtain a portion of it. (See the introd. to the chapter.) The Arm. adds ἀλλοτρίους, "the bread of others;" and the Aeth. has "to approach to eat the strangers' bread."

of scorning to give and take.] Rather, of railing over giving and taking. Another reading is σκορπισμοῦ, "scattering," which the marginal annotator of S. H. explains of adulteration. "From robbing the goods of thy neighbour entrusted to thee" (Aeth.). "Taking and giving," מישא ומתן, is a common Rabbinical expression for "commerce."

20. of silence before them that salute thee.] The Syriac, which, as we have noticed, omits the whole of the preceding passage, dwells on this point at some length.

21. to turn away thy face from.] Rather, the face of. Heb. השיב פנים (1 Kings ii. 16, &c.), the opposite of ὅρασις of the last verse.

take away a portion or a gift.] Rightly referred by Fritzsche to the distribution of goods between kinsmen. For the last word, מַתָּן, it seems probable that מָנָת, "a share," should have been read; the corruption perhaps occurs elsewhere in this book.

22. overbusy.] These "maids" in the Greek romances and elsewhere are the ordinary go-betweens. The readings, however, vary.

23, 24. These verses are attached to the following chapter in the Greek editions.

23. of iterating and speaking again that which thou hast heard.] This is apparently the only way in which the T. R. can be translated; we should, however, read with S, ἀπὸ δευτερώσεως λόγου ἀκοῆς, of repeating a word which thou hast heard. The caution is against circulating idle rumours.

24. Cp. xxxii. 10.

CHAPTER XLII.

Having in the previous chapter indicated what a man should be ashamed to do, the writer marks in the first stanza of this chapter (after an introductory verse) the things of which a man ought not, and needs not, to be ashamed—bearing in mind that by the latter expression he means that they will not really affect his reputation. This is indicated in the last two clauses of v. 8, with which the stanza closes (vv. 1–8). For v. 8*c* (the wording of which should be compared with

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

OF these things be not thou ashamed, and [a] accept no person to sin thereby:

2 Of the law of the most High, and his covenant; and of judgment to justify the ungodly;

3 ‖ Of reckoning with thy partners and ‖ travellers; or ‖ of the gift of the heritage of friends;

4 Of exactness of balance and weights; or of getting much or little;

B. C. cir. 200.

[a] Lev. 19. 15. Deut. 1. 17. Prov. 24. 23. ch. 20. 22.

‖ Or, Of thy partners' speech.

‖ Or, companions.

‖ Or, of the giving.

xli. 24 a) seems to imply that there was a false feeling of shame, which might prevent a man from doing that which, if "truly instructed" and disciplined, he would not hesitate to do before all men. The difficulty, that vv. 6, 7 seem not to be formally included in the enumeration of things not to be ashamed of, is only apparent. The proposal to put v. 8 before vv. 6, 7—in which case they should be included in the next stanza (placed in connexion with v. 9)—is attractive, but not necessary. For, although there may be difference in form, vv. 6, 7 manifestly contain, like the other verses in the stanza, directions concerning things which a man need not be ashamed to do. And possibly they may not have been formally connected with what a man should not be "ashamed of," because in the nature of things they would take place in the privacy of home and not in view of the public. Lastly, it is evident that with v. 9 another train of thought begins,—no longer referring to a man's actions, but to his feelings.

The large number of directions needful in regard to domestic life naturally leads the writer to revert to what seems to have been a topic of frequent lucubration with him: that of daughters and women. This forms the subject of stanzas 2 and 3, each of three verses (vv. 9–11; vv. 12–14). On each of these points we might adduce Rabbinic parallels. Indeed, vv. 9, 10—although in a different, and as it seems to us more apt form—are quoted in the Talmud (perhaps from memory), as "written in the book of Ben Sira" (Sanh. 100 b). With this other Talmudic sayings may be compared—such as, "Happy he who has male children; woe to him that has female children" (Sanh. u. s.; Qidd. 82 b; Babha B. 16 b); "A boy comes into the world: his loaf comes in his hand—a girl, nothing at all with her" (Nidd. 31 b). Indeed, it was hagadically explained that the word נקבה for "maiden" meant נקייה באה, "she cometh empty" into the world (Nidd. u. s.). And as regards women generally, it is sufficient to refer to such sayings as "Women are of a light mind" (Shabb. 33 b; Qidd. 80 b); "Multiply not talk with a woman; they say, with one's own wife: how much more with the wife of one's neighbour? Hence the sages say, if a man multiplies talk with a woman he brings evil upon himself, he neglects study of the Law, and his end will be to inherit Gehinnom" (Ab. i. 5).

As regards the second part of our chapter (beginning with v. 15), it might seem as if it were not in any way connected with what had preceded. But if we regard ch. xxxix. 16–xlii. 14 as so much matter intercalated, then ch. xlii. 15 would resume and continue the main subject-matter from ch. xxxix. 15. In that case one stanza (the fifth in the chapter, vv. 15–20) would set forth the praises of God in Creation, Providence, and Revelation; while another (the sixth, vv. 21–25) would be more specially devoted to the subject of Creation. We note in the two concluding verses two Chokhmah sayings: the antithetic dualism in nature (similar to that formerly noticed in the moral world; cp. xxxiii. 14, 15), as well as the permanence of nature (xlii. 24); and secondly, the higher beneficial purpose of every thing in nature (v. 25).

1. accept no person to sin thereby.] Sin not therein out of false shame.

2. Of the law of the most High.] I.e. to observe its ordinances and commandments in any circumstances and before any persons.

and of judgment to justify the ungodly.] This clause has occasioned some difficulty. Baduellus thought "be not ashamed" might mean "be not moved by false shame." Grotius still more harshly supplies "obloqui sententiis eorum qui id agunt." Fritzsche would take the words literally, to justify the ungodly when he happens to be in the right; a very improbable sentiment. The MSS. and Versions give no help. We prefer adopting the emendation (of Luther?), τὸν εὐσεβῆ, "to justify the pious;" i.e. to give sentence in his favour, however unpopular such an action may be. Cp. Prov. xvii. 15. An interesting rendering (cited by Fritzsche) is "to punish the ungodly." Cicero tells us that ἐδικαιώθησαν was the euphemistic expression for "they have been executed," in Sicily.

3. Of reckoning with thy partners.] Versions and commentators are divided between this interpretation and "of talking with." The latter, although supported by Grotius ("quid impedit quominus quis aut sodales aut viae comites suavi sermone oblectet") and Fritzsche, seems too trifling for this place. "Reckoning with thy partners" might mean (as the Aeth. glosses) concerning the profits; but

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

5 And of merchants' ‖ indifferent selling; of much correction of children; and to make the side of an evil servant to bleed.

‖ Or, without profit.

6 Sure keeping is good, where an evil wife is; and shut up, where many hands are.

7 Deliver all things in number and weight; and put all in writing that thou ‖ givest out, or receivest in.

‖ Or, dealest for.

8 Be not ashamed to ‖ inform the unwise and foolish, and the extreme aged ‖ that contendeth with those that are young: thus shalt thou be truly learned, and approved of all men living.

‖ Or, rebuke.

B. C. cir. 200.

‖ Or, that is accused of fornication.

9 The father waketh for the daughter, when no man knoweth; and the care for her taketh away sleep: when she is young, lest she pass away the flower of her age; and being married, lest she should be hated:

10 In her virginity, lest she should be defiled and gotten with child in what is reckoning with travellers? Further, על דבר (if the original of περὶ λόγου) could scarcely mean more than "concerning the matter of." We therefore suggest that in the Heb. על דבר חבר וארח, the last word was corrupt for ואח, and that the original meant "concerning the matter of a relative and a brother," i.e. be not ashamed to own brotherhood and connexion.

or of the gift of the heritage of friends.] Ordinarily interpreted as if the original had ἑταίροις, i.e. of giving legacies to friends, in spite of the disapproval of the heirs. Perhaps the phrase is metaphorical, the "heritage of friends" meaning those privileges to which friends have a natural claim. A few MSS. and Arm. read "others" for "friends."

4. or of getting much or little.] I.e. of acquiring wealth, whether in large quantities for fear of envy, or in small for fear of being thought mean (Grot.).

5. of merchants' indifferent selling.] Rather, of the money gained by selling and merchants. But Fritzsche is evidently right in substituting for the last word "and merchandise," supposing סחר of the original to have been wrongly pointed.

to make the side, &c.] See xxxiii. 24.

6. The suggestion of Gaab that vv. 6, 7 should be placed after v. 8 seems recommended on syntactic grounds; but it is not necessary for the sense. (See introd.)

Sure keeping.] Lit. a seal. The seal is probably to protect the goods ("vilissima utensilium anulo clausa," Tacitus, 'Annals,' ii. 2), rather than the woman.

shut up.] Viz. the stores; Copt. strangely, "thy hand."

where many hands are.] Aeth. "comers." Rather, "servants." Compare the Latin fures for "slaves:" exilis domus est ubi non et multa supersunt et dominum fallunt et prosunt furibus.

7. Deliver all things.] Lit. whatever thou deliverest, i.e. to the members of the household, "[let it be]."

8. that contendeth with those that are young.] I.e. in those contests which are only suitable for youth. The marginal reading is found in three MSS., and also in the Arm., Aeth., Copt., and S. H. versions. Compare xxv. 2 and the variant there.

9. The Syriac Version recommences here. The following passage repeats some of the matter of chaps. xxv., xxvi. Some fragments of the original are preserved in the Talmud (Sanh. 100 b).

The father waketh for the daughter when no man knoweth.] Lit. a daughter is to her father a hidden sleeplessness. But ἀπόκρυφος might be taken with θυγάτηρ, "a hidden daughter," i.e. a maiden (Grotius). Syr. "a daughter is very precious to (or heavy) upon her father." Both these renderings are mistranslations of the Hebrew (בת לאביה מטמונת שוא). The Talmud quotes (with slight alterations) vv. 9 and 10 as from Ben Sira: "A daughter is a delusive treasure to her father [the Heb. words as just quoted]: from fear he cannot sleep. When she is little, perhaps she may be seduced (?); when she is grown up, perhaps she will go astray [we translate not literally]; when she is marriageable [the difference between this and the previous age being six months, according to Jer. Yebam. 3 a], perhaps she will not be married; when she is married, perhaps she will not have children; when she is old, perhaps she will practise magic" (Sanh. 100 b, and with only slight differences in the so-called 'Second Alphabet of Ben Sira').

lest she pass away the flower of her age.] Syr. "lest she be despised," in the sense of not attracting suitors. The meaning is: she may pass the best of her life without being married.

10. The antithesis would be improved by transposing clauses b and c.

Digitized by Microsoft®

her father's house; and having an husband, lest she should misbehave herself; and when she is married, lest she should be barren.

11 [b] Keep a sure watch over a shameless daughter, lest she make thee a laughingstock to thine enemies, and a byword in the city, and a reproach among the people, and make thee ashamed before the multitude.

12 Behold not every body's [c] beauty, and sit not in the midst of women.

13 For from garments cometh a moth, and [d] from women wickedness.

14 Better is the [1] churlishness of a man than a courteous woman, a woman, I say, which bringeth shame and reproach.

15 I will now remember the works of the Lord, and declare the things that I have seen: In the words of the Lord are his works.

16 The sun that giveth light looketh upon all things, and the work thereof is full of the glory of the Lord.

B. C. cir. 200.

[b] ch. 26. 10.

[c] ch. 25. 21.

B. C. cir. 200.

[d] Gen. 3. 6.

[1] Or, wickedness.

lest she should misbehave herself.] = תשטה, Syr. (Fritzsche).

11. Keep a sure watch over a shameless daughter.] = xxvi. 10. The Syr. omits "shameless," which may have been interpolated from the parallel.

a reproach among the people.] Lit. summoned by the people (Arm.). Syr. "in the assembly of the people," probably correctly, בקהל having been misread מקהל.

The Syr. adds, "from the place where she dwells let her not go forth; and let her not go about the houses."

12. Behold not every body's beauty.] Rather, look not upon any man in (= on account of?) beauty; but ἐν καλλονῇ may be a mistranslation of בְּחֶמְדָּה, "with desire." The Syr. "shew not every man what is in thy heart," probably represents the same original differently pointed.

and sit not.] Lit. sit not as counsellor. The original would appear to have had (cf. Syr.) אל תמתיק סוד, "take not sweet counsel," in imitation of Ps. iv. 15.

13. wickedness.] Rather, "the wickedness of a woman." So all MSS.; γυναικός is omitted by Ald., Arm., Aeth.: "of a man" is substituted by the Lat. The Syr. has: "for as a moth falls upon a garment, so doth jealousy upon a woman from the wickedness of her fellow," clearly endeavouring to explain a difficult text. It is possible that the Latin Version may have here preserved the truth: "from a woman proceeds the evil (or hurt) of her husband," אשה of the original being intended for אִישָׁהּ, but read by both Syr. and Greek as אִשָּׁה. The ancients believed in "spontaneous generation." The moth coming out of the garment is used by Menander (ed. Meineke, p. 198) as an illustration of the fact that "that which cometh out of the man defileth the man."

14. The misogyny of the author reaches its climax.

churlishness.] The marginal rendering is preferable. We have already seen reason for thinking that רע איש may have meant "a wicked man."

courteous.] Rather, who doeth good.

a woman which bringeth shame and reproach.] Although the Syriac fails us here, it seems nevertheless easy to detect a slight mistranslation. The context shews that some kind of argument à fortiori was intended; ἀγαθοποιός, מטיבה, of the first clause being opposed to מביאה in the second, the latter meaning "who doeth evil," as in Prov. xii. 4. The clause will then mean: and a woman who doeth evil is a disgrace.

15. and declare the things that I have seen.] A single experience not sufficing for all.

In the words of the Lord are his works.] I.e. by His word His works were created, as the Syr. and Aeth. gloss. The Syr. adds, "and all creatures do His pleasure;" the Copt. "and the praise of His judgments has come to pass (?)." It is not improbable that a clause may have been lost.

16. With v. 15 begins the second part of the chapter, on which see the remarks in the introduction.

The sun that giveth light looketh upon all things.] The Syr. divides the verbs between the two clauses: "like a sun that riseth over all, are the mercies of the Lord revealed upon all His works." It is, however, probable that the second clause was מָלְאוּ מַעֲשָׂיו חסדו, "His works are full of His mercy." The verse probably means that the whole range of objects on which the sun looks down are full of His glory, and is an explanation of the restriction "that I have seen" in v. 15.

and the work thereof is full of the glory of the Lord.] Rather, and His work is full of His glory.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

17 [c] The Lord hath not given power to the saints to declare all his marvellous works, which the Almighty Lord firmly settled, that whatsoever is might be established for his glory.

[c] ch. 43. 27.

18 He seeketh out the deep, and the heart, and considereth their crafty devices: for [a] the Lord knoweth all that may be known, and he beholdeth the signs of the world.

[a] Or, the Highest.

19 He declareth the things that are past, and for to come, and revealeth the steps of hidden things.

B. C. cir. 200.

20 [f] No thought escapeth him, neither any word is hidden from him.

[f] Job 42. 2. Isai. 29. 15.

21 He hath garnished the excellent works of his wisdom, and he is from everlasting to everlasting: unto him may nothing be added, neither can he be diminished, and he hath no need of any counsellor.

22 Oh how desirable are all his works! and that a man may see even to a spark.

17. hath not given power.] "Hoc praefatur ne putet a se expectandum ut res verbis aequet" (Grotius).

which the Almighty Lord firmly settled, that whatsoever is might be established for his glory.] The Syriac renders, "He has given courage to them that fear Him to stand before His glory." The verb represented by "firmly settled" and "given courage" would seem to have been הִגְבִּיר (Dan. ix. 27). The last clause is probably rightly rendered by the Syr. "to stand before His glory" (see Isa. vi.). So far beyond all description is that glory, that it cannot even be contemplated by the angels.

18. the deep and the heart.] The two most inscrutable things. Comp. ch. i. 3; Dan. ii. 22.

and considereth their crafty devices.] Probably תַּעֲלֻמוֹת (Job xi. 6), "secrets" (cf. Syr.), perhaps read with ר for ל by the Greek translator.

all that may be known.] "Every conscience," a few MSS., Copt., Aeth., Arm. Heb. כּוֹל of Eccles. x. 20.

and he beholdeth the signs of the world.] The expression might also be rendered "the sign of eternity." With the former interpretation it is explained of the portents of the world (De Wette, Aeth.); with the latter (Arm.) of the signs whence the future may be known (Fritzsche). Neither of these views is satisfactory. The Syr. (in v. 20) renders: "there are manifest before Him all that come into the world;" reading כל אוֹתה עוֹלָם for על אות העולם. We are inclined to believe that this emendation is correct.

19. He declareth.] Comp. Isa. xli. 22, &c. But it may be questioned whether the original should not have been pointed יֵדַע, "he knoweth," rather than יוֹדִיעַ.

and revealeth the steps of hidden things.] Perhaps "makes out the track," finds the clue to. The "hidden things" are not necessarily "the secrets of the Divine world-plan" (Fritzsche).

21. He hath garnished the excellent works of his wisdom.] See xvi. 27.

and he is from everlasting to everlasting.] The MSS. vary between "who is," "and while he is," "as he is." The first of these is supported by the versions, but cannot be right, since evidently the reference is to the uniformity and perpetuity of nature, not to the eternalness of God. Fritzsche therefore adopts ἕως for the Hebrew עוֹד, in which case the verse should have been rendered "and they are still." We believe that either the reading of S, ὡς ("he has ordered them as they are," i.e. in that arrangement in which they abide), must be adopted, or else καὶ ἔστι, "and they exist," must be read, ἕως being regarded as having been interpolated from v. 22, of which ὡς and ὅς were further corruptions.

unto him.] More probably unto them.

may nothing be.] Rather, has nothing been.

of any counsellor.] "Ad conservandam eam molem" (Grotius).

22. Oh how desirable are all his works!] מַה נֶּאֱוֹו.

and that a man may see even to a spark.] Both text and interpretation are uncertain. The reading rendered by the A. V. is that of C. S. and a few other MSS. The other reading, ὡς, gives practically no meaning. Baduellus explains the former as signifying that there is nothing, however small, not even a spark, which does not give evidence of the beauty of creation; since, adds Grotius, a spark produces light and heat, both of them "ad vitam et artes necessariae." Drusius suggests as an alternative, "yet all a man can see therefore is up to a spark," i.e. human knowledge of creation does not extend beyond a minimum. We can scarcely believe that

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

23 All these things live and remain for ever for all uses, and they are all obedient.

ch. 33. 5. 24 ᵍ All things are double one against another: and he hath made nothing imperfect.

25 One thing establisheth the good of another: and who shall be filled with beholding his glory?

B. C. cir. 200.

CHAPTER XLIII.

1 The works of God in heaven, and in earth, and in the sea, are exceeding glorious and wonderful. 29 Yet God himself in his power and wisdom is above all.

the original was rightly translated. A hint, however, of the true text is probably preserved in the alternative reading ὡς, introducing an exclamatory clause, parallel to the first; וכמה נצצים לראות, "and how sparkling (or "brilliant," Ezek. i. 7) are they to look upon." "Sparks" was a false punctuation of the second word; σπινθῆρες of MS. 106 is probably the true reading in the Greek.

23. Cp. xxxix. 17.

24. = xxxiii. 15.

imperfect.] Rather, failing. Heb. בטל (cp. Syr.), otiosus, in Rabbinic usage frequently in the sense of "idle," "void;" cp. Lat. vacuus.

25. One thing establisheth the good of another.] Syr. "this with this in pairs."

CHAPTER XLIII.

Before giving an outline of this chapter, we have to remark that we can only do so in regard to its present Greek form. In the Syr. the text ceases with v. 12 (indeed, the two previous verses also are wanting or defective). We will not offer any conjecture as to the reason of this remarkable omission. But we have no hesitation in expressing our belief that the present Greek text does not faithfully represent the Hebrew original, but has been modified in a Hellenistic sense by the younger Siracide. As a special instance of this we refer to the purely Hellenistic sentiment in v. 27 b, which is certainly a spurious addition.

In the Greek text the chapter continues the previous argument, and that in a manner and language which almost reaches the sublime. The theme is Creation: heaven, earth, and sea, as shewing forth the glory of their Maker. This, in five stanzas, to which a sixth is added in praise of the great Creator. Each of the first five stanzas refers to some department of God's works, and closes with a kind of eulogy (in stanza i. v. 5; in stanza ii. v. 10; in stanza iii. v. 12 b; in stanzas iv. and v., which are conjoined, v. 26). The last stanza (vi.) forms a great eulogy. In general we mark in the first five stanzas two divisions: things in heaven—the first three stanzas; and things on earth—stanzas iv. and v. A symbolism seems to attach to the number of the verses in each part. The first part consists of 5 + 5 + 2 verses—in all twelve (the symbolical number of Israel), and describes things in heaven. The second part consists of fourteen verses—ten (the number of the world) for earthly phenomena, and four verses for those in the sea, while the grand concluding eulogy (in stanza vi.) consists of seven verses, which is the covenant-number.

The first stanza, with its concluding eulogy, treats of the sun (vv. 1–5). The second stanza, with its eulogy (vv. 6–10), is devoted to moon and stars. Here we may note some remarkable Rabbinic parallels as set forth in Ber. R. (the Midrash on Gen.), par. vi. We mark especially the designation of the moon as "an indication of times"—the Jews calculating the year by the moon—and "the sign of feasts," the festal calendar being arranged according to the moon. Further, if, as we believe, the concluding words of v. 6 (σημεῖον αἰῶνος) should be translated "an everlasting sign" (not "sign of the world"), we have here another Rabbinic parallel, since calculation by the moon was regarded as a distinctive sign of and for Israel, whereas the sun served as the distinctive sign for the Gentile nations who calculated by it. Manifold and very curious is the application made of this notion in the Haggadah. Thus the obscurations of sun or moon were supposed to have each a special significance. Similarly, as the sun is in the sky only by day, but the moon by night and day, so the Gentiles had only part in this world, but Israel in this and the next; and again, as when the light of the sun sets that of the moon grows and spreads, so would it be in regard to the night of the Gentiles and the light of Israel. In fact, the constant renewal of the moon was an emblem of the constant renovation of Israel. Lastly, as regards the allusion in v. 8 to the attending "camps" of the stars (see note on that verse), we recall the Rabbinic legend, that because the moon had humbled herself to rule only by night God had appointed the stars to attend and accompany her, both when she rose and when she went down.

The third is a brief stanza about the rainbow (vv. 11, 12), and serves as transition from objects in heaven to phenomena affecting earth, which are referred to in stanza iv. (vv. 13–22), while the fifth and closely-allied stanza (vv. 23–26) is devoted to those pre-

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

THE pride of the height, the clear firmament, the beauty of heaven, with his glorious shew;

2 The sun when it appeareth, declaring at his rising a marvellous ‖ instrument, the work of the most High:

‖ Or, vessel.

3 At noon it parcheth the country, and who can abide the burning heat thereof?

4 A man blowing a furnace is in works of heat, but the sun burneth the mountains three times more; breathing out fiery vapours, and sending forth bright beams, it dimmeth the eyes.

B. C. cir. 200.

5 Great is the Lord that made it; and at his commandment ‖ it runneth hastily.

‖ Or, he stayeth his course.

6 [a] He made the moon also to serve in her season for a declaration of times, and a sign of the world.

[a] Gen. 1. 14, 16. Ps. 104. 19.

7 [b] From the moon is the sign of feasts, a light that decreaseth in her perfection.

[b] Exod. 12. 2.

sented by the sea. The concluding (sixth) stanza (ירד. 27–33) is, as already stated, a grand eulogy. As concluding the Chokhmah utterances, it appropriately closes with a reference to it (v. 33 b).

1. It would be difficult to improve on the Authorized Version here.

The pride of the height.] The three members of this verse are apparently to be regarded as co-ordinate, the whole sentence being either exclamatory, or explanatory of the "glory" of xlii. 25 b. Grotius and Fritzsche, however, make "the pride of the height" predicate and the rest of the verse subject. The Copt. renders: "the boast of the height of the purity of the firmament."

2. The sun when it appeareth, declaring at his rising.] Some object is wanted for "declaring," which Fritzsche re-translates מיספר. Grotius read ἐν ἐνδόξῳ for ἐν ἐξόδῳ, with Co., interpreting this, "telleth of the glorious one;" the Aeth. seems to have had some similar reading, which cannot be right. Perhaps the original for מספר had some derivative of ספר, meaning either "beautiful" or "shining," Arab. سفر and اسفر (used especially of the dawn to translate נגה by Jewish-Arabic commentators).

a marvellous instrument.] "A masterpiece."

3. At noon.] Lit. at the noon thereof, i.e. caused by it.

The second clause is from Ps. xix. 7.

4. A man blowing a furnace is in works of heat.] "Is" should be omitted. The sentence will then mean: A man blowing a furnace in works of heat [produces great heat]. But this sense is not satisfactory, for it is much more natural to compare the sun with the furnace than with the man who blows it. Syr. "more than the furnace which blows in the work of the smith;" and this, there is reason to believe, represents the original, except that "blows" should rather have been rendered "which is blown," "fanned" (מְנֻפָּח); and "the work of the smith" perhaps by "in the workshop (officina) of the smith." Καύματος for χαλκέως is probably due to καύματος in v. 3. Grotius wished to read ἐνεργὸς καύματος, "produces heat," which the Aeth. apparently translates.

breathing out fiery vapours.] Heb. perhaps יפיח, for which the Syr. would appear to have read פיחו, "his ashes."

5. and at his commandment it runneth hastily.] The other reading, "it stoppeth" (a few Greek MSS. and S. H.), is merely a transcriber's error.

6. He made the moon also to serve in her season.] The reading here translated is found only in 248, Co. The other MSS. read "and the moon in all things for her season," in which "in all things" has no obvious meaning. Syr.: "the moon, too, standeth for a time." From this it seems clear that Grabe rightly emended ἐν στάσει for ἐν πᾶσι, "the moon is at her station at her season," viz. at night (Grotius).

for a declaration of times.] The calendars of the ancient nations were lunar; compare the Greek phrase κατὰ σελήνην ἄγειν τὰς ἡμέρας. But the special reference here is to the Jewish calculation of time (see introd.).

and a sign of the world.] Compare xlii. 18. Rather, an everlasting sign. So also the Syr., S. H., Copt., Gutmann. This is the natural interpretation of the words. Fritzsche's explanation, "a sign of the future, whence the future may be known," cannot be adopted.

7. the sign of feasts.] E.g. the Passover.

a light that decreaseth in her perfection.] I.e. "after the full moon" (Fritzsche). The expression reminds us of Job xxvi. 10, עד תכלית אור עם חשך. We should expect a different phenomenon from that men-

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

8 The month is called after her name, increasing wonderfully in her changing, being an instrument of the armies above, shining in the firmament of heaven;

9 The beauty of heaven, the glory of the stars, an ornament giving light in the highest places of the Lord.

10 At the commandment of the Holy One they will stand in their order, and never faint in their watches.

Gen. 9. 3.

11 [c] Look upon the rainbow, and praise him that made it; very beautiful it is in the brightness thereof.

B. C. cir. 200.

12 It compasseth the heaven about with a glorious circle, and the [d] hands of the most High have bended it.

[d] Isai. 40. 12, &c.

13 By his commandment he maketh the snow to fall apace, and sendeth swiftly the lightnings of his judgment.

[e] Deut. 28. 12. Job 38. 22. Ps. 135. 7. Jer. 10. 13. & 51. 16.

14 Through this [e] the treasures are opened: and clouds fly forth as fowls.

tioned in 8 b to be described here; and indeed the particular phenomenon which gave the sign of the feast, viz. the moon being full. If this was represented by the Aramaic גמר, both the Greek and Syriac renderings could be easily accounted for.

8. The month is called after her name, increasing wonderfully in her changing.] The first clause should be in brackets, since the second clearly refers to the moon, not to the month. The verse is thought to have referred to the Hebrew יֶרַח and יָרֵחַ; the latter being the older and more poetical word for the "month," whereas חֹדֶשׁ was the ordinary word. The Greek μὴν and μήνη are comparable; Drusius observes that the same remark holds good of the Flemish and English words. It does not, however, apply to the Aramaic and Syriac languages; whence the verse has been used to prove that the Siracide wrote in Hebrew. [Nevertheless the above interpretation is not free from difficulty. The original of the verse, as the consensus of Gr. with Syr. shews, must have been either ירח הוא כישמו or חדש הוא כישמו, either of which would be an unnatural way of expressing the sentiment in the text; meaning properly "the month" or "the moon is like its name," in some particular to be further explained. If the original contained the latter of the two words suggested, it should probably have been pointed חָדֵשׁ, "He (or, as we say, she) is new, as his name (new moon, חֹדֶשׁ) implies." The last clause of the former verse will then have referred to the full moon, and this to the new moon, while the next clause of this verse refers to its divers phases.]

an instrument of the armies above.] Rather, of the camps. Fritzsche accepts the interpretation of Grotius, "a beacon," i.e. a general signal in accordance with which the armies direct their movements. Comp. here also the Jewish legend, referred to in the introd.

A full stop should be placed at the end of this verse. The next refers to the stars.

9. in the highest places of the Lord.] Some MSS. and Versions have: "in the highest places Lord."

10. they will stand.] Rather, they stand.

in their order.] Heb. כמשפטם, rite.

and never faint in their watches.] Better Greek would have been καταλύσωσι τὰς φυλακάς. Syr. "and change not in their courses." This makes it probable that the original was יעלפו (Isa. li. 20; misread by the Syr. יחלפו), with which the "courses" (מרוצתיהם; perhaps misread מצודתיהם) agree better than the "watches" of the Greek translator. The "courses" of the constellations are familiar.

The rest of this chapter is wanting in the Syriac Version.

11. in the brightness thereof.] Cp. Ezek. i. 28.

12. have bended it.] Perhaps have stretched it, the metaphor having changed.

13. By his commandment he maketh the snow to fall apace.] The sentence is inelegant if the subject be God (Grotius), but we cannot well supply "the sky" with Drusius. The Aeth. would seem to have read χιών, "the snow pours down;" Fritzsche's suggestion that the verbs were used intransitively in the original is, however, simpler. The mention of snow itself in this place is rather surprising.

the lightnings of his judgment.] Cp. Ps. xviii. 15, &c.

14. Through this.] Perhaps בן על, "for this purpose."

treasures.] The storehouses in which the biblical poets figuratively represent hail, snow, &c., as piled up; see especially Job xxxviii. 22.

fly forth as fowls.] Compare the phrase of Aeschylus, λευκόπτεροι νιφάδες.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

15 By his great power he maketh the clouds firm, and the hailstones are broken small.

16 At his sight the mountains are shaken, and at his will the south wind bloweth.

17 The noise of the thunder maketh the earth ‖ to tremble: so doth the northern storm and the whirlwind: as birds flying he scattereth the snow, and the falling down thereof is as the lighting of grasshoppers:

‖ Or, to groan as a woman in her travail.

18 The eye marvelleth at the beauty of the whiteness thereof, and the heart is astonished at the raining of it.

19 The hoarfrost also as salt he poureth on the earth, and being congealed, ‖ it lieth on the top of sharp stakes.

B. C. cir. 200.

‖ Or, it is as the point of sharp stakes.

20 When the cold north wind bloweth, and the water is congealed into ice, it abideth upon every gathering together of water, and clotheth the water as with a breastplate.

21 It devoureth the mountains, and burneth the wilderness, and consumeth the grass as fire.

22 A present remedy of all is a mist coming speedily: a dew coming ‖ after heat refresheth.

‖ Or, upon the heat.

15. On the one hand, the light and elastic particles of cloud are combined into heavy masses: and, on the other, solid blocks of ice are splintered into hailstones.

16, 17. These verses have become disarranged in most of the MSS.; the original order—17 a, 16 a, 16 b, 17 b—must be restored from MSS. 23, &c., S. H., and Copt. Accordingly we arrange them as follows:—

17 a. The noise of the thunder maketh the earth to tremble.] See margin.

16 a. at his sight the mountains are shaken.] Cp. Ps. l. 2, &c. If the original was הופיעו, it may have signified "at its flashing" (i.e. the lightning): cp. Job xxxvii. 15.

16 b. and at his will the south wind bloweth.] תֵּימָן, Ps. lxxviii. 26.

17 b, &c. so doth the northern storm and the whirlwind.] Perhaps the original order was גם צפון סופה וסערה, "so too the north wind, storm and whirlwind." The variation of expression in the text is an ornament of Greek rather than of Semitic poetry.

as birds flying.] Rather, "alighting;" deponens ad sedendum, Lat.

he scattereth.] Heb. זֹרֵק, perhaps here used intransitively, as in Hos. vii. 9. This will accord better with the simile.

lighting of grasshoppers.] More probably, "of locusts," as the ancient versions render it. For "lighting" we should perhaps substitute "encamping;" Heb. נח (Ex. x. 14). The point of comparison lies in their "covering the eye of the whole earth" (Ex. x. 5). The simile is a familiar one in Scripture.

18. at the raining of it.] "Solent enim viatoribus visum adimere" (Grotius). This is not more probable than Fritzsche's rendering, "at the moisture of it." Raining and snowing are often confused by the ancients (see Tafel on Pindar, 'Olymp.' p. 403), but here some quality of the snow which occasions fear is required. Perhaps the other sense of the word נישמו, "its body," i.e. nature (in Aramaic), was intended.

19. it lieth on the top of sharp stakes.] The marginal rendering must here be substituted. Aeth. "it splits like sharp crystal." For "stakes" we should also substitute thorns.

20. Comp. Prov. xxvii. 16, LXX. (Fritzsche).

upon every gathering together.] מִקְוֶה, Isaiah xxii. 11; the torrents would not freeze.

and clotheth the water.] Lit. and the water puts on as it were a breastplate. A jingle may have been intended between שריון and שרה if the latter (Aramaic) verb was used for "resteth." Θώραξ and lorica are frequently used of any "coating;" loricatio in Vitruvius is the plastering of a wall.

21. It devoureth the mountains.] "Auferendo virorem" (Grotius).

22. A present remedy of all is a mist coming speedily.] "Present" and "coming speedily" represent the same word. If the Hebrew was מרפא הכל מהרה, it should probably have been rendered "a mist quickly healeth all."

a dew coming after heat refresheth.] If the Greek be here correct, it is clear that a verse or clause must have been lost in which the heat was mentioned. This is practically the view of Gutmann and Fritzsche, who refer v. 21 to the effects of the hot wind. The language there used agrees well with the effects of the קדים or καύσων, elsewhere described; see Gen. xvi. 6 ("burnt by the east wind"), Ezek. xvii. 10, &c. Nevertheless, the phrase ἀπαντῶσα ἀπὸ καύσωνος, כנע מקדם, must almost necessarily have meant "coming from the east:" "dew" then means "rain,"

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

23 By his counsel he appeaseth the deep, and planteth islands therein.

24 [f] They that sail on the sea tell of the danger thereof; and when we hear it with our ears, we marvel thereat.

25 [g] For therein be strange and wondrous works, variety of all kinds of beasts and whales created.

26 By him the end of them hath prosperous success, and [h] by his word all things consist.

27 We may speak much, and [i] yet come short: wherefore in sum, he is all.

28 How shall we be able to magnify him? for he is great above all his works.

29 [k] The Lord is terrible and very great, and marvellous in his power.

30 When ye glorify the Lord, exalt him as much as ye can; for even yet will he far exceed: and when ye exalt him, put forth all your strength, and be not weary; for ye can never go far enough.

31 [l] Who hath seen him, that he might tell us? and who can magnify him as he is?

[f] Ps. 107. 23, 24.
[g] Ps. 104. 25, 26.
[h] Col. 1. 17.
[i] ch. 42. 27.
[k] Ps. 96. 4. & 147. 5.
[l] Ps. 106. 2. John 1. 18. & 5. 37. & 6. 46.

and the description is continuous from v. 20. "Refresheth" should rather have been: which refresheth. The ancients believed that snow must be followed by rain within a definite period: see Herod. ii. 22; Aristoph. 'Vespae,' 260.

23. he appeaseth the deep.] "The deep subsideth," according to a few MSS.

and planteth islands therein.] This would seem to refer to the sudden emerging of islands, due to submarine motions; of which it is surprising that our author should have known. Grotius would have altered the text, so as to make it mean "et si qua est in mari insula, plantas profert;" plainly not a fortunate suggestion. The word צִיִּים is rendered "islands" by the Pesh. in Ps. lxxii. 9, and a similar rendering is given the word צִירִים by the LXX. of Isa. xlv. 16. The former word we believe to have been used in this place: "and he planteth her with ships." This, both on account of the next verses and because the appearance of ships rather than that of islands on the sea is the natural consequence of a calm. The word νήσους, "islands," is here preserved only by some "interpolated" MSS., and the Lat. and S. H. versions. All the old MSS., with the Aeth. and Copt., shew the corruption Ἰησοῦς, "and Jesus planted her."

24. Cp. Ps. cvii.

the danger thereof.] It is not clear what the original can have been: "terror" was perhaps meant.

25. whales created.] The words must rather have meant "the [marvellous] creatures, whales." Compare the ordinary Greek idiom χρῆμα θηρίου, &c.

26. By him the end of them hath prosperous success.] The best authorities here have: through him prosperity is the end thereof. The interpretation of the clause will vary according as it is supposed to refer to the immediately preceding verses, or to those which follow (see the introd.). The former was the view of the Latin translator, confirmatus est itineris finis (reading ὁδοῦ for αὐτοῦ?); the latter, however, is more probable, if we compare the second clause. We would suggest that the clauses should be inverted, and that in the first εὐοδοῖ should be read for εὐοδία, with MS. 248: "By his word all things consist; and by it he maketh the extremity of them (= the totality, קְצוֹת) to prosper."

27. and yet come short.] Rather, and we shall never attain thereto, לא נשיג.

wherefore in sum, he is all.] Rather, and the sum of the matter is: He is all. This clause is evidently a spurious Hellenistic addition by the younger Siracide (see the introd.).

28. How shall we be able to magnify him?] Lit. In glorifying him how shall we succeed?

he is great.] Lit. the one who is great. The original, however, הגדל מכל מעשיו, would probably mean "the greatest of all his works" (Ewald, 'Lehrb.' § 313).

29. From Ps. xcvi. 4.

30. When ye glorify.] Rather, Glorifying.

exalt him as much as ye can.] It is probable that "him" was not the object of this clause, but "your powers" (מאדכם?) or "your voices."

be not weary; for ye can never go far enough.] Apparently a play on the words אַל תִּינָעוּ כִּי לֹא תַגִּיעוּ.

31. Who hath seen him.] The passage from St. John cited in the margin is in a very different context, and this question is here

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

32 There are yet hid greater things than these be, for we have seen but a few of his works.

33 For the Lord hath made all things; and to the godly hath he given wisdom.

CHAPTER XLIV.

B. C. cir. 200.

1 The praise of certain holy men: 16 of Enoch, 17 Noah, 19 Abraham, 22 Isaac, 23 and Jacob.

LET us now praise famous men, and our fathers that begat us. The praise of the fathers.

unnatural, if not improper. Probably the original was מי ראה, "who hath seen," viz. the whole of his work.

32. Cp. xvi. 21.

33. wisdom.] I.e. only the few are privileged to obtain any insight into these things.

CHAPTER XLIV.

From praise of the Creator the writer proceeds to that of the most prominent and distinguished of His people. Yet here also the object is not merely, nor mainly, praise of the heroes of Jewish history, but rather praise of God in them and for them. The chapter naturally arranges itself in four stanzas. In the first (vv. 1–7) the writer indicates that his main object is to praise the God who had bestowed manifold and divers gifts upon men for the good of His people. The description of these varied gifts and administrations is here general, the object being to shew that they all came from God and all served for the public good. In the second stanza (vv. 8–15) he proceeds to shew that there was another class, by whom also God was praised and whom He had raised up, although they had not occupied public or prominent positions, and their name and fame had not been preserved. Yet they also had their reward and their memorial. The latter consisted in their own happiness and peace unto death, and after it in the children and the good name which they left behind them. Once more we notice here a melancholy absence of all idea of another life (see especially v. 14). The stanza might be thus summed up: Not all can be famous, but all may be good; and, if so, they will be useful, happy, enduring, and of blessed memory: useful in life and after death.

The third stanza (vv. 16–18) begins the praise of individuals by name. In the Greek text this embraces Enoch and Noah. But it deserves special notice that the verse about Enoch (v. 16) is omitted in the Syr. Version, which in this is followed by the Arabic. On examining the Greek text, we find that it bears traces of Jewish tradition. On comparing LXX. Gen. v. 24 with Ecclus. xlv. 16*a*, we observe that while in the main the words of the LXX. are retained, there are also notable alterations. The LXX. has [we italicise the words used in common in the LXX. and in Ecclus.]: "And Enoch pleased God [the Lord] well, and he was not found because [these words are omitted in Ecclus.] God translated him"—where Ecclus. has: "and he was translated." These alterations and omissions are very important, as they seem to avoid the biblical doctrine of Enoch's translation (to heaven) by God (Ecclus. omits "he was not found because," as well as the notice that God translated him). [We mark that Heb. xi. 5 reproduces the LXX.: see Delitzsch ad loc.] Nor is this modified by Ecclus. xlix. 14 (where the Alex. however reads, not ἀνελήφθη, as the Vat., but μετετέθη as in xliv. 16). Now it is quite true that the Rabbis, chiefly in connexion with the Christian controversy, not only controverted the ascension to heaven of Moses and Elijah (Sukk. 5 a), but that the Midrash (Ber. R. 25) maintains that Elijah had died [this expressly, and also implicitly by interpreting the לקח of Gen. v. 24 by the use of the same word in Ezek. xxiv. 16]. The Targum Onkelos boldly puts: "because God made him to die" [so the correct text, ed. Berliner]. At a later period the Targum Pseudo-Jon., however, not only taught Enoch's ascension to heaven, but represents him there as Metatron, the highest of Angels, while, on the other hand, the so-called Jer. Targ. again omits all this. This latter may be regarded as the Palestinian current of opinion. Perhaps little intrinsic value attaches to the allegorisms of Philo, who makes the translation of Enoch the symbol of a change from a worse and blameable to a better mode of life ('de Abrah.' § 3), or from the domination of the body to the rule of the soul, and at the same time also the forsaking of the many for the solitude of meditation ('de Praem. et Poen.' § 3—as regards solitude and meditation, 'de mutat. nom.' § 4).

It results that Philo (like the majority of the Rabbis) not only ignored (if not expressly denied) the ascension of Enoch, but that, like Ecclus. xliv. 16 b, he represented him as "an example of repentance"—as one who had changed from a worse to a better state. But this also accords with Rabbinic tradition. According to Ber. R. 25, he had been reckoned among sinners; was by turns wicked and pious; and God had said that if he continued in his piety, He would take him out of the world. Whatever, therefore, may be said about the ascension of Enoch (on which

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

2 The Lord hath wrought great glory by them through his great power from the beginning.

3 Such as did bear rule in their kingdoms, men renowned for their power, giving counsel by their understanding, and declaring prophecies:

B. C. cir. 200.

4 Leaders of the people by their counsels, and by their knowledge of learning meet for the people, wise and eloquent in their instructions:

opinions varied at different times), Philo's idea about Enoch's repentance seems grounded on Jewish tradition. [It need scarcely be said that, with his peculiar views, Philo could not have believed in any real ascension of Enoch, any more than the Son of Sirach, who studiously ignores another life.] So far then from Ecclus. xlv. 16 being a spurious verse (as Fränkel supposes, 'Einfl. d. Palästin. Exeg.' p. 44, note e), it accords alike with Palestinian and Alexandrian notions, and there is not any reason why the older Siracide should not have written, and the younger Siracide translated, this verse—but quite the opposite. For its omission in the Syr. translation, we account on the ground that the verse would appear to the Christian translator inconsistent with Old but especially with New Testament teaching, and that it might deprive Christians of a powerful argument for the Resurrection and Ascension of Christ. That it was used by Christians in that sense, is expressly stated in the Jewish Midrash. [We cannot help suspecting that similar motives prompted what seems to us the more emphatic wording of v. 21 b in the Syr.] Lastly, we notice with pleasure in the reference to Noah the absence of the later repulsive Rabbinic legends.

The fourth stanza in ch. xliv. (vv. 19–23) treats of the Patriarchs: Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Here also we mark the absence of later Rabbinic legends. Again, it is instructive—or at least should be so—that, contrary to the confident assertions of a certain school of modern critics, Gen. xxii. 18 was understood by the younger Siracide (who presumably knew Hebrew) as by the LXX. to mean: "in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed"—and not "with thy seed shall they bless themselves." Indeed, not improbably the younger Siracide here quoted from the LXX.

1. that begat us.] Rather, in their generation; in chronological order.

2. The Lord hath wrought great glory by them.] The last two words are not found in the best MSS. From the Syriac we learn that the original had נתן להם, which the Syr. pointed נְתַן, "let us give," the Greek נְתַן [אֹ]לָהֶם; but which should have been pointed נִתַּן, "was given."

through his great power from the beginning.] "His great power" in the Greek is dependent upon "hath wrought;" giving in this context no very satisfactory meaning. The Syr. has: "because all their greatness was above the generations of the world." From this it would appear that the original was גָּדְלוּ מִיְּדוֹת עֹלָם, "they were greater than the generations of the world;" i.e. they were eminent, conspicuous among them. The first word was misread גְּדֻלָּה from גֹּדֶל by both; the Syriac, "all [their greatness]," is an acknowledgment that the pronominal affix was in the singular.

3. First class of men of eminence.

Such as did bear rule in their kingdoms.] It is a little remarkable that the complement in all the other clauses in vv. 3, 4, is some personal quality of the individuals praised. Moreover the plural "kingdoms" is improper, since reference is made only to the kings of the united people, and then to those of Judah. The clause is omitted in the Syriac. Perhaps the author intended "by their counsels," using מלך in the Aramaic sense.

giving counsel by their understanding.] From the variations in the MSS., the original would appear to have had the imperfect.

and declaring prophecies.] Lit. and having declared by prophecies. The original had probably the perfect הִגִּידוּ (cf. Syr.), and meant "they gave information by their prophetic power." The Syr. renders: "they declared signs by their prophetic power." "Signs" reads like a mistranslation of אֹתִיוֹת, "coming events."

4. Second class: leaders and teachers.

Leaders of the people by their counsels.] Aeth. "kings of the earth in their expeditions."

and by their knowledge of learning meet for the people.] The Greek is here difficult and certainly corrupt. For γραμματείας we should emend γραμματεῖς, from the Aethiopic and Coptic versions; and so Fritzsche suggested. The same is apparently supported by the Syr. The original of this was either שטרי or שפטי, "judges of the people by their prudence." A possible version of the uncorrected text is that of Grotius, "and with wisdom [= possessed of wisdom] meet for the scribes of the people."

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

5 Such as found out musical tunes, and recited ‖ verses in writing:

‖ Or, ditties.

6 Rich men furnished with ability, living peaceably in their habitations:

7 All these were honoured in their generations, and were the glory of their times.

8 There be of them, that have left a name behind them, that their praises might be reported.

[a] Gen. 7. 22.

9 And some there be, which have no memorial; [a] who are perished, as though they had never been; and are become as though they had never been born; and their children after them.

B. C. cir. 200.

10 But these were merciful men, whose righteousness hath not been forgotten.

11 With their seed shall continually remain a good inheritance, and their children are within the covenant.

12 Their seed standeth fast, and their children ‖ for their sakes.

‖ Or, after them.

wise and eloquent in their instructions.] Lit. in whose instruction were wise words.

5. Third class: poets and composers.

found out musical tunes.] The word signifies perhaps no more than "producing" or "performing." The Syriac suggests that it was the inventors of the instruments to whom allusion was made.

and recited verses.] The difficult combination "recited in writing" seems to have led the Syrian to transfer "in writing" to the next clause. "Verses" apparently represents משלים; for "recited" the comparison of Greek and Syriac suggests that the original was אמרי. Fritzsche regards this as an allusion to the books of Job and Canticles.

6. furnished with ability.] Heb. perhaps סמוכי חיל (cp. Gen. xxvii. 37, דגן ותירש סמכתיו), "well supplied with goods." The reference might be to the Patriarchs (Bretschneider); more probably it is to the wealthy landowners, the Naboths and Araunahs, to whom incidental allusion is made.

in their habitations.] Compare Dan. iv. 1.

7. and were the glory of their times.] We have reason for believing (cp. Syr.) that the original of the first clause would have been translated literally, "all these — there was honour to them." The translator being unable to paraphrase the second clause as he had paraphrased the first, left it, somewhat carelessly, unaltered. He should have rendered it, "and had boasting (i.e. magnificence) in their days."

8, 9. Second stanza. Yet not all of these became celebrated in after-times, nor had they even their memorial preserved.

8. that their praises might be reported.] Lit. that [men] might recount [their] praises.

10. The difference is due to the use made by them severally of their privileges; the latter sui memores alios fecere merendo.

whose righteousness.] Lit. righteousnesses; i.e. righteous acts (Isa. lxiv. 5).

hath not been forgotten.] Grotius (wrongly), "apud Deum scilicet."

11–13. With their seed shall continually remain a good inheritance, &c.] There is some confusion in these verses, which with the help of the Syriac may be partly corrected. (a.) Syr. "With their seed remaineth their fortune." We follow Fritzsche in believing that "good" was a substantive in the original; this may have been טובה or טובם. (b.) The Syr. continues: "their root is to their children's children." He read therefore שרשם where the Greek read (perhaps) ירשה. If we combine these readings into ירשם, i.e. יִרְשׁוּם, "these will inherit them," ἔκγονα αὐτῶν will be intelligible: "and their children shall inherit them" (or "have inherited them"). (c.) The Syr. proceeds: "In their covenant remaineth their seed." This can be obtained from the Greek by shifting a stop. The covenant which God made with their fathers is extended by Him to the sons; and the covenant is called theirs, just as the "covenant of Abraham," &c. is spoken of. (d.) Gr. 12 b: "And their children through them;" Syr. "and their children's children in good works." It is easy here to detect two readings—בַּעֲבָרָם, "on their account," and בְּמַעֲשֵׂיהֶם, "in works;" and we cannot hesitate to prefer the former. It is possible that in (c.) "by their covenant" would have been a better rendering. (e) v. 13: "Their seed shall remain for ever." Here we accept the emendation of the Syr. "their remembrance," זכרם for זרעם. We have heard enough in the previous clause of the advantages enjoyed by their descendants.

The Syriac omits v. 15 b, 16; the omission of this mention of Enoch is not a little remarkable, for it is the first time that he appears in the character of prophet. See the introduction.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

13 Their seed shall remain for ever, and their glory shall not be blotted out.

14 Their bodies are buried in peace; but their name liveth for evermore.

15 [b] The people will tell of their wisdom, and the congregation will shew forth their praise.

16 [c] Enoch pleased the Lord, and was translated, being an example of repentance to all generations.

17 [d] Noah was found perfect and righteous; in the time of wrath he was taken in exchange [for the world;] therefore was he left as a remnant unto the earth, when the flood came.

18 An [e] everlasting covenant was made with him, that all flesh should perish no more by the flood.

19 Abraham was a [f] great father of many people: in glory was there none like unto him;

20 Who kept the law of the most High, and was in covenant with him: he established the covenant in [g] his flesh; and when he was [h] proved, he was found faithful.

21 Therefore he assured him by an [i] oath, that he would bless the nations in his seed, and that he would

B. C. cir. 200.

[b] ch. 39. 10.

[c] Gen. 5. 24. Heb. 49. 14. Hebr. 11. 5.

[d] Gen. 6. 9. & 7. 1. Hebr. 11. 7.

[e] Gen. 9. 11.

[f] Gen. 12. 2, 3. & 15. 5. & 17. 4.

[g] Gen. 17. 10, 11. & 21. 4.

[h] Gen. 22. 1.

[i] Gen. 22. 16, 17, 18. Gal. 3. 8.

16. being an example of repentance.] As fully stated in the introduction, Philo takes Enoch's translation as symbolic of his change to a better life; cf. Geiger, 'Urschrift,' p. 198. The versions all alter this sentiment (except Aeth.): Lat. ut det gentibus poenitentiam: Copt. "an example of wisdom" (διανοίας?); S. H. "to be an everlasting example" (with MS. 253). On the whole subject comp. the remarks in the introduction.

17. See the references.

he was taken in exchange [for the world].] Lit. became a substitute; the Syr. and Aeth. versions gloss as the A. V. He became a substitute in the sense that his preservation served instead of the preservation of the whole world. This is more natural than to render "he became the price of the salvation of the world," with Grotius and Fritzsche; giving a sentiment which is doubly inaccurate. Nevertheless, we shall find occasion at xlvi. 15 for supposing that the word חלף was used by our author in its Arabic sense of "to leave behind." He may have used a derivative here also in the sense of "remnant," as Barhebraeus suggests.

when the flood came.] The Vat. and some other authorities have (corruptly): "on this account the flood came."

18. everlasting covenant.] For the phrase comp. Ex. xxxi. 16.

no more.] Lit. not.

by the flood.] Rather, by flood.

19. a great father, &c.] The author would appear to have employed a schema etymologicum, אבי רב המון גוים. רב is omitted (perhaps rightly) by Syr. The true etymon is still obscure.

in glory was there none like unto him.] Lit. not found. Syr. "there was no stain set on his glory." This seems to point to two separate readings, לא נמצא במוהו and לא נתן כום. The latter expression occurs more than once in this book, and is likely to have been introduced here by the reminiscence of those other passages.

20. and was.] Lit. became = entered into (Syr.).

he established the covenant in his flesh.] The subject is probably still Abraham. ברית, as Grotius observes, is a technical term for "circumcision." But the probable occurrence of that word in the preceding clause and the jingle make it not unlikely that the Aramaic קים was here used: והקים קים. "Establish" means here to "ratify," the sign in his flesh being compared to the pillars on which treaties were engraved by the ancients.

and when he was proved.] See Gen. xxii. These "merits" of Abraham are largely insisted on in the Jewish ritual.

21. he assured him by an oath.] Rather, made good to him; and this is the Hebrew sense of הקים and קים. This expression might be justified on the ground that the promise of God is so sure as to be identical with its fulfilment. Nevertheless the regular use of the verb קים in Aramaic for "to swear" (see Buxtorf, 'Lex. Rabb.' coll. 1992, 3), together with the Syriac version here, make it probable that the author meant "swore him an oath." Compare v. 22.

that he would bless the nations in his seed.] The best authorities have the passive, "that all nations should be blessed." It is well known that many modern critics make the original mean "that all nations should bless themselves by," i.e. in their blessings cite the name of Abraham. See Edersheim's 'Prophecy and History,' &c., p. 55.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

multiply him as the dust of the earth, and exalt his seed as the stars, and cause them to inherit from sea to sea, and from the river unto the utmost part of the land.

[k] Gen. 26. 3, 4, 5.

22 [k] With Isaac did he establish likewise [for Abraham his father's sake] the blessing of all men, and the covenant,

B. C. cir. 200.

23 And made it rest upon the head of [l] Jacob. He acknowledged him in his blessing, and gave him an heritage, and divided his portions; among the twelve tribes did he part them.

[l] Gen. 27. 28. & 28. 14.

CHAPTER XLV.

1 The praise of Moses, 6 of Aaron, 23 and of Phinees.

as the dust of the earth.] See Gen. xv. 5; xxii. 17. Syr. and Aeth. "like the sand of the sea," perhaps correcting from the above passages.

exalt his seed as the stars.] The Aeth. substitutes "multiply." The Syr. renders: "that he would set his seed above all nations."

and cause them to inherit, &c.] (Gen. xv. 18; Ex. xxiii. 31; Deut. xi. 24; Josh. i. 4.) I.e. from the Red Sea to the Mediterranean, and from the Euphrates to the Arabian deserts. These boundaries were attained during the most flourishing period of Israel. But the writer seems also to have had in mind Ps. lxxii. 8.

22. did he establish.] I.e. "swear," קִיֵּם; v. supra. There is no reason for the brackets in the A. V.

the blessing of all men and the covenant.] There is some confusion in these verses. The Syr. has: "and the blessing of all them that went before rests upon the head of Israel." The words "and made it rest" of the next verse seem to represent the Heb. יניח. This probably referred to Isaac and meant "he transmitted it." The addition in the Syriac would seem to be an interpretation of the first word of v. 23.

23. And made it rest upon the head.] The phrase is from Gen. xlix. 26; the author has also in mind Gen. xlviii. 14. As Jacob represents the unity of the people, the blessing is not conveyed to any single individual after him.

He acknowledged him in his blessing.] Syr. "whom he called my first-born Israel." It seems that ברכה and בְּכֹרָה, "birthright," have been confused; nor can we doubt that the Syriac in the main represents the true tradition. Transposition of letters is one of the most familiar sources of corruption in Semitic texts. The fact that the birthright was assigned to Jacob is too characteristic for our author to have passed over. ויכירהו בבכרה, or some similar phrase, corresponding with the legal expression in Deut. xxi. 17, כי את הבכר יכיר, "he must recognise the firstborn as such," was probably employed. The subject is probably Isaac, not God.

and gave him an heritage.] Lit. in heritage. Perhaps "he installed him in the heritage." The Aeth. shews a reading, "the inheritance itself;" the Syr., Lat., and one Greek MS., "the inheritance," either of which would be easier.

and divided his portions.] Fritzsche would make this refer to the land.

CHAPTER XLV.

A continuation of the previous chapter. The subjects of praise are Moses (vv. 1–5), Aaron (vv. 6–22), and Phinehas (vv. 23–25). The chapter concludes with a brief address to the high-priest then in office (v. 26). In the first stanza (vv. 1–5) we mark the (perhaps first) occurrence of what afterwards became a usual mode of expression: "his memory to blessing" (see note). It is not easy to decide whether at any rate v. 2 does not contain an allusion to some of the legends connected with the early history of Moses (for a popular summary of them, see B. Beer, 'Leben Moses' [posthumous and incomplete]). In stanza ii. (vv. 6–22) we notice a greatly disproportionate length and excessive abundance of detail, the more remarkable from its contrast with the comparative brevity of the encomium upon Moses, the great hero of Rabbinic conception and legend. This led writers in various ages to regard the author of this book as a priest (see General Introduction). To us it rather indicates that he wrote at a period when alike the civil and spiritual power was in the hands of the high-priest (the προστάτης τοῦ λαοῦ). The emphatic reference to the succession in the high-priesthood seems (as explained in the General Introd.) to indicate an allusion to contemporary events. According to Josephus, Simon I.—whom he designates as Simon the Just—was succeeded not by his son Onias (who was still a minor), but by his brother Eleazar, and afterwards by another brother, Manasseh. And it was only after the death of the latter that Onias II. became high-priest, being succeeded by his son, Simon II. (For the various dates see Gen. Introd. § II.) As stated in another place, we regard Ecclus. xlv. 25 as alluding to the long extrusion of

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

AND he brought out of him a merciful man, which found favour in the sight of all flesh, even [a] Moses, beloved of God and men, whose memorial is blessed.

[a] Exod. 11. 3.

2 He made him like to the glorious saints, and magnified him, so that his enemies stood in fear of him.

3 By his words he caused the wonders to cease, and he made him [b] glorious in the sight of kings, and gave him a commandment for his people, and [c] shewed him part of his glory.

[b] Exod. 7, 8, 9, 10, chapters.

4 [d] He sanctified him in his faithfulness and meekness, and chose him out of all men.

5 He made him to hear his voice, and [e] brought him into the dark cloud, and [f] gave him commandments before his face, even the law of life and knowledge, that he might

B. C. cir. 200.

[c] Exod. 34. 6.

[d] Numb. 12. 3.

[e] Exod. 24. 18.

[f] Exod. 19. 7. Deut. 6. 1, 2.

Onias from the pontificate, due to intrigues of the actual occupants of the office with the Egyptian suzerains of Palestine. Similarly, we consider v. 26 as addressed to Onias II. The political rule of Judæa was in his hands (Jos. 'Ant.' xii. 4, 1), but to none of his successors could such language as in v. 26 have been addressed (see the General Introduction). On the bearing of all this upon the question of the date of the original composition of Ecclesiasticus, see the General Introduction. (For a brief summary of the history of that period, see 'Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah,' App. IV., vol. ii. pp. 668–670; and for a detailed account, Herzfeld's 'Gesch. des Volkes Israel.')

1. And he brought out of him a merciful man.] Syr., Lat., Copt., and Aeth. connect this with the last verse of the previous chapter, and put the verb in the plural. The phrase "and he brought out" is from Isa. lxv. 9.

whose memorial is blessed.] זברנו לברכה, an early case of this prayer, invariably attached (usually in the abbreviated form ז"ל) to the names of dead Israelites.

2. like to the glorious saints.] Lit. to the glory of the saints; "the angels" (Grotius, &c.); "the priests" (Fritzsche).

and magnified him, so that his enemies stood in fear of him.] Lit. in the fears of his enemies: "enemies" appears to be a gloss, by the Syr. rendering "among the timid." The original (בפחדים?) meant "with terror," and is rightly represented by the Greek. This suggests doubts concerning the originality of ἁγίων in clause 1, to which the Syriac has nothing to correspond; while for "he likened" (וידמהו) it has "he raised" (וירממהו). "He raised him high with glory" was perhaps the original verse; the Syriac "with blessings" (for "with glory") seems to be an interpolation from the end of the last sentence.

3. By his words he caused the wonders to cease.] Lat. monstra placavit; a phrase taken very improperly from the Roman religion. Grotius refers the words to the wonders of the Egyptian magic; Fritzsche to the withdrawal of the plagues. The words are too brief for the former interpretation, while we should expect the performance of the miracles to be mentioned rather than the withdrawal of them. The original was probably הֵנִיחַ, which may mean either "he sent down" or "he caused to cease:" the translator not surprisingly adopted the wrong signification. The clause is omitted in the Syr. Copt. and Aeth., "he performed:" this may be either a liberty, or represent a reading ἐποίησε, which could have no claim to originality.

he made him glorious in the sight of kings.] Syr. "he made him to stand before the king." "To stand before the king" is a Hebrew phrase meaning "to be the king's minister" (Gesen., 'Thes.,' col. 1039*a* and 1111*b*); not quite an appropriate notion here, which the Greek translator may have intentionally avoided. The author's idea was probably more similar to that of Ps. cxix. 46 or Isa. lii. 15. Yet לִפְנֵי is occasionally used in the sense of instar, "like;" "and he established him as a king" would here be very suitable.

and gave him a commandment for his people.] The original, ויפקדהו על עמו (cp. Syr.), probably meant: "he set him over his people."

part of his glory.] Most of the versions obliterate the partitive genitive, which is here highly significant.

4. He sanctified him.] הקדישׁ; compare Jer. i. 5. "In" perhaps means "on account of" (Aeth.).

5. He made him to hear.] The privilege given him above "all flesh" (Deut. xxxiv. 10). The Syr. puts these words at the end of v. 3.

and gave him commandments before his face.] Probably ויתן לפניו, "and set before him." The personal conference is sufficiently insisted on in the previous clauses.

of life.] I.e. "which if a man do he shall live" (Ezek. xx. 11): compare Prov. vi. 23; supra, xvii. 11.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

teach Jacob his covenants, and Israel his judgments.

[g] Exod. 4. 14.

6 He [g] exalted Aaron, an holy man like unto him, even his brother, of the tribe of Levi.

[h] Exod. 28. 1, 2, 4.

7 An everlasting covenant he made with him, and [h] gave him the priesthood among the people; ‖he beautified him with comely ornaments, and clothed him with a robe of glory.

‖ Gr. he blessed.

8 He put upon him perfect glory; and strengthened him with ‖rich garments, with breeches, with a long robe, and the ephod.

‖ Gr. vessels, or, instruments.

9 And he compassed him with [i] pomegranates, and with many golden bells round about, that as he went there might be a [k] sound, and a noise made that might be heard in the temple, for a memorial to the children of his people;

B. C. cir. 200.

[i] Exod. 28. 33.

[k] Exod. 28. 35.

10 With an holy garment, with gold, and blue silk, and purple, the work of the embroiderer, [l] with a breastplate of judgment, and with Urim and Thummim;

[l] Exod. 28. 15, 30.

11 With twisted scarlet, the work of the cunning workman, [m] with pre-

[m] Exod. 28. 17.

that he might teach, &c.] Cp. Ps. xxv. 14; and especially Ps. ciii. 7.

6. There is one word too much for the rhythm: "he exalted," "holy," "his brother" (cp. Ps. cvi. 16), are omitted by different versions. The last of these, which is omitted by the Syr., may perhaps be an interpolation. "The tribe is mentioned here, being in the case of Aaron of such importance" (Fritzsche).

7. he made with him.] See above, xliv. 21. Our author gives Aaron a higher place than the Pentateuch ascribes to him.

and gave him the priesthood among the people.] Syr. "he set him for the truth of his people." This variation is curious, because it suggests that our author made use here of a very decided Arabism, אמת עמו from אמה = Arab. 'immatun, "priesthood," more familiar in its derivative Imám (used by the Jewish-Arabic commentators in the sense of "high-priest"). The natural punctuation would have been אֱמֶת, "truth;" and indeed the Greek translator must have been following some family tradition about the pronunciation of this word, if our conjecture be correct.

he beautified him with comely ornaments.] The marginal variant should have been "he called him happy." This the Lat. and Aeth. render "he beatified," while the Copt. beneficio linguae reproduces the Greek word. That there must be a misreading or mistranslation here seems clear, as is observed by Fritzsche, who supposes that יאשרהו was a corruption for יאזרהו, "he girt him." The Syr. renders: "and gave him." This points, we believe, to an original ישרנו, which might well have signified in the Aramaising dialect of the time יאשרנו, but actually meant ישרנו, "and he gave him," from the verb שור, used by Isa. lvii. 9 with a similar construction, of which תשורה, "a gift," is a derivative.

clothed him.] Lit. girt him. Syr. "he chose him with the sublimity of his glory." We recognise the two meanings of אדרת, "magnificence" and "robe;" if the Syr. "chose" is not corrupt, it probably represents a corruption, יבחר for יחגר. "Magnificence" is more suitable to this verse, since the garments are so fully described in what follows.

8. He put upon him perfect glory.] Syr. "garments of purple:" apparently the original had only תְּכֵלֶת, "purple," very ignorantly read תִּכְלֹת, "perfection," by the Greek translator.

and strengthened him with rich garments.] Lit. with vessels of strength. Fritzsche's ingenious suggestion that the Heb. had חֵזֶק, meaning "girt," is probably correct, though not confirmed by the Syr. The remainder of the verse seems correctly restored by the same critic, בכלי עז. עז has not unfrequently the meaning "magnificence."

It is not a little remarkable that the following list of garments is omitted by the Syriac translator. It seems natural to attribute this to a wish on the part of a Christian translator or emendator not to enlarge on the glories of the Jewish priesthood. But as we miss in it the rhythm of the rest of the chapter, it may be an interpolation.

9. The A. V., with S. H., seems rightly to connect χρυσοῖς with "the bells." On all these see the various Bibl. Encyclopaedias.

that as he went there might be a sound.] Rather, to give forth a sound: ἠχεῖν is transitive.

and a noise made.] Rather, and to make a noise.

in the temple.] An apparent (not a real) anachronism.

for a memorial.] Meaning "for a reminder."

10. breastplate of judgment.] Lit. a platform of judgment. The reason of this translation of the Heb. חשן is obscure.

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

cious stones graven like seals, and set in gold, the work of the jeweller, with a writing engraved for a memorial, after the number of the tribes of Israel.

[n] Exod. 28. 36.

12 [n] He set a crown of gold upon the mitre, wherein was engraved Holiness, an ornament of honour, a costly work, the desires of the eyes, goodly and beautiful.

13 Before him there were none such, neither did ever any stranger put them on, but only his children and his children's children perpetually.

[o] Numb. 28. 3, 4.

14 [o] Their sacrifices shall be wholly consumed every day twice continually.

[p] Lev. 8.

15 [p] Moses consecrated him, and anointed him with holy oil: this was appointed unto him by an everlasting covenant, and to his seed, so long as the heavens should remain, that they should minister unto him, and execute the office of the priesthood, and [q] bless the people in his name.

B. C. cir. 200.

[q] Numb. 6. 23, 24.

16 [r] He chose him out of all men living to offer sacrifices to the Lord, incense, and a sweet savour, for a memorial, to make reconciliation for his people.

[r] Numb. 17. 5. 1 Sam. 2. 28.

17 [s] He gave unto him his commandments, and authority in the statutes of judgments, that he should teach Jacob the testimonies, and inform Israel in his laws.

[s] Deut. 17. 10, 11. & 21. 5. & 33. 10. Mal. 2. 7.

18 [t] Strangers conspired together

[t] Numb. 16. 1.

12. wherein was engraved Holiness.] Ex. xxviii. 36 has: "holiness to the Lord," which Fritzsche thinks should be restored here. The last words of the sentence ("the desires of the eyes," &c.) may either refer to the garments as a whole, or to that last mentioned.

13. any stranger.] I.e. "of another tribe," as S. H. paraphrases it.

14. Their sacrifices . . . wholly consumed.] See Ex. xxix. 38, 39. As the chief part of the daily worship in the Temple, our author makes the daily sacrifices include all the others. (Comp. Dan. viii. 11–13; xi. 31; xii. 11.) The substantives from the verb ὁλοκαυτοῦν are common in the LXX.; the verb itself is very rare.

15. Moses consecrated him.] Lit. filled his hand, מלא ידו, from Ex. xxviii. 41; on the import of this expression, see the Commentaries. The Syr. renders: "placed his hand upon him;" a phrase that is used of the consecration of Joshua (Num. xxvii. 18), but not of Aaron. On the later use of the סמיכה in the designation to the Rabbinic office, see 'Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah,' ii. p. 382. We can scarcely fail to see here a trace of the Syrian's Christianity.

anointed him with holy oil.] Ex. xxix. 7. Did our author know of the anointing of Aaron only? On this question see Dillmann on Lev. viii. 12.

this was appointed unto him by an everlasting covenant.] Rather, this became for him an everlasting covenant.

so long as the heavens.] כִּימֵי (Syr., Lat.) was a better reading than בימי (Gr.).

minister unto him.] לשרת לו; the Levites "ministered" to the priests.

and execute the office of the priesthood.] Ex. xxviii. 41, 43, &c. The Syr. omits these words.

and bless the people.] Num. vi. 23. Aaron and his sons are commanded to do this.

16. The position of this verse compared with the last clause of 14 is curious; however, accurate order is not a characteristic of our author.

out of all men living.] כל חי, Gen. iii. 20, = every man. In the passage cited the phrase is clearly intended as an idiom.

for a memorial.] I.e. "for a burnt offering:" see Lev. xxiv. 7, &c.

for his people.] "Thy people," most MSS. and Copt.; "all Israel," Syr.

17. He gave unto him his commandments.] The best MSS. (except S) give "He gave unto him in His commandments;" and this seems to be the original reading, although the Syr. favours the A. V. The author meant that God gave Aaron this authority (הַמִּשְׁלָ) by committing unto him the thōrah.

in the statutes of judgments.] Lit. in the covenants of judgments: v. ad sup. xxxviii. 43. The Syr. varies here as there.

The last clauses are omitted by the Syr. (See note on v. 8.)

inform.] Lit. to illuminate, = להאיר, which however is rare and late in this construction. See Ps. cxix. 135.

18. Strangers conspired together.] I.e. persons belonging to different families. In Num. xvii. 5 זר איש is explained to mean: "not of

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

against him, and maligned him in the wilderness, even the men that were of Dathan's and Abiron's side, and the congregation of Core, with fury and wrath.

19 This the Lord saw, and it displeased him, and in his wrathful indignation were they consumed: he did wonders upon them, to consume them with the fiery flame.

[u] Numb. 17. 8.

20 [u] But he made Aaron more honourable, and gave him an heritage, [x] and divided unto him the firstfruits of the increase; especially he prepared bread in abundance:

[x] Numb. 18. 12, 13.

21 For they eat of the sacrifices of the Lord, which he gave unto him and his seed.

B. C. cir. 200.

[y] 1 Cor. 9. 13.

22 [z] Howbeit in the land of the people he had no inheritance, neither had he any portion among the people: for the Lord himself is his portion and inheritance.

[z] Numb. 18. 20. Deut. 12. 12. & 18. 1, 2.

23 [a] The third in glory is Phinees the son of Eleazar, because he had zeal in the fear of the Lord, and stood up with good courage of heart when the people were turned back, and made reconciliation for Israel.

[a] Numb. 25. 11, 12, 13. 1 Mac. 2. 54.

the seed of Aaron." Fritzsche's conjecture that the author wrote זרים, "wicked men" (cp. Num. xvi. 26), is not confirmed by the Syr.

and maligned] = and envied, ויקנאו, of Ps. cvi. 16.

the men that were of Dathan's and Abiron's side.] Heb. אנשי (Gesenius, 'Thes.' p. 85*b*), very happily rendered by this Greek idiom, which does not imply necessarily more than the people themselves.

and the congregation of Core.] Omitted in Ps. l. c. and in Deut. xi. 6.

with fury and wrath.] One of these words is sufficient for the rhythm, and only one is offered by Syr. and Lat. Cp. Num. xvi. 13 sqq.

19. and it displeased him.] Lit. and he was not pleased. Syr. "and he waxed wroth." The latter is so much the more natural expression that we might conjecture that the Hebrew was ויחר לו, corrupted in the Greek translator's text to וישר, "and it pleased him;" "not" being the translator's addition.

and in his wrathful indignation were they consumed.] The Syr. transposes this clause and the fourth.

he did wonders.] Perhaps בריאה ברא of Num. xvi. 30, of which the Syr. preserves a trace.

to consume them.] I.e. consuming them (Ewald, 'Lehrb.' § 280 d).

20. he made Aaron more honourable.] Rather, he gave him yet more glory, i.e. yet more than that described above. The rebellion of Korah did not directly increase his glory, although it publicly manifested and attested his Divine appointment.

and gave him an heritage.] Cp. Num. xviii. 20.

divided unto him.] Rather, apportioned to them.

the firstfruits of the increase.] ראשית בכורים, Ex. xxiii. 19; Ezek. xliv. 30,—a phrase of uncertain analysis, on which see Dillmann ad l. c. Exod.

especially he prepared bread in abundance.] "Bread" of course means food in general. "He provided" is perhaps for ערך, misread by the Syrian ("order") עֶרֶךְ.

21. From Lev. vi. 9.

22. An explanation of what was meant by the inheritance of v. 20.

he had.] Rather, he hath or "shall have."

for the Lord himself is his portion and inheritance.] Lit. (according to Vat.) he himself is thy portion, inheritance. There is no reason to doubt the genuineness of this text. The author probably intended a poetical apostrophe, in order, partly, to avoid the ambiguity of the repeated pronoun ("for He is his portion"); and he further employed a poetical construction (prob. חלקך נחלה), "thy portion as far as inheritance goes," which the translator did not fully understand; cp. Wright, 'Arabic Grammar,' ii. § 44 e. The Syrian adds, "and his inheritance is the house of Israel."

23. The third in glory.] Syr. "has received treble glory."

because he had zeal in the fear of the Lord.] בקנאו ליהוה (cp. Num. xxv. 13); apparently, however, the translators wished to avoid the juxtaposition of the two words in the original.

and stood up with good courage of heart when the people were turned back.] The Vat. gives "caused to stand;" but "stood" is defended by Syr. and by עמד in Ps. cvi. 30. Τροπὴ represents the Heb. פֶּרֶץ, "breach," which the Syrian renders more faithfully

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

24 Therefore was there a covenant of peace made with him, that he should be the chief of the sanctuary and of his people, and that he and his posterity should have the dignity of the priesthood for ever:

[b] 2 Sam. 7. 12, &c.

25 [b] According to the covenant made with David son of Jesse, of the tribe of Juda, that the inheritance of the king should be to his posterity alone: so the inheritance of Aaron should also be unto his seed.

26 God give you wisdom in your heart to judge his people in righteousness, that their good things be not abolished, and that their glory may endure for ever.

CHAPTER XLVI.

B. C. cir. 200.

1 The praise of Joshua, 9 of Caleb, 13 of Samuel.

JESUS [a] the son of Nave was valiant in the wars, and was the successor of Moses in prophecies, who according to his name was made great for the saving of the elect of God, and taking vengeance of the enemies that rose up against them, that he might set Israel in their inheritance.

[a] Numb. 27. 18. Deut. 34. 9. Josh. 1. 2. & 12. 7.

2 How great glory gat he, when he did lift up his hands, and stretched out his sword against the cities!

3 Who before him so stood to it? for the Lord himself brought his enemies unto him.

(here followed by S. H.). It means the plague which overtook the people.

and made reconciliation.] ויפלל in Ps. cvi. 31; the Syr. renders "and prayed."

24. a covenant of peace.] Num. xxv. 12: cp. Geiger, 'Urschrift,' p. 76.

that he should be the chief.] Not only in things pertaining to the sanctuary, but also the political chief of his people—with special reference to the circumstances of the time when the Siracide wrote (see the introd.).

of the sanctuary.] Lit. of the holy things, sacra. Fritzsche, "the holy ones," i.e. priests.

dignity of the priesthood] = the high-priesthood. The author would appear to have used an Aramaic derivative from a compound word (e.g. גְּדֻלַּת כֹּהֲנָה from כהן גדל).

25. According to the covenant.] The Syriac Version has: "even David the son of Jesse inherited alone the inheritance of kings; and the inheritance of Aaron is to him and his sons." The parallel is as follows: just as the royal succession was in the house of David from father to son, so was it appointed that the succession in the high-priestly office should be in the direct line. For the allusion in this to the history of the time and the succession of Onias II., see the introduction.

26. God give you wisdom.] Syr. "therefore bless God who has given you wisdom."

and that their glory may endure.] Rather, and [give] their glory. The original may have been misunderstood in some way.

CHAPTER XLVI.

This chapter treats of Joshua, Caleb, the Judges, and Samuel—in so many stanzas of unequal length. What is said concerning the Judges in v. 12 a is not inconsistent with the writer's ignoration of another life after death. For (1) the Greek rendering must be corrected by the Syr. (see note on v. 12); (2) the statement itself is modified in v. 12 b; (3) we have a significant expression in regard to Samuel in v. 19 a. More difficulty in this respect is presented by v. 20 a. We had best explain the seeming inconsistency by supposing either that the writer understood the prophesying after death in some peculiar manner; or, more probably, that he regarded those in Hades as unconscious indeed—not truly living—but not as absolutely annihilated.

1. the son of Nave.] Corrupt for "Nun" (Syr.). The same designation is used in the LXX.

was valiant in the wars.] Heb. גבור חיל (cf. Syr.), "a valiant hero."

the successor of Moses in prophecies.] The author perhaps referred to Joshua the promise of Deut. xviii. 18 (Fritzsche). Syr. "who was reserved (or "observed") to be like Moses," omitting the two following clauses.

according to his name.] Jēshū'a and J'shū'āh ("salvation").

2. and stretched out his sword.] So Alex.; Vat. "to decline." The reference is to Jos. viii. 18, 27, where Joshua stretches out his spear at the siege of Ai.

3. so stood to it.] The sentiment required seems rather what the Syriac has, "who was able to stand before him." Perhaps the word rendered "so" may have been intended to mean "then."

for the Lord himself brought his enemies unto him.] This seems no adequate reason for the statement in the previous clause. The best

B. C. cir. 200.

4 [b] Did not the sun go back by his means? and was not one day as long as two?

[b] Josh. 10. 12, 13, 14.

5 He called upon the most high Lord, when the enemies pressed upon him on every side; and the great Lord heard him.

[c] Josh. 10. 11.

6 [c] And with hailstones of mighty power he made the battle to fall violently upon the nations, and in the descent [of Beth-horon] he destroyed them that resisted, that the nations might know all their strength, because he fought in the sight of the Lord, and he followed the Mighty One.

B. C. cir. 200.

[d] Numb. 14. 6. 1 Mac. 2. 55, 56.

7 [d] In the time of Moses also he did a work of mercy, he and Caleb the son of Jephunne, in that they withstood the congregation, and with-interpretation is that of Fritzsche, who would make the words signify "the Lord brought them on," delivering state after state into the hands of the invader. We suppose that there is here a mistranslation. The Syriac renders: "for he did the wars of the Lord" (i.e. fought the battles of the Lord). This suggests an original כי את קרב יי׳ הוא קרב. The Greek (whether "wars," πολέμους, or "enemies," πολεμίους, be the right reading) missed the construction of the sentence; and, besides, failed to observe that the second קרב, "he fought," was a denominative from the first קרב, "war," and accordingly rendered it "brought near." It is not impossible that the sentence should have been introduced with "when" rather than "for." Compare, however, Jos. x. 18.

4. go back.] The author should have said "stand still." As, however, the Syr. represents this, the passage may have been interpolated from infra, xlviii. 23. The true reading is perhaps represented by MS. 155, ἐνεποδίσθη, "was hindered," followed by the Lat. It is in any case strange that he did not adopt the characteristic word quoted from the Book of Jashar.

by his means.] Lit. in his hand = through his instrumentality.

5. when the enemies pressed upon him on every side.] "When he pressed the enemies" would (in this Greek) be also a possible version. The scene referred to is apparently that of Josh. x. 8, but does not correspond accurately with the description here. The Syriac Version, "and he answered him and put power in his hand," represents perhaps the correction of someone to whom the same difficulty occurred.

heard him.] Rather, answered them (Vat.).

6. And with hailstones.] The Greek text omits "and," and connects the words "with hailstones" with the previous clause: "and answered them" (except perhaps A, S; see Nestle, 'Append.' p. 128). The hailstones were the answer.

he made the battle to fall violently upon the nations.] The Greek text must here be corrected from the Syr. and Lat.: "which he hurled upon the hostile nation." In this phrase we recognise the נוי איביו of Josh. x. 13.

and in the descent he destroyed them that resisted.] I.e. the descent of Beth-horon (Josh. x. 11).

that the nations might know all their strength.] Rather, according to the Vat. (with some other MSS.), his strength, i.e. Joshua's, or more probably God's. The Syr. has a remarkable reading: "all the accursed nations," עם חרמי. כל עמי חרמו, "the people on whom My curse has fallen," is a phrase used by Isaiah, and would here be appropriate.

because he fought in the sight of the Lord.] Lit. that [or because] against [or in the presence of] God is his war. We should render "that they are fighting against God;" the Syriac inverts the expression, "that God is fighting with them."

and he followed the Mighty One.] Rather, for he followed also behind a mighty one; גם הוא מלא אחרי אלהים: cp. Josh. xv. 8 (Fritzsche). This should be connected with the next verse.

7. a work of mercy.] The word in the original probably rather meant "piety."

in that they withstood the congregation.] All the best Greek MSS. have "the enemy," which Fritzsche understands of the inhabitants of Canaan, whom they professed themselves willing to fight. It would be less strained to interpret it, with earlier commentators, of the rebels among the congregation. "To oppose the enemy" in the sense of the evil spirit which suggested these murmurings would also be intelligible. The Syr. renders, "standing in the breach of the people," as sup. 23. This phrase, however, would not be suitable here, since Caleb and Joshua did not succeed in making reconciliation for the people, but only for themselves. The conduct referred to must certainly be that recorded in Numbers xiv. 6–10. Most probably we have to do with euphemisms. שנאיו של ישראל, "the enemies of Israel," is the euphemism held the people from sin, and appeased the wicked murmuring.

Digitized by Microsoft®

8 [e] And of six hundred thousand people on foot, they two were preserved to bring them into the heritage, even unto the land that floweth with milk and honey.

9 [f] The Lord gave strength also unto Caleb, which remained with him unto his old age: so that he entered upon the high places of the land, and his seed obtained it for an heritage:

10 That all the children of Israel might see that it is good to [g] follow the Lord.

11 And concerning the judges, every one by name, whose heart went not a whoring, nor departed from the Lord, let their memory be blessed.

12 Let their bones [h] flourish out of their place, and let the name of them that were honoured be continued upon their children.

13 [i] Samuel, the prophet of the

B. C. cir. 200.

[e] Numb. 26. 65. Deut. 1. 35, 36.

[f] Numb. 14. 38. Josh. 14. 11.

B. C. cir. 200.

[g] Josh. 14. 8, 9.

[h] ch. 49. 10.

[i] 1 Sam. 10. 1. & 16. 13.

for Israel used in the Rabbinic writings when any evil is spoken of the nation. "To withstand the congregation" would have been an offensive phrase if used as a ground of panegyric. The copy followed by the Syrian is equally euphemistic, but has taken a different line.

and appeased the wicked murmuring.] Syr. "and taking away the ill report from the land of promise." The difference between the versions is here one of conception of the situation, the Syr. having reference to Num. xiii. 27, the Greek to Num. xiv. 7. This, however, does not necessarily imply any difference in the original, in which we should expect at least one of the characteristic words הסה and דבה to be used. If the author employed the phrase דבת הארץ, the Greek "murmuring of wickedness" might conceivably (as to the latter word) come from an Aramaic gloss, ארע, which had crept into the text.

8. people on foot.] Numbers xi. 21.

to bring them.] I.e. "to be brought," since none of the others survived.

9. See Josh. xiv. 6, 11.

he entered upon the high places of the land.] Rather, he rode upon. "To ride upon the high places of the earth" occurs in Deut. xxxii. 13 and Isa. lviii. 14. Hebron is called "a hill" in Joshua l. c.

10. that it is good to follow the Lord.] Syr. "that he had fulfilled the Law of God." The phrase is from Josh. xiv. 8, 9, 14. The word טוב had fallen out of the Syrian's copy.

11. the judges.] The Syriac Version seems to attach this word to the former verse, "that he had fulfilled the Law of God and His judgments." Probably, however, for w' dīnauhy we should read w' dayyōnauhy.

every one by name.] I.e. severally. The author will not mention their names now, but bids the reader pray for their memory.

went not a whoring.] As was the case with Gideon. "Idolatry" of course is meant.

12. flourish out of their place.] Syr. "like lilies." The simplest way of reconciling these two versions will probably be to suppose that the original was כנרקסם, the change of which into ממקומם is not wholly unintelligible. We do not doubt that the Syriac is right; since "their place" will not give in this context any satisfactory meaning. Wishes that the graves of men might be green, which are so common in the Greek Anthology, scarcely seem to occur in the Bible. The wish, on the other hand, that their bones might flourish "like the narcissus," i.e. that their memory might survive and flourish, is very suitable to this passage.

and let the name of them that were honoured be continued upon their children.] The Greek words are difficult. A more literal rendering would be, "and let their name [remain] upon their children, being taken in exchange for their glorified persons;" possibly in this sense: may their children continue to treasure their names as some sort of substitute for their departed owners. The Syriac renders: "and let them leave their good name to their children and their glory to all the people." It would seem from this (1) that the word rendered ἀντικαταλλασσόμενον in the Greek was נחלף (so Fritzsche), which the Syrian translator rightly connected with the Arab. Khalaf in the sense of "to leave behind;" (2) that the last word was כְּבֹדָם, "their glory," parallel with "their name" in the first clause; (3) that for αὐτῶν (והם, "them"), the true reading was והעם, of which the third letter was omitted by a copyist's error. We render therefore: their name is left behind with their children, and their glory for their people. Their names, on the one hand, are a glory to their descendants; but, on the other, they are the pride of the people from whom they sprang. The effect of their particular achievements

B. C. cir. 200.

Lord, beloved of his Lord, established a kingdom, and anointed princes over his people.

14 By the law of the Lord he judged the congregation, and the Lord had respect unto Jacob.

[k] 1 Sam. 3. 19, 20.

15 [k] By his faithfulness he was found a true prophet, and by his word he was known to be faithful in vision.

16 He called upon the mighty Lord, when his enemies pressed upon him on every side, when he offered

[l] 1 Sam. 7. 9, 10.

[l] the sucking lamb.

17 And the Lord thundered from heaven, and with a great noise made his voice to be heard.

18 And he destroyed the rulers of the Tyrians, and all the princes of the Philistines.

19 And before his long sleep he made [m] protestations in the sight of the Lord and his anointed, I have not taken any man's goods, so much as a shoe: and no man did accuse him.

B. C. cir. 200.

[m] 1 Sam. 12. 3.

20 And after his death [n] he prophesied, and shewed the king his end, and lifted up his voice from the earth in prophecy, to blot out the wickedness of the people.

[n] 1 Sam. 28. 18, 19.

CHAPTER XLVII.

1 The praise of Nathan, 2 of David, 12 of Solomon his glory, and infirmities. 23 Of his end and punishment.

AND after him rose up [a] Nathan to prophesy in the time of David.

[a] 2 Sam. 7. 2, 3. & 12. 1. 1 Chron. 17. 1.

2 As is the fat taken away from may have long been lost and effaced, but their names are an heirloom which survives.

13. his Lord.] Syr. "his Creator," adding "him that was asked (lent) from the womb of his mother." This reference to the story of his birth is not inappropriate, and may have fallen out of the copy used by the Greek through homoeoteleuton, שמואל שמואל. But some other insertions in the Syr. of this verse render this doubtful.

14. had respect unto Jacob.] I.e. the Lat. respexit, "visited them."

15. he was found a true prophet.] Lit. was known for certain to be one.

and by his word.] So most MSS., for the Vat. reading πίστει, "in his faith." The Syr. fails us here.

16. when he offered the sucking lamb.] 1 Sam. vii. 9, 10.

18. the Tyrians.] Böttcher ('A. L.' 103) conjectured that the original meant "enemies," and was wrongly pointed by the translator. We regard this conjecture as improbable, because (1) the parallelism requires a proper name; (2) "captains of the enemies" is an improbable phrase; (3) the Syriac agrees with the Greek; (4) the Syriac suggests that the original was in the singular, צור. The writer had in mind Ps. lxxxvii. 6.

19. before his long sleep.] Syr. "at the time that he rested on his bed;" cp. Isa. lvii. 2. For the text, cp. Jerem. li. 39.

and [his] anointed.] The pronoun can only have been omitted by error in the best Greek copies.

so much as a shoe.] This is found in the LXX. of 1 Sam. xii. 13, in place of some difficult words in the Hebrew. Its occurrence here would be of critical importance for that passage, were it not that the Syr. here omits it. Probably, therefore, it is here an interpolation.

20. and shewed the king his end.] Syr. "his path:" the third instance which we have had of confusion between אחרית and ארח.

to blot out the wickedness of the people.] On the analogy of Ps. l. 10, this should mean "to atone for," "to obtain forgiveness for;" which is surely out of place. It would be possible to render the words (in Hebrew) "bidding him blot out the wickedness." But Samuel's words contain no such bidding. The interpretation which refers the words to the coming calamity is forced; moreover, the biblical narrative makes the sin of which it was the consequence Saul's exclusively. We suggest that the words had no place in the original text, but were a gloss בכפר עין דור, "in the village of Endor," referring to the scene of Samuel's posthumous prophecy, but rendered as above by the Greek translator. (The Syr. omits "people.")

CHAPTER XLVII.

After a brief allusion to Nathan—natural as following on the praises of Samuel—the writer, omitting Saul, passes first to David (vv. 2–11), and then to Solomon (vv. 12–22). Possibly v. 22 a, b may contain some dim reference to a hope of the restoration of the ten tribes. In any case the writer seems to expect a restitution of the Davidic kingdom. The closing stanza (vv. 23–25) is

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

the peace offering, so was David chosen out of the children of Israel.

3 ‖ He played with [b] lions as with kids, and with bears as with lambs.

4 [c] Slew he not a giant, when he was yet but young? and did he not take away reproach from the people, when he lifted up his hand with the stone in the sling, and beat down the boasting of Goliath?

5 For he called upon the most high Lord; and he gave him strength in his right hand to slay that mighty warrior, and set up the horn of his people.

6 So the people honoured him with [d] ten thousands, and praised him in the blessings of the Lord, in that he gave him a crown of glory.

7 For [e] he destroyed the enemies on every side, and ‖ brought to nought the Philistines his adversaries, and brake their horn in sunder unto this day.

B. C. cir. 200.

8 In all his works he praised the Holy One most high with words of glory; with his whole heart he sung songs, and loved him that made him.

9 [f] He set singers also before the altar, that by their voices they might make sweet melody, and daily sing praises in their songs.

10 He beautified their feasts, and set in order the solemn times ‖ until the end, that they might praise his holy name, and that the temple might sound from morning.

11 [g] The Lord took away his sins, and exalted his horn for ever: he gave him a covenant of kings, and a throne ‖ of glory in Israel.

‖ Or, He smote lions.

[b] 1 Sam. 17. 34.

[c] 1 Sam. 17. 49, 50, 51.

[d] 1 Sam. 18. 7.

[e] 2 Sam. 5. 7. & 8. 1, &c.

‖ Or, contemned.

[f] 1 Chron. 16. 4.

‖ Or, perfectly.

[g] 2 Sam. 12. 13.

‖ Or, of a kingdom.

devoted to a reprobation of Rehoboam and Jeroboam.

2. The fat was burnt on the altar, the rest given to the priest.

taken away.] Rather, separated; perhaps הורם.

3. He played.] The other reading, "he struck" (see marg.), has little MS. support, but is supported by the Syriac.

5. that mighty warrior.] From 1 Sam. xvii. 33.

6. So the people honoured him with ten thousands.] Syr. "the women praised him." Hebrew, unlike the other Semitic languages, has no distinction of gender in the 3rd person of the perfect plural. The expression "honoured him with ten thousands" is curiously concise, if the reference be to 1 Sam. xviii. 7. The next clause, "and praised him in the blessings of the Lord," is omitted in the Syriac. It is possible that these two clauses are only different translations of the same, with a various reading בְּרָכוֹת for בְּרֻבוֹת. The former of them, "they praised him [with] blessings" (Ewald, 'Lehrb.' § 279 d), may have been what the author intended.

in that he gave him.] Lit. when a crown of glory was being won for him; or (possibly) "carried by him" (Aeth.). The clause does not read naturally, but cannot be corrected from the Syriac "he fought little," which would be most inaccurate, and is also evidently corrupt.

7. and brought to nought.] Syr. "was avenged upon the Philistines;" Lat. extirpavit. The verb used in the Greek properly means "despised," but is occasionally employed in the LXX. to represent the Hebrew בּוּס, "to trample." It is more likely that the LXX. misunderstood the Greek than the Hebrew word.

8. he praised.] Lit. he gave thanksgiving. It seems probable that the words at the end of the clauses have been transposed, and that the author intended, "he gave glory . . . in words of thanksgiving." "Words of glory" is scarcely a Hebrew phrase; whereas "to give glory" and "a voice of thanksgiving" are common expressions.

9. This verse is interesting as shewing that our author was acquainted with the Book of Chronicles.

and daily sing praises in their songs.] This clause is omitted in all MSS. save 248 (and Co.). It is apparently due to a reminiscence of the Syriac verse, "every day continually he spake his praises before the altar; he gave mighty praises yearly."

10. He beautified their feasts.] Lit. he put beauty in feasts.

and set in order the solemn times.] Times of singing.

until the end.] Rather, perfectly.

the temple.] Rather, the sanctuary.

11. took away his sins.] See 2 Sam. xii. 13; and (perhaps) Ps. li. 9.

he gave him a covenant of kings.] The

B. C. cir. 200.

12 After him rose up a wise son, and for his sake he dwelt at large.

13 [h] Solomon reigned in a peaceable time, and was honoured; for God made all quiet round about him, that he might build an house in his name, and prepare his sanctuary for ever.

[h] 1 Kings 4. 21, 24, 25. & 5. 4, 5.

14 [i] How wise wast thou in thy youth, and, as a flood, filled with understanding!

[i] 1 Kings 4. 29, 30.

15 Thy soul covered the whole earth, and thou filledst it with dark parables.

16 [k] Thy name went far unto the islands; and for thy peace thou wast beloved.

[k] 1 Kings 4. 34. & 10. 1.

17 [l] The countries marvelled at thee for thy songs, and proverbs, and parables, and interpretations.

[l] 1 Kings 4. 31, 32.

18 By the name of the Lord God, which is called the Lord God of Israel, thou didst [m] gather gold as tin, and didst multiply silver as lead.

[m] 1 Kings 10. 22, 27.

19 [n] Thou didst bow thy loins unto women, and ‖ by thy body thou wast brought into subjection.

B. C. cir. 200.

[n] 1 Kings 11. 1, &c.

‖ Or, in.

20 Thou didst stain thy honour, and pollute thy seed: so that thou broughtest wrath upon thy children, and wast grieved for thy folly.

21 [o] So the kingdom was divided, and out of Ephraim ruled a rebellious kingdom.

[o] 1 Kings 12. 15, 16, 17, 20.

22 [p] But the Lord will never leave off his mercy, neither shall any of his works perish, neither will he abolish the posterity of his elect, and the seed of him that loveth him he will not take away: wherefore he gave a remnant unto Jacob, and out of him a root unto David.

[p] 2 Sam. 7. 15. Ps. 89. 33.

23 Thus rested Solomon with his fathers, [q] and of his seed he left behind him Roboam, even the foolishness of the people, and one that had no understanding, who [r] turned away the people through his counsel.

[q] 1 Kings 11. 43.

[r] 1 Kings 12. 10, 11, 13. 14.

verse seems to refer to the covenant that the throne should be in his house for ever; see Ps. lxxxix. 29. "A covenant of kings," however, is a curious phrase. But 248, Co., Lat., and perhaps Syr., read βασιλείας, "a charter of royalty."

12. at large.] Syr. "in quiet." The Heb. was probably ברוחה.

13. made quiet.] For this phrase, see Deut. xii. 10, &c.

that he might build.] I.e. have time to build. Compare also 1 Chron. xxviii. 3.

14. For the simile, see sup. xxiv. 25.

15. covered.] The image of the river (the Nile?) is kept up (Fritzsche).

16. far unto the islands.] Cp. the comm. on Isa. xxiv. 15.

for thy peace.] This clause seems somewhat unnatural in the context. Syr. "and they wait[ed] for thy report" = ומחכים לשמעך. Possibly ומחבים לשלמך was a corruption of this, or there may have been a word-play on the name of Solomon.

18. By the name of the Lord God.] The prosperity of Israel in the time of Solomon is attributed to his piety, and especially to the agency of the Lord.

as lead.] Syr. "as dust," connecting עפרת with עפר.

19. thou wast brought into subjection.] Lit. and hadst authority exercised over thee.

20. and wast grieved for thy folly.] Vat. "I am grieved." The Syriac has: "that they should groan upon their beds."

21. So the kingdom.] Lit. that the kingdom should be; with confusion of purpose and consequence.

22. take away.] Rather, annihilate.

any of his works.] The Syriac: "of his words."

23. the foolishness of the people.] This phrase has caused great difficulty to commentators, although the epithet "foolishness of the people" might perhaps stand for "the most foolish of the people" (Grot.), or "the author of the foolishness of the people." Fritzsche most ingeniously conjectures that we should read מזרע עמון, "from the seed of Ammon," referring to the lineage of Rehoboam's mother; and that "foolishness" should be turned into "a fool." We do not doubt, however, that the Syriac rendering, "multiplying folly," is on the whole right, though the original text is hard to reconstruct.

who turned away.] I.e. caused them to revolt. Syr. "who led the people by his counsel;" perhaps we should emend ;ܒܕ for ;ܕܒܕ "who scattered" or "divided."

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

[s] 1 Kings 12. 28, 30.

[t] 2 Kings 17. 6, 18.

There was also Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who [s]caused Israel to sin, and shewed Ephraim the way of sin:

24 And their sins were multiplied exceedingly, that [t]they were driven out of the land.

25 For they sought out all wickedness, till the vengeance came upon them.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

1 The praise of Elias, 12 of Eliseus, 17 and of Ezekias.

B. C. cir. 200.

THEN stood up [a]Elias the prophet as fire, and his word burned like a lamp.

[a] 1 Kings 17. 1.

2 [b]He brought a sore famine upon them, and by his zeal he diminished their number.

[b] Jam. 5. 17.

There was also Jeroboam the son of Nebat.] In the Greek this is the object of "left" in the first part of the verse. Syr. "let there be no remembrance to Jeroboam."

CHAPTER XLVIII.

The subject of the first stanza (vv. 1–11) is Elijah; that of the second (vv. 12–16), Elisha. In stanza ii. v. 16 forms a natural transition to the mention of the pious rulers. Accordingly, king Hezekiah, with whom the prophet Isaiah is joined, forms the subject of the third stanza (vv. 17–24). The combination of prophets with kings (Nathan with David, xlvii. 1; Isaiah with Hezekiah), as well as the emphatic notice of the prophets (Samuel, Elijah, Elisha), shew that the author intended a review of the history of Israel from its religious aspect—although, at the same time, he may in his own mind also have classed the prophets with the representatives of Chokhmah.

As regards the theological standpoint of the writer, this chapter is of great interest and importance. We mark in it several points, as they successively emerge. (1) Verse 5 b seems to give further confirmation to the opinion previously expressed (see introduction to ch. xlvi.) that the writer regarded the departed in Hades not as annihilated, although not in a state of consciousness nor of real life. (2) While we mark in vv. 10–12 the absence of any mention of or reference to a personal Messiah, there cannot be any doubt that the writer expected a Messianic kingdom, according to the Jewish conception of it. Its negative aspect in the punishment and destruction of the heathen was already set forth in ch. xxxv. 18, 19, and in the prayer, xxxvi. 1–17, where we should also notice the anticipated fulfilment of prophecy (v. 15) in the restoration of Israel and the exaltation of Zion, on which see also xxxvii. 25 b. This positive aspect of "the kingdom" was further emphasised in the reference to Abraham in ch. xliv. 21, and to Isaac (v. 22); in that to David in ch. xlvii. 11, and even in the allusions contained in v. 22. These hopes are now fully expressed in ch. xlviii. 10, 11. (3) We gather from xlviii. 10, 11, that the writer identified the advent of this happy period with the return of Elijah—sharing in this the ordinary Jewish views. (4) For the understanding of vv. 10, 11 we must call special attention to the Syriac translation, as not only restoring in some important particulars the correct text (as in the Hebrew original), but as affording to our mind clear evidence that the Syriac translation was made by a Christian hand. We further notice (5) that in v. 13 the Syriac evidently rightly omits the second clause; and lastly (6) that the writer not only fully admits the miraculous in the scriptural record of Israel (as in Samuel, Elijah, Elisha), but also the reality of prophecy as in the case of Isaiah in vv. 22–24. As regards the latter verses, there are notable differences in the Syr. Version. For, first, the Syr. has in v. 22 c, d, "as had commanded him Isaiah the prophet, the most glorious of the prophets." Secondly, v. 24 in the Syr. does not necessarily convey, as in the Greek, that Isaiah prophesied of "the last things." The Syr. version is as follows: "And in the spirit of might [probably according to Hebrew usage = "the Spirit of God"] he saw [prophesied] new things and comforted the mourners of Zion. And so long as he was in the world he saw [prophesied] signs and wonders when they were not existent [before they took place]." Comparing the Greek with the Syriac version (the Arab. is very corrupt), we ask ourselves whether the Syr. does not here represent the true Hebrew original and the Greek a later alteration?

Looking back on the large belief in the supernatural on the part of the writer, his ignoration of another life seems certainly—to say the least—logically an inconsistency. But it is just the kind of inconsistency at which we do not wonder, which indeed we almost expect, on the part of such a religious philosopher as our author.

1. as fire.] Cp. Isa. xxx. 28. The author refers to the fierce and uncompromising character of this prophet's messages.

a lamp.] Rather, a torch. Cp. Zech. xii. 6.

2. by his zeal.] With reference to 1 Kings xix. 10.

he diminished their number.] Syr. "he split them." If the Greek translation be correct,

B. C. cir. 200.

3 By the word of the Lord he ‖shut up the heaven, [c]and also three times brought down fire.

‖ Or, made heaven to hold up.

4 O Elias, how wast thou honoured in thy wondrous deeds! and who may glory like unto thee!

[c] 1 Kings 18. 38. 2 Kings 1. 10, 12.

5 [d]Who didst raise up a dead man from death, and his soul from the ‖place of the dead, by the word of the most High:

[d] 1 Kings 17. 21, 22.

‖ Or, grave.

6 [e]Who broughtest kings to destruction, and honourable men from their ‖bed:

[e] 2 Kings 1. 16.

‖ Or, seat.

7 Who heardest the rebuke of the Lord in Sinai, [f]and in Horeb the judgment of vengeance:

[f] 1 Kings 19. 8, &c.

8 [g]Who anointedst kings to take revenge, and prophets to succeed after ‖him:

B. C. cir. 200.

[g] 1 Kings 19. 15, 16.

9 [h]Who wast taken up in a whirlwind of fire, and in a chariot of fiery horses:

‖ Or, thee.

[h] 2 Kings 2. 11.

10 Who wast ‖ordained [i]for reproofs in their times, to pacify the wrath of the Lord's judgment, before it brake forth into fury, and to turn the heart of the father unto the son, and to ‖restore the tribes of Jacob.

‖ Or, written of.

[i] Mal. 4. 5, 6. Luke 1. 17.

‖ Or, establish.

11 Blessed are they that saw thee, and ‖slept in love; for we shall surely live.

‖ Or, were adorned with love.

the author refers to the "seven thousand" who were left (1 Kings xix. 18).

3. he shut up the heaven.] He held back would be more literal than the marginal alternative.

and also.] Lit. and so; i.e. and likewise.

4. For the apostrophe, compare supra, xlvii. 14.

6. Who broughtest kings to destruction.] Cp. 1 Kings xxi. 20; also xix. 16.

from their bed.] The phrase naturally reminds us of 2 Kings i. 16, where Ahaziah is represented as on a sick-bed. Yet it is remarkable if the "bringing down" of a sick man to the grave is regarded by the writer as a remarkable feat of prophetic power. Probably our author used ערש in its familiar Arabic sense of "throne." אלערש is technically "the throne of God."

7. Who heardest the rebuke of the Lord in Sinai.] The Syr. has a strange corruption, "in his temptation;" נסיונו for סיני. "The Lord" is omitted by the best MSS. "Rebuke" meant rather "reasoning," תוכחת.

the judgment of vengeance.] 1 Kings xix. 17, 18.

8. to take revenge.] Heb. לנקום. This is clearly stated as the purpose of the anointing of the kings in 1 Kings xix. 16–18. The author may well take notice of the dignity of the prophetic office here exercised.

10. Who wast ordained for reproofs in their times.] More lit. who wast written (specified) in reproofs for times, which Fritzsche ingeniously interprets, "who wast specified in the prophecy of Malachi to come at a certain time;" i.e. at the time of the restoration. [The Syriac Version has here only: "who is destined to come before the day of the Lord cometh."] In Hos. v. 9 יום תוכחה means "day of judgment," and we imagine that the author must have intended some phrase like this. This might be obtained by reading ἐλεγμός and εἰς καιρόν with inferior MSS.; הכתוב לעת תוכחה, "he that is written for [= to appear at] the time of judgment."

to pacify the wrath of the Lord's judgment.] According to the better reading, to pacify wrath before rage, i.e. before it burns (Fritzsche). The Lat. has "to pacify the wrath of the Lord." Compare Ps. ii. ad fin. The author is interpreting the last words of Malachi.

to restore.] From Isa. xlix. 6. The Syriac. "to preach to," betrays a Christian hand.

11. Blessed are they that saw thee, and slept in love.] The best Greek copies have "were adorned in love;" but as this can give no reasonable meaning in the context, we prefer the reading of the inferior MSS. "Slept in love" must, however, mean "slept contented," feeling that their best wish had been granted them; and this "in contentment" is probably only a gloss, though a singularly happy and appropriate one. This brings us to the text of the Syriac, "happy is he that shall have seen thee and die," אישרי ראיך ומת; i.e. "happy is he that shall see thee before he die."

for we shall surely live.] A difficult phrase, interpreted by the Vet. Lat. "we only live this life;" by Grotius and Fritzsche, "yet we shall surely remain alive," i.e. we shall surely live to see that day. Fritzsche finds in this passage evidence that the author looked forward to a speedy restitution, and imagined that he would live to see it. It seems to us unlikely that so cautious a writer would express his confidence so positively. We believe 12 [k]Elias it was, who was covered with a whirlwind: and Eliseus was filled with his spirit: whilst he lived, [l]he was not moved with the presence of any prince, neither could any bring him into subjection.

13 ‖ No word could overcome him; [m]and after his death his body prophesied.

14 He did wonders in his life, and at his death were his works marvellous.

15 For all this the people repented not, neither departed they from their sins, [n]till they were spoiled and carried out of their land, and were scattered through all the earth: yet there remained a small people, and a ruler in the house of David:

16 Of whom some did that which was pleasing to God, and some multiplied sins.

17 [o]Ezekias fortified his city, and [p]brought in water into the midst thereof: he digged the hard rock with iron, and made wells for waters.

18 In his time [q]Sennacherib came up, and sent Rabsaces, and lifted up

B. C. cir. 200.

[k] 2 Kings 2. 11, 15.
[l] 2 Kings 3. 14.
‖ Or, Nothing.
[m] 2 Kings 13. 21.

B. C. cir. 200.

[n] 2 Kings 18. 11, 12.

[o] 2 Chron. 32. 5.
[p] 2 Kings 20. 20.

[q] 2 Kings 18. 13, 17. Isai. 36. 1.

that the true text is preserved by the Syr.: "yet he shall not die; he shall surely live." The author recalls his former words "and die."

12. was covered with a whirlwind.] The expression is a strange one. Schleussner (iii. p. 50) would emend ἐπετάσθη for ἐσκεπάσθη (from a quotation of Jerome), "flew up;" and this seems confirmed by the Aeth. (ערג), though the freedom of that translator renders him untrustworthy. The Syriac renders: "Elias was gathered to heaven in storehouses;" the Hebrew of this was probably בסופה נאסף, "was gathered (or taken up) by a whirlwind." The Syriac translator was deceived by the intentional assonance, and the Aramaising orthography several times noticed gave him the right to read the former word באספה (see Nehem. xii. 25). The Aethiopic connects this clause with the preceding by inserting "for the sake of Elias who was," &c.

was filled with his spirit.] Syr. "and received double prophecy; and many temptations (read 'signs') and wonders spoke his mouth."

whilst he lived, &c.] The reference is to 2 Kings iii. 13, and vi. 16.

13. No word could overcome him.] This may mean either that no difficulty was too great for him, or that no secret was hid from him (Syr.). Probably there is special reference to the cleansing of Naaman, and therefore the first interpretation is to be preferred.

and after his death his body prophesied.] Lit. when he was at rest. The Syr. omits this clause; and its meaning is doubtful. The only possible reference is apparently to 2 Kings xiii. 21. But against this interpretation is (1) the certainty of the reference of 14 b to that fact, (2) the strangeness of the expression "prophesied." It has been suggested that the clause is spurious. If it were genuine, 14 b could only refer to Elisha's interview on his death-bed with the king; for in the case of such a worker of miracles the author would have no occasion to refer to the same act twice. But the language of the clause plainly renders any such reference impossible. Fritzsche's conjecture on this point is very improbable.

14. wondrous were his works.] Syr. "he raised the dead to life;" perhaps an incorrect gloss (see above).

15. till they were spoiled and carried.] Omit the last two words as an addition of the A. V. Fritzsche's ingenious conjecture that נשבו and נישסו have been confused, and that the true reading signified "were carried away captive" is confirmed by the Syr.

The author thus closes the history of the great and good men of Israel.

yet there remained a small people.] Compare Isa. vi. 11.

and a ruler in the house of David.] The Syr. renders this verse: "and Judah was left alone a small domain for the house of David." It is likely that the Syrian rightly translated the word שלטן, "dominion," and that the original meant either "the realm of the house of David," or "as subjects for the house of David."

16. that which was pleasing to God.] The MSS. omit the last two words.

17. water.] The best MSS. strangely give τὸν Γώγ, "Gog," ingeniously interpreted by Geiger ('Z. D. M. G.' xii. 542) as a corruption for ἀγωγόν, "a conduit;" a conjecture confirmed by S^2. Fritzsche suggests a corruption of "Gihon." "Water" is the rendering of the Syr., Lat., Aeth., S. H. (marg.), and the reading of many MSS. The corruption must have originated in a Greek MS. The Hebrew word was probably תעלה.

wells.] Rather, reservoirs.

18. and sent Rabsaces.] The best MSS. add "and he marched." As the Syr. and

B. C. cir. 200.

his hand against Sion, and boasted proudly.

19 Then trembled their hearts and hands, and they were in pain, as women in travail.

2 Kings 19. 15, 20.

20 [r] But they called upon the Lord which is merciful, and stretched out their hands toward him: and immediately the Holy One heard them out of heaven, and delivered them by the ‖ ministry of Esay.

‖ Or, hand.

2 Kings 19. 35. Isai. 37. 36. Tobit 1. 18. 1 Mac. 7. 41. 2 Mac. 8. 19.

21 [s] He smote the host of the Assyrians, and his angel destroyed them.

2 Kings 18. 3.

22 [t] For Ezekias had done the thing that pleased the Lord, and was strong in the ways of David his father, as Esay the prophet, who was great and faithful in his vision, had commanded him.

B. C. cir. 200.

23 [u] In his time the sun went backward, and he lengthened the king's life.

[u] 2 Kings 20. 10, 11. Isai. 38. 8.

24 He saw by an excellent spirit what should come to pass at the last, and he comforted them that mourned in Sion.

25 He shewed what should come to pass for ever, and secret things or ever they came.

CHAPTER XLIX.

1 The praise of Josias, 4 of David and Ezekias, 6 of Jeremy, 8 of Ezekiel, 11 Zorobabel, 12 Jesus the son of Josedec, 13 of Necmias, Enoch, Sem, Seth, and Adam.

THE remembrance of [a] Josias is like the composition of the perfume that is made by the art of the

[a] 2 Kings 22. 1. 2 Chron. 34. 1.

Lat. versions omit this, and it is unnecessary if not perplexing in this context, it must be regarded as a dittography of καὶ ἐπῆρεν.

lifted up his hand.] This is the reading of the worse MSS., but doubtless correct. For the expression, compare 2 Sam. xx. 21.

19. Omitted in the Syr.

22. was strong in.] Rather, abode by, החזיק (Fritzsche). On the Syriac of clauses c and d, see the introd.

23. In his time.] Syr. "by his hands," reading בידיו (for ביומיו), which is probably right; compare, however, sup. xlvi. 4. The Syriac reading also makes the transition to Isaiah less abrupt.

24. what should come to pass at the last.] חדשות, "new things" (Isa. xlii. 9), like the Lat. novissima, seems from the Syr. to have been in the original. On the Syr. rendering of this verse, see the introd.

them that mourned in Sion.] From Isa. lxi. 2, 3.

25. or ever they came.] Isa. xlii. 9.

CHAPTER XLIX.

This chapter consists of four stanzas. The subject of the first (vv. 1–3) is pious king Josiah, on whom, as a bright example of piety in very dark days, the writer dilates with peculiar tenderness. In the second stanza (vv. 4–10) the mention of the three pious kings—David, Hezekiah, and Josiah—leads him, by way of contrast, to speak of the wicked kings who had brought such unutterable misery on Israel. In accordance with our author's method of combining kings (or reigns) with prophets, the reference to these kings brings up the names of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, as well as the twelve prophets. The two former are described in accordance with the scriptural presentation of the leading features in their prophetic activity. We mark that, as afterwards Philo, our author gives special prominence to Jeremiah. The arrangement of his prophecies into those of judgment and consolation (v. 7 c, d) is in accordance with Jewish views. In v. 9 the subject is not Ezekiel but God, whose vision by Ezekiel had been described in v. 8 (see note on v. 9). In regard to v. 10 b, see the note.

The third stanza (vv. 11–13) refers to the activity of the post-exilian Jewish heroes: Zerubbabel, Joshua, and Nehemiah. Ezra is not mentioned. The review of Israel's history closes, not inaptly, in the fourth stanza (vv. 14–16) with a retrospect upon the fathers of Israel's history: Enoch, Shem, Seth, and Adam. It will be observed that they are enumerated in the inverse order of their succession. They are selected as the worthies to whom Israel's covenant-history would be traced up. In regard to Adam, however, it is not clear whether v. 16 b does not refer mainly to his priority in time, as the first human being, the father of the whole race.

1. Josias.] See the passages cited in the margin.

like.] Lit. serves for. With the expression compare Cant. i. 2.

the composition of the perfume.] See Ex. xxv. 6, xxxi. 10. The translator adopts the LXX. version of the Hebrew words, in which קטרת is perhaps derived from a wrong root, meaning properly "burning," "fumigation."

B. C. cir. 200.

apothecary: it is sweet as honey in all mouths, and as musick at a banquet of wine.

‖ Or, prospered.
[b] 2 Kings 23. 4, &c. 2 Chron. 34. 3, 33.
[c] 2 Kings 23. 3, 25.

2 He ‖behaved himself uprightly in the conversion of the people, [b]and took away the abominations of iniquity.

3 [c]He directed his heart unto the Lord, and in the time of the ungodly he established the worship of God.

4 All, except David and Ezekias and Josias, were defective: for they forsook the law of the most High, even the kings of Juda failed.

[d] 2 Chron. 36. 17.
‖ Or, horn.

5 [d]Therefore he gave their ‖power unto others, and their glory to a strange nation.

B. C. cir. 200.

6 [e]They burnt the chosen city of the sanctuary, and made the streets desolate, ‖[f]according to the prophecy of Jeremias.

[e] 2 Kings 25. 9. 2 Chron. 36. 19.
‖ Or, by the hand of Jeremy.
[f] Jer. 37. 8.

7 For they [g]entreated him evil, who nevertheless was a prophet, [h]sanctified in his mother's womb, that he might root out, and afflict, and destroy; and that he might build up also, and plant.

[g] Jer. 38. 6.
[h] Jer. 1. 5, 10.

8 [i]It was Ezekiel who saw the glorious vision, which was shewed him upon the chariot of the cherubims.

[i] Ezek. 1. 3, 4, 15.
[k] Ezek. 13. 11. & 38. 9, 16, 22.

9 For he [k]made mention of the enemies under the figure of the rain, and ‖directed them that went right.

‖ Or, did good.

that is made.] The Greek text refers "made" to the remembrance; the English translation follows a necessary correction.

as musick, &c.] For the author's estimate of this, see sup. xxxii. 5, 6.

The reference in clause 1 is not, however, necessarily to the incense of the sanctuary, but the meaning may be that of pleasure and refreshment, such as is conveyed to all the senses by perfume, honey, and music. And so it was a Jewish saying that "three things calm the mind of man, and they are these: sound [voice, music], sight, and smell [perfume]" (Ber. 57 b).

2. He behaved himself uprightly.] The original probably meant "he succeeded." The Syr. renders: "he was hidden from temptations." This perhaps represents no different reading, but a false connexion of the derivative of שוב employed by the author with שבה, "to carry captive;" which led to this glossing of the word "succeeded." The verse indicates why his "remembrance" was so precious. On the activity of Josias, comp. 2 Kings xxiii. 24.

3. he established the worship of God.] Lit. he strengthened.

4. The verse begins the second stanza. The author, one imagines, might also have mentioned at least Jehoshaphat and Asa; but (as Fritzsche remarks) the worship in the "high places" continued in their time.

failed.] I.e. came to ruin. Or, perhaps, rather, they deserted their post of duty.

5. he gave.] The Greek MSS. have all they gave, and this is rendered certain by the Syr. The author either refers to those foreign alliances which the prophets so severely condemned, or makes them responsible for the result to which their actions led. Indeed, the two would be combined in the view of the writer. He would chiefly have in mind the calling in of the Assyrian power by Ahaz, with all its disastrous consequences to Judah and Israel; comp. 2 Kings xvi. 7.

6. They.] The strange nation.

the streets.] Syr. "the ruins thereof." חרבות and רחבות were various readings. Doubtless the Greek reading is to be preferred.

according to the prophecy.] Lit. "by the hands." We must read with the Syr. בימי, "in the days" of Jeremiah. The same variation was noticed at xlviii. 23.

7. Comp. the corresponding passages in Jeremiah, which can scarcely leave a doubt that the younger Siracide had the LXX. version of Jeremiah before him. The reference is to the twofold commission of Jeremiah: to destroy and to build.

8. the glorious vision.] Rather, the vision of the glory = הכבוד. The reference is to the visions described in Ezek. i., viii., and x.

which was shewed him.] Rather, which he shewed him.

9. For he made mention of the enemies under the figure of the rain.] Lit. in rain. "Rain" is referred by the commentators to the ὑετὸς κατακλύζων, "flooding rain," with which in Ezek. xiii. 11 (LXX.) the false prophets are threatened. But the whole verse is so difficult and unsatisfactory that it cannot be supposed to represent the original faithfully. The Aeth. renders: "and he mentioned the enemy with wrath," anticipating Fritzsche's conjecture that the Hebrew זעם, "wrath," was corrupted into זרם, "flooding rain," in the translator's copy. The Syr., "and even concerning Job he

B. C. cir. 200.

10 And of the twelve prophets let the memorial be blessed, and [l] let their bones flourish again out of their place: for they comforted Jacob, and delivered them by assured hope.

[l] ch. 46. 12.

11 How shall we magnify [m] Zorobabel? even he was as a signet on the right hand:

[m] Ezra 3. 2. Hag. 2. 23.

12 So was [n] Jesus the son of Josedec: who in their time builded the house, and set up an holy temple to the Lord, which was prepared for everlasting glory.

B. C. cir. 200.

[n] Ezra 3. 2. Hag. 1. 12. & 2. 2. Zech. 3. 1.

13 And among the elect was Neemias, whose renown is great, [o] who raised up for us the walls that were said," clearly reading אִיּוֹב for אוֹיֵב, as Arnaldus and Geiger observed. Accepting this correction ("Job" for "the enemy"), both these scholars imagine the reference to be to Ezekiel's mention of Job (xiv. 14). But it is improbable that so unimportant a fact would be alluded to here, although Ezekiel's mention of Job might have reminded our author of him. We would propose translating: For He [God] remembered [made remembrance of = זָכַר, so rendered in the LXX., especially frequently in the Psalms; see particularly Ps. ix. 12 (Heb. 13) and Ps. lxxiv. 22 (LXX.: Ps. lxxiii.)] the enemy in storm. We suggest that the Greek translator misread בִּישָׁעִירִם, "in rain-shower" (Deut. xxxii. 2, which the LXX. render by ὄμβρος as in our verse), instead of בִּיסַעֲרָה, "in storm"—or else "He remembered the enemy in wrath," if he misread זֹרֵם for זֹעֵם. Either of these corrections would make clause 1 correspond with clause 2, which would not be the case if we were to correct "enemy" into "Job," the introduction of that name being also unsuited to the context.

[o] Neh. 7. 1.

and directed them that went right.] Lit., according to the better reading, to do good to them, &c. Geiger ('Z. D. M. G.' xii. 572) emended the whole verse as follows: גַּם אֶת אִיּוֹב זָכַר בְּסַעֲרָה לִגְמֹל דַּרְכֵי יְשָׁרִים, "Job, too, he remembered in the whirlwind to repay his righteous dealing." To the twofold commission of Jeremiah (v. 7), which the writer conceives to be further confirmed by the visions of Ezekiel (v. 8), corresponds the twofold activity of God: towards His enemies and to those that "go right."

10. let the memorial be blessed.] This clause is found only in MS. 248.

let their bones flourish again.] The Syriac here supports the Greek. The repetition of these words from ch. xlvi. 12 (see the connexion there) deprives them of the meaning which some might attach to them as referring to the resurrection of the body.

for they comforted.] On the supposition that these two clauses are here in their right place, we must adopt this reading, which is supported by the Syr. and the Vet. Lat., though not found in the best MSS., which give the singular. The latter would necessitate a reference to God (v. 9), and also the transposition (Fritzsche) of the last two lines of v. 10 to v. 9. In that case v. 10 would consist of only the first three lines in the A. V. On the whole we prefer this re-arrangement for the reason about to be mentioned.

and delivered them by assured hope.] Lit. by (in) assurance of hope. Whether we retain this and the previous line in their present position, or, as we prefer, add them to v. 9, the subject must be "God." The Syr., which adopts the plural number ("they comforted") consistently with the reference to the prophets, alters the last line as follows: "and promised them that they should be delivered."

11. Here begins stanza iii. The omission of Ezra is somewhat remarkable. It is scarcely accounted for by the circumstance that only the rebuilding of the Temple and city were in the mind of the writer (Fritzsche). Did he feel out of sympathy either with the person or the special activity of Ezra in regard to the Law?

a signet.] The author adheres to his custom of employing characteristic phrases. In our view the writer does not intend to refer to the signet as an ornament, but to indicate that in and by Zerubbabel the previous promises of God to Israel were sealed.

12. Jesus the son of Josedec.] See Zech. iii. 1–9.

who in their time.] The addition seems needless, and, as we might expect, the Syriac is different; "by their exhortation," Polyglot; "in their poverty," Lagarde: the former is supported by the Arab., which, however, is corrupt. It is probable that the author wrote "with their hands," בִּידֵיהֶם, which was corrupted into בִּימֵיהֶם, as so often in these chapters.

builded the house, and set up an holy temple.] Syr. "set up an altar and built a holy temple." This rendering avoids the tautology.

prepared.] A reference to Haggai's well-known prophecy; though the Siracide had no conception of the manner in which it would be fulfilled in the coming of the Messiah.

B. C. cir. 200.

fallen, and set up the gates and the bars, and raised up our ruins again.

14 But upon the earth was no man created like [p]Enoch; for he was taken from the earth.

15 Neither was there a man born like unto [q]Joseph, a governor of his brethren, a stay of the people, whose bones were regarded of the Lord.

16 [r]Sem and Seth were in great honour among men, and so was Adam above every living thing in the creation.

B. C. cir. 200.

[p] Gen. 5. 24. ch. 44. 16. Hebr. 11. 5.
[q] Gen. 41. 43. & 42. 6. & 45. 8. & 50. 25. Exod. 13. 19.
[r] Gen. 5. 3, 32. & 11. 10.

CHAPTER L.

1 Of Simon the son of Onias. 22 How the people were taught to praise God, and pray. 27 The conclusion.

SIMON the high priest, the son of Onias, who in his life re-

13. And among the elect was.] The better reading is, and may the memory of Nehemias be great. Compare Jos. 'Ant.' xi. 5, 8, where it is recorded that Nehemiah called priests and Levites from the country into the thinly populated city, and built them houses at his own expense (Fritzsche).

our ruins.] Lit. our ground-plots. The original was probably, however, חרבות, "ruins."

14. The author having come to the end of the national history in the last stanza takes a retrospect of the "fathers" of Israel's covenant-history. It was perhaps in order to indicate this that their names are introduced in the reverse order of their chronological succession. If Enoch was rightly omitted by the Syr. in xliv. 16, the introduction of his name here will be more intelligible.

was no man.] Syr. "few;" doubtless an intentional alteration, perhaps from a Christian hand.

15. a governor.] Rather, a leader; the reference is to Gen. xlix. 26, נזיר אחיו.

a stay of the people.] This and the previous clause are omitted by Syr.

whose bones were regarded of the Lord.] "Of the Lord" must be omitted. Aeth. "his bones found mercy." Lat. et post mortem prophetaverunt, an interpolation from xlviii. 13. Syr. "and his body was gathered in peace;" whence it appears that the reference is to the careful conveyance of the body of Joseph from Egypt (see Ex. xiii. 19; Jer. xxiv. 32). Possibly the author used the word נקברו, "were buried," of which the second and third letters had become transposed in the Greek translator's text; the word בקר ("to look to," "to care for") is occasionally rendered ἐπισκέπτεσθαι in the LXX. The Syriac adds the words "in peace." It is possible that that word itself (בשלם) represents a corruption of "in Shechem" (בשכם).

16. were in great honour among men, &c.] Syr. "Seth, Shem, and Enos were created among men; and over all these is the glory of Adam." It has been suggested that the Hebrew original may have consisted of a combination of the first clause of the Greek with the second of the Syriac. Some word which either bore the two meanings, "create" and "glorify," or while signifying the latter was similar in form to a word meaning the former, must have been employed in both clauses. Shem and Seth represent the ancestors of the pious part of the postdiluvian and antediluvian world respectively. The "Enos" of the Syrian is probably nothing more than a dittography of באנוש, "among men."

CHAPTER L.

This chapter describes the services of the Temple in the time of Simon I., whose character and administration are highly extolled, and whose appearance in the various functions of his high-priestly office are also set forth under a variety of figures. It closes with a grand eulogy, perhaps in imitation of those at the end of each of the five books in the Psalter. This is followed by what we regard as a spurious later addition, alike in the Hebrew original and the Greek Version (see note on vv. 25, 26). The book concludes with the name of the writer and a general commendation of that which formed the subject of the whole work.

The chapter seems arranged into six stanzas:—Stanza i., vv. 1–4: praise of Simon I. as high-priest and ruler (see the General Introduction). Stanza ii.: the high-priest on the Day of Atonement, vv. 5–10. Stanza iii.: the high-priest in the ordinary functions of his office, vv. 11–20. Stanza iv.: grand eulogy, vv. 22–24. [Stanza v.: later insertion, vv. 25, 26.] Stanza vi.: general conclusion, vv. 27–29. Thus the chapter would consist of four verses (stanza i.), six verses (stanza ii.), ten verses (4 + 6, stanza iii.), four verses (stanza iv.), and, omitting the interpolated stanza v., three verses (stanza vi.).

1. Simon the high priest, the son of Onias.] Syr. "son of Nathaniah," a name with an easier etymon than "Onias." In the list of the high-priests of that period we have no fewer than three of the name of Onias (four, if we include Menelaus; five, if we add the Onias who founded the temple at Leontopolis) in paired the house again, and in his days fortified the temple:

B. C. cir. 200.

2 And by him was built from the foundation the double height, the high fortress of the wall about the temple:

[a] 1 Kings 7. 23.

3 In his days the [a]cistern to receive water, being in compass as the sea, was covered with plates of brass: B. C. cir. 200.

4 He took care of the temple that it should not fall, and fortified the city against besieging:

5 How was he honoured in the midst of the people in his coming out of [‖]the sanctuary! ‖ Gr. the house of the veil.

Egypt. As regards the question which Simon is referred to in this verse—whether the first or the second of that name—we refer to the General Introduction, § II. The Syr. adds, "greatest of his brethren and crown of his people was." And some such phrase seems required to give the sentence a commencement; it may have been omitted in the Greek copy by design or by neglect—probably the former.

repaired the house.] Gr. ὑπέρραψεν, well rendered in Latin by Kessler, "sartam tectam praestitit;" Heb. רִפָּא (Fritzsche). On the subject of these repairs we must once more refer to the General Introduction, § II.

fortified the temple.] Rather, strengthened or "rebuilt;" see the references in Ges. 'Thes.' s. v. חָזַק.

2. And by him was built, &c.] This verse is obscure, and precise historical details are wanting (see General Introduction, § II.). The author apparently refers to a high surrounding wall built round the Temple; many of the words are to be found in the description of the palace at Persepolis given by Diodorus xvii. 71. The second clause may be translated "a lofty structure, a surrounding wall for the Temple." Ἀνάλημμα—in the LXX. 2 Chron. xxxii. 5 for "Millo"—is employed to designate any massive structure; see Wesseling ad l. c., Diod., Suidas s. v., with the references in Bernhardy's edition. The first clause is rendered more difficult by the phrase ὕψος διπλῆς; which should mean, "by him was founded (= built) to the height of a double;" "a double," διπλῆ, signifying some measure of length. In any case ὕψος, so close to ὑψηλόν, would suggest that the text was either corrupt or mistranslated. Perhaps the former was the case, and the original had חוֹמוֹת, signifying a "double wall" (compare l. c. Diod.), which the Syrian (whose text, however, is deficient) misread קוֹמוֹת, "height." For various suggestions on this locality, see Fritzsche.

3. The A. V. here follows an emended text. The Greek literally rendered would be: in his days was diminished a receptacle of waters, brass [or, with some MSS., "a lake"], in circumference like that of a sea. It is clear that this "diminished" cannot represent the original correctly; nor are the attempts that have been made to correct the Greek text successful. Fritzsche, whose criticisms on the attempts of his predecessors are here as elsewhere painfully sharp, reads ἐλατομήθη, "was cut out of stone;" a correction far inferior to that of Herzfeld ('Gesch. Israels,' ii. 195), ἠλατώθη. The Syriac Version, though it only preserves two words of the verse, enables us to correct the error with certainty. It renders "he dug a well," shewing that חסר, "diminished," in the Greek copy was an error for חפר, "dug." But this also shews us that in the second clause λάκκος, "a lake," must be substituted for χαλκός, "brass," of the best MSS.; a substitution in accordance with the canon that a more difficult reading is to be adopted in preference to one easier. The whole verse should then be rendered, in his days was dug out a receptacle of waters, a reservoir in circumference like a sea. There seems here an allusion to some public work, probably with a view to render a longer defence of Jerusalem possible.

4. He took care of the temple.] The A. V. follows an emendation; all the best authorities have: who took thought for his people.

that it should not fall.] Rather, against ruin.

against besieging.] The author would seem to mean "to stand a siege in," i.e. so that it could stand a siege. Ἐμπολιορκεῖσθαι would have been the correct Greek rather than ἐμπολιορκῆσαι. The mistake may be due either to the translator or to his copyists.

5. Stanza ii. The description of the high-priest during the most solemn function of his office: on the Day of Atonement.

in the midst of the people.] Ewald took the words to mean "during the circuit of the people," i.e. "on the solemn feast-day when the people walked in solemn procession round the sanctuary." But this is impossible, since there was no such circuit on the Day of Atonement. Syr. "when he departed out of the temple;" whence Bretschneider corrected the Greek ναοῦ for λαοῦ.

in his coming out of the sanctuary.] Rather, when he came out from the house of

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

6 He was as the morning star in the midst of a cloud, and as the moon at the full:

7 As the sun shining upon the temple of the most High, and as the rainbow giving light in the bright clouds:

8 And as the flower of roses in the spring of the year, as lilies by the rivers of waters, and as the branches of the frankincense tree in the time of summer:

B. C. cir. 200.

9 As fire and incense in the censer, and as a vessel of beaten gold set with all manner of precious stones:

10 And as a fair olive tree budding forth fruit, and as a cypress tree which groweth up to the clouds.

11 When he put on the robe of honour, and was clothed with the the veil, i.e. from behind the Veil—from the Holiest of all. As the high-priest only entered the Holiest of all on the Day of Atonement, the reference must be to his "glorious" appearance on that day. For details of the services of that day, we refer to 'The Temple and its Services,' ch. xvi. The appearance of the high-priest is described in the following verses under eleven figures.

6. as the morning star.] Compare Isa. xiv. 12.

in the midst of a cloud.] Syr. "between clouds."

the moon at the full.] Lit. full in days. Syr. "in the days of Nisan;" a remarkable reading, which, if right, would seem to refer to the Paschal moon—but, if so, incorrectly. On the other hand, the autumn full moon—the harvest-moon—would be a much more suitable figure. It, as well as some of the subsequent figures, gains in significance when we remember that on the Day of Atonement the high-priest wore "linen garments" ('Temple and its Services,' pp. 266, &c.).

7. As the sun shining upon the temple of the most High.] Syr. "upon a palace" (Heb. היכל? or אפדן?). The author is referring to gilt rooves.

in clouds of glory.] Syr. omits "of glory."

8. as the flower of roses in the spring of the year.] The expression "spring of the year" is the same as in xxiv. 23. Syr. "like the ears of the field;" an equally natural simile in our author's mind: see on xl. 22.

as the branches of the frankincense tree.] The meaning of the expression βλαστοὶ λιβάνου has been questioned. That represented by the A. V. is adopted by Fritzsche; and the reference to midsummer is explained by him (after Hug) from the observation of Theophrastus ('Hist. Plant.' ix. 1, 6), that the tree is tapped "under the Dog-star and in the hottest days." It has been suggested that the mention of frankincense in the next clause renders this interpretation improbable; and that we should translate "the shoots of Lebanon," עצי לבנון. This might indeed be referred to the fragrant herbs which grew there (so Herzfeld, l. c.; compare Cant. iv. 11), but it is more probably to be interpreted of the cedars, whose magnificent growth affords the material for so many biblical similes; since rich and luxurious vegetation rather than fragrance is the characteristic of all the plants mentioned in v. 10. On the other hand, however, aromatic plants alone are mentioned in one verse, and the mention of "branches of the frankincense tree" would form an apt transition to "the incense" in the next verse.

in the time of summer.] Probably "in harvest time," בימי קציר; cp. Syr. here, and LXX. of Prov. xxvi. 1. This corresponds with the date of the Fast.

9. As fire and incense.] The figure of hendiadys is not common in the Semitic languages. We prefer, therefore, the reading of the Syr., אשׁי לבנה, "offerings of incense"—conjectured independently by Fritzsche.

as a vessel of beaten gold.] Compare the similes in xxxii. 5, 6.

10. a fair olive tree.] "Fair" is found only in 248, Co.

budding forth fruit.] Rather, bringing forth. Syr. "whose branches are mighty," perhaps thinking of פארה for פריה.

as a cypress tree which groweth up to the clouds.] The cypress is φύσει ὑψηλόν (Theophrastus, 'Caus. Plant.' III. vii. 4). The tree spoken of, however, seems to have been the עין שכן, or oleaster (cp. Syr.). The expression "which groweth up to the clouds" is so strange that even without the Syriac we might have guessed that the author had used the word עב, which bears the twofold meaning of "cloud" and "foliage," and that the latter was the sense which the author intended to convey. Theophrastus ('Hist. Plant.' I. viii. 3 and III. vi. 2) observes on the regularity of the boughs of this tree. To this feature our author probably alludes, but the original is difficult to reconstruct out of ὑψουμένη and ܡܫܡܫ.

11. Second stanza.

When he put on the robe of honour.] The

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200. perfection of glory, when he went up to the holy altar, he made the garment of holiness honourable.

12 When he took the portions out of the priests' hands, he himself stood by the hearth of the altar, compassed with his brethren round about, as a young cedar in Libanus; and as palm trees compassed they him round about.

13 So were all the sons of Aaron in their glory, and the oblations of the Lord in their hands, before all the congregation of Israel.

14 And finishing the service at the altar, that he might adorn the offering of the most high Almighty,

[b] Deut. 32. 14. ch. 39. 26. 15 He stretched out his hand to the cup, and poured of [b] the blood of the grape, he poured out at the foot of the altar a sweetsmelling savour unto the most high King of all.

B. C. cir. 200.

16 Then shouted the sons of Aaron, and [c] sounded the ‖ silver trumpets, and made a great noise to be heard, for a remembrance before the most High.

[c] Numb. 10. 8, 10.

‖ Or, trumpets beaten forth with the hammer.

17 Then all the people together hasted, and fell down to the earth upon their faces to worship their Lord God Almighty, the most High.

18 The singers also sang praises with their voices, with great variety of sounds was there made sweet melody.

19 And the people besought the Lord, the most High, by prayer before him that is merciful, till the distinctive vestments of the high-priest (see 'The Temple and its Services,' p. 72). Although during the ordinary part of the services on the Day of Atonement the high-priest wore his usual vestments—"the robe of honour," or, as it is called, "the golden vestments"—yet it seems more likely that the reference now is to the ordinary, or to the Sabbatic, or other festive functions of the high-priest. This, partly because it is not likely that these functions would remain wholly unnoticed, partly because we should scarcely expect that after the full description of the appearance on the Day of Atonement the writer would go back to it again. The wearing of the "golden vestments" during part of the Day of Atonement seems alluded to in the figure of v. 9. In connexion with this it here deserves notice that the services of that day were concluded by the high-priest in his "golden vestments" ('Temple and its Services,' pp. 285, 286). Indeed, a comparison of the figures in vv. 5–10 will shew that they correspond with the rubric regarding the vestments to be worn by the high-priest in the various functions of that solemn day.

he made the garment of holiness honourable.] Rather, he made the surrounding [the ambitus] of the sanctuary glorious. "The surrounding of the sanctuary" is the Court of the Priests where "the holy altar," i.e. the altar of burnt-offering, stood. For the rendering of ἁγίασμα by "sanctuary," comp. Ecclus. xlvii. 10, 13; xxxvi. 15; xlix. 6. The high-priest might officiate on any day and in any of the priestly functions.

12. the portions.] Syr. "of flesh." The sacrifice was cut up in pieces according to certain rules, and salted before being laid on the altar. For the various rubrics, comp. 'The Temple and its Services,' pp. 90, 100, 135, 141.

compassed with his brethren round about.] On the number of priests who carried up the various sacrifices, comp. u. s. p. 90.

as a young cedar in Libanus.] Omitted by Syr.; perhaps it has come in from v. 8.

13. For the detailed explanation of the order of service as here described we must refer to the account of these services, u. s. ch. viii.

14. And finishing the service at the altar.] Lit. and performing completion on the altars; Syriac, "until he had finished serving the altar." The latter would seem to represent the better reading; מְשֹׁרֶת was read by the Greek translator מְשֻׁרֶת, and עד כלה taken by him for an adverbial phrase (probably we should read εἰς συντέλειαν for καὶ σ.).

that he might adorn the offering.] Rather, while adorning or performing.

15. the cup.] Heb. קִשּׂוֹת, not used in singular. The "drink-offering" was poured on the base of the altar: comp. 'The Temple and its Services,' p. 142.

16. silver.] The marginal rendering is more literal. Immediately after the "drink-offering," the Temple-music began (u. s. pp. 142–144). On the musical part of the service, comp. u. s. pp. 52–57.

19. "The Psalm of the day was always sung in three sections. At the close of each

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200. solemnity of the Lord was ended, and they had finished his service.

20 Then he went down, and lifted up his hands over the whole congregation of the children of Israel, to give the blessing of the Lord with his lips, and to rejoice in his name.

21 And they bowed themselves down to worship the second time, that they might receive a blessing from the most High.

Ps. 72. 22 Now therefore [d]bless ye the God of all, which only doeth wondrous things every where, which exalteth our days from the womb, and dealeth with us according to his mercy. B. C. cir. 200.

23 He grant us joyfulness of heart, and that peace may be in our days in Israel for ever:

24 That he would confirm his mercy with us, and deliver us at his time!

25 There be two manner of nations which my heart abhorreth, and the third is no nation:

26 They that sit upon the mountain of Samaria, and they that dwell among the Philistines, and that foolish people that dwell in Sichem.

the priests drew three blasts from their silver trumpets, and the people bowed down and worshipped" (u. s. p. 143).

20. On the priestly benediction and the response of the people, see u. s. p. 141. In the Temple of Herod the priestly blessing was given before the meat- and drink-offering and the Psalmody.

21. Although this verse seems naturally to connect itself with that which precedes, the structure of the chapter (see introduction) requires it to be connected with the hymn which follows.

22–24. Although put in the mouth of the people, this is rather ideal than real, and the hymn of thanksgiving must be regarded as the original composition of the Siracide rather than as forming part of the services in the Temple. Its catholic character, as distinguished from narrow Jewish views (v. 22 a, b); its expression of a wider gratitude (v. 22 c, d); its healthy tone (v. 23), and its pathetic utterance of hope (v. 24), entitle it to a place among the loftiest of uninspired hymns. As noticed in the General Introduction, it has been reproduced in the well-known German hymn of Rinckart (about 1648): Nun danket alle Gott—with special appropriateness to the circumstances of the time of its composition—the close of the Thirty Years' War. (For its translation into English, see 'Hymns Ancient and Modern,' No. 379.) The Syriac version of the hymn is as follows:

"And let the people of the earth praise the Lord,
Who doeth famous things on earth,
And created the sons of man from out the womb of their mother,
And ruleth them according to His will,
To give unto them wisdom of heart;
And let there be peace between them;
And let mercy be established with Simon:
[or: And let it be established with Simon the Just (see General Introduction, p. 6)]
And with his seed, as the days of heaven."

It will be observed that while the Syriac rendering is in the first five lines more universal in its tone than the Greek, being probably modified by the Syriac translator, the last three lines seem more accurately to express what one would expect to have been in the mind of the original Hebrew writer.

25, 26. There be two manner of nations, &c.] It has been suggested that these two verses have the appearance of being a riddle, containing the author's name or an indication of the date at which the book was completed. Upon the whole their insertion in this place—after the concluding eulogy of vv. 22–24 and before the customary close in vv. 28, 29—seems so strange and incongruous that we are disposed to regard them as the later addition of a scribe, and as dating from near the time of Herod. This on account of the covert allusion to Edom, which, as the birthplace of the family of Herod, the Idumæan, was held in such general hatred at that time. For the reference to "the mountain of Samaria" must have been intended to cover some other allusion, the Samaritans being referred to in the last clause of the verse. The Hebrew original had no doubt "in mount Seir," referring to Edom. This is preserved in the Syr. גבל (comp. Ps. lxxxiii. 8—while in the Samar. version of the Pentateuch Seir is rendered by גבלה). Similarly, the Vet. Lat. translates: in monte Seir. By the expression "Philistines," we conjecture that the foreign—Grecian—settlers in Palestine (advenæ) are meant, especially those who inhabited the older Philistine and Phœnician cities by the sea-coast. The

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

27 Jesus the son of Sirach of Jerusalem hath written in this book the instruction of understanding and knowledge, who out of his heart poured forth wisdom.

28 Blessed is he that shall be exercised in these things; and he that layeth them up in his heart shall become wise.

29 For if he do them, he shall be strong to all things: for the light of the Lord leadeth him, who giveth wisdom to the godly. Blessed be the Lord for ever. Amen, Amen.

CHAPTER LI.

A Prayer of Jesus the son of Sirach.

I WILL thank thee, O Lord and King, and praise thee, O God my Saviour: I do give praise unto thy name:

B. C. cir. 200.

2 For thou art my defender and helper, and hast preserved my body from destruction, and from the snare of the slanderous tongue, and from the lips that forge lies, and hast been mine helper against mine adversaries:

3 And hast delivered me, according to the multitude of thy mercies and greatness of thy name, from ‖ the teeth of them that were ready to devour me, and out of the hands of such as sought after my life, and from the manifold afflictions which I had;

‖ Gr. the gnashing of the teeth.

4 From the choking of fire on every side, and from the midst of the fire which I kindled not;

words "they that dwell among" are taken from H, 248, Co., but are not in any of the principal MSS., which have only "the Philistines."

CHAPTER LI.

Viewed generally, this chapter consists of three parts: Part I., vv. 1–12; Part II., vv. 13–27; Part III., vv. 28–30. The first two parts consist of several stanzas. Part I. has two stanzas, each of five verses (vv. 1–5; 6–10), and closes with a stanza of two verses (vv. 11, 12). Part II. has three stanzas, each of five verses (vv. 13–17; 18–22; 23–27). Part III., which may be regarded as the general conclusion, consists of one stanza of three verses. Not only the different parts of this chapter, but the stanzas of which each part consists, are well marked by the difference of the subject in each of them. Perhaps this is least clear in Part I. But here also we notice that from the record of strictly personal events in stanza i. (vv. 1–5) the writer passes in the second stanza (vv. 6–10) to a more general religious consideration of them and a statement of his own spiritual experience, which in the third stanza rises into thanksgiving (vv. 11, 12). This forms an apt conclusion of Part I. In Part II. the writer once more gives in the first stanza (vv. 13–17) what may be called a more personal account of his inner life as regards Wisdom, and again passes in the second stanza (vv. 18–22) to a more general statement in regard to it. Lastly, stanza iii. is an admonition addressed to all, and based on the writer's personal experience of Wisdom. This prepares for Part III., which contains a general commendation of the pursuit of wisdom and piety.

As regards critical points we note that this chapter is wanting in the S. H. Version, and in one or two MSS. Fritzsche would place it before v. 27 of the last chapter, without any adequate ground. Bickell endeavours to prove that it was an alphabetical psalm. In any case, from its personal character, the author was justified in making it an appendix to his book, within which it would have been entirely out of place. The Syriac Version has many strange variations (as in the preceding chapters), all of which do not require to find a place here.

1. I will thank thee, &c.] Cp. the commencement of Ps. cxxxviii. The Aeth. inverts clauses 1 and 2. On the circumstances of danger which beset the author, see the General Introduction, pp. 4, 8, 13.

2. For thou art.] Rather, hast been on a particular occasion.

from the snare of the slanderous tongue.] For the circumstances in Ben Sira's personal history which explain this verse, comp. the General Introduction, pp. 4, 8.

mine adversaries.] Lit. those who stood beside me—naturally in a hostile sense, "waiting to destroy me."

3. and greatness of thy name.] Lit. and of thy name. The text, if right, exhibits a remarkable zeugma. Aeth. "and on account of thy name." Some MSS. (with the Lat.) solve the difficulty by omitting the copula; and this Fritzsche adopts after Drusius. The original is likely to have been כרב חסדי שמך, "according to the multitude of the

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

5 From the depth of the belly of hell, from an unclean tongue, and from lying words.

6 By an accusation to the king from an unrighteous tongue my soul drew near even unto death, my life was near to the hell beneath.

7 They compassed me on every side, and there was no man to help me: I looked for the succour of men, but there was none.

8 Then thought I upon thy mercy, O Lord, and upon thy acts of old, how thou deliverest such as wait for thee, and savest them out of the hands of the enemies.

9 Then lifted I up my supplication from the earth, and prayed for deliverance from death.

10 I called upon the Lord, the Father of my Lord, that he would not leave me in the days of my trouble, and in the time of the proud, when there was no help. B. C. cir. 200.

11 I will praise thy name continually, and will sing praise with thanksgiving; ‖and so my prayer was heard: ‖ Or, because my prayer.

12 For thou savedst me from destruction, and deliveredst me from the evil time: therefore will I give thanks, and praise thee, and bless thy name, O Lord.

13 When I was yet young, or ever I ‖went abroad, I desired wisdom openly in my prayer. ‖ Or, went astray.

14 I prayed for her before the temple, and will seek her out even to the end.

15 Even from the flower till the mercies of Thy Name," when the ו was corrupted into ו. The reason for the periphrase must have been rhythmical.

4. which I kindled not.] I.e. trouble which I had brought on by no folly of my own. It is likely, however, that there is a mistranslation, and that the original meant "so that I was not burnt."

5. the belly of hell.] Or, rather, Hades—so also in v. 6. The phrase is from Jonah's hymn (ii. 3, בטן שאול), to which this chapter contains several allusions. The meaning is that he was guiltless.

unclean tongue.] Comp. Isa. vi. 5, "of unclean lips," which, however, is rather different.

6. By an accusation to the king from an unrighteous tongue.] The text of the best MSS. is here corrupt and must be corrected. The inferior MSS. read διαβολῆς for διαβολή. The text means: from a false accusation to the king, from the accusation of an unrighteous tongue. The A. V. follows a correction, διαβολῇ. Copt. "from the calumny of the tongue of violence of the king." This clause, however, really forms part of the preceding verse, to which it should be joined. With the next clause begins the second stanza, which is connected with the first by the resumption of the reference to Hades.

my soul drew near, &c.] Similar complaints are frequent in the Psalms.

7. They compassed me.] Syr. "I turned behind."

8. out of the hands of the enemies.] The better MSS. have: hands of the Gentiles. This would also fit in better with the peculiar circumstances of danger in which the writer was placed.

10. the Lord, the Father of my Lord.] "Christi ut apud Davidem Ps. cx. 1" (Grotius). This, however, is impossible in such a book as this. The Syriac shews us that the original text signified: "unto the Lord, my father, O Lord."

in the time of the proud, when there was no help.] The construction is difficult; the best critics seem, however, agreed about the meaning.

11. Concluding stanza of Part I.

and so (rather, yea) my prayer was heard.] Apodosis of v. 10. The whole cast of this stanza is entirely in accord with the spirit of the Old Testament. Whatever Israel lost in its degenerate times, it was not the dignity of suffering.

13. The verse begins Part II. Here Bickell makes the alphabetical portion begin.

or ever I went abroad.] The commentators are divided between this meaning and that suggested in the margin. For the author's travels, see xxxiv. 11. Yet "to wander" need mean no more than "to leave the nest."

openly.] Perhaps "loudly."

14. before the temple.] Cp. Ps. v. 8; cxxxviii. 2. The posture of the suppliant is that of looking towards the sanctuary.

and will seek her out.] A holy resolution to persevere in what he had from the first

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

grape was ripe hath my heart delighted in her: my foot went the right way, from my youth up sought I after her.

16 I bowed down mine ear a little, and received her, and gat much learning.

17 I profited therein, therefore will I ascribe the glory unto him that giveth me wisdom.

18 For I purposed to do after her, and earnestly I followed that which is good; so shall I not be confounded.

19 My soul hath wrestled with her, and in my doings I was exact: I stretched forth my hands to the heaven above, and bewailed my ignorances of her.

‖ Or, I got understanding.

20 ‖I directed my soul unto her, and I found her in pureness: I have had my heart joined with her from the beginning, therefore shall I not be forsaken.

B. C. cir. 200.

21 My ‖heart was troubled in seeking her: therefore have I gotten a good possession.

‖ Or, bowels.

22 The Lord hath given me a tongue for my reward, and I will praise him therewith.

23 Draw near unto me, ye unlearned, and dwell in the house of learning.

24 Wherefore are ye slow, and what say ye of these things, seeing your souls are very thirsty?

25 I opened my mouth, and said, [a] Buy her for yourselves without money.

[a] Isai. 55. 1.

26 Put your neck under the yoke, and let your soul receive instruction: [b] she is hard at hand to find.

[b] Deut. 30. 14.

sought, and in which experience had confirmed the wisdom and goodness of his choice.

15. Even from the flower till the ripening grape.] The writer has in mind Isa. xviii. 5. If the reading adopted by the A. V. be right, the author is referring to his own lifetime, "from earliest youth to manhood." The simile is a common one in the classical poets. Horace's immitis uvae and Pindar's γενύσι φαίνων τέρειναν ματέρ' οἰνάνθας ὀπώραν will occur to many readers. Most MSS., however, have ὡς, "as," for ἕως, "till," giving a difficult verse, which might be explained with Fritzsche: "from her [Wisdom's] flower, as from the ripening grape," &c.

16. and gat myself, &c.] Compare the phrase in the Prologue.

17. I profited.] Rather, I made progress. Syr. "her yoke became a glory to me." Perhaps עֻלָּהּ has been confused with עלה.

18. This verse begins a new stanza.

19. hath wrestled with her.] Syr. "clung to her." Can there be any reference here to the wrestling of Jacob? But the word is not the same as that used in Gen. xxxii. 21.

and in my doings I was exact.] The best MSS. have "and in the doing of hunger," which is evidently impossible. The reading of the A. V. is found in a few MSS. Possibly we should accept Fritzsche's correction, ποιήσει νόμου, "doing of the law:" comp. xix. 18.

20. The order of the clauses in the T. R. is as follows: "I directed my soul," "I have had," "I found her." It is clear that the order of the A. V. is correct, which is supported by A and S.

I have had my heart joined.] Lit. I gained heart, i.e. I acquired wisdom, קניתי לב (as the Syr. shews).

with her.] The T. R. has "with them." The Syr. omits the phrase.

21. My heart.] The marginal reading is that of all the best authorities, doubtless altered for decency's sake. Syr. "my entrails burned like an oven."

23. This verse begins a new stanza. The Orientals feel no modesty in praising their own works. In an Arabic letter shewn the commentator, the author of a poem in honour of Mohammad writes: "Have you not heard what the author of it says of it?—'Blessed are all they that read it; lost are all they that cast it aside.'" At the same time the praise in this verse may be intended rather for what formed the subject of the work than for the writer's mode of presenting it.

24. and what say ye of these things.] These words are omitted by the best MSS., and are shewn to be spurious by the Syr. In reality they represent a gloss τί λήγετε upon the διότι ὑστερεῖτε, "why are ye slow," of the text.

25. A recommendation willingly to submit themselves. The expression "yoke" for "obligation" is common in Jewish writings:

Digitized by Microsoft®

B. C. cir. 200.

[c] ch. 6. 19.

27 [c]Behold with your eyes, how that I have had but little labour, and have gotten unto me much rest.

28 Get learning with a great sum of money, and get much gold by her.

29 Let your soul rejoice in his mercy, and be not ashamed of his praise.

B. C. cir. 200.

30 Work your work betimes, [d]and in his time he will give you your reward.

[d] Rom. 2. 6, 7.

comp. Ab. iii. 5; Ber. iii. 2 (especially the latter).

26. Syr. adds, "and he that giveth his soul will find her."

27. The labour was brief, the rest great and lasting. We prefer referring the sentence to the author's experience as regards his submission to wisdom and piety than to the labour of composing his book and the satisfaction ensuing from it.

rest.] The Syr. omits the word. Perhaps מַנָּחָה, "a present," should have been read rather than מְנוּחָה, "rest."

28. Concluding part. The Syr. renders this verse: "Hear my teaching though little, and ye shall gain silver and gold by me."

Digitized by Microsoft®

BARUCH.

INTRODUCTION.

	PAGE
§ I. Contents and Division	241
§ II. The reputed Author	242
§ III. The alleged Place and Time of Writing	244
§ IV. Relation to the Canonical Books of the Old Testament	248
§ V. Original Language	248
§ VI. Probable Date	250
§ VII. Text	251
§ VIII. Place in Canon	252
Appendix: The Titles of God in Baruch	253

§ I. Contents and Division.

The Book of Baruch, as it stands in the Authorized Version, consists of several parts distinctly marked:—

Chap. i. 1–14. Historical Preface, describing the origin of the book.

Chap. i. 15—iii. 8. Israel's Confession and Prayer in the time of captivity.

Chap. iii. 9—iv. 4. Israel admonished to return to the Fountain of Wisdom.

Chap. iv. 5—v. 9. Encouragement and promise of a happy deliverance.

The Epistle of Jeremy, which appears in the A.V. as Baruch chap. vi., is a distinct work, which it will be better to consider in a separate Introduction.

The first step towards determining the relation of these several parts to each other, and to the whole, is to state briefly the contents of each, before attempting to examine them critically.

Chap. i. 1–14. The Historical Preface. (a) Origin of the Book in Babylon (i. 1–9). (b) Message sent with the Book to Jerusalem (i. 10–14).

(a) This is the Book which Baruch wrote in Babylon, in the fifth year after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, and read in the ears of King Jechonias and all the captives who dwelt by the river Sud. "Whereupon they wept, fasted, and prayed before the Lord;" and, having collected money, sent it to Jerusalem with the book (v. 14), and with the silver vessels brought from the Temple, which Zedekiah had made after Jechonias had been carried away captive by Nebuchadnezzar (1–9).

(b) With the money and the book was sent this message: "Spend the money in sacrifices, pray for Nebuchadnezzar and his son Balthasar, that we may live long and happily under their shadow, and that God may forgive us our sins, and turn his anger from us. Read this book of confession and prayer in the Temple upon the solemn Feasts" (10–14).

Chap. i. 15—iii. 8. Israel's Confession and Prayer. (a) Confession of sins (i. 15—ii. 10). (b) Prayer for forgiveness and deliverance (ii. 11—iii. 8).

(a) The Lord is righteous, but we and our fathers have sinned against Him since the day that He brought them out of the land of Egypt (i. 15–19). The judgments therefore which God foretold by Moses and the Prophets have justly fallen upon us; yet, notwithstanding all God's terrible chastisements, we have not repented and turned to Him (i. 20—ii. 10).

(b) And now, Lord, remembering Thy mercy to our fathers in Egypt, we acknowledge our sins, and pray Thee to "deliver us for thine own sake," that our afflicted souls may live to praise Thee (11–18). We plead not any righteousness of our fathers, or of our kings. Thy prophets warned us to submit to the king of Babylon, but we hearkened not to the warnings which Thou hast now made good upon our fathers, upon us, and on Thy holy House (19–26). Yet in all this Thou hast dealt mercifully with us, according to Thy word by Moses, that, after being made few in number and scattered among the heathen, Thy people should remember themselves and turn unto Thee, and be brought back to the land promised to their forefathers, and be joined to Thee in an everlasting covenant, and be no more cast out of the land (27–35).

Digitized by Microsoft®

We cry to Thee in anguish: hear us in Thy great mercy: hear the prayers of Thy people, and remember not their iniquities: for now Thou hast put Thy fear in our hearts, and we praise Thee this day in the midst of our captivity (iii. 1–8).

Chap. iii. 9—iv. 4. ADMONITION TO RETURN TO THE FOUNTAIN OF WISDOM. Why art thou in captivity, Israel? Because thou hast forsaken the Fountain of Wisdom. Where Wisdom is, there is life and peace (9–14). But who has found the place of Wisdom? Not the rulers of the earth, nor those whose hearts were set upon riches; neither they, nor their children after them, nor the wise of all nations, nor the giants of old time have found Wisdom. None hath found her in all the wide world, in the sky, or beyond the sea; none but the All-Wise, the Maker of the world and all that is therein, whom the light and the stars obey (15–34). This is our God, and He hath given wisdom unto Israel in the Law that endureth for ever. Happy art thou, O Israel, if thou wilt walk in that light (iv. 1–4).

Chap. iv. 5—v. 9. ENCOURAGEMENT, AND PROMISE OF A HAPPY RETURN. Let Israel take courage. The remnant shall not perish, though they have provoked God to jealousy by idolatry, and have grieved Jerusalem their mother (5–8).

Sion appeals to her neighbours for pity, because her children have departed from God's law, and been carried into captivity by a strange and terrible nation (9–16). Turning now to her children, she cries, How can I help you? He that hath sent these evils on you will deliver you. Go your way; and while I in sackcloth cry unto the Eternal, cry ye also to Him for deliverance. For He has given me a joyful hope that ye shall return with gladness. Therefore bear His chastisement patiently, and ye shall see the destruction of your enemies. Seek Him with tenfold earnestness, and He will save you (17–29).

Jerusalem herself now receives a message of comfort. Woe to thy enemies! Woe to the city where thy children are in bondage! She shall be desolate, burned with fire, a habitation of demons.

See thy children gathered to thee again. Put on again thy glorious apparel. God giveth thee a new name. Arise! Stand upon the height, and see every valley exalted, every mountain brought low, that thy children may be brought back to thee in the light of the glory of God (iv. 30—v. 9).

Looking back over this summary of the contents, we see clearly that there is no essential connexion between the first portion i. 1—iii. 8, consisting of the Prayer and its historical preface, and the second part iii. 9—v., containing the Praise of Wisdom and the Promise of speedy deliverance.

Accordingly, in considering the questions of Authorship, of the Time and Place of Composition, and of the Original Language, we cannot admit any argument which rests on the supposed unity of the Book, but must examine the two parts separately, before attempting to discover how they came to be connected.

§ II. THE REPUTED AUTHOR.

We do not propose in this section to discuss the authenticity of the book, but only to review the historical and traditional notices of Baruch, the reputed author.

The book which bears the name "Baruch" ("Blessed") professes to contain "the words of the book which Baruch the son of Neriah . . . wrote in Babylon in the fifth year" after "the Chaldeans took Jerusalem and burnt it with fire."

Digitized by Microsoft®

The Baruch here meant is unquestionably the companion of the prophet Jeremiah, described by Josephus as "being of a very illustrious family, and eminently learned in his native tongue." ('Ant.' x. ix. § 1.) He is first mentioned in Jer. xxxii. 12, as "the son of Neriah;" and was thus the brother of "Seraiah, the son of Neriah, the son of Maaseiah," who went to Babylon with Zedekiah, king of Judah, taking with him the book in which Jeremiah had written "all the evil that should come upon Babylon" (Jer. li. 59, 60).

The ancestry of Baruch is traced back for three generations before his grandfather Maaseiah in Baruch i. 1, an historical notice the truth of which is generally admitted.

In Jeremiah xxxvi. Baruch appears as the prophet's faithful friend, who wrote in the roll of a book, and read first to the people assembled in the outer court of the Temple on a public Fast-day, in December 605 B.C., and then in the ears of the princes of Judah, all the words in which Jeremiah gave warning of the coming destruction. Of Baruch we do not hear again until after the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, 588 B.C.; but from the statement of Josephus, in the passage already quoted, that Jeremiah, when set free from chains at Ramah (Jer. xl. 1–6), entreated Nebuzaradan to release Baruch also, we may infer that he had shared his master's captivity.

After the murder of Gedaliah and the flight of Ishmael (Jer. xli.), the prophet delivered to "the remnant of Judah" a warning from God not to seek refuge in Egypt, but to remain quietly in their own land (xlii.). The advice was rejected, and Baruch was accused of urging Jeremiah to deliver the people into the hands of the Chaldeans (xliii. 3); and both the prophet and his faithful companion were compelled by "the captains of the host" to go with them into Egypt, where they dwelt at Tahpanhes (v. 7), a town of Lower Egypt on the eastern border, near Pelusium, called by Herodotus Daphnae, and identified by Sir Gardner Wilkinson with Tel-Defenneh ('Dict. of the Bible').

There Jeremiah uttered his prophecies of the conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar (xliii. 8–13 and xlvi., xlvii.), and his remonstrance against the idolatry of his countrymen in Egypt (xliv.). The fulfilment of Jeremiah's predictions, though not recorded in the historical books of the Old Testament, is attested by Josephus, who says that Nebuchadnezzar slew the king of Egypt, and set up another in his place, and again made captive the Jews who were in Egypt, and led them away to Babylon ('Ant.' x. 9, § 7).

According to a Jewish tradition (Seder olam rabba, c. 26) Jeremiah and Baruch were both carried away to Babylon at this time, and a trace of this same tradition is seen in the Greek superscription of Ps. cxxxvii., which the Vatican Codex attributes to Jeremiah (Τῷ Δαυὶδ Ἱερεμίου).

Another tradition, mentioned by S. Jerome ('adv. Jovin.' ii. 9), states that Jeremiah and Baruch both died in Egypt, the former being stoned by the Jews at Tahpanhes, for his stern rebuke of their apostasies. This is usually regarded as the most trustworthy account: but, according to another rabbinical tradition, Baruch left Egypt after his master's death, and himself died in Babylon twelve years after the destruction of Jerusalem.

In concluding this notice of the reputed Author of the Book, we may draw attention to an interesting view of the personal character of Baruch in Jer. xlv. The chapter expressly refers to the fourth year of Jehoiakim, when Baruch wrote the words of Jeremiah in a book, and read them in the ears of the princes (Jer. xxxvi.). Baruch himself was deeply affected by the message which he had to deliver: "Thou didst say, Woe is me now! for the Lord hath added grief to my sorrow; I fainted in my sighing (R.V. I am weary with my groaning), and I find no rest."

But the word of the Lord must be fulfilled: "That which I have planted I will pluck up, even this whole land." Let Baruch therefore form no vain hopes, nor seek great things for himself, but be content to know that wherever he may go his life shall be protected.

The nature of this prophecy explains its position: being purely personal and private, it is not inserted in the course of the history after Jer. xxxvi., but appended, with other isolated prophecies, at a later period, probably after the death of Jeremiah, to his final remonstrance against the idolatry of his countrymen in Egypt.

§ III. The alleged Place and Time of Writing.

According to the account given in Baruch i. 1–14, the book was written by Baruch, the son of Neriah, "in Babylon, in the fifth year, and in the seventh day of the month, what time as the Chaldeans took Jerusalem and burnt it with fire."

The first question is, To what capture of Jerusalem does this statement refer?

(1.) In the year B.C. 606, Nebuchadnezzar "came up, and Jehoiakim became his servant three years" (2 Kings xxiv. 1): "then he turned and rebelled against him. And the Lord sent against him bands of the Chaldees, ... and sent them against Judah to destroy it, according to the word of the Lord, which he spake by his servants the prophets" (v. 2). On this occasion, according to 2 Chr. xxxvi. 6, Nebuchadnezzar bound Jehoiakim "in fetters, to carry him to Babylon," but this intention seems to have been frustrated by the death of Jehoiakim (2 Kings xxiv. 6; Jer. xxii. 18, 19): "Nebuchadnezzar also carried of the vessels of the house of the Lord to Babylon" (2 Chron. xxxvi. 7).

Jehoiachin, who succeeded, reigned only three months, and then was carried to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, with great treasure, and with the princes and all the men of might. These events took place B.C. 599–597; but though Jerusalem was besieged and taken more than once, there is no mention of its being burnt with fire at this time.

(2.) In the eleventh year of Zedekiah, B.C. 588, the king having been previously carried away captive to Babylon, "came Nebuzaradan . . . unto Jerusalem, and he burnt the house of the Lord, and the king's house, and all the houses of Jerusalem, and every great man's house burnt he with fire" (2 Kings xxv. 9). The same event is described in similar language in 2 Chron. xxxvi. 19, it being expressly mentioned that "they burnt the house of God, and brake down the wall of Jerusalem, and burnt all the palaces thereof with fire."

It is beyond all reasonable doubt that this latter destruction of Jerusalem is the event referred to in the words of Baruch i. 2, "what time as the Chaldeans took Jerusalem, and burnt it with fire:" and in the fifth year after that event, i.e. in 583 B.C., Baruch is said to have written the book and read it in the ears of Jehoiachin. (Compare note on i. 2.)

The objections urged against the historical truth of this statement are numerous, the most important being drawn from the representations in i. 1–14: but our course will be cleared if we deal first with arguments drawn from other portions of the book.

Thus, in the sections iii. 9—iv. 4 and iv. 5—v. 9, there are expressions which betray a later date than the fifth year after the burning of Jerusalem in 588 B.C. In iii. 10 a late period of the Captivity is implied in the words "thou art waxen old in a strange country:" and in iv. 22, 24, 25, the assurance that the promised deliverance is near at hand is emphatically repeated.

It is not enough to answer, as Reusch does on iv. 22, that "the seventy years of the exile are but a short time in comparison with the 'everlasting joy' which follows thereon (iv. 29; v. 1: compare Isa. liv. 7, 'For a small moment have I forsaken thee; but with great mercies will I gather thee. In a little wrath I hid my face from thee for a moment; but with everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee).'" In fact, the continuance of the Exile for seventy years was foretold, not as a short but as a long time, in direct contradiction to the false prophet who promised deliverance within two full years (Jer. xxviii. 3, 11; xxix. 5–10).

With regard to Isa. liv. 7, 8, the prophet appears to set himself in imagination beyond the close of the Captivity, whereas Baruch is supposed to write not long after its commencement. In looking back upon the Exile as past, it was quite natural to regard it as of short duration: but the hope of speedy deliverance in Baruch iv. 22–25, though put into the mouth of Sion at the time of her children's departure, is in fact only suited to a late period of the Captivity, and is directly contrary to the expectation expressed in i. 12, "We shall serve them many days."

The true answer is that the objection is decisive as to the later date of these sections, but does not affect the previous section, i. 1—iii. 8, which is perfectly distinct.

Returning to the introductory section, i. 1–14, we have to consider the objection that it "contains historical errors which are inconceivable in a contemporary, but may fairly be imputed to a later writer."

The general charge, thus stated by Fritzsche and adopted by most Protestant commentators, is based upon alleged misrepresentations of—(A) the personal history of Baruch; (B) the circumstances of the captives in Babylon; (C) the condition of Jerusalem.

A. The presence of Baruch in Babylon in the fifth year after the destruction of Jerusalem (1) has no other evidence, and (2) is improbable, because Baruch attached himself constantly to the person of Jeremiah, and he was at that time still alive (Fritzsche: so also Lange).

(1.) As regards the want of evidence to confirm the statement that Baruch was in Babylon (i. 1), it might be fairly answered that there is no evidence against it, and therefore no inference to be drawn either way. The scriptural history, as we have seen, is silent concerning the latter years of Jeremiah and Baruch after their arrival at Tahpanhes.

Either of the traditions above mentioned, that they were both carried away by the Chaldeans from Egypt to Babylon, or that Baruch after his master's death joined the Jewish exiles in Babylon and died there twelve years after the destruction of Jerusalem, is in itself as probable as the other tradition, that both remained in Egypt and died there.

(2.) The confident assumption that Jeremiah was still alive in the fifth year after the destruction of Jerusalem is not supported by any particle of evidence. On the other hand, the tradition that both died in Egypt states also that Jeremiah was stoned by his countrymen: if this were so, the occasion was probably his rebuke of their idolatry, which seems to have occurred soon after his arrival at Tahpanhes (Jer. xliii. 8—xliv.); and probability is thus given to the view that Baruch survived him. We conclude that, beyond the statement of i. 1, 2, there is no evidence either for or against Baruch's visit to Babylon, and no improbability in it. Certainly we cannot admit Fritzsche's positive assertion: "There is, therefore, an error in i. 1, 2."

B. (1.) "According to i. 3, King Jehoiachin was present at the reading; but at that time he was still in prison" (Fritzsche).

This objection rests solely upon an extremely literal, and probably exaggerated, view of the statement in 2 Kings xxv. 27, concerning the release of Jehoiachin by Evil-Merodach many years later. It is not probable that the king or his fellow-captives were kept for thirty-seven years in such close confinement as to be forbidden to meet together to listen to the reading of a book by one of their number.

(2.) "In i. 11 the son of Nebuchadnezzar is called Balthasar."

Balthasar, i.e. Belshazzar (Dan. v. 1), was the grandson of Nebuchadnezzar, and, according to the custom of the writers of the Old Testament, might be called his son, as in Dan. v. 2, 11, 18, Nebuchadnezzar is called the "father" of Belshazzar, being in fact his grandfather. Our author, taking the expression too literally, makes Belshazzar heir to the throne during the life of Nebuchadnezzar.

Nebuchadnezzar's son and successor, Evil-Merodach (2 Kings xxv. 27; Jer. lii. 31), was murdered by his brother-in-law Neriglissar, on whose death (556 B.C.) his infant son, Laborosoarchod, was murdered by the usurper Nabonadius (Labynetus). This last having married a daughter of Nebuchadnezzar (Nitocris), associated his eldest son, Belshazzar, with himself as co-regent, thus restoring the line of Nebuchadnezzar. Nabonadius, when defeated by Cyrus, fled to Borsippa, while Belshazzar was shut up in Babylon and there perished, B.C. 538. The touching prayer of Nabonadius for Belshazzar —"my eldest son, the offspring of my heart,"—in one of the cuneiform inscriptions, is given in the 'Speaker's Commentary' on Dan. v. 1, where the history of the period is admirably discussed.

C. State of Jerusalem.—(1.) It is argued that the state of Jerusalem in the fifth year after its destruction by the Chaldeans could not have been such as is assumed in the request of the exiles that their money might be spent in sacrifices (i. 10), and the book read in the house of the Lord upon the feasts and solemn days.

Reusch answers that of the people who had not been carried away some would naturally gather again round Jerusalem (compare Jer. xl. 12), having among them some priests who had either been left behind by the Chaldeans or had escaped and hidden themselves: that though Temple and Altar had both been destroyed, they might have raised an Altar among the ruins, and resumed their sacrifices and observance of the Feasts, as well as the circumstances would permit. This explanation is in fact justified by the statement in Jer. xli. 5, that there came Jews "from Shechem, and Shiloh, and Samaria, with offerings and incense in their hand, to bring them to the house of the Lord."

Thus the ruins of the Temple (as the chief modern interpreters agree) are still called by Jeremiah himself "the house of the Lord;" and if offerings are brought in less than three months after its destruction, much more may have been done in five years towards a partial restoration of the accustomed worship.

(2.) "It is not true that Joachim was at that time the High Priest."

In this objection there are two points to be examined: (a) The title ascribed to Joachim, the son of Hilkiah; (b) The date.

(a) "The priest" (ὁ ἱερεύς, i. 7) very frequently means "the High Priest," this latter title (הַכֹּהֵן הַגָּדוֹל) being rare in the Pentateuch, and the corresponding ἀρχιερεύς still rarer. On the other hand, ἀρχιερεύς has become frequent in the Apocryphal books, while ὁ ἱερεύς is, apparently, only once in them applied to the High Priest (1 Macc. xv. 1, 2).

In Jeremiah (xx. 1; xxi. 1; xxix. 20, 21; xxxvii. 3; lii. 21) we find "the priest" (ὁ ἱερεύς) used as a distinctive title of persons who were not the High Priests, as "Pashur the son of Immer, the priest, who was also chief governor in the house of the Lord" (xx. 1–6) in the time of King Jehoiachim, and "Zephaniah the son of Maaseiah, the priest" (xxi. 1; xxxvii. 3) in the time of Zedekiah. To this Zephaniah a letter was sent by Shemaiah from Babylon, in which he said, "The Lord hath made thee priest in the stead of Jehoiada the priest, that ye should be officers in the house of the Lord" (xxix. 26).

The office in which Zephaniah succeeded Jehoiada was that of "second priest," or "Sagan," as we learn expressly from Jer. lii. 24: "The captain of the guard (Nebuzaradan) took Seraiah the chief priest, and Zephaniah the second priest," and brought them to Riblah, where they were put to death, B.C. 587, and Seraiah was succeeded as High Priest by his son Jehozadak, who was carried away captive to Babylon (1 Chr. vi. 14).

Thus the contemporary usage of the title by Jeremiah, and the absence of the name of Joachim from the list of High Priests in 1 Chr. vi. 13, 14, combine to shew that Joachim is called "the priest," as being the successor of Zephaniah in the office of "second priest" and "governor of the house of the Lord."

(b) As to the date Kneucker (p. 208) argues that "the author of the (alleged) interpretation (i. 4–9) has no doubt mistaken the time at which Joachim son of Hilkiah attained the office of 'second priest,' when he puts him in office in the fifth year after the capture of Jehoiachim, i.e. B.C. 595: for he was much earlier."

But "the fifth year" is not B.C. 595, but, as we have shewn, B.C. 583, and even with this later date there is no such mistake as is alleged.

Hilkiah is mentioned as High Priest in the eighteenth year of Josiah (2 Kings xxii. 4), i.e. about 620 B.C. His son might therefore well be the "second priest" in 583 B.C., about thirty-seven years later; and in that office he would have the care of the treasury, more especially in the absence of the High Priest in Babylon.

Digitized by Microsoft®

(3.) Another alleged error is the statement that "vessels of the house of the Lord" were at that time brought back, "namely silver vessels" which Zedekiah had made (i. 8).

The golden vessels provided by Solomon (1 Kings vii. 48–50; 2 Chr. iv. 19–22) are said to have been "cut in pieces" (2 Kings xxiv. 13), or, according to 2 Chr. xxxvi. 10, carried away by Nebuchadnezzar, when he brought Jehoiachin "to Babylon, with the goodly vessels of the house of the Lord."

On this occasion (599 B.C.) there is no mention of silver vessels. But at the end of Zedekiah's reign, when Nebuzaradan "burnt the house of the Lord," we read (2 Kings xxv. 9, 15) that "the fire-pans, and the bowls, and such things as were of gold, in gold, and of silver, in silver, the captain of the guard took away."

This express mention of silver vessels at the end of Zedekiah's reign, and the absence of any such mention on the previous occasion, seem to give probability to our author's statement (i. 8) that they had been made by Zedekiah to replace the golden vessels which had been destroyed and carried away at the beginning of his reign: just as, when Shishak carried away the golden shields which Solomon had made, Rehoboam made shields of brass to replace them (2 Chr. xii. 10). "It is true," says Reusch, "that in Kings and Chronicles (where the narrative of the reign of Zedekias is very defective) this is not expressly stated, but it is in itself very probable that Zedekias, the successor of Jehoiachin, caused those golden vessels, such at least as were indispensable to the Temple service, to be replaced by new, cheaper, silver ones.

"These new silver vessels, together with the others which had been left behind in 599 B.C., were carried away to Babylon in 588 B.C., after the destruction of Jerusalem (2 Kings xxv. 13 ff.), and were (as we learn from Baruch) restored at this time,—being either redeemed by the exiles or restored by Nebuchadnezzar out of compassion to the penitent Jews; while the other silver and the golden vessels remained in Babylon till the time of Cyrus."

There is nothing improbable in this explanation, and the allegation of error, resting only on an argument e silentio, is by no means proved.

The following is, according to Reusch (p. 47), the most probable combination of events partly stated, partly assumed, in the Book of Baruch.

"In the fifth year after the destruction of Jerusalem, i.e. in 583 B.C., Baruch was in Babylon, and read his book to Jechoniah and an assembly of the Jewish exiles.

"This assembly made a collection of money, and sent the produce to Jerusalem.

"In the letter which accompanied it, the Jews at Jerusalem were exhorted to present offerings for Nebuchadnezzar and for the exiles, and to read Baruch's book (sent with the letter) on Feast-days." Baruch himself was the bearer: he was going back to Jerusalem to restore some of the vessels of the Temple which had been carried off at the time of its destruction; namely, silver vessels made by Zedekiah to replace the original golden vessels carried off by Nebuchadnezzar at the capture of the city in the time of Jehoiachin, B.C. 599.

"In this there is nothing inconsistent with the supposition that Baruch himself composed this short historical preface to his book, though it is also possible that some one else may have added it afterwards."

This defence is ingenious, but not adequate. We may acknowledge our belief that the tendency of modern criticism has been to exaggerate the supposed evidence of spuriousness drawn from the historical statements of the book. If, however, these statements were entirely free from any great inaccuracy, it would not necessarily follow that Baruch was the author, but only that the real author was well informed concerning the events of which he writes. On the other hand, the serious error of representing Belshazzar as contemporary with Nebuchadnezzar (see above, B 2) is fatal to the theory of Baruch's authorship, and betrays an ignorance which can only be imputed to one who lived long after the death of Belshazzar and the return of the exiles.

Digitized by Microsoft®

§ IV. Relation to the Canonical Books of the Old Testament.

One of the commonest and strongest arguments against the genuineness of the Book of Baruch is based upon its want of originality and its close dependence upon earlier books. There is much truth in the objection, at least as applied to the earlier portion (i. 1—iii. 9); but there is also much exaggeration and inaccuracy in the expressions used.

Eichhorn, as quoted by Reusch, p. 66, calls the book "a mere rhapsody out of various ancient Hebrew scriptures, especially Daniel and Nehemiah." Keerl, also quoted by Reusch, writes still more strongly: "Every Prophet of the Old Testament brings new as well as old out of his treasure. The worthy Baruch contents himself with transcribing the older prophecies. In comparing the contents of his book, there comes over one a feeling as if some incompetent scribbler had wished to do an exercise in the language and style of the Prophets; it reminds one of the rhetorical practice of a feeble schoolboy, who composes an opusculum out of all sorts of passages."

Fritzsche, with more justice, speaking of the first part only, calls it "a cento from earlier writings, in which Jeremiah, Daniel, Nehemiah, Deuteronomy, and Isaiah are so strongly used, that this necessarily carries us on into a later time which had lost all productive prophetical power."

We do not find, even in the first part, any proof of dependence on Nehemiah; but the use made of Deuteronomy and Jeremiah in the first section, and of Isaiah in the second, is such as goes far to justify the conclusion which Fritzsche has drawn.

The similarity between Baruch i. 15–ii. 17 and Daniel ix. 7–19 is too evident to be denied, and too close to be accidental. The two passages are so much alike, not merely in single phrases and sentences, but in the whole course of thought, that no one can help assuming a connexion between them. But while fully admitting this connexion, Reusch tries to maintain the genuineness of Baruch by suggesting that he, and not Daniel, is the original author. In support of his opinion he appeals to the frequent resemblance to passages of Jeremiah, and argues that the prayer, composed by Baruch, may have come into general use among the Jews in captivity, to whose circumstances and feelings it is very suitable, and thus its language was adopted by Daniel in his prayers, as also in "the Prayer of the Three Children in the Furnace."

This argument, if well founded, would be more effectual in destroying the genuineness of Daniel than in establishing that of Baruch.

A more impartial judgment on the relation between Baruch and Daniel is expressed by critics like Fritzsche and Kneucker, who deny the authenticity of both alike. They "can afford to see," as Dr. Pusey says of Fritzsche, "that the Book of Daniel was used" in Baruch, on account of the late date assigned to the latter.

Dr. Pusey's own judgment is too valuable to be omitted: "The great prayer of Daniel is made the basis of the early portion of the prayer in Baruch. . . . The agreement is not in formulæ, but in whole verses, and that in the same order. Nor can there be any doubt, that Daniel is the original, which is filled up and expanded in Baruch. The prayer of Daniel is one whole, whose inspired thoughts, like those in the Psalms, have formed the devotions of 2300 years, ever gushing forth in renewed fulness. . . .

". . . The prayer in Baruch, on the contrary, is a mosaic formed of jewels from Daniel, Nehemiah (?), and Jeremiah, blended together, yet not forming one distinct whole." ('Lectures on Daniel,' p. 362.)

§ V. Original Language.

Three different opinions have been held concerning the original language of the book: (a) that the Greek text is throughout original; (b) that it is throughout a translation from Hebrew; (c) that the part i. 1—iii. 8 was originally written in Hebrew, and iii. 9—v. 9 in Greek.

It will be desirable to consider the language of these two parts separately, it being universally admitted that they do not contain equally strong evidence of a Hebrew original.

Digitized by Microsoft®

In i. 14 the author, writing in the name of the Exiles, directs that his book shall be read publicly in the Temple at Jerusalem. This of course implies that the book to be so read was written in Hebrew, and the evidence would be conclusive if the Introduction (i. 1–14) were the genuine work of Baruch: even a later author may have intended his prayer to be used in public worship, and we are "hardly justified in assuming this direction to be a mere fiction" (Fritzsche). The real evidence, however, lies in the language of the Greek text itself, and in its relation to the Hebrew Scriptures and Septuagint.

It may be admitted that a translation from Hebrew might possibly be written in so pure a style as not to be distinguishable from an original work in Greek; or, on the other hand, a book written in Greek by a Jew, accustomed to think and write in Hebrew, might bear the appearance of a translation from Hebrew.

The question is therefore put on a right basis by Fritzsche when he says that even strong Hebraisms may indicate only that the writer was a Jew, not necessarily a translator; "but the question is as to the nature of those Hebraisms and of the whole work. Where a man's thoughts and words run back at once into Hebrew, where we find what is absolutely contradictory to the genius of Greek not distinguished from the context, and can discover only faint colouring of genuine Greek, while on the other hand considerable knowledge of Greek accidence and, in a measure, of syntax is shewn,—there the writing must be a translation, because otherwise this very knowledge must have had a more decided influence, and the appearances can only be explained by the restraint which hampers the writer. And this principle is applicable here: the section i. 1–iii. 8 contains not only individual examples of strong Hebraism, but is almost one entire Hebraism, and reads like another translation in the Septuagint" (p. 71).

We proceed to notice the special instances alleged in proof of a Hebrew original.

(a) The constant use of καί (Heb. ו) at the beginning of a sentence, when in ordinary Greek some other conjunction would be used.

(b) The relative followed by a demonstrative, as in Hebrew (אֲשֶׁר).

ii. 4, οὗ (διέσπειρεν) . . . ἐκεῖ. The same construction occurs also in ii. 13, 29; iii. 8. All these passages are derived directly or indirectly from Deut. xxx. 3, where the LXX. have the same close imitation of the Hebrew.

ii. 26, οὗ ἐπεκλήθη τὸ ὄνομά σου ἐπ' αὐτῷ. This is taken from Dan. ix. 18, exactly as in the LXX.

(c) i. 15, ὡς ἡ ἡμέρα αὕτη. The same phrase is repeated in i. 20; ii. 6, 11, 26, in all of which places it is in quotations from canonical books, and agrees with the rendering of the LXX.

The instances given above are generally accepted as proofs of a Hebrew original (Fritzsche, Reusch, Lange, Kneucker). If their evidence is somewhat weakened by their occurrence in citations from the Hebrew Scriptures and their close agreement with the Septuagint, it is on the other hand worthy of notice that the later section of Baruch is almost, if not entirely, free from these forms of Hebraism.

In i. 10, περὶ ἁμαρτίας, meaning "sin offerings," is a phrase which may have become familiar in Hellenistic Greek from its use by the LXX.; and in ii. 25 the strange use of ἀποστολή for "pestilence" is closely connected with Jer. xxxii. 36.

More decisive evidence of translation from Hebrew is found in the following passages, and discussed in the notes on them:—

i. 10, μαναά, said to be used in translations only, not in any original Hellenistic writing.

ii. 18, ἐπὶ τὸ μέγεθος can, as it seems, only be explained as representing some Hebrew word which has been misread or misunderstood.

On ii. 29, βόμβησις, and iii. 4, τεθνηκότων, see the Additional Notes.

In these and other passages we may recognise the truth of Fritzsche's remark that, in this first section, "the very literal translation allows the exact Hebrew to gleam through."

A further proof of the existence of a Hebrew original is found in the fact

Digitized by Microsoft®

mentioned by Schürer ('Geschichte d. Jüd. Volkes im Zeitalter Jesu Christi,' p. 724), that in the Milan MS. of the Hexaplar Syriac there is a marginal note at i. 17 and ii. 3, "This is not found in the Hebrew."

In the second part (iii. 9—v. 9) Kneucker gives a long list of Hebraisms, most of which are so thoroughly naturalised in Hellenistic Greek, that they prove nothing concerning a Hebrew original:—

iii. 11. προσελογίσθης μετὰ τῶν εἰς ᾅδου, a citation from Ps. lxxxviii. 4.
iii. 24. οἶκος θεοῦ for "heaven:" see note on ii. 16.
iii. 31. οὐκ ἔστιν ὁ γινώσκων.
iii. 33. ὁ ἀποστέλλων τὸ φὼς καὶ πορεύεται.
iii. 35. λογισθήσεται πρὸς αὐτόν. Is not this good Greek?
iv. 5. λαός μου.
iv. 18, 21. ἐξελέσθαι ἐκ χειρὸς ἐχθρῶν.
iv. 20. ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις μου.
iv. 26, v. 5. ἀπὸ ἀνατολῶν ἕως δυσμῶν. See Matt. viii. 11.
v. 3. τῇ ὑπ' οὐρανὸν πάσῃ. See Luke xvii. 24.
v. 4. καλεῖσθαι, in the sense "to be:" "thy name shall be called."

Such examples are far too weak to prove a Hebrew original, and cannot be compared to the instances collected from the first part.

The following are more deserving of consideration, though far from convincing:—

iii. 17. καὶ οὐκ ἔστι τέλος. Compare Nah. ii. 9; iii. 3, 9; Isa. ii. 7, ix. 7; Eccl. xii. 12.
iii. 18. καὶ οὐκ ἔστιν ἐξεύρησις. Compare Job v. 9; Ps. cxlv. 3; Prov. xxv. 3; Eccl. viii. 16; Isa. xl. 28.
iv. 22. τοῦ αἰωνίου σωτῆρος. See the note.
v. 6. ὡς θρόνον βασιλείας. See the note.

The insufficiency of the evidence derived from these Hebraisms in the second part is admitted even by the advocates of a Hebrew original. They acknowledge also that the Greek style differs from the language of the earlier chapters, being purer, more flowing, more choice in particular words and phrases.

The contents also are more original, and "in the appreciation and treatment of older prophetic and didactic passages (the author) shews a certain independence and versatility, and here and there we cannot deny to him a certain poetic force and vivid representation. Compare, e.g., iii. 15, 24, 32; iv. 5, 23, 30, 36" (Kneucker).

On the whole, we may safely conclude that the evidence of translation is almost irresistible in the first part, while in the second there is more probability in favour of the Greek as original. In Dr. Pusey's judgment the latter part bears "no marks of a translation" ('Lectures on Daniel,' p. 361)

§ VI. Probable Date.

The marked difference between the two portions of the book, both in style and contents, casts much doubt upon the unity of authorship, and makes it not improbable that the two parts were composed by different authors at different times: but when, or by whom, we have not the means of deciding.

Ewald assigns an early date to the first section of the book,—"written during the last period of the Persian rule, as the communities in and around Jerusalem were becoming more restless and disaffected towards the existing rule, and, on the other hand, the communities in the East were fearing, and perhaps had actually experienced therefrom, great injury both to themselves and the cause of the true religion generally." ('Prophets of the Old Testament,' v. 109.)

This early date is declared by Kneucker (p. 55) to be "absolutely impossible," without any reason except that it is opposed to his theory of the late date of Daniel. Fritzsche, apparently for the same reason, assigns the composition to the late Maccabean period; while Kneucker himself is unable to reconcile the contents and purposes of the book with the circumstances of the Jews in any period prior to the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, A.D. 70.

The earlier date assigned to this first portion of the book by Ewald appears much more probable: the arguments in favour of it are very forcibly stated by Ewald in 'The History of Israel,' v. p. 207 (Engl. Tr.), and again in the work quoted above.

In regard to the second section (iii. 9–v. 9), Ewald's judgment, that "in point of age, subject, and purpose, as well as art and execution, it was originally a different piece," will hardly be questioned by any one who is not interested in maintaining that the whole book is the genuine work of Baruch.

Digitized by Microsoft®

The uncertainty as to the original language of this section increases the difficulty of assigning it to any definite period. Dr. Pusey, speaking of the latter portion, says, "that mostly original and beautiful section was probably written not so long after the close of the Canon. It is written amid hopes of a speedy restoration, but in a calm atmosphere of trust, in the consciousness of no troubles beyond those which were the results of the Captivity, and with no anticipation of the distresses of the Maccabean period. It was, then, doubtless written before Antiochus Epiphanes." If, however, the Greek text is the original, the comparatively late date of the composition is rendered probable by its dependence upon the Septuagint, in such expressions as ἐνωτίσασθε (iii. 9), τί ὅτι (iii. 10), τῇ ὑπ' οὐρανὸν πάσῃ (v. 3); and especially in the words εὐπρέπεια δόξης (v. 1), and εἰς ὁμαλισμόν (v. 7), on which see the notes.

Schürer (p. 724) sees a decisive proof of very late date in the remarkable similarity between Baruch v. and Psalm of Solomon xi. The Psalms of Solomon were not written till after the death of Pompey (B.C. 48), that event being graphically described in Ps. ii. 30, 31. But there is no sufficient evidence that our author borrowed from this late Psalter. From a careful examination of the similar passages, it seems more probable that both borrowed independently from the Septuagint.

§ VII. Text.

For the purpose of this Commentary it will be sufficient to mention briefly a few of the chief authorities to which we may have occasion to refer in discussing the more important variations of the Greek text.

I. The Textus Receptus is contained in the edition of the Septuagint published at Rome in 1587 by authority of Pope Sixtus V., and based upon the famous Vatican Codex (B). The text of the Roman edition was several times republished by Tischendorf, and a sixth edition by Nestle in 1880, with prolegomena, emendations, and the various readings of the oldest uncial MSS.

II. The Vatican Codex (B) of the 14th century, edited by Vercellone and Cozza ('Bibliorum Sacrorum graecus codex Vaticanus,' Romae, 1868–1875, tom. i.–v.). The Book of Baruch is in the fourth volume.

III. Codex Alexandrinus (A), of the 5th century, in the British Museum, edited by Grabe (Oxon. 1707–1720) and by Baber (1812–1828), is the basis of the edition of the Septuagint published by Field (Oxon. 1859), at the cost of the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge.

The Codex has been recently published in a photographic fac-simile. A full account of it is given by Tischendorf in the Prolegomena to his edition of the Septuagint (pp. lii.–lxii.).

Of the value of the text of this famous uncial Fritzsche (p. vi.) gives the following estimate:—"Greater attention has been given to the Codex Alexandrinus only in order to shew that it is greatly overvalued; and notwithstanding its antiquity, it ought, with its made-up text, to be used only with great caution."

In the great critical edition of the Septuagint by Holmes and Parsons (Ox. 1798–1827), the variations of twenty-five manuscripts are compared with the Vatican Text of the Book of Baruch. After comparing these variations in thirty-one passages, Kneucker (p. 97) thus states his conclusion:—"Although the original text of the Greek Version is found in no one MS. entirely pure, yet it may be recognised and restored with certainty everywhere, except in some four passages [ii. 10, 18, 29, 31], from the Vatican Codex with help of other manuscripts, of which five are sufficient for the purpose,—namely, III. (Alex.), XII. (Marchalianus), 22, 233, 239."

XII. Codex Marchalianus (Vat. 2125), an uncial of the 6th or 7th century, but of no great critical value.

233 (Vat. 2067), a cursive of the 12th century.

239 (Bologna 641) is dated 1046 A.C.

Digitized by Microsoft®

These three MSS. contain both Baruch and the Epistle of Jeremy.

22 (British Museum), a cursive of the 11th or 12th century, contains Baruch.

This MS. and 233 are said to "belong, according to a recent discovery of Paul de Lagarde and Mr. Field, to the recension of the martyr Lucian made in the 3rd (?) century" (Lange, p. 61). The recension here meant seems to be the revised version of the Septuagint made by Lucian in the 4th century: see 'Dictionary of Christian Biography,' LUCIANUS (12).

Fritzsche (p. 174) gives the following classification of the MSS. collated by Holmes and Parsons for the Book of Baruch:—

"(1) To the first class belong 22*, 48, 51, 231, 62, 96. These agree closely throughout, and often stand alone, but then always give arbitrary changes; e.g. in i. 9 they give, in agreement with the Syriac, καὶ τοὺς τεχνίτας, an interpolation from Jer. xxiv. 1 (Sept.).

"In general agreement with these are also 36, 49, 26, 198 (reaching to ii. 19), and 229.

"(2) The second class consists of the Codex Alexandrinus, 33, 70, 86, 87, 88, 90, 91, 228, *233, *239. In this class, however, particular divergences are more frequent. Thus Alex. stands oftener alone, and here, as elsewhere, it is shewn that its text is an amended one, which existed elsewhere in a purer form.

"Lastly, *XII., 23 [Venetus, an uncial marked by Holmes and Parsons as a cursive], and 106 are of a very mixed nature, agreeing sometimes with the first class, sometimes with the second."

The Received Text is acknowledged to be an essentially good one: the two classes into which Fritzsche divides the MSS. represent two revisions of it, not strictly independent, yet often preserving the original reading, especially when their chief witnesses agree.

The Codex Sinaiticus (Friderico-Augustanus) and the famous Codex Ephraem Syri rescriptus (C) do not contain Baruch or the Epistle of Jeremy. For these books Tischendorf compares the Roman Text with the Vatican and Alexandrine MSS. only, making no use of Versions or Fathers (Proleg. p. xxii.).

Versions. — The ancient versions, Latin (2), Syriac (2), Arabic, Æthiopic, Coptic, Armenian, are all made from the Greek.

The Latin Version adopted in the Vulgate (Vetus Lat. a) is part of the so-called Itala, in use before the time of Jerome, who did not include either Baruch or the Epistle of Jeremy in his revision.

It is an extremely literal, even servile, rendering of the Greek: Fritzsche does not hesitate to call it also "a patois full of provincialisms and grammatical blunders." Kneucker, who gives a detailed account of the readings of this version (pp. 141–151), concludes that "The old Itala, for the Book of Baruch, has followed a Greek text which is not contained entire in any of the known Greek Codices, which are also altogether of later origin,—a mixed text, which may be traced most frequently (apart from the Vatican Codex II.) in the MSS. 62, 36, III. (Alex.), 48, 231."

The second Latin Version (Vet. Lat. b), first published at Rome by Tommasi, 1688, was re-edited by Sabatier ('Bibliorum Sacrorum Latinae Versiones Antiquae'), and thought by him to represent the earliest form of the Itala, but is described by Fritzsche as a less literal and more latinised reproduction of Vet. Lat. a, collated with a Greek text.

A full account of the Syriac and other ancient versions is given by Kneucker.

The English Authorized Version agrees generally with the Vatican Text; where this differs materially from the Alexandrine, or from the Latin, the readings of these latter will be noticed in the Commentary, but minute textual criticism is not embraced in the plan of this work.

§ VIII. PLACE IN CANON.

St. Jerome expressly states that neither the Book of Baruch nor the Epistle of Jeremy had any place in the Hebrew Canon; nor is any portion of either work extant in Hebrew.

On the other hand, it is stated in the 'Apostolical Constitutions,' v. xx., that the Jews, "even now on the tenth day of the month Gorpiaeus, when they assemble together, read the Lamentations of Jeremiah" (iv. 20), "and Baruch, in whom it is written, This is our God, &c." (Bar. iii. 36). This statement may possibly have arisen from the direction in i. 14.

Digitized by Microsoft®

In the Greek Bible both works are placed among the writings of Jeremiah; and in the Vatican and Alexandrine MSS., as also in the Roman edition, they stand in the following order: (1) Jeremiah, (2) Baruch, (3) Lamentations, (4) Epistle of Jeremy.

In the Latin Bible as revised by St. Jerome, Baruch and the Epistle are both omitted for the reason above stated, nor have they any place in the oldest known MS. of the Vulgate, the Codex Amiatinus.

In the Clementine, and other editions of the Vulgate, "the Prophecy of Baruch," including the Epistle of Jeremy as chap. vi., is placed after Lamentations.

At the Council of Trent it was recognised, among the other deutero-canonical books, as part of the Old Testament Canon ('Conc. Trid.' S. 4, decr. de can. Script., cited by Reusch).

In the English Bible, at the time of the Reformation, it was removed to the place where we now find it among the Apocrypha.

Appendix: The Titles of God in Baruch.

It is interesting to notice the use of different titles of God in different parts of the book.

In the First Section, i. 1—iii. 8:—

(a) Κύριος and its cases without the article stand alone more than twenty times, and with the article twice (ii. 9, 17).

(b) Κύριος θεὸς ἡμῶν about five times (i. 18, 19, 22; ii. 5; iii. 8).

Κύριος ὁ θεὸς ἡμῶν (Ἰσραήλ, αὐτῶν) about ten times (i. 10, 13, 21; ii. 11, 12, 15, 19, 27, 31; iii. 6).

ὁ Κύριος θεὸς ἡμῶν (i. 13, 15; ii. 6).

(c) Κύριε παντοκράτωρ ὁ θεὸς Ἰσραήλ (iii. 1, 3).

In the Second Section, iii. 9—v. 9:—

(a) Κύριος apparently does not occur at all, but only θεός, or ὁ θεός, as far as iv. 7.

(b) In iv. 8 αἰώνιος first occurs in the combination θεὸν αἰώνιον. Compare Isa. xl. 28.

(c) In iv. 10, 14, 20, 22 (first part), 24, 35, and v. 2, ὁ αἰώνιος seems to take the place of Κύριος as representing the sacred name Jehovah.

Also in the latter part of iv. 22 (παρὰ τοῦ αἰωνίου σωτῆρος ὑμῶν) it probably has the same sense, "The Eternal your Saviour," corresponding to "The Lord (Jehovah) your Saviour" in Isa. xlix. 26; lx. 16.

(d) Ὁ ἅγιος, "The Holy One," is not found in the First Section; but in iv. 22, 37 and in v. 5 it stands alone, as in Isa. xl. 25 and Hab. iii. 3. In the canonical books it is commonly found in combination with other words, e.g. "the Holy One of Israel."

This remarkable difference between the two parts of the book in the words used to represent the sacred name Jehovah seems strongly to confirm the other evidence that the two parts had different authors or translators.

For the general argument and main substance of this note on the titles of God, and for very valuable criticism on other parts of this commentary on Baruch and the Epistle of Jeremy, I am indebted to the Rev. P. H. Mason, B.D., Tutor, President, and Hebrew Lecturer of St. John's College, Cambridge.

E. H. G.

Digitized by Microsoft®

BARUCH.

CHAPTER I.

1 Baruch wrote a book in Babylon. 5 The Jews there wept at the reading of it. 7 They send money and the book to the brethren at Jerusalem.

AND these are the words of the book, which [a] Baruch the son of Nerias, the son of Maasias, the son of Sedecias, the son of Asadias, the son of Chelcias, wrote in Babylon, 2 In the fifth year, and in the [a] Jer. 36. 4.

CHAPTER I.

1–14. HISTORICAL PREFACE.

On the contents of these verses see the Introduction, § 1.

1. And these are the words.] Compare Jer. xxix. 1, "Now these are the words of the letter," &c. The conjunction implies that the Book of Baruch is to be connected with the writings of Jeremiah, which it follows immediately in the ancient MSS. (See the Introduction, § viii.)

the son of Nerias, the son of Maasias.] Compare Jer. xxxii. 12. The same descent is ascribed in Jer. li. 59 to Seraiah, Baruch's brother, who was the chief chamberlain of Zedekiah, and went with him to Babylon. This Maasias, or Mahseyah (Heb. מַחְסֵיָה), is not to be confounded with the Maaseiah (Heb. מַעֲשֵׂיָה) who is mentioned in Jer. xxxv. 4 and in 2 Chron. xxxiv. 8 as "governor of the city" in the time of Josiah, nor with the Maaseiah in Jer. xxix. 21.

Sedecias.] The name is the same as Zedekiah, but the person here meant is not to be identified (as in the 'Dictionary of the Bible,' art. "Sedecias") with the false prophet in Jer. xxix. 21, 22: see the preceding note.

Asadias.] The name, not the person, is the same as in 1 Chron. iii. 20, "Hasadiah." The Syriac Version gives "Saraia," from a mistake between two similar letters.

Chelcias.] The same name, in the Hebrew form, was borne by Hilkiah, the father of Eliakim, "who was over the household" of Hezekiah (2 Kings xviii. 18, 26; Isa. xxii. 20, xxxvi. 3); by Hilkiah, the High Priest in the reign of Josiah (2 Kings xxii. 4); and by Jeremiah's father, one "of the priests that were in Anathoth" (Jer. i. 1).

The Old Latin (b) adds after the name of Chelcias "of the tribe of Simeon;" but we have no proof of this statement in the genealogies, only a bare possibility being implied in the fact noticed in 2 Chr. xv. 9, that some of the tribe of Simeon joined themselves to Judah and Benjamin in the reign of Asa.

In the work known as 'The rest of the words of Baruch' Jeremiah is called a priest, and Baruch a Levite.

"The strange Rabbinic tradition (Carpzov. 'Introd. in lib. Vet. Test. Jerem.') that eight of the persons most conspicuous in the religious history of this period (Jeremiah, Baruch, Seraiah, Maaseiah, Hilkiah, Hanameel, Huldah, Shallum) were all descended from the harlot Rahab, may possibly have been a distortion of the fact that they were connected, in some way or other, as members of a family" ('Dictionary of the Bible,' art. "Jeremiah").

in Babylon.] On the question whether Baruch was ever in Babylon, see Introduction, § iii. p. 245.

2. In the fifth year.] The date from which this "fifth year" is to be reckoned must, of course, be gathered from the context, and accordingly can be no other than the time when "the Chaldeans took Jerusalem and burnt it with fire," i.e. 588 B.C.

The proposal to refer the date to the fifth year of the exile of Jehoiachin, B.C. 595, is quite arbitrary, and only serves to make a difficulty where none really exists.

in the seventh day of the month.] According to 2 Kings xxv. 8, Nebuzaradan came "unto" Jerusalem in the fifth month, "on the seventh day of the month:" according to Jer. lii. 12, he came "into" Jerusalem in the fifth month, "in the tenth day of the month." The burning of the city, which followed, is not limited by either of these passages, nor by Baruch, to one particular day; there is therefore no necessary discrepancy.

It is possible (as Kneucker suggests) that the original reading in Baruch was—"in the fifth year, in the fifth month, and in the seventh day of the month;" and that the second clause being so similar to the first was accidentally omitted, as in Ezekiel xxxii. 17

Digitized by Microsoft®

seventh day of the month, what time as the Chaldeans took Jerusalem, and burnt it with fire.

3 And Baruch did read the words of this book in the hearing of Jechonias the son of ‖Joachim king of Juda, and in the ears of all the people that came to hear the book,

4 And in the hearing of the nobles, and of the king's sons, and in the hearing of the elders, and of all the people, from the lowest unto the highest, even of all them that dwelt at Babylon by the river Sud.

5 Whereupon they wept, fasted, ‖and prayed before the Lord.

6 They made also a collection of money according to every man's power:

7 And they sent it to Jerusalem unto ‖Joachim the high priest, the son of Chelcias, son of Salom, and to compared with xxxii. 1. But that the conjecture, though possible, is not necessary, is shewn in the next note.

‖ Or, and vowed vows.

‖ Or, Joacim.

what time as.] Literally, "at the season in which." The same phrase is used by the LXX. in Deut. xvi. 6, where it is stated expressly that the Passover is to be sacrificed "at even, at the going down of the sun," but the month and day of the month are only defined by the words "at the season that thou camest forth out of Egypt." So here, the day of the month is expressly stated, but the month itself, and the year, are both defined by reference to "the season in which the Chaldeans burnt Jerusalem with fire." "The remembrance of the destruction of Jerusalem must have been especially vivid at this season, and therefore their hearts peculiarly susceptible to admonition" (Tirinus).

3. in the hearing.] Literally, "in the ears," as in Jer. xxxvi. 6, 10, 13, 14, and frequently.

Jechonias the son of Joachim.] I.e. Jehoiachin son of Jehoiakim (2 Kings xxiv. 6, 15; Jer. xxiv. 1, xxvii. 20).

that came to hear the book.] Literally, "that came to the book." The tense indicates a repeated coming, as if the book were read "day by day," as in Neh. viii. 18.

The idea that "the book of the law" is meant, and that in this gathering of the people by the river-side we see the origin of the Jewish synagogue, has no foundation in this passage, where "the book" (τὴν βίβλον, cf. Jer. xxix. 1) is evidently the same as in the beginning of the verse (τὸ βιβλίον). Both the Greek words are used to translate the same Hebrew word (סֵפֶר) in Jer. xxix. 1; xxx. 2; xxxii. 10–12. "The book of the law" could not, in this context, have been described simply as "the book," without some addition.

4. the nobles.] "the mighty men" (τῶν δυνατῶν), as in v. 9.

the king's sons.] "the kings' sons," according to the better reading of the Vatican Codex, i.e. the princes of the house of David, not sons of Jehoiachin. See the note on Jer. xxii. 30, "Write ye this man childless," and compare the expression "our kings" in v. 16.

the elders.] These are mentioned (with the priests and the prophets) in Jer. xxix. 1 as "the residue of the elders which were carried away captive."

from the lowest unto the highest.] "from the least even unto the greatest," as in Jer. xlii. 1, or "both small and great," as in 2 Kings xxiii. 2, where the same words are used by the LXX., meaning "both young and old."

the river Sud.] Of this river nothing is known except from this passage. We may infer that it was not far from Babylon, but beyond this the endless conjectures concerning its position are of little use.

5. Whereupon, &c.] "And they wept and fasted." Compare 2 Sam. i. 12.

Instead of the contents of the book being given here, as we might have expected, the effects of the reading are first stated.

and prayed.] The rendering in the margin, "vowed vows," represents the reading of the Alexandrine and other MSS., which may have been suggested by the mention of offerings in what follows (vv. 6, 10).

6. according to every man's power.] Literally, "according as each man's hand was able;" an evident Hebraism. Compare Deut. xvi. 10 (Sept.) and 17: "every man shall give as he is able;" marg. "according to the gift of his hand."

7. sent it.] The "it" should be in Italics, being rightly supplied, as is seen from v. 10. Ewald's rendering "sent him," i.e. Baruch, is less natural.

Joachim the high priest, the son of Chelcias, son of Salom.] Read, "Joachim the priest, son of Hilkiah, son of Shallum." Joachim is not here called the High Priest, but simply "the priest" (ὁ ἱερεύς), being thus distinguished from the general body of priests, probably because he was (like Pashur, Jer. xx. 1, and Zephaniah, Jer. xxix. 25, 26) the "chief the priests, and to all the people which were found with him at Jerusalem,

8 At the same time when he received [b] the vessels of the house of the Lord, that were carried out of the temple, to return them into the land of Juda, the tenth day of the month Sivan, namely, silver vessels, which Sedecias the son of Josias king of Juda had made,

9 After that Nabuchodonosor king of Babylon had carried away Jechonias, and the princes, and the ‖captives, and the mighty men, and the people of the land, from Jerusalem, and brought them unto Babylon.

10 And they said, Behold, we have sent you money to buy you burnt offerings, and sin offerings, and incense, and prepare ye ‖manna, and offer upon the altar of the Lord our God;

[b] 2 Kings 24. 13. 2 Chron. 36. 10.

‖ Or, prisoners.

‖ Gr. corruptly for mincha, that is, a meat offering.

governor in the house of the Lord," and therefore the proper person to receive the money. Compare Ezra viii. 29, 33; and see more on this point in the Introduction, § iii. p. 246.

which were found with him.] Compare 1 Sam. xiii. 15, "and Saul numbered the people that were present (marg. "found," LXX. τὸν εὑρεθέντα) with him."

8. At the same time when he received.] Omit the words "at the same time," which are not expressed in the Greek, nor required in the English. The person meant is evidently not Joachim, for he is described as being already at Jerusalem, but the chief person previously mentioned, namely Baruch, who being at Babylon (is said to have) received the vessels in order "to return them into the land of Juda."

the temple.] The sanctuary, or Holy Place (ὁ ναός), distinguished from "the house," as a whole, and from "the oracle" or Holy of Holies: see 1 Kings vi. 3, 5.

to return them.] The Greek word (ἀποστρέψαι), not very commonly used in this sense "to restore," seems to be taken from Jer. xxviii. 3, where Hananiah falsely prophesies that within two years God would "bring again" all the vessels of the Lord's house that Nebuchadnezzar had taken away, and also bring back Jehoiachin and all the captives. Compare Jer. xxix. 10 and Baruch i. 12. No restoration of the vessels is elsewhere recorded before the time of Cyrus.

the tenth day of the month Sivan.] The Vat. Codex has Σειουάλ, which is probably an error for Σειουάν, the name of "the third month, that is the month Sivan" (Esther viii. 9), corresponding nearly to June. The words seem to be misplaced here, and Hitzig thinks their proper place is in v. 14. If retained here, they define more closely the time when Baruch is said to have "received the vessels." Reusch supposes that his intended departure was delayed some weeks; and the assembly, which is to be regarded as immediately preceding it, took place "on the seventh day of the fifth month."

silver vessels.] On the historical worth of the statement concerning these vessels, see the Introduction, § iii. p. 247.

9. The whole verse is taken from 2 Kings xxiv. 14 and Jer. xxiv. 1, with some remarkable variations.

the princes.] These are not princes of the royal blood, but the chief officers of the court (ἄρχοντας, שָׂרִים).

the captives.] See the Additional Note.

the mighty men.] Greek, δυνατούς. These might be either, as in 2 Kings xxiv. 14, "the mighty men of valour" (τοὺς δυνατοὺς ἰσχύι), or more generally, as in 2 Kings xxiv. 15, "the mighty of the land" (τοὺς ἰσχυροὺς τῆς γῆς), i.e. the rich and powerful, the same class who in v. 4 are called "the nobles" (τῶν δυνατῶν).

This latter sense is the more probable, as corresponding more nearly to the Septuagint version of Jer. xxiv. 1 (τοὺς πλουσίους, "the rich").

and the people of the land.] These, in contrast to "the mighty men" above mentioned, can only be the common people in general: many of these were carried away into captivity; for, according to 2 Kings xxiv. 14, "none remained save the poorest sort of the people of the land."

10–14. A message sent from the captives in Babylon to Jerusalem, with the gold and the Book of Baruch.

10. sent you money to buy you burnt offerings.] Read, "sent unto you money, and buy ye for the money burnt offerings."

sin offerings.] Literally, "for sin" (περὶ ἁμαρτίας), as in Isa. liii. 10; Ps. xl. 6; Heb. x. 6, 8.

manna.] Read, "a meat offering." The reading of the Vatican and Alexandrine MSS. μάννα is a frequent corruption of μαναά, the Greek form of the Hebrew word for "a meat offering" (מִנְחָה, minchâh):

Digitized by Microsoft®

Ezra 6. 10. er. 29. 7.

11 And [c]pray for the life of Nabuchodonosor king of Babylon, and for the life of Balthasar his son, that their days may be upon earth as the days of heaven:

12 And the Lord will give us strength, and lighten our eyes, and we shall live [d]under the shadow of Nabuchodonosor king of Babylon, and under the shadow of Balthasar his son, and we shall serve them many days, and find favour in their sight.

Ezek. 6. an. 4. 21.

13 Pray for us also unto the Lord our God, for we have sinned against the Lord our God; and unto this day the fury of the Lord and his wrath is not turned from us.

14 And ye shall read this book which we have sent unto you, to make confession in the house of the Lord, upon the feasts and solemn days.

compare in the Septuagint Jer. xvii. 26, xli. 5.

offer upon the altar.] See Introduction, § iii. p. 246.

11. In Jer. xxix. 7, the exiles themselves are bidden to seek the peace of the city whither they are carried away captive.

Balthasar his son.] The LXX. use the same Greek form of the name both for Belteshazzar (Dan. i. 7) and for Belshazzar (Dan. v. 1). This latter, here called the son of Nebuchadnezzar, was in fact his grandson: see the notes on Dan. v. 2, 11, in the 'Speaker's Commentary,' and our Introduction, § iii. p. 245.

On the meaning of the name Belshazzar ("Bel protect the king"), see the Additional Note on Dan. i. 7.

as the days of heaven upon the earth.] Both here, and in the original passage (Deut. xi. 21) from which this phrase is taken, the more exact rendering is "as the days of the heavens above the earth," i.e. as long as the heavens continue to cover the earth,—in other words, to the end of time. Compare Job xiv. 12, "till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake;" Ps. lxxxix. 29, "his throne as the days of heaven."

12. And the Lord will give us strength.] Compare Ps. xxix. 11: "The Lord will give strength unto his people." The effect of the prayers for the kings of Babylon will be that in their prosperity they will be favourable to the captives, who will long enjoy their protection. "In the peace thereof shall ye have peace" (Jer. xxix. 7).

lighten our eyes.] I.e. give us safety and prosperity. Compare Ezra ix. 8; Ps. xiii. 3, xix. 8; and Baruch iii. 14.

live under the shadow.] The protection enjoyed under the rule of a powerful monarch is compared to the shadow of a great tree: thus Ezekiel, when describing the Assyrian as "a cedar in Lebanon," says that "under his shadow dwelt all great nations" (xxxi. 6; compare Dan. iv. 12). It is a different image when the Psalmist speaks of "the shadow of God's hand," or "the shadow of his wings."

serve them many days.] In accordance with Jer. xxix. 5, 28.

13. Pray for us also.] Ewald draws attention to the tone of genuine humility in these Jewish exiles, who, "with a consciousness of their errors and calamities, gladly accept for themselves the intercession at Jerusalem."

sinned against.] Greek, "sinned unto," as in ii. 5; Prayer of Manasses, 7.

the fury of the Lord and his wrath.] Both words in the Greek express strong emotion; but when they are distinguished, "wrath" (ὀργή) is the settled feeling of anger, and "fury" (θυμός) its sudden blaze. The distinction is well seen in Ecclesiasticus xlviii. 10: "to pacify the wrath of the Lord's judgment before it brake forth into fury" (κοπάσαι ὀργὴν πρὸ θυμοῦ).

14. this book.] The Book of Baruch, referred to in i. 1, and contained in i. 15—iii. 8.

to make confession.] This meaning of the Greek word (ἐξαγορεῦσαι) is fully established by its use in Ezra x. 1, "when Ezra had prayed, and when he had confessed (ἐξηγόρευσε), weeping, and casting himself down;" and in Neh. ix. 2, "stood and confessed (ἐξηγόρευσαν) their sins," and ib. v. 3. It is found also in Lev. v. 5, xvi. 21, xxvi. 40; Num. v. 7; Neh. i. 6; Ps. xxxii. 5; Dan. ix. 20. A public confession is to be made in the very words of the book, which follow in v. 15 ff.

The meaning given by Fritzsche and Lange, "we have sent you this book to make it known," is very feeble.

in the house of the Lord.] See note on v. 10; and Introduction, § iii. p. 246.

solemn days.] Lit., "days of season," an unusual expression: but compare Ecclesiasticus xxxiii. 8, "He altered seasons and feasts."

Digitized by Microsoft®

[e] Dan. 9. 7. ch. 2. 6. See Neh. 9. 32, &c.

15 And ye shall say, [e]To the Lord our God belongeth righteousness, but unto us the confusion of faces, as it is come to pass this day, unto them of Juda, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem,

16 And to our kings, and to our princes, and to our priests, and to our prophets, and to our fathers:

17 For we have [f]sinned before the Lord, [f] Dan. 9 5.

18 And disobeyed him, and have not hearkened unto the voice of the Lord our God, to walk in the commandments that he gave us openly:

19 Since the day that the Lord brought our forefathers out of the land of Egypt, unto this present day,

i. 15—iii. 8. THE CONFESSION OF THE CAPTIVES IN BABYLON.

Verses 15–18. These verses correspond closely with the prayer of Daniel (ix. 7–10), with some omissions and variations. The character of the variations shews—(1) that the Greek texts of the two passages are independent versions, and (2) that they are taken from two different Hebrew books. On the other hand, the correspondence is so close that these two Hebrew originals cannot have been wholly independent of each other. See the Introduction, § iv. p. 248.

15. To the Lord our God belongeth righteousness.] Compare Dan. ix. 7, 9. The A. V. rightly supplies a verb in the present tense; for the meaning is, not "God's was the righteous cause" (Hitzig on Daniel), but "righteousness" is the eternal attribute of God manifested in all His dealings with Israel, even in their deepest misfortunes. Compare the words of Azarias in The Song of the Three Holy Children, vv. 4, 5: "For thou art righteous in all the things that thou hast done to us: yea, true are all thy works, thy ways are right, and all thy judgments truth. In all the things that thou hast brought upon us, and upon the holy city of our fathers, even Jerusalem, thou hast executed true judgment." Compare also Bar. ii. 9; Dan. ix. 14.

the confusion of faces.] Omit the article, with the Vatican MS.

as it is come to pass this day.] Lit., "as this day is." Ewald's rendering—"shame of face now at this time"—is inadequate: there is a comparison implied in the Greek—To us belongs confusion of face, as this day is an example and a proof. Compare Deut. ii. 30; Jer. xxv. 18, xliv. 6, 23; Dan. ix. 15; and especially Ezra ix. 7, "and to confusion of face, as it is this day." unto them of Juda.] Literally, "to the man of Judah," as Ewald renders: but the Hebrew word (אִישׁ) is often used collectively, and the phrase "the men of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem" occurs frequently in the prophetic books, especially in Jeremiah, e.g. xi. 2, 9. See Gesenius, 'Hebrew Gr.' § 108, 1.

16. our kings, &c.] The like enumeration of special classes, beginning with the highest, and so shewing that none are to be excepted, is frequent in Jeremiah, e.g. xxxii. 32: in Dan. ix. 8, the priests and the prophets are not mentioned, but the fuller enumeration given by our author is found also in Neh. ix. 32.

and our fathers.] All generations as well as all classes are included in the author's view, which embraces the whole history of Israel from the giving of the Law to the time present (v. 19).

17. For we have sinned.] "For that:" compare Dan. ix. 8, "because we have sinned against thee;" and see the note at the end of the chapter on the Greek construction, and on the evidence of a Hebrew original of Baruch.

18. And disobeyed him.] Our author substitutes this for the beautiful passage in Dan. ix. 9: "To the Lord our God belong mercies and forgivenesses, though we have rebelled against him." How can we fail to recognise here the difference between the real prophet and the copyist? The remainder of the verse is taken entirely from Dan. ix. 10, but with variations, which imply that the Book of Baruch was first compiled in Hebrew. See the note at the end of the chapter on v. 17.

the commandments.] In Dan. ix. 10 both Hebrew and Greek have "in his laws:" our author's phrase is especially frequent in Ezekiel.

that he gave us openly.] The same words (ἔδωκε κατὰ πρόσωπον ἡμῶν) are better rendered in ii. 10 and in Daniel, "which he set before us," i.e. as the rule and guide of our life.

19. The sin confessed is no occasional transgression, but continual disobedience from the first day of the national existence till now. For the phrase compare 2 Sam. vii. 6, "since the time that I brought up the children of Israel out of Egypt, even to this day;" 2 Kings xxi. 15; Jer. vii. 25.

we have been disobedient.] The unusual form of the verb (ἤμεθα ἀπειθοῦντες) expresses very strongly the continuous persistence in disobedience: compare Deut. ix. 7, 24 (LXX.).

Digitized by Microsoft®

we have been disobedient unto the Lord our God, and we have been negligent in not hearing his voice.

20 [g] Wherefore the evils cleaved unto us, and the curse, which the Lord appointed by Moses his servant at the time that he brought our fathers out of the land of Egypt, to give us a land that floweth with milk and honey, like as it is to see this day.

21 [h] Nevertheless we have not hearkened unto the voice of the Lord our God, according unto all the words of the prophets, whom he sent unto us:

22 But every man followed the imagination of his own wicked heart, to serve strange gods, and to do evil in the sight of the Lord our God.

[g] Deut. 28. 15. Dan. 9. 11.

[h] Dan. 9. 10.

we have been negligent in not hearing.] The Greek word (σχεδιάζω), meaning to do anything in a slight, careless, negligent way, does not occur elsewhere in the LXX. It is well translated by Ewald, "we were too careless to hearken." A comparison with Dan. ix. 11, "by departing (ἐξέκλιναν, LXX.) that they might not obey," shews the independence both of our translator and of his Hebrew text. See the note on σχεδιάζω at the end of the chapter.

20. Wherefore the evils cleaved unto us.] Better rendered by Ewald: "So there clave unto us the evils." Compare Dan. ix. 11: "Therefore (καί, Heb. ו) the curse is poured upon us, and the oath that is written in the law of Moses the servant of God." The reference is to Deut. xxviii., where see especially v. 21, "The Lord shall make the pestilence cleave unto thee" (προσκολλήσαι Κύριος); and v. 60, "and they shall cleave unto thee" (κολληθήσονται ἐν σοί).

appointed by Moses.] "appointed unto Moses," i.e. commanded Moses to declare: see Ex. xvi. 16, 32, 34 (LXX.).

at the time.] "in the day:" compare Jer. xi. 4; Dan. ix. 15.

like as it is to see this day.] "as it is this day:" see on v. 15. In Jer. xi. 4, 5, from which our passage is evidently taken, the clause refers to the continued possession of the land: "in the day that I brought them forth out of the land of Egypt . . . that I may perform the oath which I have sworn unto your fathers, to give them a land flowing with milk and honey, as it is this day." In the present context the last clause seems to refer to the beginning of the verse: "clave unto us . . . as it is this day."

21. Nevertheless.] Literally, "And." The words are taken from Dan. ix. 10, as in v. 18 above.

22. But every man followed the imagination.] "And we walked every one in the imagination of his evil heart." The same phrase (διάνοια καρδίας) occurs in ii. 8, and in 1 Chr. xxix. 18, but apparently nowhere else in the LXX., and once only in the N. T. (Luke i. 51).

to serve.] The same Greek word (ἐργάζεσθαι, "to work") occurs below in ii. 21, 22, 24: "to serve the king of Babylon." The translator of Jeremiah alone appears to use it in the sense of "serving God" or "serving false gods" (xxx. 8, 9), though elsewhere he renders the Hebrew root (עָבַד) by its usual equivalent (δουλεύειν).

in the sight, &c.] Compare Jer. xxxii. 30.

ADDITIONAL NOTES ON VERSES 9, 17, 19.

9. the captives.] The Hebrew word (מַסְגֵּר), which is rendered in our A. V. "smiths," is originally a Hiphil participle, which means "shutting up," and is used as a noun in two senses: (1) a prison, Ps. cxlii. 7; Isa. xxiv. 22, xlii. 7. (2) a smith, i.e. locksmith, 2 Kings xxiv. 14; Jer. xxiv. 1, xxix. 2. In the first of these passages the LXX. have rendered it by συγκλείων, and by δεσμώτης in both passages of Jeremiah. These are, according to Fürst, the only places in which it occurs.

The active sense (συγκλείων) corresponds to the Hebrew, and is required by the context, in which מַסְגֵּר is associated with חָרָשׁ, "craftsmen" or "carpenters."

But the translator of Jeremiah took it in a passive sense—"one who is shut up," "a prisoner"—and the mistranslation is repeated in Baruch.

Reusch supposes that δεσμώτης is used by the translator in an active sense (Schlosser = locksmith), and thus substitutes ignorance of Greek for a mistaken rendering of the Hebrew.

The inference in any case is clear that the writer of the Greek text of Baruch was either the same person as the translator of Jeremiah, or at least had the Greek version of Jeremiah before his eyes.

In the Latin "cunctos potentes" is thought to be a corruption of "vinctos et potentes,"

Digitized by Google

the original word having been afterwards put in a wrong place—"duxit eos vinctos in Babylonem."

17. ὃν ἡμάρτομεν.] The construction of the relative is difficult, but there is no variation of reading: the conjecture ἀνθ' ὧν is therefore inadmissible, as having no support.

Fritzsche thinks that the relative, which should have been in the nominative (οἱ ἡμάρτομεν), is attracted to ἡμῶν, but such an attraction of the nominative is utterly inadmissible.

A better construction is found by referring ὧν back to αἰσχύνη for its government—"shame for the sins which we have committed." The distance, however, between the two words makes their connexion obscure, and in any case it must be admitted that the translator has given a very vague interpretation of the Hebrew (אֲשֶׁר).

Instead of ὧν ἡμάρτομεν ἔναντι Κυρίου, as in Baruch, the LXX. give in Dan. ix. 8 οἵτινες ἡμάρτομέν σοι. Some light is thus thrown on the composition of our book: for the different renderings of the relative shew that the Greek texts have different authors, while the further variation ἔναντι Κυρίου for σοι is more than a mere diversity of translation, and proves that there must have been a Hebrew text of Baruch differing here from the text of Daniel.

19. ἐσχεδιάσαμεν.] The word is used in the same sense, "to act carelessly," by Polybius, XII. iv. § 4, ὑπὲρ ὧν Τίμαιος κακῶς καὶ παρέργως ἱστορήσας ἐσχεδίασεν; and XXIII. ix. § 12, οὗτοι μὲν ἐσχεδιακότες ἐφαίνοντο τοῖς κακοῖς πράγμασιν.

CHAPTER II.

The prayer and confession which the Jews at Babylon made, and sent in that book unto the brethren in Jerusalem.

[a] Dan. 9 12, 13.

[a] THEREFORE the Lord hath made good his word, which he pronounced against us, and against our judges that judged Israel, and against our kings, and against our princes, and against the men of Israel and Juda,

2 To bring upon us great plagues, such as never happened under the whole heaven, as it came to pass in Jerusalem, according to the things that were written in the law of Moses;

3 That a man should [b] eat the flesh of his own son, and the flesh of his own daughter.

[b] Deut. 28. 53. Lam. 2. 20. & 4. 10

4 Moreover he hath delivered them to be in subjection to [c] all the king-

[c] 2 Kings 24. 2.

CHAPTER II.

1. Therefore the Lord made good.] Lit., "And the Lord established."

The whole verse is taken, with slight variations and additions, from Dan. ix. 12, on which see the notes in the 'Speaker's Commentary.'

his word.] The LXX. in Daniel render the Hebrew less exactly by προστάγματα.

judges that judged Israel.] The meaning of "judges" in Daniel l. c. is rightly expanded in the words which are here added by our compiler, "and against our kings and against our princes." For in Daniel we are not to think only of "the judges" specially so called, though in our passage the word is so limited. Compare 1 Sam. vii. 16, 17. The wider sense occurs in Ps. ii. 10; Hos. vii. 7.

2. To bring upon us, &c.] Explanation of the way in which God fulfilled His word. On this explanatory use of the Greek infinitive (with τοῦ) "in epexegesis, where the simple infinitive with or without ὥστε might have been used," see Winer, 'Greek Gr.' § xliv. p. 410, E. Tr. This construction is very common in the LXX., ל with the infinitive denoting both design and consequence.

great plagues, such as never happened, &c.] There is a sort of redoubled comparison resulting from a combination of two thoughts: (1) plagues such as never happened elsewhere, and (2) such plagues never happened elsewhere as happened at Jerusalem. There is a similar mode of expression in Col. i. 6.

under the whole heaven.] Deut. iv. 19; Dan. vii. 27; Baruch v. 3.

3. The reference is to Lev. xxvi. 29, and Deut. xxviii. 53—passages which are recalled in Jer. xix. 9; compare Lam. ii. 20 and iv. 10: "The hands of the pitiful women have sodden their own children: they were their meat in the destruction of the daughter of my people."

That a man should eat, &c.] More exactly, "That we should eat, each man the flesh of his son, and each man the flesh of his daughter." The Greek here follows closely the idiomatic use of the Hebrew word אִישׁ.

4. Moreover he hath delivered them to be in subjection.] "And he made them subject:"

doms that are round about us, to be as [d] a reproach and [e] desolation among all the people round about, where the Lord hath scattered them.

5 Thus we [‖f] were cast down, and not exalted, because we have sinned against the Lord our God, and have not been obedient unto his voice.

6 [g] To the Lord our God appertaineth righteousness: but unto us and to our fathers open shame, as appeareth this day.

7 [h] For all these plagues are come upon us, which the Lord hath pronounced against us.

8 [i] Yet have we not prayed before the Lord, that we might turn every one from the imaginations of his wicked heart.

9 Wherefore the Lord watched over us for evil, and the Lord hath brought it upon us: for the Lord is righteous in all his works which he hath commanded us.

10 Yet we have not hearkened unto his voice, to walk in the commandments of the Lord, that he hath set before us.

11 [k] And now, O Lord God of Israel, that hast brought thy people out of the land of Egypt with a mighty hand, and high arm, and with signs, and with wonders, and with great power, and [l] hast gotten [d] Isai. 43. 28.

[e] Jer. 25. 38. & 44. 6, 22.
‖ Gr. were beneath, and not above.
[f] Deut. 28. 43, 44.
[g] ch. 1. 15.
[h] Dan. 9. 11, 12. ch. 1. 20.
[i] Dan. 9. 13, &c.
[k] Dan. 9. 15.
[l] Neh. 9. 10.

compare Gen. ix. 2, xiv. 20; Josh. xi. 8, &c., where the A. V. renders "delivered into the hand."

all the kingdoms that are round about us.] Egypt, Assyria, Babylon.

to be as a reproach.] Omit "as." The primary passage, Deut. xxviii. 37, is repeated in various forms in 2 Chr. xxix. 8; Jer. xxv. 9, 11, 18, xxix. 18, xlii. 18, xliv. 12, 22.

and desolation.] Rather, "and an astonishment." Compare Jer. xxix. 18: "I will deliver them to be removed to all the kingdoms of the earth, to be a curse and an astonishment, and an hissing, and a reproach, among all the nations whither I have driven them." See the Additional Note.

where the Lord hath scattered them.] Compare Jer. xxix. 14, 18, xl. 12; Dan. ix. 7, in all which places the same Hebraism (οὗ . . . ἐκεῖ) is found in the LXX., as it is also in the original passage Deut. xxx. 3.

5. Thus we were cast down.] "And they were cast down." Compare Deut. xxviii. 13 (whence the words are taken, in converse order), and v. 43, "thou shalt come down very low," &c.

and have not been obedient unto his voice.] Better rendered by Ewald (E. Tr.): "not to hearken unto his voice."

6. See on i. 15, and compare Ezra ix. 7.

open shame.] "confusion of face:" literally, "the shame of faces."

7–17. This passage is taken in great part from Dan. ix. 13–18.

7. See the Additional Note. If we retain the reading of the chief MSS. (Vatican and Alexandrine), we may connect vv. 7–9 closely with v. 6, and render the whole passage thus: "confusion of face, as appeareth this day, (according to) what the Lord pronounced against us, all these evils which are come upon us, and we did not entreat the face of the Lord, that we should turn every one from the thoughts of his wicked heart, and so the Lord watched over the evils, and the Lord brought them upon us."

pronounced against us.] Compare Jer. xvi. 10, xix. 15, xxv. 13, xxxv. 17, xxxvi. 31: and observe the close dependence of our author upon Jeremiah as well as upon Daniel.

8. prayed before the Lord.] More literally, "did not entreat the face of the Lord." Compare the rendering given in the margin (E. V.) in 1 Kings xiii. 6; Ps. cxix. 58; Jer. xxvi. 19; and many other passages, including Dan. ix. 13, from which our verse is wholly taken. The corresponding Hebrew phrase is very expressive,—"stroke the face."

imaginations.] "thoughts (νοημάτων);" not the same word as in i. 22.

9. watched over us for evil.] "watched over the evils," as in Dan. ix. 14.

in all his works which he hath commanded us.] Dan. ix. 14, "which he doeth: for we obeyed not his voice:" an acknowledgment of the justice of the chastisements inflicted. Our author refers it to what God has required of Israel, whose sin was aggravated because God required only what was right and good.

10. set before us.] See on i. 18.

11. The whole verse is taken literally from Dan. ix. 15, with the insertion of the words "and high arm, and with signs, and with wonders, and with great power," taken from Jer. xxxii. 21: compare Ps. cxxxvi. 12.

hast gotten thyself a name.] Compare Neh. ix. 10; Ex. xiv. 18; and margin, Dan. ix. 15.

thyself a name, as appeareth this day:

12 O Lord our God, we have sinned, we have done ungodly, we have dealt unrighteously in all thine ordinances.

13 [m] Let thy wrath turn from us: for [n] we are but a few left among the heathen, where thou hast scattered us.

14 Hear our prayers, O Lord, and our petitions, and deliver us for thine own sake, and give us favour in the sight of them which have led us away:

15 [o] That all the earth may know that thou art the Lord our God, because [‖p] Israel and his posterity is called by thy name.

16 O Lord, [q] look down from thine holy house, and consider us: [r] bow down thine ear, O Lord, to hear us.

17 Open thine eyes, and behold; [s] for the dead that are in the graves, whose [‖] souls are taken from their bodies, will give unto the Lord neither praise nor righteousness:

[m] Dan. 9. 16, &c.
[n] Jer. 42. 2.
[o] Isai. 37. 20.
[‖p] Gr. thy name is called upon Israel.
[q] Dan. 9. 19. [q] Deut. 26. 15. Isai. 63. 15.
[r] Dan. 9. 18.
[s] Ps. 6. 5. & 115. 17. Isai. 38. 18, 19. Ecclus. 17. 27, 28.
[‖] Gr. spirit, or, life.

12. Compare Dan. ix. 15, 16.

in all thine ordinances (δικαιώμασι).] In Daniel the corresponding words are connected with the following verse: "O Lord, according to all thy righteousness, I beseech thee, let thine anger be turned away."

For "righteousness" the LXX. there read "mercy" (ἐλεημοσύνη), an admissible meaning, but one which shews that our compiler used not the Greek version, but the original Hebrew, to which his translator gave a meaning different from that given by the LXX.

13. Let thy wrath turn from us.] There is an evident abruptness and want of connexion, which is removed by the reading of Cod. A (ἀποστραφήτω δή), in which δή answers to the Hebrew particle of entreaty (נָא), rendered in the A.V. "now," or "I pray thee;" or as n Dan. ix. 16, "I beseech thee."

a few left among the heathen.] Compare Deut. iv. 27, "And the Lord shall scatter you among the nations, and ye shall be left few in number among the heathen, whither the Lord shall lead you;" Lev. xxvi. 33; Deut. xxviii. 62; Ps. xliv. 11; Jer. xlii. 2, xlix. 15; Obad. 2.

where thou hast scattered us.] Dan. ix. 7; compare v. 4, and v. 29 below.

14. Hear our prayers, &c.] "Hearken unto our prayer, O Lord, and our supplication:" Dan. ix. 17; 2 Chr. vi. 19.

for thine own sake.] Dan. ix. 19.

led us away.] "carried us away captive:" as in Jer. xxix. 14, and constantly.

15. That all the earth may know.] 1 Sam. xvii. 46; 2 Chr. vi. 33, &c.

called by thy name.] "And that thy name is called upon Israel and upon his race." See the marginal notes in the A.V. on Dan. ix. 18; Jer. xiv. 9; 2 Chr. vi. 33, &c.

16. from thine holy house.] Deut. xxvi. 15: "Look down from thy holy habitation, from heaven."

bow down thine ear, O Lord, to hear us.] "and hear;" as in Dan. ix. 18, "incline thine ear, and hear." The original is Isa. xxxvii. 17, the prayer of Hezekiah against Sennacherib.

17. Comp. Isa. xxxvii. 17: "Open thine eyes, O Lord, and see." The remainder of the verse is taken substantially from Isa. xxxviii. 18, Hezekiah's prayer after his recovery from sickness.

in the graves.] Literally, "in Hades:" "in the unseen world." The souls, not the bodies of the dead, are of course meant. See the next note.

whose souls are taken.] "whose spirit is taken." The construction of the relative pronoun is closely copied from the Hebrew. See Introd. § v. p. 249.

from their bodies.] The Greek word (σπλάγχνα) rendered "bodies" means really the inner organs, especially the nobler organs, lungs, heart, and liver. The description strengthens the contrast between the living and the dead, who, being deprived of the "spirit," have no longer any living bodily powers wherewith on earth to praise God.

By "spirit" is here meant "the breath of life" (Gen. ii. 7, vi. 17, &c.).

will give unto the Lord neither praise nor righteousness.] "will not give unto the Lord glory and righteousness." The Gk. word (δικαίωμα) rendered "righteousness" in A.V. may mean, as in 2 Sam. xix. 28, a "right," a just claim, equivalent to "due honour." The corresponding Hebrew word (צְדָקָה) has the same sense also in Neh. ii. 20, but more usually means "justice" or righteousness shewn in act: compare Keil's note on Dan. ix. 16. The meaning of our passage therefore seems to be to "ascribe to God glory and justice." In the phrase "give glory to God" the Hebrew word always used (כָּבוֹד) means not mere "praise" or "recognition," but inherent glory. See notes on Rom. iii. 23 in the 18 But the soul that is greatly vexed, which goeth stooping and feeble, and the eyes that fail, and the hungry soul, will give thee praise and righteousness, O Lord.

Digitized by Microsoft ®

19 [t] Therefore we do not make our humble supplication before thee, O Lord our God, for the righteousness of our fathers, and of our kings.

20 For thou hast sent out thy wrath and indignation upon us, as thou hast spoken by thy servants the prophets, saying,

21 [u] Thus saith the Lord, Bow down your shoulders to serve the king of Babylon: so shall ye remain in the land that I gave unto your fathers.

[t] Dan. 9. 18.

[u] Jer. 27. 11.

'Speaker's Commentary.' Our interpretation is rendered certain by the corresponding passage in v. 18, where the more usual word (δικαιοσύνη) is employed.

The doctrine of the verse concerning the state of the dead does not differ from that which is found in the original passage (Isa. xxxviii. 18), and frequently in the Psalms. Compare the notes in the 'Speaker's Commentary' on Pss. vi. 5, xxx. 9, lxxxviii. 10–12, cxv. 17; and see the same thought expressed in Ecclus. xvii. 27, 28. The meaning of such passages is well stated by Cornelius à Lapide in his 'Commentary on Baruch,' quoted here by Reusch: "The dead, it is said, praise not God, (1) because in their state as dead they cannot praise Him with bodily organs, the mouth and tongue. (2) They do not praise God for new mercies received from Him day by day in wonderful deliverance from troubles as happens to the living (Ps. lxxxviii. 11: 'Wilt thou shew wonders to the dead? . . . Shall thy wonders be known in the dark? and thy righteousness in the land of forgetfulness?'). (3) They praise not God with such praise as the living praise Him withal, nor with such praise as the living can hear; wherefore in respect of the living there is from the dead no praise, even as there is no voice, no life. . . .

"For the Old Testament understands by the praise of God an outward and perceptible praise, which may edify others and encourage them to join in the same, such as the praise of penitents entreating and imploring God's mercy, as was this praise of Baruch and the Jews, which is properly called 'giving glory:' for 'glory' is praise and renown made public, whereas praise and honour may be private and secret."

18. greatly vexed.] The Greek means literally "vexed at the greatness" (ἐπὶ τὸ μέγεθος); and this reading is fully supported in the MSS. But there is almost certainly some corruption, or error of translation: for the following clause, "which goeth stooping and feeble," is descriptive of the body, not of "the soul."

Ewald (reading καὶ for ἐπί) renders: "the grieving soul, and the pride which goeth along bowed and fainting;" but neither this, nor any other possible meaning of μέγεθος, is satisfactory. The whole verse is imitated from Deut. xxviii. 65: "Neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest: but the Lord shall give thee a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind." See the Additional Note, and Introd. § v. p. 249.

the eyes that fail.] Compare Deut. xxviii. 65: "The Lord shall give thee there a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind." The words of Deuteronomy were evidently in our author's mind here as in so many other passages of this chapter.

the hungry soul.] Compare Jer. xxxi. 25: "For I have satiated the weary soul, and I have replenished every sorrowful soul." For "sorrowful soul" the LXX. there have "hungry soul;" the Hebrew word there and in Deut. xxviii. 65 ("sorrow of mind") meaning literally to "pine" or "waste away."

19. Therefore we do not make our humble supplication before thee.] Literally, "For we do not cast down our supplication before thy face." Compare Jer. xxxvi. 7, xxxvii. 20, xxxviii. 26, xlii. 2; Dan. ix. 20.

for the righteousness.] Literally, "upon the righteous deeds," as a ground or foundation for our petition. Compare for the thought Deut. ix. 4–6. Ewald thinks that an additional clause, such as that in Daniel, "but for thy great mercies," has been omitted here; but our author postpones that plea till v. 27.

20. thou hast sent out.] Omit "out."

and indignation.] "and thine indignation."

by thy servants.] Literally, "by the hand of thy servants," following the Hebrew closely.

21. The verse is compiled from Jer. xxvii. 11, 12.

Bow down your shoulders.] "shoulder." The Greek words used here (ὦμος) and in v. 33 (νῶτος) are both different from the word (τράχηλος, "neck," Hebrew עֹרֶף) used by the LXX. in the corresponding passages of Jeremiah (xxvii. 2, 8, 11, 12; xxviii. 12, 14); another Hebrew word (עֵבֶר) is represented

22 But if ye will not hear the voice of the Lord, to serve the king of Babylon, x Jer. 7. 34. & 16. 9. & 25. 10. 23 x I will cause to cease out of the cities of Juda, and from without Jerusalem, the voice of mirth, and the voice of joy, the voice of the bridegroom, and the voice of the bride: and the whole land shall be desolate of inhabitants.

24 But we would not hearken unto thy voice, to serve the king of Babylon: therefore hast thou made y Jer. 8. 1, 2. good y the words that thou spakest by thy servants the prophets, namely, that the bones of our kings, and the bones of our fathers, should be taken out of their places.

25 And, lo, z they are cast out to the heat of the day, and to the frost of the night, and they died in great miseries by famine, by sword, and by pestilence.

z Jer. 36. 30.

26 And the house which is called by thy name hast thou laid waste, as it is to be seen this day, for the wickedness of the house of Israel and the house of Juda.

27 O Lord our God, thou hast dealt with us after all thy goodness, and according to all that great mercy of thine, throughout, as also in the epithet "stiff-necked" (σκληροτράχηλος) in v. 30.

In Jeremiah the command to bring the neck under the yoke of the king of Babylon was enforced by the prophet's symbolical action in putting bonds and yokes upon his own neck.

to serve.] Literally, "to work for," as in i. 22. Compare Jer. xxviii. 14, xl. 9.

so shall ye remain in the land.] "and abide upon the land:" i.e. do not attempt to escape into Egypt. Compare Jer. xlii. 10, 13.

23. The verse is taken very literally from Jer. vii. 34, which passage is in part repeated in xvi. 9, and in Jer. xxv. 10, a context already quoted by our author: the translation, however, is independent of the LXX.

desolate of inhabitants.] See notes on v. 4; and compare Jer. xxxii. 43, xlviii. 9.

24. But we would not hearken.] "And we hearkened not." The prophecy especially meant is Jer. viii. 1: "They shall bring out the bones of the kings of Judah, and the bones of the princes, and the bones of the priests, and the bones of the prophets, and the bones of the inhabitants of Jerusalem out of their graves."

places.] "place."

25. Instead of continuing the quotation from Jer. viii. 2, "And they shall spread them before the sun, and the moon, and all the host of heaven, whom they have loved," &c., the author passes to another prediction of similar import.

to the heat of the day, and to the frost of the night.] Or, "to the heat by day, and to the frost by night." The Greek words are the same as in Jer. xxxvi. 30, where they refer to the dead body of Jehoiakim. This obvious reference of the passage is overlooked by Ewald, who imagines that there is an omission in the text, which he would supply thus: "and now are they cast out of their graves; and thy surviving ones are exposed to the heat," &c.

they died.] This refers to the people generally, as in Jer. xxi. 9.

in great miseries.] A free but good rendering of the Greek (πόνοις πονηροῖς).

by pestilence.] The Greek word (ἀποστολή) means properly "a sending forth;" but here, and in Jer. xxxii. 36, with which our passage closely corresponds, it is used as an equivalent to the Hebrew word meaning "pestilence." See the fuller explanation at the end of the chapter.

26. which is called by thy name.] Literally, as in Dan. ix. 18, "upon which thy name has been called:" compare v. 15.

hast thou laid waste, as it is to be seen this day.] The Greek means simply, "hast thou made as it is this day." See note on i. 15.

house of Israel.] "The evil of the house of Israel" is in like manner called to remembrance in Jer. xi. 17, a passage written more than a hundred years after the fall of the kingdom of Israel. Compare ii. 1.

27. O Lord our God, thou hast dealt with us.] "And yet, O Lord," &c.

goodness.] The Greek word (ἐπιείκεια), in its form as a substantive, seems to occur only here and in the books which were written originally in Greek (The Song of the Three Children, v. 19, "loving-kindness;" Wisdom ii. 19, "meekness;" xii. 18, "equity;" 2 Macc. ii. 22, "favour;" x. 4, "mercy"). The adjective, however, is used by the LXX. to render the Hebrew word meaning "ready to forgive" in Ps. lxxxvi. 5.

according to all that great mercy of thine.] See the note on v. 19, and compare Dan. ix. 18.

28 As thou spakest by thy servant Moses in the day when thou didst command him to write thy law before the children of Israel, saying,

29 [a] If ye will not hear my voice, surely ‖this very great multitude shall be turned into a small number among the nations, where I will scatter them.

30 For I knew that they would not hear me, because it is a stiff-necked people: but [b] in the land of their captivities they shall ‖remember themselves,

31 [c] And shall know that I am the Lord their God: for [d] I will give them an heart, and ears to hear:

32 And they shall praise me in the land of their captivity, and think upon my name,

33 And return from their stiff ‖neck, and from their wicked deeds: for they shall remember the way of their fathers, which sinned before the Lord.

34 [e] And I will bring them again into the land which I promised with an oath unto their fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and they shall be lords of it: and I will increase them, and they shall not be diminished.

35 And [f] I will make an everlasting covenant with them to be their God, and they shall be my people: [g] and I will no more drive my people of Israel out of the land that I have given them.

[a] Lev. 26. 14, &c. Deut. 28. 15, 62.
‖ Gr. this great swarm.
[b] Lev. 26. 32, &c.
‖ Or, come to themselves.
[c] Ps. 9. 16.
[d] Deut. 30. 6. Jer. 24. 7. & 32. 39.
‖ Gr. back
[e] Jer. 16. 15.
[f] Jer. 31. 31, &c. & 32. 38, 40.
[g] Lam. 4. 22.

29. surely.] Greek εἰ μήν, on which see Winer, 'Grammar of N. T.,' pp. 553, 627, and the commentators on Heb. vi. 14.

this very great multitude shall be turned, &c.] "this swarm so great and so many shall turn," &c. The nation is compared to a great swarm of bees, the Greek word being an imitation of their humming. As a substantive it is apparently only used here, but the verb (βομβεῖν) occurs in Jer. xxxi. 35; 1 Chr. xvi. 32; and in Plato, 'Rep.' viii. 564, D. See more in the Additional Note.

30. I knew that they would not hear me.] "I know that they will not," &c. The same tense (ἔγνων) is used by the LXX. in Jer. xiv. 20, xviii. 23, xxxiii. 3, xlviii. 30; in all which places the A. V. has the present.

captivities.] "captivity," as in v. 32. The Greek word (ἀποικισμοῦ) is used by the LXX. only in Jeremiah.

shall remember themselves.] Literally, "will return to their heart." Similar phrases occur in 1 Kings viii. 47; 2 Chr. vi. 37; Dan. iv. 34, 36.

31. an heart.] I.e. "a heart to know me" (Jer. xxiv. 7), "an understanding heart" (as some MSS. here read); or else "a new heart" (Ezek. xviii. 31). Compare Jer. xxxii. 39, where for "one heart" the LXX. read "another heart."

ears to hear.] Literally, "hearing ears:" compare Prov. xx. 12, "the hearing ear and the seeing eye."

33. stiff neck.] See note on v. 21.

wicked deeds.] See note at the end of the chapter.

the way of their fathers.] I.e. their evil course of conduct, as in Ezek. xvi. 61; xx. 43; xxxvi. 31, 32.

34. The promise of restoration is already given in Lev. xxvi. 42–45; Deut. xxx. 1–5.

the land which I promised with an oath.] See Deut. xxxiv. 4.

35. I will make an everlasting covenant with them.] In Lev. xxvi. 44, 45, God promises to "remember the covenant of their ancestors." Here the "everlasting covenant," as in Jer. xxxii. 40 and frequently, is the "new covenant" of Jer. xxxi. 31–33.

I will no more drive my people of Israel out of the land.] This corresponds to Jer. xxxii. 41, "I will plant them in this land assuredly with my whole heart, and with my whole soul;" xxiv. 6, "I will plant them, and not pluck them up;" and xlii. 10, "I will plant you, and not pluck you up."

Some modern interpreters, while acknowledging that these passages express a Messianic hope, deny the accomplishment of that hope in Jesus of Nazareth, and say that the promise has never been fulfilled: they see in it nothing more than a promise of material prosperity made to Israel after the flesh. Grotius gives rather a different view: "This covenant with Israel continued until Messiah came, and would have continued afterwards if they had received the Messiah,—a condition which is sometimes expressed, sometimes to be understood."

But both these views are directly opposed to the distinguishing characteristic of the "new covenant," that it shall never be broken, as the old covenant was (Jer. xxxi. 32, &c.). The description of the "new covenant" in Jeremiah as one which shall be written upon the heart can only apply to the spiritual covenant which God has made with the true Israel in Jesus Christ (Isa. lv. 3; Heb. viii. 6).

Digitized by Google

The Messianic hope had its material as well as its spiritual side, and the two are often combined in one view by the prophets, looking forward to the restoration of Israel and redemption in Christ as one event. In the former, however, the material aspect of the promise had its temporal and symbolical fulfilment: in the latter, the spiritual fulfilment in the establishment of the kingdom of Christ in the hearts of men.

ADDITIONAL NOTES ON VERSES 4, 7, 18, 25, 29, 33.

4. desolation.] Gr. ἄβατον. The corresponding Hebrew word (שְׁמָמָה) meant originally, according to Fürst, "astonishment," and then "desolation." It is translated by many different words in the Septuagint, as will be seen by referring to Deut. xxviii. 37; 2 Kings xxii. 19; 2 Chr. xxix. 8, xxx. 7; Jer. xviii. 16, xix. 8, xxv. 9, xlii. 18.

Passages in which ἄβατος is used as the translation of שְׁמָמָה are Jer. xxv. 18, 38; xliv. 22; xlviii. 9; xlix. 13, 17.

It is only in Jeremiah, apparently, that either שְׁמָמָה or its cognate שִׁמְמָה is rendered by ἄβατος; a circumstance which favours the conjecture that Baruch and Jeremiah were translated into Greek by the same person. But see the note on v. 21.

7. The received reading (Vat. and Alex.) is as follows:—ἃ ἐλάλησε Κύριος ἐφ' ἡμᾶς πάντα τὰ κακὰ ταῦτα ἃ ἦλθεν ἐφ' ἡμᾶς. To avoid the apparent difficulty of construction, the second ἃ is omitted in Codd. XII., 26, 33, 36, 49, &c.; while διότι is substituted for the first ἅ in Codd. 22, 48, 51, supported by the Lat. quia [and Syr.: Fritzsche].

The latter reading, though an evident gloss, points to the true explanation, the first ἅ being a bald translation of אֲשֶׁר, which may be construed in two ways. Either it is simply the relative, referring to v. 6; or it has here, as in other places, the force of a conjunction "as" (Ewald), or "because." On this use of אֲשֶׁר, see Gesenius, 'Hebr. Gr.,' § 155, 1 and 3. Ewald begins a new sentence with v. 7: "As the Lord spake all the evils concerning us which came upon us, but we did not entreat the face of the Lord . . . so the Lord watched over the evils," &c.

18. The Received Text (ἀλλ' ἡ ψυχὴ ἡ λυπουμένη ἐπὶ τὸ μέγεθος ὃ βαδίζει κύπτον καὶ ἀσθενοῦν) is supported by all the MSS., except that some cursives omit ὅ, and others, with Theodoret, insert πνεῦμα before βαδίζει. Neither of these corrections would remove the difficulties of the passage. No help is given by the free paraphrases of the Latin Versions.

Most of the modern commentators suppose that the Hebrew text was itself corrupt, or was misunderstood by the translator.

Reusch and Kneucker, referring to the original passage Deut. xxviii. 65, suggest that here also there was a similar antithesis between the soul and the body, or some part of it, e.g. the foot.

All that can be said with certainty is that the passage gives strong evidence of a Hebrew original.

25. pestilence.] That the word ἀποστολή is here used in this peculiar sense is clear from the parallel passage (Jer. xxxii. 36), where it is employed by the LXX. to translate the Hebrew word (דֶּבֶר), which is commonly used for "destruction," "death," "pestilence" (θάνατος, Jer. xiv. 12, xxi. 6, 7, &c.). As to the origin of a meaning so remote from the etymological sense of ἀποστολή, "a sending forth," Fritzsche suggests that it arose from the frequent use of the phrase ἀποστέλλειν θάνατον (Lev. xxvi. 25; 2 Chr. vii. 13; Jer. xxiv. 10; Ezek. xiv. 19, 21, xxviii. 23; Amos iv. 10).

29. multitude.] The Greek substantive βόμβησις, "buzzing," is said to be used nowhere else: the Hebrew word (הָמוֹן) to which it corresponds (as βομβεῖν to המה in Jer. xxxi. 35; xlviii. 36) occurs in 1 Kings xx. 13; 2 Kings xxv. 11; Isa. xiii. 4, xvii. 12; Ezek. xxx. 15, and is variously rendered by the LXX. as ὄχλος, ἔθνη, πλῆθος.

From this frequent use of הָמוֹן for "multitude," Kneucker argues that "the Greek translator here certainly misses both the sense and the right word, and is guilty of a mis-translation." But an examination of the passages quoted above from Isaiah will shew that in his use of the word the idea of "multitude" is derived from that of a "humming noise." Our author's attempt to represent this original meaning of the Hebrew by the new but rightly formed word βόμβησις cannot justly be called a mis-translation. It is, however, a strong proof of a Hebrew original.

33. wicked deeds.] For πονηρῶν πραγμάτων, which is the reading of the Codex Alexandrinus, the Vatican has πονηρῶν προσταγμάτων, and this is adopted by Fritzsche in the same sense as "statutes that were not good" (Ezek. xx. 25). But there the "statutes" are represented as given in anger by God: here, if the word (προστάγματα) is retained, it should be compared with Deut. xxviii. 20 (πονηρὰ ἐπιτηδεύματα, "the wickedness of thy doings"); Jer. xxiii. 2, 22, xxv. 5, xxvi. 3. A better word than "deeds" or "doings" would be "practices;" i.e. habitual deeds,—customs recognised and, as it were, prescribed (προστάγματα).

Digitized by Microsoft®

CHAPTER III.

3 The rest of their prayer and confession contained in that book, which Baruch writ, and sent to Jerusalem. 30 Wisdom was shewed first to Jacob, and was seen upon the earth.

O LORD Almighty, God of Israel, the soul in anguish, the troubled spirit, crieth unto thee.

2 Hear, O Lord, and have mercy; for thou art merciful: and have pity upon us, because we have sinned before thee.

3 For [a]thou endurest for ever, and we perish utterly. [a] Ps. 102 26.

4 O Lord Almighty, thou God of Israel, hear now the prayers of the dead Israelites, and of their children,

CHAPTER III.

1-8. An earnest prayer for deliverance, founded upon God's ancient promise recited in ii. 18–35.

Some commentators regard this as a separate prayer composed by Baruch for the exiles independently of the preceding chapters, alleging that "every link of transition, and still more every indication pointing to the preceding promise, is wanting" (Reusch).

No link of transition is needed, for the prayer follows quite naturally upon the promise.

The indications pointing to the preceding promise are numerous, as will at once appear by comparing v. 6 with ii. 31, 32, 35; v. 7 with ii. 31–33; v. 8 with ii. 29, 33.

Besides these references to the promise (ii. 28–35), Kneucker has shewn that every verse has some phrase or thought connecting it with the preceding portion of the book, i. 15—ii.

This will be the more evident if, instead of quoting the parallel passages in the notes on each verse, we bring together a few of the more striking into one view.

Compare iii. v. 1 with ii. 18.
iii. v. 2 „ ii. 14, 27.
iii. v. 3 „ ii. 13, 29.
iii. v. 4 „ i. 20; ii. 7, 10.
iii. v. 5 „ ii. 11, 15, 19.
iii. v. 6 „ i. 15, 18, 21, &c.
iii. v. 7 „ i. 16–19; ii. 6, &c.
iii. v. 8 „ i. 15, 19, 20; ii. 4.

While thus closely connected with the preceding chapters, the whole prayer is more independent of other books of Scripture; more forcible, tender, and earnest. By whomsoever and whenever composed, it expresses the genuine feelings of the writer.

1. the soul in anguish.] "a soul in anguish;" literally, "in straits" (ἐν στενοῖς). Compare 2 Sam. xxiv. 14; Susanna 22. Our English rendering of this word, and the equivalent (στενοχωρία, Isa. xxx. 6; Wisd. v. 3), is derived from the Vulgate (in angustiis). See Trench, 'N. T. Synonyms,' ii. 20.

the troubled spirit.] "and a troubled spirit." The Greek word (ἀκηδιάω) means originally "to be without care or sorrow," and hence in its later use "to be insensible to pain," "to be past feeling," "dependent," "heavy." It is used by the LXX. in Isa. lxi. 3, "spirit of heaviness;" Ps. cxix. 28, "my soul melteth away for very heaviness."

2. As the verse stands in the A.V., two reasons are urged why God should shew mercy to Israel: (1) His own nature as "a merciful God" (Deut. iv. 31, &c.); and (2) the suppliants' confession of sin, as in Ps. xli. 4, "I said, Lord, be merciful unto me: heal my soul; for I have sinned against thee."

On the omission of the words "for thou art merciful: and have pity upon us," in the Vatican MS., see the note at the end of the chapter.

3. A further twofold motive to compassion lies in the contrast between the eternal majesty of God and the helplessness of His perishing creatures: Isa. lvii. 15, 16.

endurest.] "sittest (in the throne)." Compare Ps. ix. 4, xxix. 10; Lam. v. 19.

perish utterly.] "are perishing for ever." The A.V., though it misses the force of the repetition "for ever," seems to apply the words rightly to Israel as a nation: We, the remnant of Thy people, left few in number among the heathen, are perishing in exile, and with us Thy people Israel will perish "for ever." Compare Jer. xl. 15, "the remnant in Judah perish;" Lev. xxvi. 38 f.; Deut. xxx. 18; Jer. xxvii. 10, 15.

4. hear now the prayers of the dead Israelites.] This strange expression—"the prayer of the dead of Israel"—has given rise to much discussion. "Some ancient interpreters understood by it, what seems to be the most obvious meaning, that the pious ancestors in limbo patrum prayed for their nation" (Reusch): and an appeal is made to such passages as Ps. xcix. 6; Jer. xv. 1; 2 Macc. xii. 43 ff., xv. 12, 13, to shew that such a view concerning the state of the dead is not without support in the O. T. A glance at these passages will shew how little they support the view in question: but even if their testimony were stronger, it could not be set against our author's own statement in ii. 17: "The dead . . . will give unto the Lord neither praise nor righteousness."

which have sinned before thee, and not hearkened unto the voice of thee their God: for the which cause these plagues cleave unto us.

5 Remember not the iniquities of our forefathers: but think upon thy power and thy name now at this time.

6 For thou art the Lord our God, and thee, O Lord, will we praise.

7 And for this cause thou hast put thy fear in our hearts, to the intent

Another opinion is that the phrase refers to the prayers which righteous men, now dead, such as Moses or Samuel or Solomon, had offered during their life (Ex. xxxii. 32; 1 Kings viii. 25 ff.): but this explanation is very far-fetched, and inconsistent with the plain meaning of the words "Hear the prayer of the dead," which can hardly be understood of prayers offered many centuries before.

A third view, held by many commentators (Maldonatus, à Lapide, Calmet, Grotius, Luther, Ewald, Reusch), is that by "the dead of Israel" are meant the suppliants themselves, who in their misery speak of themselves hyperbolically as "the dead." It is true that in v. 3 they speak of themselves as "perishing," and in v. 11 as "counted with them that go down into the pit;" but those expressions are evidently metaphorical, and can only apply to the living, while here it seems equally clear that the perfect participle (τῶν τεθνηκότων, as in ii. 17) can only apply to those who are actually dead.

It is, in short, impossible to find a satisfactory explanation of the words "prayer of the dead:" their meaning is clear, but quite inadmissible in this context, and directly opposed to our author's statement in ii. 17.

There is no various reading in the Greek text, except "prayers" for "prayer," which gives no help. But if proof were needed that the Greek text is not the original, we may find it in these words.

In Hebrew the difference between "the dead of Israel" (מֵתֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל) and "the men of Israel" (מְתֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל) lies only in the vowel-points of the first letter, and is no greater than the difference between mêthêy and m'thêy. In the Hebrew original of Baruch, written, as it must have been, without vowel-points, there could not have been any sign at all of the two meanings of מתי. This at once makes it probable that a translator from the Hebrew may have put "the dead of Israel" instead of "the men of Israel," which latter reading removes the difficulty of our passage.

The probability of this explanation is raised almost to certainty, when we consider the frequent mistakes which Greek translators have made in rendering the Hebrew word (מתים, "men"), and especially when we find that in Isa. v. 13 the Seventy, and in Isa. xli. 14 Aquila and Theodotion, give it the meaning "dead," as our translator does here.

For a fuller discussion of the subject, see the critical note at the end of the chapter.

and of their children, which have sinned before thee, and not hearkened unto the voice of thee their God.] Render, "and sons of the sinners before thee, which hearkened not," &c. "The sinners" meant are spoken of in the relative clause which follows in the 3rd person, and clearly distinguished from the suppliants who speak of themselves in the 1st person (ἡμῖν). Thus in the former part of the verse they give a twofold description of themselves: (1) as the remnant of Israel, and (2) as sons of the sinners whose disobedience has brought evil upon their children. This interpretation is confirmed by vv. 5, 7, 8, in which the fathers only are mentioned as sinners before God. The present participle (τῶν ἁμαρτανόντων) makes no difficulty, as it answers to the Hebrew participle, which has no distinction of tense: in both languages the participle is often a timeless substantive; see Winer, 'Gr.' § xlv. 7.

for the which cause these plagues cleave unto us.] "and so the evils clave unto us." Compare i. 20. It was a characteristic tendency of the Jews to trace the misfortunes of the children to the sins of their fathers: Ezek. xviii. 2; Lam. v. 7; Jer. xxxi. 29; Tobit iii. 3, 4.

5. forefathers.] "fathers." think upon thy power.] "remember thy hand:" compare ii. 11; Isa. li. 9.

and thy name.] Ps. lxxix. 9, cvi. 8; Isa. lxiii. 12; Jer. xiv. 21.

6. thee, O Lord, will we praise.] The inverted order of the words produces an emphasis which is not in the original: "we will praise thee, O Lord."

7. And for this cause.] "for therefore," i.e. that we should praise Thee, as is explained below.

to the intent that we should call upon thy name.] Or, according to the Vatican MS.,—"and (made us) to call,"—a second thing put into the heart by God.

and praise thee.] "and we will praise thee;" namely, because through Thy grace we have repented, according to Thy promise:

that we should call upon thy name, and praise thee in our captivity: for Deut. v. 1. [b]we have called to mind all the iniquity of our forefathers, that sinned before thee.

8 Behold, we are yet this day in our captivity, where thou hast scattered us, for a reproach and a curse, and to be subject to payments, according to all the iniquities of our fathers, which departed from the Lord our God.

9 Hear, Israel, the commandments of life: give ear to understand wisdom.

10 How happeneth it, Israel, that thou art in thine enemies' land, that thou art waxen old in a strange compare ii. 31, 32. For this we will praise thee even now, while yet in exile.

called to mind.] "put away from our heart:" see the note at the end of the chapter, on the reading.

8. captivity.] More literally, "place of exile" (ἀποικίᾳ). Compare ii. 13.

and to be subject to payments.] "and a penalty" (Ewald). The Greek word (ὄφλησιν) does not occur elsewhere in the Septuagint, and its meaning here is not very clear. The A. V. seems to refer it to "paying tribute;" Grotius understands it of "debt," referring to Deut. xxviii. 44; others of the guilt and penalty of sin (Reusch); Kneucker thinks that the Greek translator misread or misunderstood the Hebrew word. But, instead of resorting to uncertain conjecture, it is better to take the Greek word in its proper sense of "paying a penalty," and to connect it closely with the words which follow. We thus get a thought perfectly appropriate to the context, that God has scattered the Israelites among the heathen to be an object of reproach and of cursing, and "to pay the penalty for [literally, "according to"] all the iniquities" of their fathers. Compare ii. 4, and the notes there.

iii. 9—iv. 4. Israel admonished to return to the Fountain of Wisdom.

9. Hear, Israel.] An echo of Deut. v. 1, or rather of Deut. vi. 4, "the beginning of what is termed the Sh'ma ("Hear") in the Jewish services" ('Speaker's Commentary').

commandments of life.] The genitive expresses the effect or purpose, as in Rom. v. 18, "justification of life." Compare Rom. vii. 10, "the commandment which was unto life," and the note there. The same thought is more fully expressed by our author in iv. 1.

give ear to understand.] The Greek word (ἐνωτίσασθε) is common in the LXX.; e.g. in Ex. xv. 26, "give ear to his commandments." Here, as in Ps. xlix. 1, it refers to what has gone before: Ponder them in your ears, to understand wisdom.

10. How happeneth it, Israel, that thou art in thine enemies' land?] "Why is it, Israel, why is it, that thou," &c. The same construction (τί ὅτι) is found in 1 Sam. i. 8, Isa. xxii. 1 (Septuagint), and in Mark ii. 16, Luke ii. 49, Acts v. 4, 9. Much of the vivacity of the question is lost in the Authorized Version by omitting the second interrogative with Codex A and other MSS. The attention is first roused, then quickened by the repetition, as in Prov. xxxi. 2: "What, my son? And what, the son of my womb? And what, the son of my vows?"

The question includes vv. 10, 11, and is answered in vv. 12, 13: its four clauses form a climax of misery, completed in the words "counted with them that go down into the grave."

thine enemies' land.] This cannot possibly mean, as Ewald supposes, "the ancient native land of Israel here called a foreign land (v. 10)," because "the most utterly foreign nations and rulers marched over its soil, as if it were entirely lost to Israel." This verse is in its plain and obvious meaning fatal both to Ewald's theory, that the Section iii. 9—v. 9 is "A prophetic Liturgy on the basis of the Law," "intended to be used at a public service of humiliation in the Temple at Jerusalem;" and to Nöldeke's view (mentioned by Kneucker) that it is an address of "consolation for the Israelites left behind in misery after the destruction of Jerusalem."

waxen old.] Compare Ps. vi. 7, xxxii. 3; Lam. iii. 4; and especially Dan. xi. 33, where, instead of "fall by the sword, and by flame, by captivity, and by spoil many days," the Vatican text of the LXX. means "they shall fall upon the sword, and wax feeble [lit. "old"] by it, and by captivity," &c. Compare also Ps. xviii. 45, "The strangers shall fade away" (ἐπαλαιώθησαν), where, as in Ps. vi. 7, the idea of decay is more prominent than that of age.

Hence Reusch and Kneucker argue that the phrase "waxen old" does not necessarily point to a late period of the Captivity: but see Introduction, § iii. p. 244.

defiled with the dead.] Not "by the dead," but "equally with the dead." This meaning country, that thou art defiled with the dead,

[c] Ps. 28. 1. 11 That thou art [c]counted with them that go down into the grave?

12 Thou hast forsaken the fountain of wisdom.

[d] Ps. 81. 13, 14. 13 [d]For if thou hadst walked in the way of God, thou shouldest have dwelled in peace for ever.

14 Learn where is wisdom, where is strength, where is understanding; that thou mayest know also where is length of days, and life, where is the light of the eyes, and peace.

is required by the Greek (συνεμιάνθης), and agrees better with the parallel clause which follows. The defilement meant is probably the contact with idolatry, as in Jer. ii. 23; Ezek. xx. 31. The meaning suggested by Grotius, that the Jews in Babylon were made to serve in burying the dead, is a mere conjecture, having no support either in the context or in history.

11. counted with them that go down into the grave.] The language is taken exactly from Ps. lxxxviii. 4, except that "Hades" is substituted for "the pit." Compare v. 19 below.

Ewald interprets the passage metaphorically of "the dead, i.e. such as were without the true pure life mentioned in v. 9, i.e. among heathen and under their rule," so that Israel is "itself, as it were, dead and polluted by the dead." But the true meaning is that which is more fully developed in the Psalm from which the clause is quoted, Ps. lxxxviii. 3–6, where the suppliant describes himself as one brought down by extreme misery, as it were, to the very edge of the grave, and cast aside like a neglected corpse.

12. The speaker who addresses Israel now answers his own question. It is because "Thou hast forsaken the fountain of wisdom," i.e. God Himself, as in Jer. ii. 13, "They have forsaken me, the fountain of living waters," xvii. 13, and Ps. xxxvi. 9, "With thee is the fountain of life."

In Ecclesiasticus i. 5 the Authorized Version gives, "The word of God most high is the fountain of wisdom;" but the verse is not found in the Vatican Codex, and is generally regarded as spurious. Also in 2 Esdras xiv. 47 (A. V.) it is said of certain books: "In them is the spring of understanding, the fountain of wisdom" (fons sapientiae): this Book of Esdras does not exist in Greek.

In our passage it is certainly best to interpret "the fountain of wisdom" of God Himself, according to Ecclus. i. 1: "All wisdom cometh from the Lord, and is with him for ever." Israel had forsaken God by ceasing to walk in His way, as is explained in the next verse.

13. For if.] Omit "for."

"The way of God" is the way in which God teaches man to walk: compare Ps. xxvii. 11, "Teach me thy way, O Lord, and lead me in a plain path;" Micah iv. 2. On the reading see the Additional Note.

14. Learn where is wisdom.] Since the cause of thy misery is that "thou hast forsaken the fountain of wisdom" (v. 12), learn now once more who possesses and imparts her (vv. 15, 27, 32). Compare Job xxviii. 12 ff.

wisdom.] "prudence" (φρόνησις). "The Divine Principle which alone produces true life and happiness is here personified, and characterised in three distinct elements as φρόνησις, 'insight,' 'prudence;' ἰσχύς, 'strength,' and σύνεσις, 'understanding.' . . . But the same Principle is also characterised simply as φρόνησις (v. 28), σοφία (v. 23), and ἐπιστήμη, vv. 20, 27, 36." (Fritzsche.)

See further, on the distinction between these words, in the Additional Note.

strength.] I.e. the moral and spiritual power which belongs essentially to godly wisdom. Compare Mic. iii. 8, "Truly I am full of power by the Spirit of the Lord, and of judgment, and of might, to declare unto Jacob his transgression;" Job xii. 13, "With him is wisdom (σοφία) and strength (δύναμις), he hath counsel and understanding (σύνεσις)." See also Prov. ii. 2, 3, 6 in the Greek.

also.] "at the same time."

length of days.] The Greek substantive (μακροβίωσις) seems to occur only here. Kneucker remarks that the Semitic maxim, "With the ancient is wisdom; and in length of days understanding" (Job xii. 12), takes from the religious standpoint of the Jews the converse form: "The fruit of wisdom (as revealed in God's law) is long life and happiness: Ex. xx. 12; Deut. iv. 6; Prov. iv. 10." See also Prov. iii. 16, "Length of days is in her right hand."

life.] True "life" (ζωή), as in v. 9, is more than mere "length of days;" it is life in its essence as a spiritual force, "the strength, freshness, and bloom of life." (Reusch.) For this emphatic sense of "life," compare Ps. xvi. 11; Prov. iv. 13: "Keep her (instruction), for she is thy life."

the light of the eyes.] I.e. cheerfulness, happiness: see note on i. 12.

peace.] Prov. iii. 17: "all her paths are peace."

15 [e]Who hath found out her place? or who hath come into her treasures?

16 Where are the princes of the heathen become, and such as ruled the beasts upon the earth;

17 They that had their pastime with the fowls of the air, and they that hoarded up silver and gold, wherein men trust, and made no end of their getting?

[e] Job 28. 1, 20.

15. The question, Where is Wisdom to be found? is repeated under various forms, and many imaginary answers are rejected, but the true answer is not given till v. 32 ff.

Compare Job xxviii. 12, 20, "Whence then cometh wisdom (σοφία), and where is the place of understanding (ἐπιστήμης)?" v. 23, "God understandeth the way thereof, and he knoweth the place thereof," i.e. her dwelling-place (Ps. xxxvii. 10). "Wisdom" is here used in its comprehensive sense as that which exists in God as its source, and must be sought by man from Him.

It is regarded (in the question) as something hidden and hard to find: as in Job xxviii. 21, "It is hid from the eyes of all living." Its place is known to none but God (Bar. iii. 32).

into her treasures.] "treasuries," or "treasure-houses." Compare Job xxxviii. 22, "Hast thou entered into the treasures of the snow?" Ps. cxxxv. 7, "He bringeth the wind out of his treasuries."

16. Where are the princes of the heathen become.] Omit "become."

The author first brings examples to prove that none but God hath found the place of Wisdom. The enumeration of the different conditions, ages, and races of men serves to magnify the incomparable worth of wisdom.

the princes of the heathen.] These princes or rulers (ἄρχοντες) stand first, as the types of human grandeur, pride, and arbitrary power: compare Ecclus. x. 14. Some find here an allusion to the great kings of Babylon, and to Nebuchadnezzar in his madness (Kneucker). But the past tenses, and the whole context, shew that in words at least the author refers to the mighty rulers of past ages; such, for example, as Nimrod, the "mighty hunter before the Lord." That there may at the same time be a veiled allusion to Nebuchadnezzar seems not improbable when we look at such passages as Jer. xxvii. 6: "And now have I given all these lands into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon, my servant: and the beasts of the field have I given him also to serve him."

The same thought concerning the dominion over the beasts of the field as given to Nebuchadnezzar is found also in Jer. xxviii. 14; Dan. ii. 38; Judith xi. 7.

such as ruled the beasts.] "they that had dominion over the beasts:" compare Jer. xxvii. 6; Dan. ii. 38.

17. They that had their pastime with the fowls of the air.] Job xli. 5: "Wilt thou play with him as with a bird? Or wilt thou bind him for thy maidens?"

The Seventy seem to have understood Ps. civ. 26 in the same way: "There is that leviathan whom thou hast formed to take thy pastime with him (δράκων οὗτος ὃν ἔπλασας ἐμπαίζειν αὐτῷ)." On this traditional Jewish interpretation, adopted by some modern commentators, see the note in the 'Speaker's Commentary.'

The meaning of the allusion to "the beasts" and "the fowls of the air" in connexion with the search after Wisdom is seen by referring to such a passage as Job xii. 7: "Ask now the beasts, and they shall teach thee: and the fowls of the air, and they shall tell thee." These mighty rulers in all their pride could find nothing better to do than to amuse themselves with such trifles, and yet they have not learned wisdom from the birds who have travelled so far and seen so much: compare Job xxxv. 11: "But none saith, Where is God my Maker, . . . who teacheth us more than the beasts of the earth, and maketh us wiser than the fowls of heaven?"—a passage which may otherwise be rendered: "Who teacheth us by the beasts of the earth, and maketh us wise by the fowls of heaven." See Delitzsch and the 'Speaker's Commentary.'

wherein men trust, and made no end of their getting.] Literally, "wherein men trusted, and there is no end of their getting." In the former clause the Greek translator has rightly given the past tense: in the latter, which represents a common Hebrew phrase that has no verb expressed, he seems inadvertently to have used the present (ἐστί). In Isa. ii. 7 the LXX. rightly use the past tense (οὐκ ἦν ἀριθμός). The sense and connexion are clearly shewn in the A.V.: "they that hoarded up silver and gold, . . . and made no end of their getting." Neither their absolute power, nor their boundless riches, could give wisdom to those princes of the heathen. On the Hebraisms of this and the next verse, see the Introd. § v. p. 250.

18, 19. There is some difficulty in determining the sense and construction of these verses, and their relation to the preceding context. Much depends upon the meaning of the first clause, which in the Vulgate (qui argentum fabricant) and A.V. is referred to the silversmiths, and more particularly (as Kneucker thinks) to the makers of silver

18 For they that wrought in silver, and were so careful, and whose works are unsearchable, 19 They are vanished and gone down to the grave, and others are come up in their steads.

20 Young men have seen light, and dwelt upon the earth: but the way of knowledge have they not known,

21 Nor understood the paths thereof, nor laid hold of it: their children were far off from that way.

22 It hath not been heard of in Chanaan, f neither hath it been seen in Theman. f Jer. 49. 7.

idols, the value of "whose works" is "unsearchable" from their number and excellence. Taken in this sense, and in connexion with vv. 16, 17, the general meaning of the passage will be, that not only the mighty and the rich, but the skilful artists whose works were so precious,—all are gone.

On the other hand, it must be considered that the Greek word (τεκταίνω), though not uncommon in the Septuagint, seems never to be there used of material, but only of moral working. With the usual meaning "contrive" or "devise," i.e. how to get, the whole passage, vv. 16–19, may be thus rendered: "Where are the rulers of the nations, and they that had dominion over the beasts upon the earth; they that played with the birds of heaven, and hoarded up silver and gold wherein men trusted, and there was no end of their getting?—For they that wrought to get silver, and were full of care, and whose works are past finding out, they are vanished," &c.

See the Additional Note for a fuller discussion of the sense and connexion of the whole passage.

18. so careful.] The same word as in Matt. vi. 34.

whose works are unsearchable.] The probable meaning is, "whose labours are infinite." Compare in the Greek Isa. xl. 28: "there is no searching of his understanding."

20, 21. One generation after another has failed to find wisdom.

20. Young men have seen light.] "Younger men have seen light;" i.e. have been born and lived. Compare Job iii. 16: "infants which never saw light."

By "the way of knowledge" and "the paths thereof" is meant the way that leads to knowledge (ἐπιστήμη, "science," Aristot.): so in vv. 23, 27, 31, 36.

21. nor laid hold of it.] These words should begin a new sentence: "Nor did their sons lay hold of her, they wandered far," &c.

from that way.] Literally, "from the way of them" (αὐτῶν), which De Wette explains as meaning "the way of their fathers" (ii. 33): the children wandered away far beyond their fathers.

It would be simpler to refer αὐτῶν to the children themselves—"they wandered far out of their way," i.e. out of the right way in which they should have sought Wisdom. Compare Job xvii. 9, "The righteous also shall hold on his way;" Prov. v. 8, "Remove thy way far from her;" x. 10, "He that perverteth his ways shall be known;" xi. 5, "The righteousness of the perfect shall direct his way;" xix. 3, "The foolishness of man perverteth his way;" xx. 24, "Man's goings are of the Lord: how can a man then understand his own way?"

Even this rendering may be questioned on the ground that throughout the whole passage it is "the way of knowledge" that is mentioned: vv. 23, 27, 31, 36. Fritzsche, Reusch, and Kneucker prefer the various reading (αὐτῆς for αὐτῶν), which has little authority.

22, 23. "He enumerates the nations that prided themselves on wisdom" (Theodoret).

22. Chanaan.] According to the later usage of the name, Canaan refers to the Phœnicians who dwelt on the sea-coast (Zeph. ii. 5; Matt. xv. 22), "whose merchants are princes, whose traffickers are the honourable of the earth" (Isa. xxiii. 8). Compare 2 Chr. ii. 7, and Ezek. xxviii. 3–5, where of "the prince of Tyre" it is said: "Behold, thou art wiser than Daniel; there is no secret that they can hide from thee: with thy wisdom and with thine understanding thou hast gotten thee riches, and hast gotten gold and silver into thy treasures: by thy great wisdom, and by thy traffic, hast thou increased thy riches," &c. Compare Zech. ix. 2, 3.

"Theman," or Teman, a district and city in the south of Edom, was as famous for wisdom in counsel, and for proverbial sayings, as Canaan for arts and commerce. Jer. xlix. 7: "Concerning Edom, thus saith the Lord of hosts, Is wisdom no more in Teman? Is counsel perished from the prudent? Is their wisdom vanished?" Compare Obad. 8, 9.

23. The Agarenes.] "The sons also of Agar," i.e. the Ishmaelites (Gen. xvi. 15; xxxvii. 25; Ps. lxxxiii. 6).

that seek wisdom upon earth.] Gen. xxxvii. 25: "Behold a company of Ishmaelites came 23 The Agarenes that seek wisdom upon earth, the merchants of Meran and of Theman, the ‖authors of fables, and searchers out of understanding; none of these have known the way of wisdom, or remember her paths.

Or, expounders.

24 O Israel, how great is the house from Gilead, with their camels bearing spicery and balm and myrrh, going to carry it down to Egypt." These travelling merchants are here represented as "seeking wisdom upon earth" on the principle that knowledge is increased by travel. The same word (σύνεσις) is in this verse first rendered "wisdom," and then (as in v. 14) "understanding:" the latter should be used in both places, though there is no emphasis on the special sense.

On the reading see the Additional Note.

the merchants of Meran.] The name "Meran" is not found elsewhere, and is thought to be a corruption, though there is no various reading. The most probable conjecture is that ר has been substituted for ד in the Hebrew form of the name "Medan," which in Gen. xxxvii. 36 is supposed to be applied to the Midianites (v. 28) or Ishmaelites who bought Joseph. "The different names given to the traders do not shew that the account has been drawn from different legends, but that these tribes were often confounded, from the fact that they resembled one another so closely, not only in their common descent from Abraham (Gen. xvi. 15; xxv. 2, 'Medan and Midian,' both sons of Keturah), but also in the similarity of their mode of life and constant change of abode, that strangers could hardly distinguish them, especially when they appeared, not as tribes but as Arabian merchants, such as they are here described as being, 'Midianitish men, merchants'" (Keil and Delitzsch on Gen. xxv. 2). Thus "the merchants of Medan" who were sons of Keturah are very naturally mentioned in connexion with the "sons of Agar" or Ishmaelites, as in Genesis.

and of Theman.] This is not necessarily the name of the same people as in v. 22. The Greek name (Θαιμάν) represents two different Hebrew names: "Theman" or "Teman" (Gen. xxxvi. 11), grandson of Esau; and "Tema," son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15), mentioned in Job vi. 19, Jer. xxv. 23, Isa. xxi. 13, 14. The modern name is Teymá ('Dictionary of the Bible').

the authors of fables.] The Greek word (μυθολόγοι) is not found elsewhere in the Greek Scriptures, and μῦθος only in Ecclus. xx. 19, followed by παραβολή in v. 20.

Various meanings are here proposed. Ewald writes: "This undoubtedly refers to a literature of legends and stories, much read at that time, and which spread from this people over the whole earth, a precursor of the later 'Thousand and One Nights,' &c."

The older commentators think that it means those who in Oriental fashion clothed their thoughts in fables, parables, or proverbs: e.g. Ezek. xvii. 2; xviii. 2, 3. Compare Ps. xlix. 4, "I will incline mine ear to a parable: I will open my dark saying upon the harp;" lxxviii. 2, "I will open my mouth in a parable: I will utter dark sayings of old; which we have heard and known, and our fathers have told us," &c. On the full meaning of Mashal, compare Lowth ('Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews,' sect. iv. p. 43): "The Persians, the Arabs, and many of the most ancient of the Eastern nations, preserved in verse their history and politics, as well as the principles of religion and morals."

searchers out of understanding.] This additional description confirms the view which we have taken of the preceding clause. If, as Bishop Lowth suggests, the legendary lore included under the name Mashal embraced "all science, human and divine," these mythologists might well be called inquirers after wisdom, or "searchers out of understanding."

none of these have known.] Literally, "but the way of wisdom they have not known." The construction is irregular, but the meaning not obscure: The sons of Agar and merchants of Medan and Teman have been diligent searchers after knowledge about earthly things, yet they have not found the way that leads to true wisdom (σοφία).

On the construction and reading, see the Additional Note.

24–28. In this third part of the answer to the question, Who hath found out the place of Wisdom (v. 15)? the author passes from the consideration of particular classes of men, the mighty and rich (16–19), the ancients and their descendants (20, 21), nations most famous for enterprise, commerce, and intelligence (Phœnicians and Arabians), and rises to a higher thought that in the whole created world, great as it is, Wisdom is nowhere to be found, except in Him who is "the fountain of wisdom" (v. 12).

"Hitherto he has said that earthly might and riches, and human study and search, cannot bring men to the attainment of wisdom; the thought now takes the turn that human strength (Kraft) gives no claim to the reception of wisdom,—that in imparting it God has no regard to power and might." (Reusch.)

of God! and how large is the place of his possession!

25 Great, and hath none end; high, and unmeasurable.

26 There were the giants famous from the beginning, that were of so great stature, and so expert in war.

27 Those did not the Lord choose, neither gave he the way of knowledge unto them:

28 But they were destroyed, because they had no wisdom, and perished through their own foolishness.

29 [g] Who hath gone up into heaven, and taken her, and brought her down from the clouds? [g] Deut. 30. 12, 13. Rom. 10. 6, 7.

30 Who hath gone over the sea, and found her, and will bring her for pure gold?

24. O Israel.] The motive of this appeal is explained by v. 36. The thought that God has made His wisdom known to Israel only is already passing through the writer's mind.

the house of God.] This phrase, which first occurs in Gen. xxviii. 17, is always applied in the O. T. to some place or building where God grants His presence. But here its meaning cannot be limited to an earthly sanctuary, which would neither suit the description in v. 26, nor the mention of the giants in v. 27. Nor does v. 27 allow us to apply it to "the heavens" as God's dwelling-place. (Comp. 'De Mundi opif.,' § 7.) It must have the wider meaning in which Philo-Judaeus ('de Incorr. Mundi,' § 21, θεῖον δέ τι μέγεθος ὁ κόσμος καὶ οἶκος θεοῦ αἰσθητῶν) applies it to the whole created universe. It is, however, possible that this idea of "the universe" is expressed by combining the two clauses of the verse, the heaven being "the house of God," and earth "the place of his possession." The latter phrase is illustrated by Ps. civ. 24: "The earth is full of thy riches" (κτήσεως, the word here rendered "possession").

25. This thought of the immensity of the world serves to render God's favour to Israel the more conspicuous: "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof: the world, and they that dwell therein" (Ps. xxiv. 1); and yet "He hath chosen Jacob unto himself, and Israel for his peculiar treasure" (Ps. cxxxv. 4).

26. There were the giants, &c.] The author follows the Septuagint version of Gen. vi. 4 more closely than is here shewn in the A.V. "There were the giants born, who were from the beginning men of renown, of great stature, expert in war." Other references to Gen. vi. 4 are found in Ecclus. xvi. 7; Wisdom xiv. 6.

27. Those did not the Lord choose.] "Not these did God choose." Reusch refers to Deut. iv. 37: "Because he loved thy fathers, therefore he chose their seed after them, . . . to drive out nations from before thee greater and mightier than thou art;" and argues that our author is thinking especially of the giant sons of Anak, and the Rephaim, because it was more directly to them that Israel was preferred. But the allusion to the giant race of the world before the Flood is more in accordance with the wide scope of the whole passage (vv. 24–30), and the grandeur of the thoughts which it borrows from the ancient Scriptures.

28. But they were destroyed, &c.] "So they perished, because they had no prudence (φρόνησιν); they perished because of their foolishness." The language is not so well suited to the Canaanites who were destroyed by Israel, as to the flood of waters "in the old time, when the proud giants perished" (Wisdom xiv. 6).

29, 30. The language is borrowed from the description of the Divine commandment in Deut. xxx. 12: "Who shall go up for us to heaven, and bring it unto us? . . . Who shall go over the sea for us, and bring it unto us?"

But the language is not used by our author to enforce the same argument as in Deuteronomy. There the purpose is to make Israel feel that the wisdom of God has been brought very near to them, even in their heart and conscience, and therefore need not be sought far off, "in heaven," or "over the sea." Here the meaning is, that man can never find wisdom for himself, not even if he could mount up to heaven or cross over the sea. Our author's use of the passage thus falls far short of that deep significance which St. Paul discerned in it (Rom. x. 5–9). The addition of the words "brought her down from the clouds" rather points to a connexion of our passage with Ecclus. xxiv. 3,—where Wisdom says of herself: "I came out of the mouth of the most High, and covered the earth as a cloud. I dwelt in high places, and my throne is in a cloudy pillar. I alone compassed the circuit of heaven, and walked in the bottom of the deep." The conclusion of that passage, as of our own, is that Wisdom could find no resting-place except in Israel. Compare also Job xxviii. 14.

30. pure gold.] Literally, "choice gold:" compare Job xxviii. 15–19.

31 No man knoweth her way, nor thinketh of her path.

32 But he that knoweth all things knoweth her, and hath found her out with his understanding: he that prepared the earth for evermore hath filled it with fourfooted beasts:

33 He that sendeth forth light, and it goeth, calleth it again, and it obeyeth him with fear.

34 The stars shined in their watches, and rejoiced: [h] when he calleth them, they say, Here we be; and so with cheerfulness they shewed light unto him that made them.

35 This is our God, and there shall none other be accounted of in comparison of him.

36 He hath found out all the way of knowledge, and hath given it unto

[h] Ps. 147. 4.

31. No man knoweth.] There is none that knoweth."

her path.] I.e. the path that leads to Wisdom.

32. But he that knoweth all things knoweth her.] The comparative poverty of our language makes it almost impossible to reproduce the distinction between the two Greek words: one of which (εἰδώς) represents the ever-present knowledge of Him "that knoweth all things;" while the other (γινώσκει) ascribes to God the same mental process by which man gets to know what was not previously known to him. See the Additional Note. The latter idea is developed in a still more anthropomorphic fashion in the following words: "and hath found her out with his understanding."

The description of God's creative action as extending over all His works serves to confirm the truth that He must know fully the way of wisdom, for only by wisdom hath He made them all. This argument also is taken from Job xxviii. 23, 24 ff. It serves to exalt the glory of Him, who is in an especial sense the God of Israel, by whom the chosen nation has been so highly favoured (vv. 35, 36).

for evermore.] Compare Eccles. i. 4: "One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh: but the earth abideth for ever." Thus the earth may be called eternal in comparison with man and his works, but the statement must not be taken in an absolute sense. The duration of God's works exalts His power.

33. By "light" some here understand the light of the sun, and others lightning. In favour of the former they refer to Job xxxi. 26: "If I beheld the sun (margin, "light") when it shined." This seems to be the only passage in which the Hebrew word for "light" (אוֹר) is translated "sun" (ἥλιον, LXX.), though of course it often means the light of the sun.

On the other hand, "light" (אוֹר) is used for "lightning" in Job xxxvi. 30, 32, xxxvii. 3, 11, 15; from which passages the description seems to be taken. Compare Job xxxviii. 35: "Canst thou send lightnings that they may go?"

with fear.] The lightning is personified, and described as conscious of God's power and command.

34. The stars shined in their watches.] Compare Ecclus. xliii. 10: "At the commandment of the Holy One they will stand in their order, and never faint in their watches."

"A metaphor from soldiers keeping watch: for the stars are the host of heaven" (Cornelius à Lapide). The old commentator in this good note anticipates the poet's thought:

"The sentinel stars set their watch in the sky."

and rejoiced.] Compare Job xxxviii. 7, "The morning stars sang together;" and Ps. cxlviii. 3, "Praise him, all ye stars of light;" and Shakspeare's allusion to the former passage ('Merchant of Venice,' v. 1):

"There's not the smallest orb which thou beholdest,
But in his motion like an angel sings, Still quiring to the young-eyed cherubims."

when he calleth them.] Ps. cxlvii. 4; Isa. xl. 26.

Here we be.] Compare Job xxxviii. 35: "Canst thou send lightnings, that they may go, and say unto thee, Here we are?" Judith ix. 6. "They spake not by word, but by deed" (Cornelius à Lapide).

35. Compare Ps. xlviii. 14, "This God is our God for ever and ever;" and cxiii. 5, "Who is like unto the Lord our God?"

This mighty God, the Maker of the world, to whose power and wisdom all things in heaven and earth bear witness, is in an especial sense our God, whom alone we worship, and who has chosen us to be His peculiar people.

36. The question of v. 15 now receives its full answer. God alone has "found out all the way [or rather "every way"] of knowledge."

Compare Job xxviii. 23: "God understandeth the way thereof, and he knoweth the place thereof;" i.e. of wisdom.

Jacob his servant, and to Israel his beloved.

37 [i] Afterward did he shew himself upon earth, and conversed with men. [i] Prov. 8. 31. John 1. 14 and hath given it unto Jacob his servant.] Ps. cxlvii. 19: "He sheweth his word unto Jacob, his statutes and his judgments unto Israel. He hath not dealt so with any nation; and as for his judgments they have not known them." Compare also Isa. xliv. 1, "Jacob my servant, and Israel whom I have chosen;" and Deut. iv. 5.

beloved.] See Deut. xxxii. 15, in the LXX. (ἐλάκτισεν ὁ ἠγαπημένος).

37. Afterward did he shew himself upon earth.] "Afterward she was seen upon earth." No subject is expressed in the Greek, but there can be no doubt that the statement refers to "knowledge" (ἐπιστήμη, v. 36), not as in A. V. to God. Compare Ecclus. xxiv. 8: "So the Creator of all things gave me a commandment. . . . Let thy dwelling be in Jacob, and thine inheritance in Israel . . . and so was I established in Sion" (v. 10).

and conversed with men.] In Prov. viii. 31 Wisdom speaks thus of herself: "Rejoicing in the habitable part of his earth: and my delights were with the sons of men."

On the supposed reference of this verse to the Messiah, see the Additional Note.

ADDITIONAL NOTES ON VERSES 2, 4, 7, 12, 13, 14, 18, 23, 32, 37.

2. The Vatican MS. omits the words ὅτι θεὸς ἐλεήμων εἶ· καὶ ἐλέησον, which are found in the Alexandrine and most other MSS. and Versions. They are rejected by some modern commentators, and Kneucker argues that the superfluity of words does not suit the deep emotion of the suppliant; a criticism which is not convincing.

4. The great difficulty of the expression "Hear the prayers of the dead Israelites," the complete removal of the difficulty by the proposed emendation "the prayer of the men of Israel," and the striking proof which the supposed mistake affords of a Hebrew original,—all make it desirable to examine carefully the way in which the LXX. render the word מֻתֵי, and its construct מְתֵי.

The word first occurs in the phrase מְתֵי מִסְפָּר, "men of number," i.e. "few in number" (A.V.), men easily counted (εὐαρίθμητοι τινες). This formula occurs in Gen. xxxiv. 30 (ὀλιγοστὸς ἐν ἀριθμῷ); in Deut. iv. 27 (ὀλίγοι ἀριθμῷ); 1 Chron. xvi. 19 (ὀλιγοστοὺς ἀριθμῷ); Ps. cv. 12 (ἀριθμῷ βραχεῖς ὀλιγοστούς). We see that in the Greek translation no trace appears of the original meaning "men;" and we shall find further reason to doubt whether the translators had any knowledge of this meaning.

In Deut. xxxiii. 6, "Let not his men be few" (literally, "a number"), the LXX. give καὶ ἔστω πολὺς ἐν ἀριθμῷ. In Deut. xxvi. 5 and xxviii. 62 we find another combination, בְּמְתֵי מְעָט; meaning literally "with men of fewness," and rendered in both places by the LXX. ἐν ἀριθμῷ βραχεῖ.

In all these passages the idea of a "small number" is expressed by the words with which מְתֵי is combined, but was apparently attached by the Greek translators to that word itself. Thus in Isa. xli. 14, "Fear not, thou worm Jacob, and ye men of Israel," the LXX. have ὀλιγοστὸς Ἰσραήλ, and the margin of the A. V. gives as an alternative "few men of Israel."

The mistaken notion of the LXX. becomes apparent when we turn to passages in which there is no idea of number in the Hebrew. Thus in Job xi. 3, "Should thy lies put men (מְתִים) to silence?" they seem to wander in total darkness, writing εὐλογημένος γεννητὸς γυναικὸς ὀλιγόβιος, and still clinging in the last word to their error. Still more remarkable is their rendering of Ps. xvii. 14: "From men which are thy hand, O Lord, from men of the world." Here מִמְּתִים is first translated ἀπὸ ἐχθρῶν, and the second time ἀπ' ὀλίγων (of which ἀπολύων, Cod. Vat., is a manifest corruption).

The same ignorance of the true meaning of the word appears in other passages: Deut. ii. 34, iii. 6; Job xi. 11, xix. 19, xxii. 15, xxiv. 12, xxxi. 31; Ps. xxvi. 4; Isa. iii. 25, v. 13. These are all the passages in which the word occurs, according to Fürst's Concordance; and the only one of them in which the Greek translators may be thought to have known its meaning is Job xxii. 15, where they turn "wicked men" (A. V.) into ἄνδρες δίκαιοι.

In Isa. v. 13 they have confounded מְתֵי, "men," with מֵת, "dead" (νεκρῶν), having turned "men of famine" into "dead through famine."

It is remarkable that the same confusion is seen in the Latin rendering of another passage quoted above—Isa. xli. 14, "ye men of Israel,"—for which we find, qui mortui estis ex Israel, which is derived from the Greek version of Aquila (τεθνεώτες) or Theodotion (νεκροί).

With these proofs of the confusion of the two words, it seems impossible to doubt that here also a translator's mistake has given us

Digitized by Microsoft®

"the dead of Israel" instead of "the men of Israel."

Mr. Cheyne, in a critical note on Isa. iii. 25, observes that מֻתַּי "implies dependence or weakness." Hence he renders it in xli. 14, "ye petty folk of Israel." But in fact the idea of "weakness" seems to be quite excluded by the parallelism of the two clauses in Isa. iii. 25: Thy men shall fall by the sword, and thy mighty in the war. Compare Job xi. 3. There is no need to assume, as some do, that the Hebrew word itself has come to connote "fewness" from its frequent occurrence in the combination מְתֵי מִסְפָּר, "men of number," i.e. "few." See Delitzsch, and Rosenmüller on Isa. xli. 14; and on Baruch iii. 4, Welte, Hitzig, Kneucker, and Reuss.

7. The A.V. ("called to mind") represents the reading of Cod. Alex. and other MSS., ἀπεστρέψαμεν ἐπὶ καρδίαν, for which Cod. Vat. has ἀπὸ καρδίας. The Vulgate gives convertimur ab iniquitate patrum.

12, 14. The author uses three synonyms in this section, which may be thus distinguished: "understanding" (σύνεσις) is a purely critical faculty; "prudence" or "discretion" (φρόνησις) is practical and directive; and these both have as their object things human and temporal; while "wisdom" (σοφία) is "the perfect combination of science (ἐπιστήμη) and intelligence (νοῦς), having for its object the highest natures" (Hampden, 'Fathers of Greek Philosophy,' p. 145). Compare Arist. 'Eth. Nic.' vi. 6: εἴη ἂν ἡ σοφία νοῦς καὶ ἐπιστήμη, ὥσπερ κεφαλὴν ἔχουσα ἐπιστήμη τῶν τιμιωτάτων. Schol. τιμιώταται δὲ αἱ ἀρχαί.

13. for ever.] The Alexandrine and many other MSS. read τὸν αἰῶνα χρόνον, as in v. 32; Isa. xiii. 20, xiv. 20. For such adjectival use of αἰῶνα, see Matth., 'Gk. Gr.,' ii. § 429, 4.

18. For they that wrought in silver.] Use of τεκταίνω (-ομαι) in the LXX.:—

Prov. iii. 29.	μὴ τέκταινε ἐπὶ σὸν φίλον κακά.
vi. 14.	τεκταίνεται κακά.
xii. 20.	δόλος ἐν καρδίᾳ τεκταινομένου κακά.
xiv. 22.	πλανώμενοι τεκταίνουσι κακά· ἔλεον δὲ καὶ ἀλήθειαν τεκταίνουσιν ἀγαθοί.
Ps. cxxix. 3.	The ploughers ploughed (ἐτέκταινον οἱ ἁμαρτωλοί) upon my back.
Ezek. xxi. 36.	τεκταινόντων διαφθοράν.
Sirach xi. 32.	πονηρὰ γὰρ τεκταίνει.
xxvii. 22.	τεκταίνει κακά.

In none of these passages is there any support for the A.V. "wrought in silver."

In classical authors the verb is found only in the Middle Voice, and its meaning ("to build") is expressly distinguished from the notion of working in metal by Plato, 'Legg.' viii. 846 E: μηδεὶς χαλκεύων ἅμα τεκταίνεσθω, μηδ' αὖ τεκταινόμενος χαλκευόντων ἄλλων ἐπιμελείσθω μᾶλλον ἢ τῆς ἑαυτοῦ τέχνης.

We thus seem to be driven to adopt the metaphorical use of the word, which alone is found in the Septuagint: in this sense it is rendered "devise" in Prov. iii. 29, vi. 14, xiv. 22; and in the last of these passages it is immediately followed by μεριμνῶντι, as here by μεριμνῶντες. The meaning will then be—"they that did devise to get silver, and were so careful;" and this is the meaning generally adopted by modern commentators, as Fritzsche, Reusch, Ewald, and Reuss.

But another question remains concerning the connexion of vv. 16, 17 with vv. 18, 19. Fritzsche supposes that the answer to the questions in vv. 16, 17 is not expressed but understood after v. 17: "Where are the mighty and the rich?" "They are gone." And then the proof of this suppressed answer follows in v. 18, where we have a very irregular construction, a nominative absolute, followed by an apodosis introduced by a superfluous καί: "For they who devised to get silver, and were so careful—their works are nowhere to be found." Then v. 19 forms a separate sentence. It is obvious that this entire separation of v. 19 makes the construction of v. 18 very harsh, and the general connexion is better represented in the A. V.

23. The reading of the chief MSS. (οἱ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς) gives no satisfactory sense. Fritzsche and Reusch omit the οἱ, with six or seven cursives: its presence in the older MSS. is probably due to an ancient error of transcription, caused by the previous occurrence of the same word in the earlier part of the verse.

In ὁδὸν δέ . . . the omission of δέ by the Alexandrine and other MSS. is a manifest attempt to correct a supposed error of construction. But this use of δέ in apodosis is not uncommon in good Greek authors, and is here justified by the implied contrast of the sentence: "the searchers after wisdom yet have not learned." See Schäfer, 'Appar. Demosth.,' iii. p. 448; Winer, 'Gramm.,' p. 694. This idiomatic use of δέ is not likely to have been introduced into a translation from Hebrew.

32. Kneucker argues that εἰδώς is here an error of translation for ἰδών, because the latter would have expressed more correctly the meaning of the Hebrew in Job xxviii. 24 ("seeth"): but the argument is not conclusive, since the author may have taken εἰδώς from the finite verb (οἶδεν), which the LXX. employ in v. 23 to translate the Hebrew יֹדֵעַ, which "includes the action of knowing both as commencing, and as completed" (Gesenius).

"The analysis of the Divine wisdom is here pushed to an excess: God finds wisdom by means of His intelligence: instead of saying simply that He alone possesses that which is denied to men." (Reuss.)

Digitized by Microsoft®

37. Afterward did he shew himself upon earth, and conversed with men.] This passage, understood of God as its subject, is constantly used by the Greek and Latin Fathers as a distinct prophecy of the Incarnation, and a proof that Christ is God. One example may suffice: "The prophet also, amazed at His great solicitude on behalf of the world, cried out clear and loud in these words, 'Our God was seen upon earth, and conversed with men.'" (Chrysost. 'Ecloga,' Hom. xxxiv.)

Augustine quotes the passage for the same purpose, ascribing it to Jeremiah ('c. Faustum,' xii. cap. 43).

Kneucker adopts this hyper-orthodox interpretation in order to turn it into an argument against the genuineness of the verse, which he regards as a spurious interpolation added by some Christian for a dogmatic purpose.

Against the more natural interpretation of the verse as referring to the abiding and progressive revelation of Divine truth to Israel, Kneucker argues (p. 312): "How could the author describe this as 'Wisdom appearing and walking among men'? If ὤφθη means anything at all, it means a visible form (against which even an appeal to v. 22 cannot avail), and indeed by virtue of the words 'conversed among men,' a human form (Phil. ii. 7), and nothing to the contrary is proved by such passages as Lev. xxvi. 12; 2 Sam. vii. 7."

In answer to this it is enough to say with Bishop Horsley ('Biblical Criticism,' ii. 64) that "Divine knowledge is personified in this discourse;" and "that 'knowledge' is the true subject of the verbs in this 37th verse, appears indisputably from the 1st verse of the following chapter, which explains how Knowledge was seen upon earth by means of her conversation with men under the Jewish Dispensation."

When a personification is employed, the language must necessarily be such as would apply to a visible human form: and the evidence of this afforded by v. 22 (ὤφθη) cannot be set aside by mere assertion, however confident.

It may be well to refer to the views of some of the best Roman Catholic commentators, as represented by Reusch. "Maldonatus, Corn. à Lapide, and Calmet, although they agree with this (the Messianic) interpretation, yet remark that ὤφθη and συνεστράφη may also be referred to Wisdom; and according to the context it seems to me quite inadmissible to give them any other reference: the whole preceding section treats of Wisdom; σοφία is equally the general subject of the whole section: it is professedly a discourse concerning Wisdom, for it is of her that the inquiry was made in v. 15; God is mentioned only on account of the connexion in which Wisdom stands to Him. Moreover we read immediately in the following verse πάντες οἱ κρατοῦντες αὐτήν, sc. σοφίαν, where again the subject of discourse is Wisdom; and a connexion with what follows can scarcely be established, unless we refer this verse to Wisdom."

While thus rightly defending the true grammatical interpretation, Reusch holds that there is still an implicit reference to the Messiah, in whom "in the fullest sense Wisdom appeared upon earth and walked among men."

CHAPTER IV.

1 The book of commandments is that wisdom which was commended in the former chapter.
25 The Jews are moved to patience, and to hope for the deliverance.

THIS is the book of the commandments of God, and the law that endureth for ever: all they that keep it shall come to life; but such as leave it shall die.

CHAPTER IV.

The new chapter ought to begin with v. 5, for it is evident that vv. 1–4 are closely connected with the description of "Wisdom" in the preceding chapter, and form the proper conclusion of the argument introduced in iii. 9. For while in iii. 36, 37 the thought has been stated in a general form, that Israel is the nation which God has distinguished by the gift of Wisdom, the practical application of the whole argument lies in the fact that this Divine Wisdom is identified with the Law of Moses, and that Israel can be restored to true happiness and prosperity only by faithful observance of the Law (vv. 1–4).

1. This is the book, &c.] This Wisdom or Knowledge (iii. 36), which God has given to Israel, "is the book of the commandments of God." For the mode of expression compare Ecclus. xxiv. 23, where Wisdom herself speaks: "All these things are the book of the covenant of the most High God, even the law which Moses commanded," &c. The book of the Law is the actual expression of the Wisdom given by God to Israel. This was the foundation of all religion for the Jews, and by none of them was the book of the Law

Digitized by Microsoft®

2 Turn thee, O Jacob, and take hold of it: walk [1]in the presence of the light thereof, that thou mayest be illuminated.

3 Give not thine honour to another, nor the things that are profitable unto thee to a strange nation.

4 O Israel, happy are we: for things that are pleasing to God are made known unto us.

5 Be of good cheer, my people, the memorial of Israel.

6 [a]Ye were sold to the nations, not for [your] destruction: but be-

[a] Isai. 50. 1. & 52. 3.

[1] Gr. to the shining before the light thereof.

more highly reverenced or more diligently studied than by the Babylonian Dispersion. "When the Law had fallen into oblivion, it was restored by Ezra of Babylon; when it was a second time forgotten, Hillel the Babylonian came and recovered it; and when yet a third time it fell into oblivion, Rabbi Chija came from Babylon and gave it back once more." (Succoth 20 a, quoted by Dr. Edersheim, 'Jesus the Messiah,' i. 12.)

the law that endureth for ever.] Compare Ecclus. i. 15: "She (Wisdom) hath built an everlasting foundation with men, and she shall continue with their seed." It is no doubt true, as Fritzsche observes, that the Jewish belief "in the eternal duration of the Law was a result of their Theocratic mode of viewing it:" but this does not affect the truth on which their belief was founded.

Reusch quotes with just approval the distinction drawn by Aquinas, and after him by Cornelius à Lapide, that "the Law is in its moral precepts absolutely eternal, but in its ceremonial ordinances eternal only in so far as they are completed and fulfilled in their Antitype: for in the new Law, that is in the mysteries of Christ and of His Church, the figures which foreshadowed them continue and are fulfilled." Compare Ps. cxix. 44, 52, 89, 96, 144, 152; Matt. v. 18; Luke xvi. 17.

they that keep it.] "they that keep hold of her:" Ps. lxxiii. 23, "Thou didst hold me by my right hand" (ἐκράτησας, LXX.).

but such as leave it.] "but they that forsake her:" compare iii. 12.

2. of it.] "of her."

that thou mayest be illuminated.] This clause is misplaced, and very freely paraphrased. Render the passage thus: "direct thy way towards her shining, in the presence of her light." The two clauses are parallel, as in Isa. lx. 3: "The Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising." The figure of walking by the light of a torch or lamp is applied in a similar way in Job xxix. 3: "When his candle shined upon my head, and when by his light I walked through darkness."

3. thine honour.] "thy glory;" i.e. the special privilege of Israel in being the sole possessor of God's law (iii. 36): compare Deut. iv. 6, "This is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations;" Ps. cxlvii. 19, 20; Ecclus. i. 19.

4. Compare Deut. xxxiii. 29: "Happy art thou, O Israel."

for things.] "for the things," &c. Compare for the thought Ps. cxix. 1, 2; Ex. xv. 26; Wisdom ix. 18, "Men were taught the things that are pleasing unto thee, and were saved through wisdom."

iv. 5—v. 9. Consolation and Encouragement for Israel.

5-8. Let the people be of good courage, for their captivity is not meant for their destruction, but for chastisement.

5. Be of good cheer.] The Greek word (θαρσεῖτε) is the same which is thus translated in the New Testament: it is used sometimes by the LXX. to represent the Hebrew which is more exactly rendered in the A. V. "Fear not."

my people.] God is here the speaker.

the memorial of Israel.] The remnant which keeps alive the remembrance of the nation is here called its "memorial." This meaning of the word (μνημόσυνον) follows very naturally from its use in such passages as Ps. ix. 6, xxxiv. 16, cix. 15, in which the utter destruction of a people is described as cutting off their "memorial." In this latter way the word is used very often in Ecclesiasticus. The sacrificial sense of "memorial" (Lev. ii. 2, &c.) is less appropriate here, though adopted by Ewald, whose explanation is rather fanciful: "Thou incense-offering Israel: thus a poet or bold speaker might denominate that nation whose whole life (and therefore itself in a certain sense) ought to be continually a sweet odour for the true God."

6. Ye were sold to the nations.] "Ye were sold to the heathen,"—i.e. given over into bondage or captivity, as in Lev. xxv. 39; Deut. xxviii. 68; and metaphorically in Rom. vii. 14, "sold under sin."

not for [your] destruction.] Omit "your." This additional thought clearly shews that the author has borrowed his language from Esther vii. 4, "we are sold to be destroyed,"—literally, "for destruction," the Greek words being the same as here (ἐπράθημεν . . . εἰς ἀπώλειαν).

Digitized by Microsoft®

cause ye moved God to wrath, ye were delivered unto the enemies.

7 For ye provoked him that made you by [b] sacrificing unto devils, and not to God.

8 Ye have forgotten the everlasting God, that brought you up; and ye have grieved Jerusalem, that nursed you.

9 For when she saw the wrath of God coming upon you, she said, Hearken, O ye that dwell about Sion: God hath brought upon me great mourning;

10 For I saw the captivity of my sons and daughters, which the Everlasting brought upon them.

11 With joy did I nourish them; but sent them away with weeping and mourning.

[b] Deut. 32. 17. 1 Cor. 10. 20.

but.] The conjunction (δέ), though omitted in the Textus Receptus (Tischendorf), is undoubtedly genuine, and strengthens the antithesis to the negative clause, "not for destruction." It is thus clearly implied that the Captivity is meant to be only a temporary chastisement.

delivered unto the enemies.] "delivered over to your adversaries" (ὑπεναντίοις, as in Josh. v. 13; Isa. i. 24).

7, 8. Proof of the charge that Israel had "moved God to wrath." The description of God as "him that made you," and in v. 8 as him "that brought you up," or nurtured you (τὸν τροφεύσαντα), serves to aggravate the ingratitude of His people. The language of the two verses is chiefly taken from Deut. xxxii. 15–18: "He forsook God which made him . . . they provoked him to jealousy . . . they sacrificed unto devils, not to God . . . thou hast forgotten God that formed thee."

7. unto devils, and not to God.] Besides Deut. xxxii. 17, compare Ps. xcvi. 5, "For all the gods of the nations are idols" (δαιμόνια, LXX.); cvi. 37, "Yea, they sacrificed their sons and their daughters unto devils;" 1 Cor. x. 20, on which passage see the note in the 'Speaker's Commentary.' The true meaning of the original passage of Deuteronomy is given in the margin of the A. V., "devils which were not God," and placed beyond doubt by v. 21, "that which is not God" (בְּלֹא־אֵל, ἐπ' οὐ θεῷ). Render therefore here—"unto daemons and no God." The substitution of "daemons" for "devils" is required by the fact that "devil" (ὁ διάβολος) is a name appropriated to "the Prince of the daemons," and the Greek word is never used as a substantive in the plural. Compare Archbp. Whately, 'Good and Evil Angels,' p. 88. See the Additional Note.

8. the everlasting God.] Isa. xl. 28; Sus. v. 42.

that brought you up.] Literally, "nursed you:" the LXX. use the Greek word (τροφεύω) only in Ex. ii. 7, of Moses' nurse.

ye have grieved Jerusalem, that nursed you.] Jerusalem is personified as the mother and nurse of her people: compare Isa. liv. 1–6, 13; Lam. i. 5, 16; Tobit xiii. 9. She mourns over the sins which have driven her children into captivity, and made her desolate.

9–16. Jerusalem appeals to her neighbours for pity.

9. For when she saw the wrath of God coming upon you, she said.] "For she saw the wrath of God which had come upon you, and said." The cause of the grief of Jerusalem is stated in the principal sentence "for she saw the wrath of God:" this therefore must not be reduced to a subordinate clause, as in the A. V.

Hearken, O ye that dwell about Sion.] Compare v. 14, and v. 24 where the same words (αἱ πάροικοι) are translated "the neighbours of Sion." In this its original and simple meaning the word is used by classical writers, and by Aeschylus ('Persae,' 869) is applied, exactly as it is here, to neighbouring cities or states: compare Jer. xlix. 18; l. 40, "Sodom and Gomorrah and the neighbour cities thereof." The more common meaning of the word (πάροικος) in the LXX. is "stranger" or "sojourner."

God hath brought upon me great mourning.] Most of the MSS. and versions insert "for" (γάρ) to mark more expressly the cause of the appeal, which Jerusalem makes to her neighbours for sympathy. But the conjunction is not necessary, and is very frequently omitted after "Hearken" or "Hear." Compare 1 Chron. xxviii. 2;—2 Chron. xiii. 4, 5; xv. 2; xviii. 18;—Isa. xxviii. 22; xxxii. 9, 10; xxxix. 5;—Jer. vi. 19;—Amos iii. 1; iv. 1; v. 1; vii. 16, &c.

10. For I saw, &c.] "For I have seen the captivity of my sons and daughters, which the Eternal hath brought upon them." Here, as in the last clause of v. 9, the aorists referring to events supposed to be recent are better rendered by the perfect.

The Alexandrian Codex and the Vulgate insert "my people" (τοῦ λαοῦ) before "my sons and daughters,"—a needless gloss.

11. With joy.] "For with joy."

Digitized by Microsoft®

12 Let no man rejoice over me, a widow, and forsaken of many, who for the sins of my children am left desolate; because they departed from the law of God.

13 They knew not his statutes, nor walked in the ways of his commandments, nor trod in the paths ‖ of discipline in his righteousness.

14 Let them that dwell about Sion come, and remember ye the captivity of my sons and daughters, which the Everlasting hath brought upon them.

15 For [c] he hath brought a nation upon them from far, a shameless nation, and of a strange language, who neither reverenced old man, nor pitied child.

16 These have carried away the dear beloved children of the widow, and left her that was alone desolate without daughters.

‖ Or, of his discipline in righteousness.

[c] Deut. 28. 49, 50.

sent them away.] I.e. into captivity: compare v. 23.

12. rejoice over me.] I.e. exult in my misfortunes, as in v. 31; Mic. vii. 8; Obad. v. 12.

a widow.] The Greek word (χηρά) sometimes has, both in classical and biblical usage, a general meaning, "desolate" or "bereft." It is thus applied to Jerusalem in Isa. xlix. 21: "I have lost my children, and am desolate" (χηρά); compare vv. 16 and 19, Lam. i. 1, and the opening lines of Heber's 'Palestine:'

"Reft of thy sons, amid thy foes forlorn, Mourn, widow'd Queen; forgotten Zion, mourn."

It is not necessary therefore to press the meaning "forsaken of God."

who . . . am left desolate.] "For the sins of my children am I left desolate." The proper connexion of this with the following clause preserves the parallel arrangement of the original.

departed.] "turned aside:" Job xxxi. 7; Ps. cxix. 51, "declined." The clause is taken word for word from Job xxxiv. 27, where A. V. has "turned back."

13. knew not.] "considered not" (οὐκ ἔγνωσαν); i.e. did not give heed to understand and observe them. This clause, like the last, is taken word for word from Job xxxiv. 27, except that there the LXX. have ἐπέγνωσαν, "would not consider," A.V. Here the reading of Cod. A (ἐφύλαξαν, "kept") is a gloss.

his commandments.] "the commandments of God," according to the better reading.

trod in the paths.] Omit "in."

of discipline in his righteousness.] The words may be connected in two ways: "of his discipline in righteousness" (Gaab), or "of discipline, in his righteousness." The former might be justified by Ecclus. l. 27, "The instruction (παιδείας) of understanding and knowledge," but it is simpler to connect "in his righteousness" with the verb "trod."

discipline.] The Greek word (παιδεία), like the Hebrew (מוּסָר) to which it answers, is applied to the "correction" of children by their parents (Prov. xxii. 15; xxiii. 13) and of men by God (Jer. ii. 30); but also has the meaning "instruction" (Prov. i. 2, 7, and very frequently).

Thus "the paths of discipline" are the paths in which God's instruction and correction should teach men to walk.

14. A renewed appeal to the neighbouring cities, beginning in the 3rd person, passes by a lively and not unusual transition to the 2nd person. The remainder of the verse is repeated from v. 10.

15. Taken from Deut. xxviii. 49: "The Lord shall bring a nation against thee from far."

a shameless nation.] This answers to "a nation of fierce countenance," in Deut. xxviii. 50, which is literally "a nation strong of face," and is rendered by the LXX. ἀναιδὲς προσώπῳ, "shameless of face." Compare Dan. viii. 23.

of a strange language.] The LXX. use the same word (ἀλλόγλωσσον) in Ezek. iii. 6: it is rather a paraphrase than a literal rendering of the Hebrew in Deut. xxviii. 49, "whose tongue thou shalt not understand" (A. V.).

who neither reverenced.] "For they neither reverenced." With "for," the reading of the Vatican MS., this sentence gives the reason for the description "a shameless nation." In Deut. xxviii. 50 it is—"which shall not regard the person of the old, nor shew favour to the young:" but according to the LXX. "nor pity the young."

16. These have carried away.] "And they have carried away,"—a continuation of the statement, "he hath brought a nation upon them from far" (v. 15).

the dear beloved children.] "the beloved sons:" the mention of daughters separately shews that "sons" are here meant.

and left her that was alone desolate without daughters.] "and robbed the lone woman of her daughters." Codex A reads μονογενῆ,

Digitized by Microsoft®

17 But what can I help you?

18 For he that brought these plagues upon you will deliver you from the hands of your enemies.

19 Go your way, O my children, go your way: for I am left desolate.

20 I have put off the clothing of peace, and put upon me the sackcloth of my prayer: I will cry unto the Everlasting [d] in my days.

21 Be of good cheer, O my children, cry unto the Lord, and he shall deliver you from the power and hand of the enemies.

22 For my hope is in the Everlasting, that he will save you; and joy is come unto me from the Holy One, because of the mercy which shall soon come unto you from the Everlasting our Saviour.

23 For I sent you out with mourning and weeping: but God will give you to me again with joy and gladness for ever.

24 Like as now the neighbours of Sion have seen your captivity: so shall they see shortly your salvation from our God, which shall come upon you with great glory, and brightness of the Everlasting.

25 My children, suffer patiently the wrath that is come upon you from God: for thine enemy hath persecuted thee; but shortly thou shalt see his destruction, and shalt tread upon his neck.

‖ Or, prosperity.

‖ Or, in the time of mine affliction.

d Ps. 116. 2. & 137. 7.

which word is used by the LXX. in the sense of "desolate" in Ps. xxv. 16.

17–29. After appealing to the neighbouring cities, Jerusalem now speaks to her children, as they are being led away into captivity.

17. But what can I help you?] "But I—in what am I able to help you?" There is strong emphasis on the pronoun, the meaning being made clear by the next verse: "It is not I, but God that must help you."

18. hands.] "hand," in the sense of "power," the common Hebrew idiom. See the Introd., § vi. p. 250.

20. the clothing of peace.] "the robe of peace;" i.e. the beautiful garment worn in times of prosperity. The word (στολή) is generally used by the LXX. for a priestly, royal, or festal robe: compare Luke xv. 22, xx. 46; John xix. 2, 5; Rev. vi. 11, vii. 9, 13, 14.

the sackcloth of my prayer.] "the sackcloth of my supplication," i.e. the sackcloth which I wear as a suppliant in my distress. But in Ps. xxii. 24 the LXX. use δέησις for "affliction;" and a comparison of v. 1 makes it probable that we should adopt the same meaning here,—"the sackcloth of my affliction." Compare Esther (Apocr.) xiv. 2.

I will cry unto the Everlasting in my days.] "I will cry unto the Eternal all the days of my life." Compare Ps. cxvi. 2, "I will call upon him as long as I live," where the margin gives "in my days," and the Greek is the same as here, and in Isa. xxxix. 8.

21. unto the Lord.] "unto God."

22. For my hope is in the Everlasting, that he will save you.] "For I hope in the Eternal for your salvation." See the Additional Note. By "salvation" is here meant a happy return from exile (see vv. 24, 29, 37), with all the blessings which Prophecy connected with it.

the Holy One.] This, as a title of God, is repeated in v. 37 and v. 5: compare Hab. iii. 3; Isa. xl. 25, &c.

shall soon come.] Compare vv. 24, 25, and see Introduction, § iii. p. 244.

the Everlasting our Saviour.] "the Eternal your Saviour;" see Appendix at the end of the Introduction, p. 253. The words are partly taken from Ps. xxiv. 5, which may be rendered, according to the LXX., "He shall receive blessing from the Lord, and mercy from God his Saviour." Ps. cvi. 21: "forgat God their Saviour." The phrase "God of (our) salvation" in the A.V. of the Psalms is in the LXX. "God our Saviour." Compare Isa. xliii. 3, &c.

24. Like as now.] "For like as now." By "the neighbours of Sion" are meant the neighbouring cities, as in v. 9.

By "brightness" is meant the moral splendour of God's attributes, which will be displayed in the deliverance and restoration of His people.

25. suffer patiently.] The verb is properly intransitive, "be long-suffering," and seems to be nowhere else followed by an accusative.

for thine enemy hath persecuted thee.] Omit "for," which is not found in the Vatican MS. "The shorter and more abrupt reading is better suited to the impassioned tone of the context." (Fritzsche.)

tread upon his neck.] "tread upon their necks." Taken from the Septuagint version of Deut. xxxiii. 29. The frequent interchanges of the singular and plural are

Digitized by Microsoft ®

‖ Or, My darlings.

26 ‖My delicate ones have gone rough ways, and were taken away as a flock caught of the enemies.

27 Be of good comfort, O my children, and cry unto God: for ye shall be remembered of him that brought these things upon you.

28 For as it was your mind to go astray from God: so, being returned, seek him ten times more.

29 For he that hath brought these plagues upon you shall bring you everlasting joy again with your salvation.

30 Take a good heart, O Jerusalem: for he that gave thee that name will comfort thee.

31 Miserable are they that afflicted thee, and rejoiced at thy fall.

32 Miserable are the cities which thy children served: miserable is she that received thy sons.

33 For as she rejoiced at thy ruin, and was glad of thy fall: so shall she be grieved for her own desolation.

34 For I will take away the rejoicing of her great multitude, and characteristic of the speaker's emotion. For examples in the N. T., see Winer, § lxiii.

26. My delicate ones.] Mic. i. 16; Deut. xxviii. 56; Isa. xlvii. 1, 8. "He calls them delicate who lived in ease and plenty, as having no experience of hardships." (Theodoret.)

and were taken away.] "they were taken away."

a flock caught of the enemies.] "a flock ravaged by enemies."

27. Repeated from v. 21.

that brought.] "that bringeth," Cod. Vat.

28. so, being returned, seek him ten times more.] "so tenfold more return and seek him."

29. everlasting joy again with your salvation.] Omit "again," to which there is nothing answering in the Greek. "Your salvation"—i.e. your restoration from exile—shall be accompanied with the enduring joy "which goes hand in hand with righteousness and the fear of God: see v. 36; v. 1–4." (Fritzsche.) See above on v. 22.

iv. 30—v. 9. Jerusalem now ceases to address her children, and herself receives comfort from the prophet.

30. he that gave thee that name will comfort thee.] The etymology of the name Jerusalem is much disputed: according to Gesenius and Fürst it means "Foundation of peace." Here the allusion is to the latter part of the name, "peace." It is, however, doubtful whether there is any allusion to the name "Jerusalem" at all. The A. V. needs correction, thus: "he that called thee by name."

Many names are suggested: "the holy city" (Isa. xlviii. 2; lii. 1); "the city of God" (Pss. xlvi. 4; xlviii. 1, 8; lxxxvii. 3): "the city of the Lord" (Isa. lx. 14); "the city of righteousness" (Isa. i. 26); "the throne of the Lord" (Jer. iii. 17). Other commentators refer to such passages as ii. 15; Jer. xxv. 29, "the city which is called by my name;" and Isa. lxii. 2, "Thou shalt be called by a new name, which the mouth of the Lord shall name," and v. 4, "Thou shalt be called Hephzibah."

It is not necessary to the argument to determine what particular name, if any, is intended: "The fact that God has 'called thee by name' is itself a pledge that He will comfort thee."

31. Miserable.] The word (δειλαιοι) expresses contempt as much as pity: it is the opposite to μακάριοι, v. 4.

32. which thy children served.] "to which thy children became bondsmen."

she that received thy sons.] The verb (δέχομαι) seems hardly appropriate to receiving captives, yet Babylon is evidently meant here; and though the preceding descriptions are more vague, they also point to Babylon, as is clear from comparing v. 31 with v. 33. The cities mentioned in v. 32 are the cities of Babylonia among which the Jewish exiles were distributed.

33. Kneucker (who in this follows Schürer and Volkmar) finds in these verses allusions to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans A.D. 70, and to the great triumph of Titus. But see Introduction, § vi. p. 250.

rejoiced at thy ruin, and was glad of thy fall.] In the Greek the words of the latter clause (εὐφράνθη, πτῶμα) are stronger than those of the former (ἐχάρη, πτῶσις). The case is exactly the reverse in our A.V., which borrows the strong word "ruin" from the Latin. A more correct rendering would be: "was glad at thy falling, and rejoiced over thy ruin."

34. According to the frequent custom of the prophets, God is introduced for a moment as speaking in the first person.

For I will take away the rejoicing of her great multitude.] "And I will take away her pride shall be turned into mourning.

Digitized by Microsoft®

35 For fire shall come upon her from the Everlasting, long to endure; and she shall be inhabited of devils for a great time.

ch. 5. 5. 36 [e]O Jerusalem, look about thee toward the east, and behold the joy that cometh unto thee from God.

37 Lo, thy sons come, whom thou sentest away, they come gathered together from the east to the west by the word of the Holy One, rejoicing in the glory of God.

from her the rejoicing," &c. The latter words may describe either the rejoicing of the city over her great population (genitive of the object, πολυοχλίας) or the joy of the great multitude itself. This latter is the usual construction of ἀγαλλίαμα in the LXX. See Ps. xlviii. 2, cxix. 111; and, for the thought, Isa. xxiv. 8–12.

35. Here the prophet speaks again. There is an allusion to the fate of Sodom and Gomorrah, to which the destruction of Babylon is compared also by Isaiah, xiii. 19.

long to endure.] Literally, "for long days," i.e. "for many days." devils.] "daemons:" see on v. 7, and compare Isa. xiii. 21: "Owls (σειρῆνες) shall dwell there, and satyrs (δαιμόνια) shall dance there;" namely, in Babylon.

for a great time.] See note on Epistle of Jeremy (Baruch vi.), v. 3. "The expression shews that he did not predict that she should be always utterly uninhabited, but for a long time: and she is inhabited now by a few Jews." (Theodoret.)

36, 37. Prophecy of the return of the captives from Babylon. The author in the assumed person of Baruch, professing to predict the return from captivity, sets himself in the very time of that return,—a proof that such was the well-known style of the real prophets, and therefore a refutation of the main objection which modern critics have urged against Isaiah's authorship of the latter portion of the book which bears his name. See Introduction, § iii. p. 244.

36. the joy that cometh unto thee from God.] That is the joy foretold in v. 22.

37. from the east to the west.] I.e. from all quarters. The phrase is repeated below v. 5. Compare Isa. xliii. 5; Zech. viii. 7. "When the exiles in Babylon had returned, those also came back who had fled at the time of the war, and occupied the western and southern regions; and this is why he made mention of those who came from the west." (Theodoret.)

rejoicing in the glory of God.] "Because it is not in their own power that they have got the better of their enemies, but God, who gave them up, restored their liberty." (Theodoret.)

ADDITIONAL NOTES TO VERSES 7, 8, AND 22.

7, 8. Kneucker regards the whole passage from "him that made you" (v. 7) to "forgotten" in v. 8 as an interpolation on the following grounds, which appear to be quite erroneous:

(1) In Deut. xxxii. 18, "God that formed thee," the participle stands in apposition to a preceding subject; and the omission of the subject by our author is not in accordance with Hebrew usage. But a similar use of the Hebrew participle, not in apposition to a preceding subject, is often found, as, for instance, in Job xxxi. 15, xl. 19; Isa. xvii. 7, xii. 11.

(2) "Forgotten" is very weak after "provoked," to which the only proper parallel is "ye have grieved." But "forgotten" is taken exactly from the original passage, Deut. xxxii. 18.

7. devils.] Fritzsche and Reuss find here in the word δαιμονίοις an imaginary proof that the author held the later Alexandrine doctrine concerning devils. "According to the prophets, the false gods are purely imaginary beings, but they were regarded later as evil spirits who had induced men to worship them" (Reuss).

The supposed proof is at once confuted by the fact that the LXX. use δαιμονίοις in Deut. xxxii. 17, from which our author is evidently borrowing his language. The acceptance of a word already employed in the Septuagint version is no proof that the writer holds the Alexandrine doctrine.

22. The peculiar construction—ἐπὶ τῷ αἰωνίῳ ἤλπισα τὴν σωτηρίαν ὑμῶν—is explained by Fritzsche as being made up of the two usual constructions ἐλπίζειν τι and ἐλπίζειν ἐπί τινι. But Reusch and Kneucker regard it as a close imitation of a Hebrew construction such as is found in Ps. xxxvii. 5, "Commit thy way unto the Lord," and Prov. xvi. 3, "Commit thy works unto the Lord," in both which passages the Hebrew verb means literally "roll," i.e. "devolve."

Digitized by Microsoft ®

CHAPTER V.

1 Jerusalem is moved to rejoice, 5 and to behold their return out of captivity with glory.

PUT off, O Jerusalem, the garment of thy mourning and affliction, and put on the comeliness of the glory that cometh from God for ever.

2 Cast about thee a double garment of the righteousness which cometh from God; and set a diadem on thine head of the glory of the Everlasting.

3 For God will shew thy brightness unto every country under heaven.

4 For thy name shall be called of God for ever The peace of righteousness, and The glory of God's worship.

5 Arise, O Jerusalem, and stand

CHAPTER V.

A Promise of lasting Happiness and Blessing to Jerusalem.

1. the comeliness of the glory.] The same Greek words (εὐπρέπεια δόξης) are used by the LXX. in Jer. xxiii. 9, but are there an evident mistranslation. The metaphor here is the same as in iv. 20 (where see note), and is frequent in Isaiah, e.g. lii. 1, "put on thy beautiful garments" (τὴν δόξαν σου); lxi. 3, "the garment of praise" (δόξης); lxi. 10, "the garment of salvation." Compare Psalm of Solomon xi. 8, "Put on, O Jerusalem, thy garments of glory, make ready thy robe of holiness."

2. a double garment.] "the double garment" (διπλοΐδα); i.e. a large mantle or cloak. When Samuel appears to the witch of Endor (1 Sam. xxviii. 14), "he is covered with a mantle." In Ps. cix. 29 it is said concerning the wicked, "Let them cover themselves with their own confusion as with a mantle;" and in Job xxix. 14, "I put on righteousness, and it clothed me," the LXX. render the last clause "like a mantle" (ἴσα διπλοΐδι).

Fritzsche remarks: "It is to be observed that here 'righteousness,' i.e. right conduct in all respects, is in the most general sense traced back to God as its source from whence it proceeds: . . . and from v. 4 it is quite clear that 'righteousness' as a virtue is intended."

This sense of the word (δικαιοσύνη) is acknowledged by all in v. 4, but here the meaning appears to be the same as in v. 9, —namely, "goodness," "kindness," "mercy." The word often has this meaning in the Septuagint, as will be seen by comparing the following passages in which it is employed in the Greek with the A. V., which renders the Hebrew word (חֶסֶד) by "mercy" or "kindness:" Gen. xix. 19, xx. 13, xxi. 23, xxiv. 27, xxxii. 10; Ex. xv. 13, xxxiv. 7; Prov. xx. 28; Isa. lxiii. 7.

a diadem.] "the diadem" (τὴν μίτραν), the same word which the LXX. use in Isa. lxi. 10: compare Judith x. 3, xvi. 8, "a tire." In these passages it means the turban or tiara worn by women, but it is also frequently used of the High Priest's "mitre," as in Ex. xxviii. 37. Jerusalem, decked once more as a bride, is to be crowned with "the glory of the Eternal."

3. unto every country under heaven.] For the Greek phrase, which means literally "the whole region under heaven," compare Ex. xvii. 14, Deut. xxv. 19, and especially Luke xvii. 24.

4. called of God.] See note on iv. 30.

The peace of righteousness.] I.e. the peace which is the fruit of righteousness: compare Isa. xxxii. 17; James iii. 18.

The glory of God's worship.] The Greek word (θεοσέβεια) means in the Septuagint "the fear of God" (Gen. xx. 11; Job xxviii. 28), or "godliness" (Ecclus. i. 25); and thus in 1 Tim. ii. 10 differs from εὐσέβεια in the same chapter, v. 2, only in being expressly limited to the reverence and piety which are shewn towards God. (See Trench, 'N. T. Synonyms,' i. 202.)

The meaning, therefore, of the second name here promised to Jerusalem is, "The glory which is the fruit of godliness." The A.V. seems to fix the thought chiefly upon the glory of outward worship, as (many suppose) in Ps. xxix. 2.

Reusch, who regards the book as a genuine prophecy of Baruch, argues that the promises of this verse extend to a moral renewal and perfecting of Israel; and that this having been only partially and imperfectly realized by the Jews after their return from captivity, the complete fulfilment is only seen "in the Jerusalem to which the Jerusalem of the Old Testament is transfigured by the Messiah in the Church." But the Messianic tone is sufficiently accounted for by the author's intimate knowledge and free use of the prophetic books, without our assuming that the writer was Baruch, and Baruch a prophet.

5. Arise, O Jerusalem.] Isa. li. 17, "Stand up, O Jerusalem."

Digitized by Microsoft®

ch. 4. 36. on high, and [a]look about toward the east, and behold thy children gathered from the west unto the east by the word of the Holy One, rejoicing in the remembrance of God.

6 For they departed from thee on foot, and were led away of their enemies: but God bringeth them unto thee exalted with glory, as children of the kingdom.

7 For God hath appointed that [b] Isai. 40. 4. [b]every high hill, and banks of long continuance, should be cast down, and vallies filled up, to make even the ground, that Israel may go safely in the glory of God.

8 Moreover even the woods and every sweetsmelling tree shall overshadow Israel by the commandment of God.

9 For God shall lead Israel with joy in the light of his glory with the mercy and righteousness that cometh from him.

and stand on high.] "and stand upon the height:" compare Isa. xl. 9.

look about, &c.] Isa. lx. 4: "Lift up thine eyes round about, and see: all they gather themselves together, they come to thee: thy sons shall come from far," &c. See on iv. 37, and compare Ps. of Solomon xi. 3, "Stand upon high, O Jerusalem, and see thy children gathered from the east and from the west."

in the remembrance of God.] "in God's remembrance:" the obvious reference to iv. 27, "Ye shall be remembered of him that brought these things upon you," leaves no room for the ambiguity contained in the A.V.

6. For they departed, &c.] "For they went out from thee on foot led away by enemies, but God bringeth them in unto thee lifted up with glory as a royal throne." Compare Isa. xlix. 22, "They shall bring thy sons in their arms, and thy daughters shall be carried upon their shoulders;" lxvi. 20, "And they shall bring all your brethren for an offering unto the Lord, out of all nations, upon horses, and in chariots, and in litters, and upon mules, and upon swift beasts, to my holy mountain Jerusalem."

The comparison to "a royal throne," literally "throne of the kingdom" (1 Kings i. 46; 2 Chron. vii. 18), has been regarded by most interpreters as unusual, and by some as inadmissible. The origin of the various reading "as sons of a kingdom" (Cod. A, &c.) is probably to be traced to this supposed difficulty. But the use of a "moving throne" among the Persians, and of litters or palanquins by the Egyptians, makes it probable that what is here meant is such a seat or throne either carried on men's shoulders or as a horse-litter. The figure is then most appropriate to the triumphant return of the captives in regal state. See Delitzsch on 'The Song of Solomon,' iii. 7–9; and Kitto, 'Biblical Cyclopædia,' LITTER.

7. God hath appointed.] An evident reference to Isa. xl. 4, the language of which passage is closely followed here.

every high hill and banks of long continuance.] "every high mountain and lasting hills:" Deut. xxxiii. 15, and xii. 2 (θινῶν).

cast down.] "made low." to make even.] Mic. vii. 12 (εἰς ὁμαλισμόν). Compare Ps. of Solomon xi. 5, "The high mountains hath he brought down to make even ground (εἰς ὁμαλισμόν) for them." The LXX. use the word only in Mic. vii. 12, and there it is a mistranslation.

go safely in the glory of God.] The allusion here, as in v. 9, "in the light of his glory," is to the light that guided Israel in the wilderness. See Ps. of Solom. xi. 7, quoted below on v. 8. For the construction compare Job xxix. 3 (ὅτε τῷ φωτὶ αὐτοῦ ἐπορευόμην), "when by his light I walked."

8. and every sweetsmelling tree.] The Greek words (πᾶν ξύλον εὐωδίας) are not found in the Septuagint, but only in Ps. of Solomon xi. 7, "Every sweetsmelling tree did God cause to spring up for them, that Israel might pass on in charge of the glory of their God."

shall overshadow Israel.] "made a shade for Israel" (Ewald): compare Jonah iv. 6. In the liveliness of his description the author writes as if the return were already past. Compare Ps. of Solomon xi. 6, "The forests made a shade for them."

9. God shall lead Israel.] Ex. xiii. 21 (ἡγεῖτο).

in the light.] "by the light:" see on v. 7.

the mercy and righteousness that cometh from him.] The goodness of God towards His people is called "mercy," as being unmerited, and "righteousness," as being a faithful adherence to His promises. See note on v. 2.

Digitized by Microsoft®

THE EPISTLE OF JEREMY.

INTRODUCTION.

	PAGE		PAGE
§ I. CONTENTS	287	§ V. APPROXIMATE DATE	290
§ II. THE SUPPOSED AUTHOR	287	§ VI. TEXT	291
§ III. THE ORIGINAL LANGUAGE	288	§ VII. PLACE IN CANON	291
§ IV. OBJECT OF THE EPISTLE	290

§ I. CONTENTS.

VERSES 1–7: PREFATORY STATEMENT.—The "Epistle of Jeremy" professes to be a copy of a letter sent by the prophet Jeremiah to the Jews who were about to be carried away captives to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar. He tells them, by God's command, that their captivity is the punishment of their sins, and that it will be long before they shall be brought back in peace (vv. 1–3).

Meanwhile they must keep themselves free from the idolatry which they will see in Babylon, and remain true to the Lord, whose angel will protect them (vv. 4–7).

VERSES 8–72: THE VANITY OF IDOLS. — From this point onward the whole Epistle is occupied in setting forth at large the vanity of idols and the folly of idol-worship.

There is no clear logical arrangement of the thoughts, but the divisions are marked by the recurrence of a refrain, which is apparently intended to give a sort of rhythmical air to the whole composition.

This refrain occurs first at v. 16, "they are known not to be gods: therefore fear them not:" it is repeated with slight variations at vv. 23, 29, 65, and 69; which verses may therefore be taken as marking the divisions of the Epistle. The question, "How can they be called gods?" also recurs in slightly varied forms at vv. 30, 40, 44, 46, 49, 52, 56.

Most of the thoughts are found in Ps. cxv. 4–8 (cxxxv. 15–18); Isa. xliv. 9–19; Jer. x. 3–9; Wisdom xiii. 10–19, xv. 13–17.

§ II. THE SUPPOSED AUTHOR.

The occasion described in vv. 1, 2 seems to be that on which Nebuchadnezzar, "in the eighth year of his reign" (2 Kings xxiv. 12), carried away Jechoniah and all the chief men of Judah, with great treasures, to Babylon.

At that time (B.C. 597) Jeremiah sent a letter "from Jerusalem unto the residue of the elders which were carried away captives . . . from Jerusalem to Babylon, after that Jeconiah the king and the queen . . . were departed from Jerusalem" (Jer. xxix. 2).

The fact that Jeremiah had written one such letter to the captives seems to have suggested the idea of dignifying by his name another letter not written in reality till many ages after his death.

The purport also of this second letter, as an argument against the folly of idolatry, was appropriate to the character and position of Jeremiah, and to the spirit of his genuine writings. It is in fact little more than an enlargement of the prophet's warning against idolatry in chap. x. 1–16, from which passage, and from Ps. cxv. 4–8 and Isa. xliv. 9–19, much of the argument, and even of the language, is freely borrowed.

Digitized by Microsoft®

The assumption of the name of Jeremiah does not necessarily imply an intention to deceive: it was in accordance with the literary usage of the later centuries B.C., and was probably understood to mean nothing more than that the author had endeavoured to imitate the manner and spirit of the elder prophet, and to write for his own generation as he supposed Jeremiah might have written under the same circumstances.

That the imitation is not very successful, may be judged from the admissions even of those who try to maintain the actual authorship of Jeremiah: thus Reusch (p. 78), in describing the composition, says: "There is a long series of facts brought forward, from which it may be clearly seen that the gods have no power nor life. There is no strict logical arrangement prevailing in the development of the subject, but the facts are simply placed one after another, some of them repeated several times in a slightly modified form, and sometimes also facts wholly different in character are set side by side. The enumeration of them is only interrupted by the statement—ten times repeated as a sort of refrain at varying intervals and in varied form—'whence it is seen, that they are no gods: therefore fear them not.'"

It is strange that a scholar who sees so clearly and describes so fairly the character of the writing can yet believe that Jeremiah was its author. It has none of the grace or power of Hebrew poetry, nor even its outward form,—nothing but a monotonous repetition of one prosaic sentence as a sort of refrain. From first to last we feel not a breath of the genuine spirit of prophecy; no spark of the fire which burned so fiercely in the words of Jeremiah, and made him so terrible to the sinners of his day; not one sound of the sorrowful sighing of his soul over the sins and calamities of his country.

The inferiority of style is admitted: how is it to be explained? When Ewald says that the author writes like an orator who proves and exhausts his subject from every point of view, and shews not the remotest movement towards prophetic flight ('History of Israel,' v. 479, E. Tr.), Reusch can only reply that "the Jews who were carried into captivity with Zedekiah belonged for the most part to the lower classes; and the fact that the letter was intended chiefly for the great mass of the people, explains its popular form and the mode of representation which is characterised by Ewald quite correctly. For such readers it was very proper to draw attention to the multitude of tangible facts which shew the nothingness of the false gods. This also explains why the letter agrees in the thoughts with other passages in which Jeremiah speaks of idolatry, especially with chap. x., but differs in its mode of expression from his prophecies. Its particular and temporary aim also helps to explain why it was not adopted into the collection of the prophet's predictions."

Unhappily for this argument, the author professes to write to the Jews who were carried into captivity, not with Zedekiah, but previously with Jechoniah; and these belonged for the most part not to the lower, but to the higher classes (2 Kings xxiv. 14–16).

When an able and zealous advocate of the genuineness of the Epistle is reduced to so feeble a defence, based upon a palpable error, it is needless to discuss the question of Jeremiah's authorship any further.

§ III. The original Language.

An advocate of the genuineness of the Epistle must of necessity maintain that it was written at first in Hebrew. This opinion, though still defended by some Roman Catholic commentators, as Welte and Reusch, is rejected without hesitation by the great majority of competent and impartial critics. The general judgment is thus expressed by Fritzsche (p. 206): "If any one of the Apocryphal books was composed in Greek, this certainly was. The style, it is true, bears traces of the Hellenistic dialect, but, for Hellenistic Greek, it is very pure, and contains many rare forms and combinations. Of Hebraism there are but rare and slight reminiscences."

Digitized by Microsoft®

The facts upon which this judgment is based cannot be denied: and Reusch, in reply to it, can only plead that "This character of the writing is far from proving that the letter could not possibly be a translation from the Hebrew. The translator, who perhaps is not the same as the translator of the book Baruch, might possibly translate freely and in seemingly good Greek style; and in the explanation of the Epistle occasion will often be presented for pointing to passages which a Greek author would certainly have expressed otherwise, and which betray a translator who in some particulars did not perfectly understand the original, or know how to render it, and did not confine himself so closely to the letter of the original as we could have wished."

The instances quoted by Reusch from Welte in support of this answer are the following:—

(a.) Inconsistencies of Greek construction. —Verse 6: προσκυνεῖν with the accusative, and with the dative in the very next verse.

The worthlessness of this objection is apparent from Reusch's own note on v. 6: "Προσκυνεῖν is construed sometimes with the dative, sometimes with the accusative: the latter is more in accordance with the Greek usage, the former with the Hebrew."

In John iv. 23 we find the same variation in a single verse: it is therefore no evidence of a Hebrew original.

Verses 8, 68: "The neuter plural with its verb in the singular, and in the plural in the same verse."

Again we refer to Reusch himself on v. 8 for an answer: "Ἐστί and δύνανται; after the subject in the neuter plural the singular is admissible, and the plural."

The transition in the same verse from singular to plural, both referring to the same subject, is found also in John x. 4.

Verse 38: "εὖ ποιεῖν with the accusative, and in v. 64 with the dative."

Reusch's note on v. 38 is: "εὖ ποιεῖν here, as is usual, with the accusative; in v. 64, Hebraistically with the dative." The classical usage with the accusative is most common in the LXX. But the dative occurs in Ex. i. 20, Josh. xxiv. 20, and five times in Ecclesiasticus: it also occurs in Mark xiv. 7 with εὖ ποιεῖν, and in Luke vi. 27 with καλῶς ποιεῖν. It may therefore rightly be called Hellenistic, but does not give evidence of a Hebrew original.

(b.) "The use of the future in a thoroughly Hebraistic manner in vv. 33, 34, 67." On v. 33 Reusch writes: "The future ἐνδύσουσιν is here especially harsh, and in this and other passages is only to be explained from a close adherence to the Hebrew."

But there is no need to assume "a close adherence to the Hebrew;" for the future is better explained as expressing a general truth (Rom. iii. 20; Gal. ii. 16), or probable event. See Winer, 'Gr. of N. T. Greek,' III. xl. 6; Bernhardy, 'Syntax,' p. 377.

(c.) "The construction βουλεύεσθαι πρός τινα (v. 48) is not found in classical Greek, but answers closely to the Hebrew נוֹעַץ אֶל."

In Tromm's Concordance the Greek construction is cited only thrice (2 Kings vi. 8; Isa. xl. 14; Jer. xxxvi. 16), and only in the first instance is it a translation of the Hebrew phrase quoted by Reusch. Its occurrence in the Epistle only shews that the author was familiar with the style of the Septuagint.

(d.) Welte notices also the use of the singular τὸ πρόσωπον αὐτῶν in vv. 13, 21 for the plural, as shewing that there stood in the Hebrew text פָּנֵיהֶם.

The inference is quite unwarranted. In v. 22 we find in like manner τὸ σῶμα αὐτῶν, as in 1 Cor. vi. 19 (τὸ σῶμα ὑμῶν); and this use of the singular, to express an object which belongs to each of several individuals, is not at all uncommon. See Matt. xvii. 6, xxii. 16; Luke ii. 31; 2 Cor. viii. 24, passages in which πρόσωπον is so used.

If these supposed traces of Hebraism be compared with the instances found in the first part of Baruch (Introduction to Baruch, § V.), it will be evident that they are quite insufficient to give even a show of probability to the theory of a Hebrew original.

When Reusch replies that there is no proof "that a Hebrew original is impossible," he makes an unreasonable demand for such demonstrative evidence as the nature of the case excludes.

Digitized by Microsoft®

We may safely accept Ewald's judgment ('Prophets of the O. T.,' v. 139, E. Tr.), that the author's "Greek language seeks occasionally [as in v. 4, ἀφομοιωθέντες ἀφομοιωθῆτε] to assume the peculiarities of the Hebrew: but even in this respect he only partially succeeds."

Schürer also (in his 'History of the Jewish People in the time of Jesus Christ,' Leipsic, 1886) decides that the Greek is certainly original.

§ IV. Object of the Epistle.

Though the author writes under an assumed name, his work is not on that account to be put aside as a mere literary forgery: it has a serious practical purpose which cannot be overlooked.

The writer is evidently making an earnest appeal to persons actually living in the midst of heathenism, and needing to be warned and encouraged against temptations to apostasy (vv. 5–7). He shews an intimate knowledge of the details of idol-worship such as could hardly be possessed by any but an eye-witness: and thus, as Ewald observes ('History of Israel,' v. 479, E. Tr.), "the numerous close allusions to idolatrous usages confer on this composition a high historical value." The condition of the readers thus indicated corresponds with that of the Jewish communities descended from those captives who, after the destruction of Babylon, instead of returning to Jerusalem, chose to remain in the country where they had made themselves a home. These, who were by far the greater portion of the Captivity, formed the nucleus of those numerous colonies throughout the East "from India unto Ethiopia" (Esther viii. 9), which were included under the general title of "The Dispersion" (James i. 1; 1 Pet. i. 1).

Thus, whether the letter was intended for the common benefit of "the Dispersion among the Greeks" (John vii. 35), or for some particular community, the local colouring is with perfect propriety borrowed from the position of their ancestors, the original captives in Babylon.

That position is admirably described by Ewald ('History of Israel,' v. 24): "The very closeness of this contact (with heathenism), and the accuracy of the knowledge thus obtained, must have created a profound repulsion in all the deeper minds; and the fact that the genius of heathenism had been developed by the Babylonians of this very period to the highest point of art and science of which it was susceptible, but had become utterly corrupt as a rule of life, necessarily increased the horror with which it was regarded. Thus the rejection, in the most contemptuous manner conceivable, of every feature of heathenism kept pace with the deepening consciousness of the eternal truth of their own religion: and never before had all the senseless and therefore intrinsically ridiculous notions involved in idol-worship been pursued and exposed in detail as they were now."

Though the historian is here speaking of the actual period of the Captivity, and grounding his remarks, according to his own well-known theory, upon the writings of Jeremiah and the so-called Deutero-Isaiah or "Great Unnamed," his description is quite as appropriate to the circumstances of "the Dispersion" several centuries later, and especially to the Epistle of Jeremy.

The author was certainly a Hellenistic Jew, and possibly, as Fritzsche thinks, a Jew of Alexandria: but, whether living in Egypt or elsewhere, he doubtless had good reason for laying the scene in Babylon, and veiling his fierce attack on idol-gods under the venerable name of Jeremiah, instead of openly deriding in his own name the religion of the people among whom he dwelt.

§ V. Approximate Date.

Attempts have been made to find a relative date for the Epistle of Jeremy from a supposed allusion to it in 2 Macc. ii. 1, 2, where it is said to have been "found in the records, that Jeremy the prophet commanded them that were carried away . . . not to forget the commandment of the Lord, and that they should not err in their minds, when they see images of silver and gold with their ornaments."

The language of the last clause is very similar to that of the Epistle in vv. 4–6; and Ewald, who recognises the allusion, observes that "there is no reason why the writer of 2 Maccabees should not have been acquainted with our little book" ('Prophets,' v. 141, E. Tr.). Herzfeld takes the opposite view, that the coincidence of language proves the Epistle to be the later work. Fritzsche however, with better judgment, thinks that the similarity of language is not such as to afford a safe criterion.

Digitized by Microsoft®

At all events, the supposed allusion to our Epistle seems to be excluded by the statement in 2 Macc. ii. 4: "It was also contained in the same writing, that the prophet, being warned of God, commanded the tabernacle and the ark to go with him, as he went forth into the mountain, where Moses climbed up, and saw the heritage of God." The Epistle contains no such reference to the tabernacle and the ark, nor to the command "to take of the fire" (v. 1).

Another supposed note of time is the frequent reference to offending, resisting, setting up, and putting down kings (vv. 18, 34, 53, 56, 59, 66), in which Ewald finds an indication of the times of the last Seleucidae and Ptolemies, and so fixes the date of the Epistle "about the beginning of the last century before Christ." "The Grecian kings had then already greatly fallen in estimation and power, and were easily deposed."

This date, 100 B.C., differs little from that which is usually assigned to the Epistle,—namely, the later period of the Maccabees, the last of whom, John Hyrcanus, died about 106 B.C.

§ VI. Text.

The Epistle of Jeremy is found in the same Greek MSS. which contain the Book of Baruch, except a few cursives. "The character of the MSS. in relation to each other is very much the same as in Baruch, only more invariable here" (Fritzsche). On this point see the Introduction to Baruch, § VII. pp. 251, 252.

§ VII. Place in Canon.

In some Greek MSS. the Epistle of Jeremy is included in the Book of Baruch, but in Cod. Vat. and Cod. Alex. it is separated from Baruch, and follows the Lamentations of Jeremiah. It has, in fact, no connexion with Baruch, except through the author's assumption of the name of Jeremiah, and his imitation of parts of his prophecy.

Digitized by Microsoft®

THE

EPISTLE OF JEREMY.

(BARUCH, CHAPTER VI., IN A. V.)

1 The cause of the captivity is their sin. 3 The place whereto they were carried is Babylon: the vanity of whose idols and idolatry are set forth at large in this chapter.

A copy of an epistle, which Jeremy sent unto them which were to be led captives into Babylon by the king of the Babylonians, to certify them, as it was commanded him of God.

BECAUSE of the sins which ye have committed before God, ye shall be led away captives into Babylon by Nabuchodonosor king of the Babylonians.

3 So when ye be come unto Babylon, ye shall remain there many years, and for a long season, namely, seven generations: and after that I will bring you away peaceably from thence.

4 [a] Now shall ye see in Babylon gods of silver, and of gold, and of wood, borne upon shoulders, which cause the nations to fear.

[a] Ps. 115. 4. & 135. 15. Isai. 44. 8, 9, 10. & 46. 5, 6, 7. Wisd. 13. 10. 2 Mac. 2. 2.

VERSES 1–7. INTRODUCTORY STATEMENT OF THE ALLEGED AUTHORSHIP AND OCCASION OF THE EPISTLE.

On the general contents of these verses, see the Introduction, § I.

The superscription is counted as v. 1 in the E. V., but not in the Greek.

1. were to be led.] From this expression and from vv. 2, 3 we see that the letter professes to have been written at a time when the captives had been removed out of Jerusalem, but had not yet left their own country for Babylon. This agrees with the occasion described in Jer. xxix. 2.

to certify them.] "to announce," or "to tell them." This message from God to the captives is evidently suggested by Jer. xxix. 4: "Thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, unto all that are carried away captives."

2. Because of the sins which ye have committed.] Compare the answer given in Jer. xvi. 10–13 to the question of the people: "Wherefore hath the Lord pronounced all this great evil against us?"

The remembrance of the sins which had led to the Captivity should cause it to be borne with patience.

3. remain there . . . for a long season.] "be there . . . a long time." Compare Jer. xxxii. 14, and Bar. iv. 35. The false prophet Hananiah, having foretold a speedy return from Babylon, was rebuked by Jeremiah (xxviii. 2–17), who in his letter to the captives bade them look for a long continuance of their exile: "Build ye houses, and dwell in them; and plant gardens, and eat the fruit of them: take ye wives, and beget sons and daughters . . . And seek the peace of the city whither I have caused you to be carried away captives, and pray unto the Lord for it: for in the peace thereof shall ye have peace." (Jer. xxix. 5–7.)

namely, seven generations.] "even unto seven generations." See the Additional Note.

I will bring you away peaceably from thence.] "I will bring you out thence in peace:" Ezek. xxxiv. 13, "I will bring them out from the people." It is the same word (ἐξάγειν) which is constantly used of bringing out the people from Egypt.

4. Now shall ye see.] "But now ye will see:" now, i.e. for the present, and as long as your captivity shall last.

gods of silver, and of gold, and of wood.] The Vulgate changes the order, and reads: "gods of gold and of silver and of stone and of wood." The addition may have been suggested by the original passage (Deut. iv. 28): "There ye shall serve gods, the work of men's hands, wood and stone, which neither see, nor hear, nor eat, nor smell."

Tertullian ('Scorpiace,' c. 8) quotes the words in the order in which they stand in the A.V. His version of the passage (vv. 4–6) is quite independent of that given in the Vulgate: he cites the whole passage as from Jeremiah.

Digitized by Microsoft®

5 Beware therefore that ye in no wise be like to strangers, neither be ye afraid of them, when ye see the multitude before them and behind them, worshipping them.

6 But say ye in your hearts, O Lord, we must worship thee.

7 For mine angel is with you, and I myself caring for your souls.

8 As for their tongue, it is polished by the workman, and they themselves are gilded and laid over with silver; [b] yet are they but false, and cannot speak. [b] Ps. 135. 16.

9 And taking gold, as it were for a virgin that loveth to go gay, they make crowns for the heads of their gods.

10 Sometimes also the priests convey from their gods gold and silver, and bestow it upon themselves.

11 Yea, they will give thereof to borne upon shoulders.] The custom of carrying the images of the gods in procession upon festival days is often ridiculed by the Hebrew prophets, as by Isaiah (xlvi. 7), "They bear him upon the shoulder, they carry him, and set him in his place;" and by Jeremiah (x. 5), "They must needs be borne, because they cannot go."

which cause the nations to fear.] "which strike terror into the heathen;" literally, "shewing terror to the heathen:" compare Ps. lx. 3, "Thou hast shewed thy people hard things;" and Ps. lxxi. 20, "Thou which hast shewed me great and sore troubles."

5. that ye in no wise be like to strangers.] "lest ye also become altogether like unto the aliens." The repetition (ἀφομοιωθέντες . . . ἀφομοιωθῆτε) is employed, like the corresponding Hebrew idiom, to give emphasis. Compare for the thought Deut. xii. 30, xviii. 9; Jer. x. 2.

neither be ye afraid of them.] "and lest fear of them take hold of you." Compare (A. V.) Ps. xlviii. 6: "Fear took hold upon them there."

6. in your hearts.] Literally, "to your mind" (τῇ διανοίᾳ): compare Gen. xxvii. 41; Jer. v. 24. Cyprian ('On the Lord's Prayer,' c. 5, E. Tr.), less correctly, connects these words with the clause which follows: "The Holy Spirit, moreover, suggests these same things by Jeremiah, and teaches, saying, In the heart, O God, ought we to worship Thee."

O Lord, we must worship thee.] "Thou, O Lord, art he whom we ought to worship." The emphasis excludes the worship of any other god.

The whole verse is omitted in the Alexandrine Codex.

7. God is here introduced as speaking. The thought is connected with vv. 5, 6, thus: "Fear them not, but worship Me only, for mine angel is with you." Compare Ex. xxiii. 23, xxxii. 34, xxxiii. 2, 3, 14, 15, and notes on these passages in the 'Speaker's Commentary.'

and I myself.] Our A.V. follows the Latin (exquiram) in understanding this clause in the 1st person as referring to God. It is simpler to refer it to the angel, instead of introducing a new subject: "Mine angel is with you, and he careth for your souls." This construction is confirmed by a similar use of the pronoun in v. 8: "and they themselves" (αὐτά τε). The phrase (ἐκζητῶν τὰς ψυχάς), literally, "seeking out your souls," is sometimes used of seeking to destroy life (2 Sam. iv. 8; Ps. liv. 3). Here, however, it evidently has the same meaning as in Ps. cxlii. 4, "No man cared for my soul" (margin: "sought after"); and in Prov. xxix. 10, "The bloodthirsty hate the upright: but the just seek his soul," i.e. watch over, and protect his life.

VERSES 8–16. IDOLS ARE THINGS WITHOUT LIFE, THE WORK OF MEN'S HANDS, SENSELESS AND HELPLESS.

8. Reasons for not fearing the idols. The conjunction (γάρ) which shews the connexion with v. 5 should not have been omitted in the A. V.

As for their tongue.] "For as for their tongue." Ps. cxv. 4: "Their idols are silver and gold, the work of men's hands. They have mouths, but they speak not;" repeated in Ps. cxxxv. 15.

false.] Compare vv. 48, 59. The substantive (ψεῦδος) is used for an idol in Isa. xliv. 20: "Is there not a lie in my right hand?" Compare Jer. xiii. 25, xvi. 19; and Rom. i. 25.

9. that loveth to go gay.] Literally, "fond of ornament" (φιλοκόσμῳ), a word used by late Greek writers,—Plutarch, Aelian, and Lucian,—but not found elsewhere in the LXX. or N. T.

for the heads of their gods.] "to set upon the heads," &c.

10. convey.] This word means "to remove secretly," as in John v. 13; or "to steal," a sense in which it is commonly used by our older writers: "Convey the wise it call" (Shakespeare). This is also the meaning of the Greek word (ὑφαιρούμενοι).

Digitized by Microsoft®

‖ Or, which prostitute themselves openly.

the ‖common harlots, and deck them as men with garments, [being] gods of silver, and gods of gold, and wood.

12 Yet cannot these gods save themselves from rust and moths, though they be covered with purple raiment.

13 They wipe their faces because of the dust of the temple, when there is much upon them.

14 And he that cannot put to death one that offendeth him holdeth a sceptre, as though he were a judge of the country.

15 He hath also in his right hand a dagger and an ax: but cannot deliver himself from war and thieves.

16 Whereby they are known not to be gods: therefore fear them not.

17 For like as a vessel that a man useth is nothing worth when it is broken; even so it is with their gods: when they be set up in the temple, their eyes be full of dust through the feet of them that come in.

18 And as the ‖doors are made sure on every side upon him that bestow.] "consume." The LXX. use the same Greek word in Deut. iv. 24 and ix. 3: "The Lord thy God is a consuming fire."

‖ Or, courts.

Arnobius ('Adversus Gentes,' vi. 21) repeats some amusing tales of robberies from the images of the gods.

11. and deck them.] I.e. the gods. This clause should be preceded by a fuller stop than in A.V. After the digression concerning the thievish priests in vv. 10, 11 a, the author resumes his account of the false gods: "And they deck them with their vestments as men."

and gods of gold.] The repetition of the word "gods" strengthens the expression of scorn.

12. Yet cannot these gods.] The word "gods" is not in the Greek, but the addition agrees well with the scornful irony of the passage: so also "cannot" is better than the more exact "do not."

moths.] Literally, "parts eaten away" (βρωμάτων), corrosion, or "decay:" a similar word (βρῶσις) is used in Matt. vi. 19.

Compare for the thought Arnobius (vi. 16): "Do you not see that these images, which seem to breathe, whose feet and knees you touch and handle when praying, at times fall into ruin from the constant dropping of rain, at other times lose the firm union of their parts from their decaying and becoming rotten (putredinis modo carie relaxari) . . . and are eaten away with rust?"

though they be covered with purple raiment.] The construction of the Greek (genitive absolute) shews that this clause should rather be joined with the following verse, as in the Latin and Arabic Versions.

13. They wipe their faces.] Compare v. 24. Here the Middle Voice (ἐκμάσσονται) is remarkable, but may perhaps imply that the priests do not themselves wipe off the dust, but get it done.

when there is much.] "which is thick."

14. he that cannot put to death.] Here, as in v. 11 and frequently in the Epistle, the future expresses as certain what the author thinks likely. See Introduction, § III. b. Though "cannot" is not actually expressed in the Greek (οὐκ ἀνελεῖ), it is correct in sense. Perhaps also, as Reuss thinks, there is a touch of irony in the future.

The author here passes to the singular, which makes the description more lively, as though he had some particular idol before his eyes.

as though he were a judge.] "like a man that is a judge."

15. He hath also in his right hand a dagger.] "And he holds a dagger in his right hand." The dagger and axe were not likely to be placed both in the same hand, as might be supposed from the A.V. The same Greek word for "dagger" (ἐγχειρίδιον) is used by the LXX. in Jer. l. 42, where A.V. has "lance," and in Ezek. xxi. 3, 4, 5, where A.V. has "sword."

thieves.] "robbers" (λῃστῶν), as in v. 18: the more exact rendering agrees with the idea of defence against violence.

16. Whereby.] "Whence:" the verse draws the conclusion from the whole paragraph, vv. 8–15, and also forms an introduction to the next paragraph.

fear them not.] Jer. x. 5.

VERSES 17–23. THE IDOLS ARE USELESS AND HELPLESS.

17. Compare Jer. xxii. 28: "Is this man Coniah a despised broken idol? Is he a vessel wherein is no pleasure?"

the temple.] Literally, "their houses," as in v. 55.

18. upon him that offendeth the king.]

Digitized by Microsoft®

offendeth the king, as being committed to suffer death: even so the priests make fast their temples with doors, with locks, and bars, lest their gods be spoiled with robbers.

19 They light them candles, yea, more than for themselves, whereof they cannot see one.

20 They are as one of the beams of the temple, yet they say their hearts are ‖gnawed upon by things creeping out of the earth; and when they eat them and their clothes, they feel it not.

‖ Gr. licked.

21 Their faces are blacked through the smoke that cometh out of the temple.

22 Upon their bodies and heads sit bats, swallows, and birds, and the cats also.

23 By this ye may know that they are no gods: therefore fear them not.

24 Notwithstanding the gold that is about them to make them beautiful, except they wipe off the rust, they will not shine: for neither when they were molten did they feel it.

25 The things wherein there is no breath are bought for ‖a most high price.

‖ Or, any price.

Render: "And as when one hath wronged a king the courts are made close around him," &c.

"the courts" (αὐλαί) are the courts of a prison, as in Jer. xxxii. 2, xxxiii. 1. Suidas gives this explanation of the word: "αὐλή, that which is now called ἀρχεῖον, where the condemned are led away, and the attendants there were called αὐλικοί."

as being committed.] A various reading (ἢ ὡς), "or as around one who has been led away to death," makes little difference in the sense.

their temples.] "their houses."

with robbers.] "by the robbers."

19. candles.] "lamps." There is probably an allusion to the Egyptian "Festival of Lamps" at Saïs (Herod. ii. 62). Compare Lactantius ('Institut.' vi. 2): "They burn lights as for one in the dark. Can a man be considered sane who presents candles and wax lights to the author and giver of light?"

they cannot see.] "Eyes have they and see not" (Ps. cxv. 5).

20. They are.] "He is." The singular "one of the beams" shews that the thought is here directed to one idol.

yet they say their hearts are gnawed upon by things creeping out of the earth; and when they eat them, &c.] Render: "Yet men say their hearts are eaten out: when the creeping things out of the earth eat them and their raiment, they feel it not."

21. through.] "from" (ἀπό). Ewald ('Prophets of the O. T.' v. 144) adopts the reading of the Alexandrine MS. (τοῦ ἐκ τῆς γῆς καιομένου), and renders: "They observe not how they are blackened in the face with the smoke which burneth out of the earth."

22. Upon their bodies and heads sit bats, &c.] "Upon their bodies and upon their heads bats and swallows alight." and birds, and the cats also.] "and other birds, and likewise cats also." Compare Lactantius ('Inst.' ii. 4): "The very birds alight upon their images . . . and build their nests, and befoul them."

23. By this.] "Whence:" compare v. 16.

VERSES 24–29. THE COSTLY BUT HELPLESS IDOLS ARE DISHONOURED BY THEIR OWN PRIESTS.

24. Notwithstanding the gold.] "For as to the gold." The sentence, if completed as it begins, would have been—"For the gold will not shine." But the plural subject, introduced in the relative clause—"with which they are set about for beauty"—is carried on into the principal sentence—"they will not shine."

that is about them.] The construction is thoroughly classical (ὃ περικεῖνται), but is found also in 4 Macc. xii. 3 (τὰ δεσμὰ περικείμενον) and in Acts xxviii. 20, and Heb. v. 2.

they wipe.] "one wipe."

rust.] Gold is, in fact, remarkable for its freedom from rust, but here the style is popular and rhetorical, as in S. James v. 3: "Your gold and silver is cankered: and the rust of them shall be a witness against you."

neither.] "not even."

25. bought for a most high price.] It is better to retain the order of the Greek words: "They have been bought at all cost—things wherein is no breath." Compare Jer. x. 14, "There is no breath in them;" and Ps. cxxxv. 17, "Neither is there any breath in their mouths," and Hab. ii. 19, quoted below on v. 39.

Digitized by Microsoft®

[c] Isai. 46. 7. ver. 4.

26 [c]They are borne upon shoulders, having no feet, whereby they declare unto men that they be nothing worth.

27 They also that serve them are ashamed: for if they fall to the ground at any time, they cannot rise up again of themselves: neither, if one set them upright, can they move of themselves: neither, if they be bowed down, can they make themselves straight: but they set ‖gifts before them, as unto dead men.

‖ Or, offerings.

28 As for the things that are sacrificed unto them, their priests sell and ‖abuse; in like manner their wives lay up part thereof in salt; but unto the poor and impotent they give nothing of it.

‖ Or, spend.

29 Menstruous women and women in childbed [d]eat their sacrifices: by these things ye may know that they are no gods: fear them not.

[d] Lev. 22. 4.

30 For how can they be called gods? because women set meat before the gods of silver, gold, and wood.

31 And the priests sit in their temples, having their clothes rent, and their heads and beards shaven, and nothing upon their heads.

26. The clauses should be transposed: "Having no feet, they are borne upon shoulders." See on v. 4.

whereby they declare unto men that they be nothing worth.] "displaying unto men their own worthlessness;" i.e. that they cannot walk, but must be carried. But a different meaning is suggested by the use of the Greek word (ἀτιμία, "shame") in Jer. xiii. 26; Nah. iii. 5.

27. for, &c.] "because, if they fall to the ground, they never rise up again of themselves."

set them upright, &c.] "set it upright," &c. There are frequent changes from the plural to the singular throughout the description of the idols.

be bowed down.] "be laid down."

make themselves straight.] "set themselves upright." but they set gifts before them, as unto dead men.] "but the offerings are set beside them as beside the dead." Compare Ps. cvi. 28: "They joined themselves unto Baal-Peor, and ate the sacrifices of the dead." Ecclus. xxx. 18, 19: "Delicates poured upon a mouth shut up are as messes of meat set upon a grave. What good doeth the offering unto an idol? for neither can it eat nor smell." Tobit iv. 17: "Pour out thy bread on the burial of the just, but give nothing to the wicked;" or, according to the Vatican Codex, "Pour out thy wine and thy bread over the tombs of the just."

For the custom of setting a feast before an idol, see Bel and the Dragon, vv. 3–15. The same custom is said to remain among the Arabs of Barbary ('Dict. of the Bible:' MOURNING, p. 437 b).

28. As for the things that are sacrificed unto them, their priests sell and abuse.] "But their sacrifices their priests," &c.

in like manner their wives.] "and in like manner their wives also."

but unto the poor, &c.] "but give no part either to the poor or to the feeble."

29. eat.] "touch," and thereby defile: compare Lev. xii. 4, "she shall touch no hallowed thing."

by these things ye may know.] "Knowing then from these things."

30. how can they be called.] The Vatican MS. preserves the true reading (κληθείησαν, the optative without ἄν), meaning, "How could they be called?" "How could such a thing be thought of?"

because women, &c.] "for women," &c. A reason why the Jews could not regard the idols as gods; for among the Jews women had no share in the service of the Tabernacle or Temple.

31. The idolatrous priests assume in their worship all the signs of mourning because (as Grotius observes) those whom the Babylonians, like the Egyptians, regarded as gods, were in reality dead men. Among the Jews, on the contrary, the priests of the living God were expressly forbidden to defile themselves for the dead (Lev. xxi. 1–11; Ezek. xliv. 25).

sit.] Compare 1 Sam. i. 9: "Eli the priest sat upon a seat (ἐπὶ τοῦ δίφρου, 'upon the seat,' LXX., the Hebrew also having the article) by a post of the temple." The Greek word (διφρεύουσιν) is rightly rendered "sit" in the A.V., as in the Latin and Syriac Versions: but its more special meaning, "to sit in a chariot," is more common; and interpreters, assuming this to be the only meaning, have adopted various readings which are quite inadmissible.

having their clothes rent.] Lev. xxi. 10: "The high priest . . . shall not uncover his head, nor rend his clothes."

Digitized by Microsoft®

32 They roar and cry before their gods, as men do at the feast when one is dead.

33 The priests also take off their garments, and clothe their wives and children.

34 Whether it be evil that one doeth unto them, or good, they are not able to recompense it: they can neither set up a king, nor put him down.

35 In like manner, they can neither give riches nor money: though a man make a vow unto them, and keep it not, they will not require it.

36 They can save no man from death, neither deliver the weak from the mighty.

37 They cannot restore a blind man to his sight, nor help any man in his distress.

38 They can shew no mercy to the widow, nor do good to the fatherless.

39 Their gods of wood, and which are overlaid with gold and silver, are like the stones that be hewn out of the mountain: they that worship them shall be confounded.

40 How should a man then think and say that they are gods, when even the Chaldeans themselves dishonour them?

and their heads and beards shaven.] Lev. xxi. 5: "They (the priests) shall not make baldness upon their head: neither shall they shave off the corner of their beard." Compare Jer. xlviii. 37.

32. They roar and cry before their gods.] Ezek. xxiv. 17: "Forbear to cry, make no mourning for the dead."

at the feast when one is dead.] "at a feast for the dead" (ἐν περιδείπνῳ νεκροῦ). Compare Jer. xvi. 7: "Neither shall men tear themselves for them (marg. 'break bread for them') in mourning to comfort them for the dead: neither shall men give them the cup of consolation to drink for their father or for their mother." St. Jerome, in his comment on the passage, compares the Jewish custom to "the feasts which the Greeks call περίδειπνα, and the Latins parentalia."

33. The priests also, &c.] "From their raiment the priests will take part to clothe," &c. On this use of the future see above, v. 14. Reusch sees in it a close imitation of the Hebrew, but without reason.

VERSES 34–38. CONTRAST BETWEEN THE IDOLS AND THE LORD.

34. Whether it be evil that one doeth unto them, or good, &c.] "if they be evil entreated of any, nor if they be entreated well," &c.

they can neither set up a king, nor put him down.] The recurrence of this and the like ideas in vv. 53, 56, 66, has been thought to indicate a time in which kings were often deposed. See Introduction, § V. The general thought of the passage, vv. 34–38, is that the idols have not the attributes of the true God: for "He putteth down one, and setteth up another" (Ps. lxxv. 7). Compare Job xii. 18; Ps. cxiii. 7, 8; Dan. ii. 21.

35. money.] Literally, "brass" or "copper," a common term for small money: Matt. x. 9; Mark xii. 41. Observe the contrast to 1 Sam. ii. 7, "The Lord maketh poor, and maketh rich."

they will not require it.] The thought and language are evidently taken from Deut. xxiii. 21: "When thou shalt vow a vow unto the Lord thy God, thou shalt not slack to pay it: for the Lord thy God will surely require it of thee."

36. They can save no man from death.] Deut. xxxii. 39, "There is no god with me: I kill, and I make alive;" 1 Sam. ii. 6, "The Lord killeth, and maketh alive: he bringeth down to the grave, and bringeth up."

37. to his sight.] Omit "his." Compare Ps. cxlvi. 8: "The Lord openeth the eyes of the blind: the Lord raiseth them that are bowed down."

38. Ps. cxlvi. 9: "He relieveth the fatherless and widow."

39. Read: "They are like unto the stones from the mountain, these wooden things, and things overlaid with gold and silver." Compare Hab. ii. 19: "Woe unto him that saith to the wood, Awake; to the dumb stone, Arise, it shall teach! Behold, it is laid over with gold and silver, and there is no breath at all in the midst of it."

shall be confounded.] "and they that serve them shall be put to shame." The reference is to the priests who "serve" (θεραπεύοντες) the idols, rather than to the worshippers in general.

40. Here, as in v. 30, the refrain, according to the A.V., forms the conclusion of one section, and the introduction to the next. But the last clause should more properly be joined with the next verse.

Digitized by Microsoft®

41 Who if they shall see one dumb that cannot speak, they ‖ bring him, and intreat Bel that he may speak, as though he were able to understand.

‖ Or, bid him call upon Bel.

42 Yet they cannot understand this themselves, and leave them: for they have no ‖ knowledge.

‖ Or, sense.

43 The women also with cords about them, sitting in the ways, burn bran for perfume: but if any of them, drawn by some that passeth by, lie with him, she reproacheth her fellow, that she was not thought as worthy as herself, nor her cord broken.

44 Whatsoever is done among them is false: how may it then be thought or said that they are gods?

VERSES 41–44. THE IDOLS ARE PUT TO DISHONOUR BY THE CHALDEANS THEMSELVES.

when even the Chaldeans, &c.] A new sentence begins here, but its apodosis must be supplied from the preceding,—thus: "And moreover—(how can a man think them to be gods)—when even the Chaldeans dishonour them?"

Their own worshippers put their idols to disgrace, "by continually demanding from them what they know cannot be performed" (Grotius).

41. Who if they shall see one dumb.] "Who when they see a dumb man."

bring him.] I.e. the dumb man, whom they bring to the idol: according to another construction, it may mean "they bring Bel and entreat him."

as though he were able to understand.] By entreating Bel, who cannot even hear (αἰσθέσθαι) their prayer, to make a dumb man speak, they put their idol to open shame.

42. Yet they cannot understand this themselves, and leave them.] This is much better than the rendering which some commentators adopt: "And though they are themselves aware of this, they cannot leave them;" for the next clause states that they, the worshippers themselves, "have no knowledge" (αἴσθησιν, "perception," or, as in the margin, "sense"), and therefore cannot forsake their foolish idolatry.

43. Compare Herodotus, i. 199: "The most disgraceful of the customs among the Babylonians is the following. Every woman of the country must once in her life go and sit in the temple of Aphrodite and have intercourse with some strange man . . . Sitting in the temple-court of Aphrodite with a wreath of cord (θώμιγγος) round their heads are many women, for some are coming and others going: and ropes stretched to form passages in every direction keep a thoroughfare among the women, along which the strangers pass through and choose for themselves. And when a woman takes her seat there, she is not allowed to go away to her home until one of the strangers throws a piece of money into her lap and takes her with him outside the temple."

Strabo (lib. xvi. c. 1) gives a similar account, and states that the practice was instituted in consequence of some oracle.

The goddess called by Herodotus Mylitta, and identified with Aphrodite, seems to be the same with Milta, Bilta, or Beltis, the wife of Bel or Bil: see Rawlinson, 'Herodotus,' i. 199.

Selden ('de Diis Syris,' ii. 8) supposes this custom to be the same which is mentioned in 2 Kings xvii. 30, "The men of Babylon made Succoth-benoth," where the last words mean literally "booths of daughters." See, however, the note in the 'Speaker's Commentary' on Kings, where the words are differently explained.

with cords about them.] Literally, "having put ropes round about them" (σχοινία περιθεμέναι): this does not refer to wearing girdles of cord, nor to a wreath of cord round the head (θώμιγξ, Herod.; θώμιγγι δ' ἔστεπται ἑκάστη, Strabo), but to the roped passages (σχοινοτενέες διέξοδοι, Herod.), each woman being enclosed within a rope, which must be broken that she might be led away.

burn bran for perfume.] "burn bran as incense,"—namely, to the goddess, that through her favour a paramour may be found. Compare Theocritus, 'Idyl.' ii. 33 and 161; Virg. 'Ecl.' viii. 82: "sparge molam."

but if any of them, drawn by some that passeth by, lie with him.] "and when one of them has been dragged off by one of them that pass by to lie with him."

was not thought as worthy as herself.] "has not been thought worthy, like herself."

her cord.] "her rope."

44. done among them.] "done on them;" it refers to the idols (ἐν αὐτοῖς, Vat.), rather than to the worshippers or priests (παρ' αὐτοῖς, Alex.).

Isai. 44. 12, 13, &c.

45 [e] They are made of carpenters and goldsmiths: they can be nothing else than the workmen will have them to be.

46 And they themselves that made them can never continue long; how should then the things that are made of them be gods?

47 For they left lies and reproaches to them that come after.

48 For when there cometh any war or plague upon them, the priests consult with themselves, where they may be hidden with them.

49 How then cannot men perceive that they be no gods, which can neither save themselves from war, nor from plague?

50 [f] For seeing they be but of wood, and overlaid with silver and gold, it shall be known hereafter that they are false:

[f] Ps. 115 4. Wisd. 13. 10.

51 And it shall manifestly appear to all nations and kings that they are no gods, but the works of men's hands, and that there is no work of God in them.

52 Who then may not know that they are no gods?

53 For neither can they set up a king in the land, nor give rain unto men.

54 Neither can they judge their own cause, nor redress a wrong, being unable: for they are as crows between heaven and earth.

VERSES 45–52. IDOLS ARE MERE WORKS OF MEN'S HANDS.

45. made of carpenters.] "made by carpenters." Isa. xl. 19; Jer. x. 3, &c.

they can be nothing else than the workmen will have them to be.] So Horace (1 Sat. viii. 1) scoffs at the statue of Priapus in his garden:—

"Olim truncus eram ficulnus, inutile lignum,
Quum faber incertus scamnum faceretne Priapum Maluit esse deum. Deus inde ego."

Lactantius quotes the same passage ('Instit.' ii. c. 4).

46. be gods.] These words (εἶναι θεοί) are found in many MSS. and Versions, but not in the Vatican Codex. Without them the meaning will be: "The makers themselves do not continue, and how then is it likely that their works should be of long continuance? for what they have left to those that come after them are lies and disgrace."

47. lies.] I.e. false gods: see note on v. 8.

48. any war or plague.] "For whenever war or troubles come upon them."

49. from war, nor from plague.] "from wars nor from troubles."

51. And it shall manifestly appear to all nations and kings.] "To all the heathen and to their kings it shall be manifest."

there is no work of God in them.] I.e. They cannot do any work such as a god can do.

52. Who then may not know.] "To whom then shall it not be known." The Vatican Codex omits the negative particle, which is necessary to the sense. Without it we should have the inappropriate question — "Whereby then shall it be known that they are not gods?" The other reading is also confirmed by the form of the questions in vv. 49, 56, &c.

53. a king in the land.] "a king of the land." See note on v. 34.

give rain unto men.] Compare Deut. xi. 14; Ps. cxlvii. 8; Acts xiv. 17; Jas. v. 7.

54. their own cause.] Compare v. 14. Some would render: "they cannot judge men's causes." But there is a keener reproach in the A.V.

nor redress a wrong.] Or, as in Isa. i. 17, "relieve the oppressed." See the note at the end of the chapter on the various reading.

being unable.] "impotent as they are."

for they are as crows, &c.] The Alexandrine and other MSS. connect this with the preceding clause, omitting γάρ: "being helpless as the crows that are between heaven and earth." This does not affect the sense, which, however, the commentators have failed to discover. Thus Reuss: "This seems to be a proverbial saying. Anyhow the comparison is to the feebleness of the crow, not to its position. Yet the animal is much less feeble (!) than the idol."

Certainly a living crow does not appear to be feeble, especially when flying "between heaven and earth." But what is more impotent than a dead crow hung up "between heaven and earth," to scare his fellows. The same thought recurs in v. 70.

Digitized by Microsoft®

55 Whereupon when fire falleth upon the house of gods of wood, or laid over with gold or silver, their priests will flee away, and escape; but they themselves shall be burned asunder like beams.

56 Moreover they cannot withstand any king or enemies: how can it then be thought or said that they be gods?

57 Neither are those gods of wood, and laid over with silver or gold, able to escape either from thieves or robbers.

58 Whose gold, and silver, and garments wherewith they are clothed, they that are strong do take, and go away withal: neither are they able to help themselves.

59 Therefore it is better to be a king that sheweth his power, or else a profitable vessel in an house, which the owner shall have use of, than such false gods; or to be a door in an house, to keep such things safe as be therein, than such false gods; or a pillar of wood in a palace, than such false gods.

60 For sun, moon, and stars, being bright, and sent to do their offices, are obedient.

61 In like manner the lightning when it breaketh forth is easy to be seen; and ‖after the same manner the wind bloweth in every country.

‖ Or, the same wind.

62 And when God commandeth the clouds to go over the whole world, they do as they are bidden.

63 And the fire sent from above to consume hills and woods doeth as it is commanded: but these are like unto them neither in shew nor power.

64 Wherefore it is neither to be supposed nor said that they are gods, seeing they are able neither to judge causes, nor to do good unto men.

55. Whereupon when.] "For even when."

burned asunder.] "burned through and through" (μέσοι).

56. thought or said.] "admitted or supposed."

VERSES 57–59. IDOLS MOST HELPLESS AND USELESS EVEN OF MEN'S WORKS.

57. Neither are those gods of wood, &c.] There is more force in the proper order: "Neither from thieves nor from robbers can they escape,—these gods of wood," &c.

58. Whose gold and silver . . . they that are strong do take.] Here, again, the force is better preserved by retaining the order of the Greek: "From whom the strong will strip off the gold and the silver and the raiment that is about them."

neither are they able.] "and they will not be able to defend themselves."

59. power.] "courage" (ἀνδρείαν).

a profitable vessel in an house, which the owner shall have use of.] "a vessel in a house useful for the purpose for which the owner shall have need of it." See Additional Note on the various reading.

such false gods.] "the false gods." The same words are repeated thrice in this verse, like a new refrain.

or to be a door.] "or even a door," &c.; i.e. is better than they.

VERSES 60–63. GOD'S WORKS ARE ALL USEFUL IN THEIR SEVERAL OFFICES.

60. sent to do their offices.] Literally, "sent forth for needful purposes."

61. easy to be seen.] "brilliant" (εὔοπτος), or "fair to see."

and after the same manner the wind bloweth in every country.] This version, with a slight addition, represents correctly the Received Text: "the wind also bloweth," &c. As sun, moon, stars, and lightning are all useful in their several offices, "after the same manner the wind also" everywhere does its work.

On the marginal rendering, "the same wind bloweth in every country," see the Additional Note.

62. And when God commandeth, &c.] "And when the clouds are commanded by God."

they do as they are bidden.] "they fulfil his bidding."

63. And the fire, &c.] "And the fire when sent forth from above to consume mountains and forests doeth that which is appointed."

but these.] "but these (idols)."

Digitized by Microsoft®

65 Knowing therefore that they are no gods, fear them not.

66 For they can neither curse nor bless kings:

67 Neither can they shew signs in the heavens among the heathen, nor shine as the sun, nor give light as the moon.

68 The beasts are better than they: for they can get under a covert, and help themselves.

69 It is then by no means manifest unto us that they are gods: therefore fear them not.

70 For as a scarecrow in a garden of cucumbers keepeth nothing: so are their gods of wood, and laid over with silver and gold.

71 And likewise their gods of wood, and laid over with silver and gold, are like to a white thorn in an orchard, that every bird sitteth upon; as also to a dead body, that is cast into the dark.

72 And ye shall know them to be no gods by the ‖bright purple that rotteth upon them: and they themselves afterwards shall be eaten, and shall be a reproach in the country.

‖ Or, purple and brightness.

73 Better therefore is the just man that hath none idols: for he shall be far from reproach.

66. Compare Jer. x. 5: "They cannot do evil, neither also is it in them to do good." But God's curse or blessing affects even kings.

67. Compare Jer. x. 2: "Learn not the way of the heathen, and be not dismayed at the signs of heaven."

68. get under.] "escape into."

69. by no means.] "in no wise." These words may be connected with the close of the sentence, thus: "In no wise then, it is manifest unto us, are they gods."

therefore.] "wherefore."

70. a scarecrow.] Lobeck ('Phrynichus,' p. 86) quotes this passage and a Scholiast's note upon it: "The prose writers of the Greeks give the names προβασκάνια and κερέμβηλα to things which the watchmen in a field set up to frighten birds or even men. But these latter are called μορμολυκεῖα."

in a garden of cucumbers.] Compare Isa. i. 8, with S. Basil's comment on the word: "A place that produces quick-growing and perishable fruits." On the form of the word, see the Additional Note.

keepeth nothing.] "that keepeth nothing." "He compares the idols to these scarecrows, which do not in reality protect the fruits but in the imagination of the birds, which suppose them to be real men, while they are only imitations of men: so also the idols are not gods, but images" (Corn. à Lap.).

71. And likewise.] "In the same manner also."

like to a white thorn.] The idols are as senseless and helpless as a thorn-bush ("Rhamnus:" 'Dict. of the Bible'), which cannot drive away the birds that settle on it: see v. 22.

cast into the dark.] "The dark" (ἐν σκότει) does not here mean "the grave," as Reusch supposes, nor "sheol." The idols are as senseless and as little respected as a corpse cast out unburied in some dark place. The same Greek word (ἐρριμμένος) is used in Judges iv. 22 of the corpse of Sisera, and in 1 Macc. xi. 4: compare Bar. ii. 25.

72. by the bright purple, &c.] "by the purple also, and by the brightness that rotteth upon them," &c. The word rendered in the margin "brightness" (μαρμάρου) means properly "marble," so called in Greek from its brightness. Marble was no doubt sometimes used to overlay and adorn wooden images, but the idea of rotting (σηπομένης) does not agree very well with marble, which moreover has not been mentioned in the preceding descriptions of the idols. Other words have been suggested, but the reading is not doubtful, and it is best to accept the general sense of "brightness" with the margin.

a reproach in the country.] Compare vv. 27 and 47.

73. the just man that hath none idols.] "a righteous man that hath no idols." The author breaks off rather abruptly with the general reflection that it is better to have nothing to do with idols, which bring only disgrace upon their worshippers.

ADDITIONAL NOTES ON VERSES 3, 27, 54, 59, 61, 70.

3. seven generations.] The Greek word (γενεά) usually meant a space of about thirty years: and if it has this meaning here, the duration assigned to the Captivity is just thrice as long as in Jer. xxix. 10: "For thus saith the Lord, That after seventy years be accomplished at Babylon, I will visit you, and perform my good word toward you, in causing you to return to this place."

Digitized by Microsoft®

The commentators on the Epistle attempt in various ways to reconcile or explain the apparent discrepancy. Some refer to Suidas, who observes that γενεά was used in medical language for a period of seven years: but that was evidently an exceptional use, which would be quite inappropriate here. Just as little help can be gained from a very doubtful passage in which Diogenes Laertius is supposed to use γενεά for a period of ten years. Reusch, a Roman Catholic commentator, who maintains that the Epistle is a genuine work of the prophet Jeremiah, supposes that γενεά is the translation of the Hebrew word (דּוֹר), which, "where it is used as a definition of time, signifies only in a general way 'a period of time,' 'a succession of years:' and why should not Jeremiah have said here 'many years and a long time even unto seven periods,' and there have recalled the more exact determination which he had already given elsewhere (xxv. 12)?" Other suggestions, such as δεκάδων for γενεῶν (Houbigant), or three for seven (i.e. γ′ for ζ′) (Welte), are still less probable.

Modern commentators, including the Roman Catholics, have for the most part given up the genuineness of the Epistle, and hold that it must have been written several centuries after the death of Jeremiah. A Jew of that later period, seeing that so large a portion of his nation was still scattered among the heathen in Babylon and in many other lands, might well think that the promised restoration of God's people, with all the great and glorious blessings which were to accompany it, could not have been fulfilled by the return of a small part of the exiles from Babylon. Unable to discern the spiritual meaning of the promises, and looking still for a more complete restoration of the greatness and glory of the nation, he might be inclined to extend the duration of the exile from "seventy years" to the longer and more indefinite period of "seven generations."

This view is held, with various modifications, by Fritzsche, Lange, Ewald ('Hist. of Israel,' v. 140, E. Tr.), and is on the whole the most probable.

27. (a.) The Vatican and Alexandrine MSS. both read διὰ τὸ μήποτε ἐπὶ τὴν γὴν πέσῃ δι' αὐτῶν ἀνίστασθαι. If this be retained, the sense will be that the attendants are ashamed "because (the idols), lest they should fall to the ground, are set up by them." The construction is perfectly regular, but the sense not satisfactory.

A better reading is suggested by the variations in the two following clauses, which both begin in the Codex Alex. with μήποτε ἐάν, but in the Cod. Vat. with μήτε ἐάν. The μήποτε is evidently wrong in these two clauses, but seems to have been transferred from the first clause, so that the true reading would be διὰ τὸ μήποτε, ἐὰν ἐπὶ τὴν γὴν πέσῃ, δι' αὐτῶν ἀνίστασθαι, μήτε ἐάν τις κ. τ. λ.

(b.) ἐάν τις αὐτὸ ὀρθὸν στήσῃ κ. τ. λ. In the two following clauses Fritzsche says that "the author in μήτε κ. τ. λ. speaks out his own opinion (von sich) positively." But if so, he must have written οὔτε, not μήτε. The true explanation of his using μήτε seems to be that he is still expressing the thought of the attendants, but, instead of continuing the construction with the infinitive (διὰ τὸ μήποτε . . . ἀνίστασθαι, μήτε . . . κινηθήσεσθαι), passes over at the end of the sentence to the indicative.

(c.) ὥσπερ νεκροῖς. The comparison of the idol-gods to corpses occurs in several of the very early Christian writings: Pseudo-Clemens Rom. 2 Cor. iii.: ἡμεῖς οἱ ζῶντες τοῖς νεκροῖς θεοῖς οὐ θύομεν. Epist. ad Diognetum, c. ii.: οὐ κωφὰ πάντα; οὐ τυφλά; οὐκ ἄψυχα; οὐκ ἀναίσθητα; οὐκ ἀκίνητα; . . . ταῦτα θεοὺς καλεῖτε κ. τ. λ. The same comparison is also found in the Διδαχὴ τῶν ιβ′ ἀποστόλων (published by Bryennius at Constantinople, 1883), cap. vi.: ἀπὸ δὲ τοῦ εἰδωλοθύτου λίαν πρόσεχε· λατρεία γάρ ἐστι θεῶν νεκρῶν.

54. Οὐδὲ μὴ ῥύσωνται ἀδίκημα. Instead of this reading of the Vatican MS., which is adopted in the Received Text (Tisch.), the Codex Alex., with many Cursives and Versions, has ἀδικούμενον.

á. Fritzsche suggests different explanations of ἀδίκημα.

(1) "Nor can they rescue a thing stolen from them." Plato, 'Republ.' ii. 365 E.: ἀδικητέον καὶ θυτέον ἐκ τῶν ἀδικημάτων. But this sense of ἀδίκημα is not found in biblical Greek, and in the passage quoted its meaning is in part defined by the context.

(2) "Nor can they hold back (from themselves) an injury." In Homer, 'Odyss.' xxiii. 243:—

> Ἡῶ δ' αὖτε > ῥύσατ' ἐπ' Ὠκεανῷ χρυσόθρονον, the meaning is simply to "hold back," not to "repel" from oneself.

Fritzsche is himself not satisfied with these explanations, and as an alternative suggests a purely conjectural emendation, ἐρύσωνται.

β′. The other reading (ἀδικούμενον) is well authenticated, and gives a better sense: The idols can neither judge their own cause, "nor relieve the oppressed." This is the common use of ῥύεσθαι, both in the LXX. (Isa. i. 17: ῥύσασθε ἀδικούμενον) and in the N. T. (Rom. vii. 24; 2 Cor. i. 10; 2 Tim. iii. 11, &c.).

59. which the owner shall have use of.] The reading χρήσεται (Alex.) has probably been substituted for the less usual κεχρήσεται (Vat.), and a feeble tautology thus introduced into the passage. As χρῆσθαι is, apparently, never found with ἐπί and a dative, ἐφ' ᾧ also was changed in some MSS. into ἐν ᾧ, ἐφ' ὅ, ὅ, or ᾧ, which last form is represented in the Authorized Version.

Neither of the changes is required. That κεχρήσεται means "shall need," rather than "shall use," is probable from the use of κεχρημένος in this sense (Homer, 'Od.' i. 13, xiv. 155; Soph. 'Phil.' 1264, &c.). If we then understand ἐφ' ᾧ in the usual sense of purpose, the meaning of the passage is clear: "a vessel useful for the purpose for which the owner shall have need of it." The Latin Version (gloriabitur) represents a reading καυχήσεται, and so confirms the form κεχρήσεται.

61. The Vatican text of this verse has τὸ δ' αὐτὸ καὶ πνεῦμα κ. τ. λ. The Alexandrine, which omits καί, may be rendered, as in the margin, "and the same wind bloweth in every country." In support of this rendering, Fritzsche refers to The Song of the Three Children, v. 43: "O all ye winds, bless ye the Lord." But the sense thus obtained, that wind is everywhere the same, the work of the same Creator, is less appropriate to our passage than that of the Vatican text—that as the other elements of nature all are useful, so the wind also is everywhere active.

This construction leaves πνεῦμα without an article, as ἥλιος, σελήνη, ἄστρα, ἀστραπή, which go before, and νεφέλαις which follows, all are. Compare for this omission of the article the passage cited by Bishop Middleton, ch. vi. § 2, from Plato, 'Cratylus,' 408 F: ἡλίου τε καὶ σελήνης καὶ ἄστρων καὶ γῆς καὶ αἰθέρος καὶ ἀέρος καὶ πυρὸς καὶ ὕδατος καὶ ὡρῶν καὶ ἐνιαυτοῦ;—and the earlier passage, 397 D: φαίνονταί μοι οἱ πρῶτοι τῶν ἀνθρώπων τῶν περὶ τὴν Ἑλλάδα τούτους μόνους που θεοὺς ἡγεῖσθαι, οὕσπερ νῦν πολλοὶ τῶν βαρβάρων, ἥλιον καὶ σελήνην καὶ γῆν καὶ ἄστρα καὶ οὐρανόν.

For the quasi-adverbial use of τὸ αὐτό, compare Philipp. ii. 18.

70. ἐν σικυηράτῳ.] Both here and in Isa. i. 8, the MSS. vary between this form and σικυηλάτῳ. Fritzsche prefers the latter on two grounds:—

(1) That it is better supported by MSS. in other authors, as Hippocrates, Cyril of Jerusalem, and Cyril of Alexandria. Basil quotes from Isaiah ἐν σικυηράτῳ, but himself writes σικυήλατον immediately after.

(2) Fritzsche finds no satisfactory etymology for σικυήρατον, but compares σικυήλατον with χαλκήλατος, χρυσήλατος.

Lobeck ('Phrynichus,' p. 86) speaks of σικυήλατον as a faulty reading in some editions of the Bible. The combined authority of the Vat. and Alex. Codd. in favour of σικυήρατον in both passages must outweigh the testimony of the Cursives.

Digitized by Microsoft®

Digitized by Microsoft®

ADDITIONS TO DANIEL.

I. THE SONG OF THE THREE HOLY CHILDREN.

Bar'kú Yahwéh mal'ákau
Gibbóre kóḥ 'osé ḥail Lišmó' beqól debáro.
* * *
Bar'kú Yahwéh kol-ç'bá'au
M'šar'tháu 'osé reçóno.
* * *
Bar'kú Yahwéh kol-má'sau
Bekól m'qomóth memšálto Bar'kí nafší eth-Yáhweh.
(Ps. ciii. 20 sqq.)

THE numerous Talmudic and Midrashic references to the story of Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah make it probable that at one time Jewish tradition had more to tell about the three martyrs than is now read in Dan. iii. A story of this kind would naturally be a popular favourite, and as such would be peculiarly liable to amplification and embellishment. Hence it is not surprising to find that the Greek versions of Daniel, followed by the Syriac, Latin, and Arabic, have interpolated at chap. iii. 23 a Prayer which Azarias utters in the name of the Three, and a Canticle which they are supposed to have chanted together in the midst of the flaming furnace.[1]

Independently of the Story of the Three Children, it appears from Jer. xxix. 22 sq., that burning alive was, as a matter of historical fact, a Babylonian mode of execution; and we have an older notice in the records of Assurbanipal, king of Assyria, who thus revenged himself on his rebellious brother Samaš-šumucîn, viceroy of Babylon (circ. 648 B.C.).[2] Firdausi tells a story which shews that Persian tradition also had its martyr-hero who came unhurt out of a fiery furnace (Malcolm's 'Persia,' i. 29, 30). The passage about the Two Wicked Prophets, quoted from the Midrash Tanḥûmâ in the Introd. to Susanna, makes Nebuchadnezzar refer to the case of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego; and curiously relates that whereas Ahab and Zedekiah perished in the flames, their holy companion, Joshua, the High Priest, came forth without other harm than the singeing of his garments. In such legends it is possible to see a literal application of scriptural passages like Ps. lxvi. 12, "We went through fire and water, and thou broughtest us out;" Zech. iii. 2, "Is not this man [i.e. Joshua, the High Priest] a brand plucked out of the fire?" and Isa. xliii. 2, "When thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burnt, neither shall the flame kindle upon thee." From texts such as these, the Haggadic expositors might easily develop stories illustrating their apparent meaning. The case is precisely analogous to that of Bel and the Dragon, and the Story of Susanna.

In the Midrash we find, besides, the following references to the Story of the Three Children. In Wayyiqra Rabba (Parash. xxxiii., cap. xxv. 1),[1] Nebuchadnezzar remonstrates with them thus: "Did not idolatry originate among you? Is it not written, 'And their graven images from Jerusalem and Samaria' [a misrendering of Isa. x. 10]? And come ye now to make nought of my god? When ye were in your own land, ye sent to us, and procured claws, hair, and bones of idols, and drew them, in

[1] This Prayer and Canticle are also read as Nos. viii.–x. among the hymns appended to the Ethiopic Psalter, where they are properly arranged, as poetical pieces, according to the rhythm.

[2] See the Introd. to the Prayer of Manasses.

[1] Apud Dr. Aug. Wünsche's 'Bibliotheca Rabbinica.'

Digitized by Microsoft®

order to fulfil that which is written (Ezek. xxiii. 14), 'the images of the Chaldeans pourtrayed with vermilion;' and come ye now to make my idol image nought?" R. Jehudah bar R. Simon makes the king remonstrate in like manner, on the ground of Ezek. xvi. 25; xxiii. 42, 43 (with a ref. to Jer. li. 44). "R. Samuel bar Nachmani said: Nebuchadnezzar said unto them: 'Your idol image was of silver and gold, as it is said (citing Hos. viii. 4); but my idol image is wholly of the purest gold, as it is said (Dan. iii. 1); and come ye now to make mine idol nought? Did not Moses write for you in the Law (Deut. iv. 28), There ye shall serve gods the work of men's hands?' They answered: 'My lord, O king, to bow before does not mean to worship, but to be subject to them in the way of forced labours, subsidies, poll-taxes, and fines.' Our Rabbis have taught: Nebuchadnezzar said unto them, Did not Jeremiah write for you (xxvii. 8), 'The nation and kingdom that will not serve N. the king of Babylon,' &c." Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego gave the same explanation as before, adding, with reference to the command to worship the image, "'Thou art נבו־כד־נצר; bark (נבח = נבו) like a dog, swell thyself out like a water-jar (כד), and chirp like a cricket' (צרצר). Straightway he barked like a dog, swelled himself out like a water-jar, and chirped like a cricket" (a reference to Nebuchadnezzar's madness).

In the Talmud Bab. Abodah Zarah 3 A, it is said that the heathen will attest before Messiah's tribunal that Israel has kept the whole Law. Nimrod will declare that Abraham chose to be cast into his fiery furnace rather than worship his idols. Nebuchadnezzar will witness in favour of Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah.

Sanhedrin, 93 A (referred to in the Introd. to Susanna), makes Nebuchadnezzar reply to his daughter thus concerning the proposals of the Two Wicked Prophets: "The god of these men hateth lust (זימה); when they come unto thee, send them unto me. When they came unto her, she sent them unto her father. He said unto them, Who told you? They said, The Holy One (blessed be He!). [He said:] Behold Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, I have asked them, and they have told me it is forbidden (אסור). They said unto him, We too are prophets like them. He (God) spake not unto them; unto us He hath spoken. He said unto them, I desire to prove you as I proved Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah. They said unto him, They were three, and we are two. He said unto them, Choose you whom ye desire along with you. They said, Joshua, the High Priest. They thought, Let Joshua come; for his merit is great, and will shield us." The result was that they were burnt, and Joshua's garments singed (Zech. iii. 1, 2). "He (Nebuchadnezzar) said unto him, I know that thou art righteous; but what is the reason that the fire gained a slight advantage over thee, and none at all over Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah? He said to him, They were three, and I (am only) one. He said to him, And behold Abraham was alone there, and there were no wicked men with him, and yet leave was not given to the fire (to burn him)." "Here there were wicked men with me, and leave was given to the fire. This is what they say, Two dry sticks (אודי, torres) and one green one. The dry ones kindle the green one."

Taanith, 18 B, also alludes to the miracle of the deliverance of the Three. Pesachim, 118 A, has the following: "Hizkiah said [with reference to the text "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us"]: It implies a descent of the righteous into the furnace of fire, and an ascent therefrom: a descent, as it is written: Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us. Hananiah said, But unto thy Name give the praise. Mishael said, For thy loving-kindness and for thy truth's sake. Azariah said, Wherefore should the heathen say? They all said, on coming up from the furnace of fire, that which is written: Praise the Lord, all ye heathen. Hananiah said: Laud him, all ye peoples. Mishael said: For his loving-kindness is mighty upon us. Azariah said: And the truth of the Lord endureth for ever; praise ye Jah."

* * * * *

"In the hour when Nimrod the wicked threw Abraham our father into the midst of the furnace of fire, quoth Gabriel before the Holy One (blessed be He!): Lord of the World, I will go down, and cool, and deliver the righteous one out of the furnace of fire. The Holy One (blessed be He!) said unto him: I am alone in my world, and he is alone in his world: it becometh the Only One to deliver the only one. And as the Holy One (blessed be He!) doth not cut off the reward of any creature, He said: Thou shalt prevail, and thou shalt deliver three of his sons' sons.[1] R. Samuel the Shilonite discoursed thus: In the hour when Nebuchadnezzar the wicked threw Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah into the midst of the furnace of fire, Yôrqemî, the Prince of Hail, stood before the Holy One (blessed be He!). Said he before Him: Lord of the World, Let me go down and cool the furnace, and deliver these righteous ones out of the furnace of fire. Quoth Gabriel unto him: The Omnipotence of the Holy One (blessed be He!) is not (involved) in this, that thou the prince of the hail (cool the flames), when all men know that waters (naturally) quench fire; but I, the Prince of Fire, will go down and make it cool within (אקרר מבפנים) and hot without, and thus work a miracle within a miracle. The Holy One (blessed be He!) said unto him, Go down. In the self-same hour Gabriel opened his mouth and said: And the truth of the Lord endureth for ever." Cf. also Pesach., 94 A.

Digitized by Microsoft®

The above passages not only illustrate the tendency to put appropriate thanksgivings into the mouth of the Three Martyrs, which we find exemplified at length in our Apocryphon: they also shew that the conception of a deliverance from a fiery furnace was traditional among the Jews, in all probability from very ancient times. And we have to bear in mind a fact familiar enough to students of the Talmudic and Midrashic literature, though apparently unknown to many expositors of Scripture, whose minds conspicuously lack that orientation which is an indispensable preliminary to a right understanding of the treasures of Eastern thought; I mean, the inveterate tendency of Jewish teachers to convey their doctrine not in the form of abstract discourse, but in a mode appealing directly to the imagination, and seeking to rouse the interest and sympathy of the man rather than the philosopher. The Rabbi embodies his lesson in a story, whether parable or allegory or seeming historical narrative; and the last thing he or his disciples would think of is to ask whether the selected persons, events, and circumstances which so vividly suggest the doctrine are in themselves real or fictitious. The doctrine is everything; the mode of presentation has no independent value. To make the story the first consideration, and the doctrine it was intended to convey an afterthought, as we, with our dry Western literalness, are predisposed to do, is to reverse the Jewish order of thinking, and to do unconscious injustice to the authors of many edifying narratives of antiquity.

The composer of the Song of the Three Children has drawn largely upon the Psalter, and the Prayer of Azarias follows scriptural models. Although the Greek text as Greek reads rather baldly, we cannot agree with Fritzsche that "the accumulated doxologies" of the Song are an artistic defect; nor do we think the separate enumeration of the manifold powers of creation "frigid." The monotony of form is itself effective. It is like the monotony of the winds or the waves; and powerfully suggests to the imagination the amplitude and splendour of God's world, and the sublimity of the universal chorus of praise. The instinct of the Church, which early adopted the Benedicite for liturgical use, was right.

The supposition that the Prayer and the Hymn are due to different authors rests upon a false contrast between vv. 15 and 31, 62. It is true that the former passage presupposes the destruction of the Temple and the cessation of sacrifice, but the latter does not contradict this, for "the temple of thine holy glory" is the celestial temple or palace (see note ad loc. and Isa. vi. 1); and the language of v. 62, "O ye priests of the Lord," &c., is accounted for either by the consideration that there were priests among the exiles, or by the fact that the verse is taken bodily from Ps. cxxxiv. 1, and the author's view is ideal. Fritzsche thinks

[1] I.e. the Three Holy Children.

Digitized by Microsoft®

he "has simply fallen out of his cue." In v. 15 he certainly appears to have done so, in the remark that "there is no prophet," which would suit his own time, but not that of the Exile. But here, too, the writer may have been influenced by a reminiscence of such passages as are cited in the note on the verse.[1] The style of prayer and song is identical throughout.

As to the original language of all the Three Additions to Daniel, it was probably in each case either Hebrew or Aramaic. The Greek text consequently is either a translation or a paraphrastic remodelling of the pieces. Eichhorn at first argued for a Greek original, as in the case of Judith also, but later he changed his opinion so far as to leave the question undecided.[2] Keil and Fritzsche maintain the originality of the Greek. The latter observes that in cases of this kind a Hebrew original has usually been inferred from the strongly Hebraizing character of the Greek; but there is always a great difference between a translation and an original Hellenistic text. In the latter a Greek colouring will always make itself apparent; in the former, awkward renderings, if not actual blunders, will always be discernible. Fritzsche admits however that, as regards the Song of the Three Children, its brevity and simplicity are against his decision; and we think that he is wrong in the assertion that there is no trace anywhere of a Hebrew text. It may be true that a Hellenist familiar with the LXX. might have written such a piece; and it is true that no mistakes in translation can be certainly specified. This last is an important point; for, as Dr. Pusey has well observed, "Hebraisms in themselves prove nothing; for one who thinks in his own language and writes in another is, in fact, translating, although mentally. One, e.g., who had the word לפני in his mind, might just as well use ἐναντίον for it, instead of ἐνώπιον, as one who had it before his eyes; and so on. But mistakes in translating shew that the writer and translator were different."[1] The suggestion, however, that in v. 14 the Heb. מכל has been misread as בכל is plausible. The difficulty in v. 17 may indicate not so much a corruption of the Greek text as a confusion of the Heb. noun כליל, "holocaust," with the verb כלל, "to perfect;" and it is doubtful whether a Hellenist would have used such an expression as καὶ ἐποίησε τὸ μέσον τῆς καμίνου ὡσεὶ πνεῦμα δρόσου διασυρίζον (v. 27), unless he were translating from a Semitic original. The word πνεύματα for ἀνεμοὶ (v. 43) may point to Heb. רוחות, which covers both terms; cf. v. 64. The commentary adds other indications, and demonstrates the strongly Hebraic cast and complexion of the Prayer and Song. But the argument for an original Hebrew text does not rest only upon such grounds as these. It may also be based upon the contents of all three Additions, which are indeed hardly conceivable as the fictions of Alexandrian Hellenists. The passages above quoted from the Babylonian Talmud and the Midrash prove that the Story of the Three Children was a favourite topic with the Rabbis and their disciples, and seem to indicate the existence of a more extended tradition, which may have included the Prayer of Azarias and the Song of the Three. Perhaps the Greek translator found this piece in a Hebrew Midrash Daniel. This would account for the recurrence to the Hebrew names of the Three. In the Aramaic of Dan. iii. they bear their Babylonian designations. See further the Introd. to Bel and Susanna.

The Additions constitute integral portions of the LXX. text of Daniel, and it is obviously difficult to suppose that the author of that text invented these stories himself, or incorporated in his version of a work written in Hebrew and Aramaic three important pieces which he only knew in a Greek dress. Moreover, the strange juxta-

[1] Compare also Wayyiqra Rabba, xxx. 23, 40: "R. Isaac explained the verse ('He will regard the prayer of the destitute,' Ps. cii. 17) with reference to the generations in which the people of Israel has no king and no prophets and no priests, and no Urim and Thummim, but only Prayer. Hence David said before God, 'Lord of the World, despise not their prayer.'"

[2] 'Einleit. in d. Apokr. Schr.,' p. 419; 'Einleit. in d. A. T.,' iv. 530.

[1] 'Daniel the Prophet,' p. 377, note 7.

Digitized by Microsoft®

position of the two languages in Daniel may indicate, as Lenormant suggested, that certain lacunae in the Hebrew text have been supplied from an Aramaic version; and if that be so, it is not impossible that one or more of our three Additions represent sections of the lost Aramaic text, which may have been fuller than the Hebrew Daniel. Little, at all events, can be alleged against the supposition that the Alexandrian translator of Daniel rendered these narratives from a Hebrew or Aramaic original, and added them to his version of the main work, as pertaining to the same subject. The identity of style, even in minute particulars, strongly favours this conclusion. And, as regards the numerous variations between the different versions, especially in the case of Bel and Susanna, we may apply the words of Dr. Neubauer: "No books are more subject to additions, alterations, and various adaptations, than popular histories; the text is in the hands of a few, and the contents are related orally to the people: hence the great variety in the texts even of the early translations." What Dr. Neubauer thus writes of Tobit, has equal force in the present instance.

Digitized by Microsoft®

THE SONG OF THE

THREE HOLY CHILDREN,

Which followeth in the third Chapter of DANIEL after this place,—fell down bound into the midst of the burning fiery furnace.—Verse 23. That which followeth is not in the Hebrew, to wit, And they walked—unto these words, Then Nebuchadnezzar—verse 24.

2 Azarias his prayer and confession in the flame, 24 wherewith the Chaldeans about the oven were consumed, but the three children within it were not hurt. 28 The song of the three children in the oven.

AND they walked in the midst of the fire, praising God, and blessing the Lord.

2 Then Azarias stood up, and prayed on this manner: and opening his mouth in the midst of the fire said,

3 Blessed art thou, O Lord God of our fathers: thy name is worthy to be praised and glorified for evermore:

TITLE.—The Song of the Three Holy Children.] In the Vatican LXX. the title is 'Prayer of Azarias' and 'Hymn of the Three.' The Alex. MS. omits. Fritzsche edits: 'Prayer of Azarias and Laud of the Three Children' (προσευχὴ Ἀζαρίου καὶ τῶν τριῶν παιδῶν αἴνεσις). The Gk. term αἴνεσις may represent Heb. תהלה, laus, psalmus, as in Ps. cxlv. (title), or תודה, actio gratiarum (Ps. xxvi. 7). In the Vulgate, S. Jerome notes: "Quae sequuntur in Hebraeis voluminibus non reperi." Walton's Syriac has the heading, "Prayer of those with Hananiah;" the Ethiopic, "Prayer of Azariah." The Syriac edited by Bugatus from the Ambrosian MS. has no heading.

2. Then Azarias stood up and prayed.] The text of Theodotion connects this section with Dan. iii. 23 thus: "And they were walking in the midst of the flame, praising God and blessing the Lord. And standing with (them: Codd. 34, 36, al.), Azarias prayed on this manner," &c., as in the A.V. The Ambrosian Syriac, which represents the LXX., has: "23. The men, therefore, that bound them of the house of Azariah, when the flame had gone forth from the furnace, it kindled and slew; but they were preserved. 24. Thus, therefore, prayed Hananiah and Azariah and Mishael, and praised the Lord, when the king commanded to cast them into the furnace. 25. But when Azariah rose up, he prayed thus; and when he had opened his mouth, he was giving thanks to the Lord, with his fellows who were with him in the midst of the fire, when the furnace was being heated [meštaggar, "kindled"] by the Chaldeans mightily: and they said."

Fritzsche edits: "On this manner, therefore, prayed Ananias and Azarias and Misael, and sang praises unto the Lord, when the king commanded that they should be cast into the furnace. Now (δὲ) Azarias stood and prayed on this manner, and opening his mouth began to give thanks (ἐξωμολογεῖτο) unto the Lord, with his companions in the midst of the fire, as the furnace was being heated by the Chaldeans exceedingly, and they said." Theodotion pruned away this prolixity, and improved the connexion of the inserted piece with the original text. The mention of "the Chaldeans" here, and again in v. 24, as executing the royal decree, is remarkable. In the canonical text of Daniel they are mentioned but once (Dan. iii. 8), where it is said that "certain Chaldeans slandered the Jews" to Nebuchadnezzar. Moreover, the recurrence to the Hebrew names of "Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego" is surprising; for throughout the narrative in Dan. iii. they are called by their Babylonian designations. It is also to be noted that in Dan. i. and ii. the order of the names is always "Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah," never, as in the addition, Hananiah, Azariah, and Mishael (here, and v. 65). These peculiarities may be allowed to have some weight, in considering the question whether the piece originally belonged to the Book of Daniel or not; but they certainly do not tend to prove that the original language of this piece was Greek.

3. Blessed art thou, O Lord God of our fathers.] A common formula of Jewish prayer. Cf. 1 Chron. xxix. 10, 20; 2 Chron. vi. 3, 4.

thy name is worthy to be praised.] So Syr.

Digitized by Microsoft®

[a] Dan. 9. 14.

4 [a]For thou art righteous in all the things that thou hast done to us: yea, true are all thy works, thy ways are right, and [b]all thy judgments truth.

[b] Ps. 25. 10.

5 In all the things that thou hast brought upon us, and upon the holy city of our fathers, even Jerusalem, thou hast executed true judgment: for according to truth and judgment didst thou bring all these things upon us because of our sins.

6 For we have sinned and committed iniquity, departing from thee.

7 In all things have we trespassed, and not obeyed thy commandments, nor kept them, neither done as thou hast commanded us, that it might go well with us.

8 Wherefore all that thou hast brought upon us, and every thing that thou hast done to us, thou hast done in true judgment.

W., Vulg., Arab., and Ethiopic. Tischendorf and Fritzsche read αἰνετὸς for αἰνετὸν (so fifteen cursive MSS., Syr. Hex., and Co. Ald.), and connect the epithet with the preceding clause. We think the reading of the four versions agrees better with that parallelism which is one of the principles of Hebrew poetical construction. Else the term αἰνετὸς, Heb. מְהֻלָּל, is applicable in both ways: Ps. xviii. 3; cxiii. 3.

The word δεδοξασμένον, "glorious," gloria affectus = afficiendus, may represent Heb. גָּדוֹל, magnus, as in Mal. i. 11, "My name is great among the nations;" or rather נִכְבָּד, honorandus, laudandus: cf. Ps. lxxxvi. 9, 12; lxxxvii. 3.

4. For thou art righteous in all the things.] ἐπὶ πᾶσι, "in reference to all." The phrase occurs in Neh. ix. 33—a very similar context. Cf. 'Il.' xix. 181: δικαιότερος καὶ ἐπ' ἄλλῳ ἔσσεαι. This clause is amplified in the successive sentences of the prayer to the end of v. 8. The spirit of it all is the same as that which finds expression in Ps. li. 4. Cf. also Jer. xii. 1. Ethiopic: "in all that thou hast brought upon us" (Gen. xxvi. 10).

yea, true are all thy works.] Gk. καὶ πάντα τὰ ἔργα σου ἀληθινά. Cf. Dan. iv. 34: καὶ πάντα τὰ ἔργα αὐτοῦ ἀληθινὰ καὶ αἱ τρίβοι αὐτοῦ κρίσεις. Also Deut. xxxii. 4: θεός, ἀληθινὰ τὰ ἔργα αὐτοῦ, καὶ πᾶσαι αἱ ὁδοὶ αὐτοῦ κρίσεις. And for the next clauses, Hos. xiv. 10; Ps. xix. 9. "Truth"—ἀλήθεια—is the reading of Codd. II., III. al.; but Fritzsche edits ἀληθιναί, "true." In Ps. xix. 9 ἀληθινὰ = Heb. אֱמֶת, "truth." Syr. W., "in truth;" Syr. Hex., "truth."

5. In all the things.] Literally, "And judgments of truth thou diddest, according to all that thou broughtest upon us, &c. [Ethiop.: "and thou hast done judgment and justice in all that thou hast done to us"]; because in truth and judgment thou didst all these things [so Syr. Hex.; but Theod., Syr. W., Vulg., Arab., Ethiop., ἐπήγαγες ταῦτα πάντα] on account of our sins." Cf. Gen. vi. 17; Jer. xix. 15; Judg. xvi. 19; Ps. iii. 7. The construction of ἐπάγειν with the dative is unusual in the LXX.

6. For we have sinned.] Fritzsche edits: "Because we sinned in all things (ἐν πᾶσιν, omitted by Theod.), and did lawlessly, to revolt from thee." Cf. 2 Chron. vi. 37; Dan. ix. 9, 15; Jer. xvii. 5. Instead of ἠνομήσαμεν ἀποστῆναι (= we made lawless revolt), Codd. III., XII. al. read ἠνομ. ἀποστάντες, "we did lawlessly by revolting." Syr. W.: "On account of our trespasses which we sinned and did wickedly (before thee), and went far from thee, (and did against thy word,) and sinned unto thee in all, and unto thy commandments we hearkened not," &c. Syr. Hex. omits the bracketed clauses. Ethiop.: "because we have transgressed and gone astray, in that we have forsaken thee."

7. In all things have we trespassed.] καὶ ἐξημάρτομεν ἐν πᾶσι. The last verse began with ὅτι ἡμάρτομεν. It is likely that the compound verb represents a different Heb. verb, viz. הִרְשִׁיעַ, impie egit: see Neh. ix. 33. The Syr. Hex. has "we sinned . . . we went astray in everything."

thy commandments.] Fritzsche: "the commandments of thy law." Theod. omits τοῦ νόμου, and reads the simple ἠκούσαμεν, instead of ὑπηκούσαμεν. All the verbs are aorists: "And we did wickedly in all things, and the commandments of thy law we obeyed not, nor observed straitly (συντηρεῖν), nor did as thou commandedst us, that it might well befal us."

8. Wherefore.] Rather, "and now." This καὶ νῦν—Heb. וְעַתָּה—is a very common formula in later Hebrew style: cf. Neh. ix. 32; 2 Chron. vi. 16, 17, 40, 41. Theod., Syr. W., Arab., wrongly omit the characteristic νῦν. The formula recurs in vv. 9 and 17 infra. The writer repeats the statement of v. 4, as a preliminary to specifying what it is that God has brought upon His people. This peculiarity is another indication of a Hebrew original.

Digitized by Microsoft®

9 And thou didst deliver us into the hands of lawless enemies, most hateful forsakers of God, and to an unjust king, and the most wicked in all the world.

10 And now we cannot open our mouths, we are become a shame and reproach to thy servants, and to them that worship thee.

11 Yet deliver us not up wholly, for thy name's sake, neither disannul thou thy covenant:

12 And cause not thy mercy to depart from us, for thy beloved

9. And thou didst deliver us.] I.e., "in that thou didst deliver us." The verse is an explication of the last. (Heb. ותתננו.) In Fritzsche's text the verse runs: "and thou didst deliver us into the hands of our lawless enemies, and most hateful renegades." So Syr. Hex. Theodotion omits ἡμῶν and καὶ before ἐχθίστων. His text may be rendered as in A.V., or perhaps thus: "enemies, lawless, abominable, apostate."

The term ἀποστάται, "rebels" or "rebellious," does not seem suitable as applied to the Chaldeans. In Isa. xxx. 1, the Jews are called τέκνα ἀποστάται; in the Heb., "stubborn, contumacious children." In Ezra iv. 12, 15, Jerusalem is called "rebel city"—πόλις ἀποστάτις—in regard to the Persian kings. Here, as in Num. xiv. 9, Josh. xxii. 19, the term represents the Heb. and Aramean מרד, "contumax fuit, defecit a domino" (cf. 2 Macc. v. 8). Michaelis thought that môrĕdim might mean "haughty" or "cruel," and he refers to the rarer Arabic and Syriac usage of the same root. The term "apostates" would then be an instance of mistranslation from the Hebrew original. But the Chaldeans are, from a Jewish point of view, not only ἄνομοι, but also ἀποστάται — "renegades" from Jehovah's law. (Cf. Jer. ii. 5; Ps. cxix. 150; and the Syr. Hex. term here.) The meaning need not be restricted to the Mosaic system. The universal laws of morality may be intended: cf. Amos i. 3; ii. 1. For the wicked lawlessness of the Chaldeans, cf. Hab. i. 11 sqq.; Is. xiv. 20 sq.

The Greek text continues: "and to a king unjust and very wicked beside (παρὰ) all the earth." The superlative πονηροτάτῳ is curious in connexion with παρά. I cannot find another instance. Otherwise the expression is thoroughly Hebraic (cf. the Ethiop., "evil above all the earth"). Such a description of Nebuchadnezzar appears, however, to be most unmerited, when considered in the light of what we are told about that great monarch in the Book of Kings, and in the writings of the contemporary prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel. The words rather express the bitter feeling of the later Jews towards their Syrian tyrants, especially Antiochus Epiphanes, whom they regarded as a "new Nebuchadnezzar." Syr. W.: "Into the hand of our wicked enemies, who are far from thee, and unto the lordship of the godless kingdom, which is worse than all the kingdoms of the earth." Ethiopic: "Sinners who are far off and removed from thee" (omitting "most hateful").

10. we cannot open our mouths.] Because we feel that our doom is just. Cf. Ps. xxxix. 9, "I am dumb, I open not my mouth; because thou hast done it;" also Matt. xxii. 12.

we are become a shame and reproach.] So Vulgate; but Greek, Syriac, Arabic, "shame and reproach have fallen to thy bondmen, and to them that worship thee."

11. Yet deliver us not up.] Theod. μὴ δὴ παραδῷς. Fritzsche omits the particle. "Wholly" is εἰς τέλος, which may be a rendering either of לכלה, ad consummationem, i.e. prorsus, plane (2 Chron. xii. 12), or of לנצח, in aeternum, as so often in the Psalms. Syr. H.: l'hartâ, "to the end."

disannul.] The Gk. is διασκεδάσῃς, "scatter abroad;" "fling to the winds," as we might say. In connexion with the term διαθήκη, it is the usual LXX. rendering of the Heb. הפר ברית, fregit, i.e. violavit foedus: Gen. xvii. 14; Lev. xxvi. 15, 44.

12. cause not thy mercy to depart.] Compare the promise to David (2 Sam. vii. 15; 1 Chron. xvii. 13).

for thy beloved Abraham's sake.] The Gk. is διὰ Ἀβ. τὸν ἠγαπημένον ὑπὸ σοῦ. This expression is usually compared with that of 2 Chron. xx. 7: ἔδωκας αὐτὴν σπέρματι Ἀβραὰμ τῷ ἠγαπημένῳ σου, where the Hebrew is, "And gavest it to the seed of Abraham thy lover" (or "friend," אהבך). But Dr. Bissell is doubly wrong in the assertion that "only in 2 Chron. xx. 7 is Abraham elsewhere called 'the beloved (A.V. 'friend') of God.'" The same Hebrew term is applied to the patriarch in Isa. xli. 8: "seed of Abraham, my lover!" where the LXX. misrenders ὃν ἠγάπησα = τοῦ ἠγαπημένου μου or ὑπ' ἐμοῦ. It is certainly curious that the Greek version should in both cases render אֹהֵב, amans, as if it were אָהוּב, amatus. St. James (ii. 23) writes that Abraham "was called friend of God" (φίλος θεοῦ ἐκλήθη). This, it is well known, is the common designation of the patriarch in the East; and had Greek

Digitized by Microsoft®

Abraham's sake, for thy servant Isaac's sake, and for thy holy Israel's sake;

13 To whom thou hast spoken and promised, [c] that thou wouldest multiply their seed as the stars of heaven, and as the sand that lieth upon the seashore.

14 [d] For we, O Lord, are become less than any nation, and be kept under this day in all the world because of our sins.

15 Neither is there at this time prince, or prophet, or leader, or burnt offering, or sacrifice, or oblation, or incense, or place to sacrifice before thee, and to find mercy.

16 [e] Nevertheless in a contrite heart and an humble spirit let us be accepted.

[c] Gen. 22. 17. & 26. 4.

[d] Baruch 2. 13.

[e] Baruch 2. 18.

been the original language of this Prayer, the expression of the text would most likely have been διὰ Ἀβ. τὸν φίλον σου. Some critics have supposed that the original expression in the present context was the Chaldee רְחִימֵךְ. It may, however, have been the Hebrew term just indicated, or the synonymous ידידך: comp. Deut. xxxiii. 12, ידיד יהוה=ἠγαπημένος ὑπὸ κυρίου, and Isa. v. 1, where לידידי is twice rendered τῷ ἠγαπημένῳ; and the Targum has זרעיה דאברהם רחמי, "the seed of Abraham my lover." So Syr. W. here; Syr. H., "who is dear (ḥabib) to thee." Ethiop. "beloved," "friend" (Hos. iii. 1).

for thy holy Israel's sake.] The phrase "Israel (i.e. Jacob) thy holy one" is unknown to the O. T. In Exod. xix. 6 it is ordained that the people of Israel shall be "a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation;" and the idea is reiterated in the succeeding portions of the Pentateuch, e.g. Lev. xi. 44, 45; Deut. vii. 6. Compare also Dan. vii. 18, 21 sqq. Applied to Jacob, the term seems to carry the same general sense: separated from the rest of the world, and devoted to Jehovah. Cf. ὅσιος in Ps. iv. 3; xvi. 9. Syr. H., "Israel thy people."

13. To whom thou hast spoken.] So Theod., οἷς ἐλάλησας πρὸς αὐτοὺς, λέγων, "unto whom thou spakest, saying." We prefer this Hebraism to Fritzsche's ὡς ἐλάλ. κ.τ.λ. (The Vatic. LXX. omits πρὸς αὐτούς, אלהם.) For the promise, see Gen. xxii. 17.

14. For we . . . are become less than any nation.] Whereas Jehovah had promised to make them numerous as the stars of heaven and the sand of the seashore, they are "minished below all the (heathen) nations" (ἐσμικρύνθημεν παρὰ πάντα τὰ ἔθνη). For the verb, see Jer. xxix. 6 (מְעַט); 1 Chron. xvi. 19.

"O Lord" is δέσποτα (אדני), instead of the commoner κύριε. Comp. Gen. xv. 2, 8; Luke ii. 29.

be kept under . . . world.] "Are low (ταπεινοί) in all the earth." It is possible that Mem and Beth have been confused here, and בכל written for מכל. In that case the original text was, "and are lower than all the earth," which agrees better with the parallel clause. Comp., however, Judg. vi. 15 (LXX. Alex.). For ταπεινὸς, see Ps. xviii. 27; Isa. xiv. 32; 1 Sam. ii. 8 (דַּל=ταπεινὸς in Judg. vi. 15). Syr. W., "we are scattered;" Vulg. humiles; Syr. Hex. meskiné, "poor."

15. Neither is there at this time.] Comp. Hos. iii. 4: "For the children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without a Maççebah (sacred pillar), and without an Ephod and Teraphim." Also 2 Chron. xv. 3; Isa. iii. 1 sqq., ix. 15.

This verse bears on the question of date, inasmuch as the assertion that there was no prophet implies a time subsequent to that of the Exilic prophets. The author unconsciously transfers a feature of his own day to that of Daniel. On the other hand, the suspension of the sacrificial rites is in keeping with the supposition that at the time of composition the Temple lay in ruins.

sacrifice or oblation.] The Gk. terms θυσία (זבח, "peace offering") and προσφορὰ (מנחה. "meat offering") are thus associated in Ps. xl. 6: "Sacrifice and meat offering thou wouldest not."

or place to sacrifice . . . and to find mercy.] Because "in Jerusalem was the place (מקום) where men ought to worship." Cf. 2 Chron. vi. 20; 1 Chron. xxii. 1; 2 Chron. vii. 12; Deut. xii. 5 sq. The term rendered "to sacrifice" is καρπῶσαι, which in Attic Gk. means "to bear fruit," "to crop land," "to enjoy the fruits or interest" of a thing or a sum of money. Here, as in Lev. ii. 11, it denotes "to offer a meat offering," and represents the Heb. אִשֶּׁה, "a fire offering" (=κάρπωμα, Lev. ii. 9, 10 et al.). Syr. W., "nor a place where we may offer sweet spices and a sacrifice;" Syro-Hex., "a place to offer fruits;" so Ethiop. For "find mercy"—εὑρεῖν ἔλεος—comp. Gen. xix. 19; Num. xi. 15 (Heb. חֵן, gratia).

16. contrite heart.] Gk. "contrite soul." Cf. Isa. lxi. 1; Ps. xxxiv. 18, cxlvii. 3. In-

Digitized by Microsoft®

17 Like as in the burnt offerings of rams and bullocks, and like as in ten thousands of fat lambs: ƒso let our sacrifice be in thy sight this day, and grant that we may wholly go after thee: for ɡthey shall not be confounded that put their trust in thee.

ƒ Ps. 51. 17.

ɡ Ps. 25, 2, 3.

18 And now we follow thee with all our heart, we fear thee, and seek thy face.

19 Put us not to shame: but deal with us after thy lovingkindness, and according to the multitude of thy mercies.

20 Deliver us also according to thy marvellous works, and give glory to thy name, O Lord: and let all them that do thy servants hurt be ashamed;

21 And let them be confounded stead of πνεύματι τεταπεινωμένῳ, Theod. gives πνεύμ. ταπεινώσεως. The former is preferable. Cf. Ps. li. 18: πνεῦμα—συντετριμμένον—καρδίαν συντετρ. καὶ τεταπεινωμένην.

17. the burnt offerings.] Some MSS. of Theod., ὁλοκαυτώσει, sing.; Fritzsche, ὁλοκαυτώμασι, "burnt offerings;" so Syr. Hex. With the general sentiment here, compare Ps. cxli. 2: "Let my prayer be set forth before thee as incense, and the lifting up of my hands as the evening sacrifice." Also Ps. li. 16, 17. Instead of "let us be accepted," Syr. W. has: "we have drawn near to the burning of the fire, praying that the offering of our soul to-day be more than bullocks and rams and many fat lambs."

and grant that we may wholly go after thee.] LXX. καὶ ἐξιλάσαι ὄπισθέν σου. Theod. καὶ ἐκτελέσαι (al. ἐκτελείσθω) ὄπισθέν σου. Fritzsche conjectures καὶ ἡ ἐξίλασις ἔμπροσθέν σου, "and our propitiation before thee," which satisfies the sense and parallelism. Eichhorn truly observes that the whole verse is so obscure and unintelligible, that no original Greek writer could have penned it.

It is likely that the Hebrew כָּלִיל, "whole," "perfect," and then "whole offering," ὁλοκαύτωμα, has been confused with the verb כָּלָה, "to finish." See Lev. vi. 15 sq.; Ezek. xvi. 14; xxvii. 4, 11. Walton's Syriac has, "And let not thy servants be ashamed;" but the Syro-Hexaplar agrees with LXX., and notes the reading of Theod. The Ethiopic gives the verse thus: "As the sacrifice of rams and bulls, and as thousands, etc., so be our sacrifice before thee to-day, and let it be perfect with thee" (i.e. in thy sight).

they shall not be confounded.] Lit., "there shall not be [Fritzsche, "there is not"] shame (i.e., disappointment) to them that put," &c. Cf. Ps. xxv. 2, 3, xxxi. 1; Rom. ix. 33. The present tense is preferable, because the clause alleges a fact of general experience: cf. v. 18. So Syro-Hex.

19. lovingkindness.] The Greek is ἐπιείκεια, which, as a human quality, Mr. Matthew Arnold would call "sweet reasonableness." In Ps. lxxxvi. 5 the adjective ἐπιεικὴς renders a Heb. term which means "placable," "forgiving," and is followed immediately by πολυέλεος, "merciful." So here "forgivingness" is the meaning (cf. Baruch ii. 21), and the term is followed by τὸ πλῆθος τοῦ ἐλέους σου, which is a substantival expression corresponding to πολυέλεος.

20. thy marvellous works.] Or, "miracles;" τὰ θαυμάσια σου, נִפְלְאֹתֶיךָ: Ps. ix. 1, and often. Cf. Exod. iii. 20. It should be remembered that what we call "operations of Nature" were, to the Old Testament mind, "marvellous works (or miracles) of Iahweh;" a view which is at once less "scientific" and more profoundly true than ours.

give glory to thy name.] Ps. xxix. 1, 2; cxv. 1. Cf. also John xii. 28.

let all them that do thy servants hurt be ashamed.] Literally, "Let all them that shew evil things to thy servants be turned about" (or, "put to shame," Ael. 'V. H.' iii. 17; or "feel shame," 2 Thess. iii. 14; Titus ii. 8: see Liddell and Scott, s.v. ἐντρέπω. The verb renders two Heb. synonyms denoting "shame:" see Ps. xxxv. 4, 26; and also a term meaning "was humbled," or "humbled oneself:" Judges iii. 30; 2 Chron. xii. 7).

Those who argue for a "Chaldee" original have supposed that οἱ ἐνδεικνύμενοι (κακὰ) represents מַחְמִין or מַרְאִין. But the Greek is not peculiar. An exact parallel occurs in the LXX. of Gen. l. 15, 17, where the Heb. גמל רעה is rendered κακὰ ἐνδείκνυσθαί τινι. Syr. W.: "think evil things against." Syr. Hex.: "shew in (against) thy servants evil things" (dam'ḫawwên b' 'abdê dîlôk bišôthô).

21. in all their power and might.] The Gk. ἀπὸ πάσης δυναστείας, in connexion with καταισχυνθείησαν, can only mean, "Let them be ashamed of all (their) power" (warlike prowess, גבורה), as of a thing which had deceived their expectations. See the same phrase and construction, Jer. ii. 36, "Thou shalt be ashamed of Egypt, as thou wast ashamed of Assyria." Also Ps. cxix. 16. Ethiopic: "in all their tyranny" (Amos iii. 9).

Digitized by Microsoft®

‖ Or, by thy power and might.

‖ Or, naphtha, which is a certain kind of fat and chalky clay, Plin. lib. 2. cap. 105.

‖ Or, cool.

‖ in all their power and might, and let their strength be broken;

22 And let them know that thou art Lord, the only God, and glorious over the whole world.

23 ¶ And the king's servants, that put them in, ceased not to make the oven hot with ‖ rosin, pitch, tow, and small wood;

24 So that the flame streamed forth above the furnace forty and nine cubits.

25 And it passed through, and burned those Chaldeans it found about the furnace.

26 But the angel of the Lord came down into the oven together with Azarias and his fellows, and smote the flame of the fire out of the oven;

27 And made the midst of the furnace as it had been a ‖ moist whistling wind, so that the fire touched them not at all, neither hurt nor troubled them.

22. And let them know.] Fritzsche omits καί. Some MSS. of Theod. give it, and it accords better with Hebrew style to retain it. So Walton's Syr.

thou art Lord, the only God.] Or, "thou art alone the Lord God"—σὺ εἶ μόνος κύριος ὁ θεός (Fritzsche). But Theod. σὺ εἶ κύριος (ὁ, III., XII. al.) θεὸς μόνος, "thou art the Lord God alone." Cf. 2 Kings xix. 19, "All the kingdoms of the earth shall know that σὺ (εἶ) κύριος ὁ θεὸς μόνος." The article before θεὸς is not in the Hebrew.

world.] ἡ οἰκουμένη, sc. γῆ. So Syro-Hex. Sometimes the Greek term renders אֶרֶץ, "earth," "land," "country," e.g. Isa. x. 23; but more often תֵּבֵל, terra fertilis et habitata, and then generally orbis terrarum (Prov. viii. 31). See Delitzsch ad Ps. xc. 2. Walton's Syr., "in all thy works."

23. And the king's servants.] The A.V. follows the text of Theodotion, which contracts the verse considerably. Fritzsche gives the full reading: "And when they had cast the three all at once into the furnace, and the furnace was red-hot (διάπυρος), according to the heating of it seven times as much;—and when they had cast them in, they who cast them in were above them (ὑπεράνω αὐτῶν, Ezek. x. 19; xi. 22), while the others were kindling underneath them (ὑπέκαιον ὑποκάτωθεν αὐτῶν: see Ezek. xxiv. 5) naphtha, and tow, and pitch, and brushwood." So Syro-Hex.

"Naphtha" is appropriately mentioned, as it was a natural product of Babylonia (Dioscor. i. 101). The word is of Persian origin (naft), and denotes a clear rock-oil or petroleum, used by the Jews for lighting purposes. See Targum Jerus. on Exod. xiv. 24: "And he cast upon them naphtha (נַפְטָא) and fire and hail stones." The term is also Talmudic (נֶפֶט): Shabb. 24 b, line 19. See also Plin. xxxv. 15; ii. 105. Syr. Hex. id.

"Tow"—Fritzsche στυπίον, Theod. στιππόν, but more correctly στυππεῖον, according to inscriptions—is the Latin stuppa. Judges xvi. 9; Isa. i. 31=נְעֹרֶת, stuppa.

"Smallwood," or brushwood, twigs, κλήματις, is properly "vine-twigs:" cf. Thucyd. vii. 53 (plur.). Isa. xviii. 5 = נְטִישׁוֹת, palmites.

"Pitch," πίσσα, is the Heb. זֶפֶת (Isa. xxxiv. 9).

24. So that the flame streamed forth.] Rather, "and the flame was spreading about" (διεχείτο: used of a disease, Lev. xiii. 22 = פָּשְׂתָה, diffudit se. Cf. Thucyd. ii. 75: ὅπως μὴ διαχέοιτο ἐπὶ πολὺ τὸ χῶμα). Syro-Hex. mešṭaff"ā, "poured out;" but Walton, "And the flame of the fire made a noise, and rose above the furnace."

forty and nine cubits.] "Up to, as far as (ἐπὶ), forty-nine cubits." Not about (περὶ, ἀμφὶ), as Bissell translates, with a false reference to Hdt. iv. 190 (181?). As regards the number, it was natural to use a multiple of the sacred number 7 (cf. Dan. ix. 25; x. 2, 13; Lev. xxv. 8); and definite numbers are often assigned in the O.T., according to the vividness of Eastern style, where we should use an indefinite expression of quantity or extent.

25. And it passed through.] Gen. xii. 6 (διῴδευσε, Theod.). Fritzsche edits διεξῴδευσεν, "it escaped," "made its way out." But the other is the usual word in the LXX. Syro-Hex., "it came forth."

26. the angel of the Lord.] As ἄγγελος κυρίου represents מַלְאַךְ יְהוָה, this is right. Walton's Syriac has "the angel of dew:" cf. the next verse.

came down into . . . together with.] Συγκατέβη . . . ἅμα. The verb occurs Ps. xlix. 17, as rendering of Heb. יֵרֵד אַחֲרָיו, "his wealth shall not descend (into the grave) after him." Cf. also Wisd. x. 14.

Azarias and his fellows.] The well-known idiom οἱ περὶ τὸν Ἀζαρίαν: cf. Ezek. xxxviii. 6, 9; xxxix. 4. Syr. W. gives the three names; Syr. H., "those of the house of Azariah."

smote.] Lit., "shook out." This verb (ἐκτινάσσω) renders נער in Exod. xiv. 27, and other places. Walton's Syr., "thrust," "drove;" Syro-Hex., "shook" (Acts xviii. 6).

27. a moist whistling wind.] Lit., "a

Digitized by Microsoft®

28 Then the three, as out of one mouth, praised, glorified, and blessed, God in the furnace, saying,

29 Blessed art thou, O Lord God of our fathers: and to be praised and exalted above all for ever.

30 And blessed is thy glorious and holy name: and to be praised and exalted above all for ever.

31 Blessed art thou in the temple of thine holy glory: and to be praised and glorified above all for ever.

32 Blessed art thou that beholdest the depths, and sittest upon the cherubims: and to be praised and exalted above all for ever.

33 Blessed art thou on the glorious throne of thy kingdom: and to be praised and glorified above all for ever.

34 Blessed art thou in the firmament of heaven: and above all to be praised and glorified for ever.

35 [h] O all ye works of the Lord, bless ye the Lord: praise and ‖exalt him above all for ever.

36 [i] O ye heavens, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

[h] Ps. 103. 22.
‖ Or, highly exalt: and so in the rest.
[i] Ps. 148. 4.

wind of dew" (i.e. "a dewy wind;" or, "a dew-laden wind," i.e. a damp rainy wind, πνεῦμα νότιον), "whistling continually" (διασυρίζον). The phrase πνεῦμα συρίζον occurs Wisd. xvii. 17. The Heb. might be רוּחַ טַל יִשְׁרֵקֶת; so Syro-Hex. Dew is mentioned Dan. iv. 15, 23, 25, 33; v. 21. Cf. also Ecclus. xviii. 16: "Shall not the dew assuage the heat?" and xliii. 22.

28. Then.] So Theod. (τότε). But Fritzsche, ἀναλαβόντες δέ, "But taking up the discourse;" so Syro-Hex., "answered:" cf. Num. xxiv. 2, 15. The following verbs are all imperfects: "were praising" or "began to praise," &c. (ὕμνουν).

29. exalted above all.] Headed: "IX. Prayer of the 3 Children" in the Ethiopic Psalter. The Greek word ὑπερυψόω is used in Dan. iv. 34 in connexion with αἰνῶ. The Syr. is ܡܪܘܡܝܢ, which suggests Heb. מְרוֹמִם, as in Neh. ix. 5. In Syr. W. vv. 29–34 have the same refrain: Laudatus tu et exaltatus in saeculum! So probably the Hebrew.

30. thy glorious and holy name.] Lit., "the holy name of thy glory;" a Hebraism.

31. the temple of thine holy glory.] A phrase not found in the Hebrew O. T. The reference is probably to the heavenly Temple: Hab. ii. 20; Ps. xi. 4; Isa. vi. 1. lxvi. 1. There is thus no inconsistency between this verse and v. 14 sq. as some have supposed (vide Introd.). Syr. W., "the temple of thine holiness," which may be original.

"To be praised" is here ὑπερυμνητός. Neither this term, nor ὑπερένδοξος which follows it, nor ὑπεραινετὸς in the last verse, is met with elsewhere in the LXX. (Trommius.)

32, 33. Fritzsche transposes these two verses, after LXX., Syr. H., Vulg.

32. For "depths" (ἄβυσσοι = תְּהוֹמוֹת; so the Syriac texts) see Ps. xxxiii. 7; lxxvii. 16. In classical Gk. the word is an adjective, meaning "bottomless," and then "boundless," "immense," in a general sense. In the LXX. ἡ ἄβυσσος = "the ocean," and this accords with the Sumerian and Assyrian ABZU, apsû, which denotes the ocean flowing round the earth and under the earth, which, according to the Babylonian cosmogony, was the sozer (i.e. father) of all things. In Rev. ix. 1, ἡ ἄβυσσος is the pit of hell.

and sittest upon the cherubims.] See Isa. xxxvii. 16; Ps. lxxx. 1.

33. the glorious throne of thy kingdom.] Lit., "the throne of the glory of thy kingdom." Fritzsche omits δόξης, which is found in some MSS. of Theod. Syr. W. omits; Syr. H. marks it with an asterisk. Cf. 1 Sam. ii. 8; 2 Sam. vii. 13; Jer. xiv. 21.

to be praised and glorified above all.] Fritzsche, ὑμνητὸς καὶ ὑπερυψούμενος; Theod., ὑπερυμνητὸς καὶ ὑπερυμνούμενος. The last word is probably due to a transcriber's error.

34. in the firmament of heaven.] So Theod. Fritzsche omits "of heaven;" but cf. Gen. i. 6. It is probably original.

35. The extract in our Prayer-book called the Benedicite, appointed to be sung as an alternative to the Te Deum, begins with this verse, and ends with the corresponding part of v. 65. It is headed, as a separate piece, in the Ethiopic Psalter: "X. Where Hananiah, Azariah and Mishael blessed." Cf. Ps. ciii. 22. The "works of the Lord" are the entire creation, visible and invisible, as appears from the subsequent enumeration of them. Cf. in general Pss. civ., cxlviii.

The refrain of this and the following verses, "praise and exalt him above all for ever"—or, as the P.B. gives it, "Praise him and magnify him for ever"—might be הַלְלֻהוּ וְרוֹמְמֻהוּ לָעוֹלָמִים. Cf. Dan. ii. 4; Ps. lxxvii. 7.

36. O ye heavens.] Syr. W. adds "of the Lord." Fritzsche puts the next verse before

Digitized by Microsoft®

37 [k] O ye angels of the Lord, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

38 [l] O all ye waters that be above the heaven, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

39 O all ye powers of the Lord, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

40 [m] O ye sun and moon, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

[k] Ps. 148. 2.
[l] Ps. 148. 4.
[m] Ps. 148. 3.

this one, and so the Prayer-book version. The order of the text is that of Theod., Syr., Old Lat. and Vulg. The general term "heavens" naturally precedes, as including the special angels. Moreover, the "works of the Lord" are subdivided into celestial and terrestrial, the former category covering everything from v. 36 to v. 51. Fritzsche therefore is wrong in stating that "By οὐρανοὶ, in contrast with ὕδατα, v. 38, only the visible arch of heaven [das Gewölbe] is meant, and that for that reason the angels are named first." Οὐρανοὶ—שָׁמַיִם—is a term including both the material and the spiritual heavens. Indeed the distinction is hardly made by Hebrew thought. In Ps. cxlviii. 1, 2, we have the same order as here,—first the heavens, then the angels; cf. Ps. ciii. 19, 20. But cp. also Ps. cxlviii. 4. The contemplation of the heavens is a natural source of elevated thought. And this is not less the case now when so much more is known about their mechanical structure and laws than it was in those ancient times, when they and all that they contained were regarded as intrinsically divine. Kant's saying about "the starry heavens above and the moral law within" has become a commonplace. "The philosopher who knows most, whether in the courses of the stars, or in the unfolding of the embryonic point, or in any other department of knowledge, is of all others in a position to feel in the highest degree the greatness of that which lies behind the phenomenal. The emotions which are considered more distinctly religious cannot be rendered less active by a higher intellectual appreciation of the greatness of their object." (Wm. Huggins, F.R.S., Times, Jan. 19, 1884.) For the later Jewish theory about the seven heavens and their contents, see Chagigah, 12 B.

37. O ye angels.] The language of this hymn does not go beyond that of the Hebrew psalms within the Canon, as may be seen by referring to the parallels (Ps. ciii. 20; cxlviii. 2; lxxviii. 25; civ. 4). There is therefore no need to discuss the doctrine of angels here. See the story quoted in the Introd. from Pesachim, 118 A sq. Gabriel, as the Prince of Fire, reminds us of Gibil, the ancient Babylonian genius or spirit of fire.

38. ye waters that be above the heaven.] The upper deep or celestial ocean, whose waters pour down in rain when "the floodgates of heaven are opened:" see Gen. i. 7, vii. 11; Isa. xxiv. 18. This ancient Semitic conception, so faithfully reflecting the simplicity with which primitive man regarded the phenomena of the natural world, will be a "rock of offence" to none, except to those who stickle for "the scientific accuracy of the Bible," and thereby evince a perversity of thought hard to be understood by any who perceive the glaring anachronism of the phrase.

39. O all ye powers of the Lord.] Δύναμις often represents חַיִל, vis, robur, virtus, copia; but very often also צָבָא, militia, exercitus, especially in the phrase (ὁ) κύριος τῶν δυνάμεων, "the Lord of hosts." That the latter is the case here is plain from the archetypal passage, Ps. ciii. 21: εὐλογεῖτε τὸν κύριον πᾶσαι αἱ δυνάμεις αὐτοῦ; Heb. כל צבאיו. What these powers are is defined in the following verses, viz. the principal objects, processes, and phenomena of the natural world, especially the sun, moon, and stars. The last were pre-eminently "the host of heaven." Cf. Gen. ii. 1; Ps. xxxiii. 6; Isa. xxxiv. 4; Eph. i. 21; Col. i. 16; 1 Peter iii. 22. Fritzsche explains "the mighty denizens of heaven," "the celestial powers in general." In Syr. W. this verse precedes v. 38.

40. O ye sun and moon.] Eichhorn and others since have objected that the language of this hymn is inappropriate to its alleged occasion. We may, however, observe an ideal fitness here and elsewhere. For the Three Holy Children are martyrs, and the idolatry against which they bear their testimony of suffering is a worship of the powers of nature. Anu[m], the spirit of heaven; Êa, the spirit of earth; the Igigi or good angels, and the Annunnaki or evil angels; Sin, the moon-god, and Shamash, the sun-god; Merodach (Jupiter), Dilpad (Venus), Kaiwânu (Saturn), and the other heavenly bodies; as well as Rimmon, the god of the air, Gibil (fire), and other natural objects and processes, were worshipped in Babylon. Above all these the hymn exalts Iahweh, their Creator.

Here, as in Ps. cxlviii. 3, the order of the words is noticeable. The Assyrian inscriptions reverse it, reading Sin, Shamash, &c., in their lists of gods. The moon was the more important deity in Semitic mythology. The verse is starred as spurious in Syro-Hex.,

Digitized by Microsoft®

41 [n] O ye stars of heaven, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

42 O every shower and dew, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

43 [o] O all ye winds, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

44 [p] O ye fire and heat, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

45 O ye winter and summer, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

46 O ye dews and storms of snow, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

[n] Ps. 148. 3. [o] Ps. 148. 8. [p] Ps. 148. 8.

whence it would appear to be an addition of Theodotion's. But the sun and moon would hardly be omitted where the stars are mentioned (see the parallel passage cited above); and the presence of the verse in the Greek MS. favours its genuineness.

41. O ye stars.] The worship of the stars, so often denounced in the O.T. (cf. 2 Kings xvii. 16, xxi. 3; Deut. iv. 19; Isa. xiv. 13, xxiv. 21–23), was widespread among the primitive Semites. A star was the character representing the word ilu, "god," in the old Babylonian writing; and star-worship was practised among the Sabeans of S. Arabia, as well as in the countries beyond the Euphrates. In an Assyrian mythological inscription the stars are called "the flock of Anu;" and in another (the Fifth Tablet of the Creation Series), it is said that the Creator "constructed the stations of the great gods," i.e. the positions of the stars in heaven.

42. O every shower and dew.] See Deut. xxxii. 2, where ὄμβρος = יְשָׁעִרִים, "showers." The reference of this verse and the following reminds us that, according to the preceding narrative, the Angel of Iahweh "made the midst of the furnace as it had been a whistling wind of dew." Rain and dew, moreover, here have that prominence which naturally belongs to them in the parched East. Some scholars have even supposed that the sacred name of Iahweh originally meant, not "He who becomes" or "causes to become," but "He who causes (the rain) to fall" upon the thirsty soil. At all events, the term Shaddai, rendered "Almighty" in our Bibles, may fairly be connected with the roots 'āshad, shādāh (effudit), and be explained "He who pours forth" the rain, and waters the earth (Arab. thadā, madefecit, rigavit): cf. Ps. civ. 3, 13; Joel ii. 23.

43, 44. Instead of "O all ye winds," Syr. W. has "O ye waters and wind." See Ps. cxlvii. 18, "He causeth his wind to blow, and the waters flow;" Ps. cxlviii. 8, "Fire and hail, snow and vapour, stormy wind fulfilling his word;" and Ps. civ. 3, 4, "Who appointeth clouds for his chariot, who walketh on the wings of the wind; who maketh his angels winds, his ministers flaming fire." Cf. also Gen. viii. 22 (καῦμα = חֹם. So Syr. here); Isa. xxxiii. 14; Deut. iv. 24; Exod. iii. 2, xix. 18, xiii. 21; Amos v. 6; Dan. vii. 9; Ps. xviii. 12–14. From these and other passages it will be seen that fire was first the visible element in Theophanies, and then the standing symbol of the Divine splendour and purity.

45. winter and summer.] I.e., ψῦχος καὶ καύσων (al. καῦμα), the reading of Theod. Καύσων is sun or summer heat: Isa. xlix. 10; Matt. xx. 12. Sometimes it is the hot east wind: Hos. xii. 1; xiii. 15. Fritzsche edits here: ῥίγος (? ῥῖγος) καὶ ψῦχος, "O ye frost and cold." So Syr. H.; but Syr. W., "O ye souls of the righteous." In his commentary he remarks: "The text and yet more the arrangement of these verses (45–51) apud Theod. is unsettled. The MSS. which directly follow the LXX. deserve no consideration. After the πῦρ καὶ καῦμα of verse 43 (44) the LXX. suitably wrote ῥίγος καὶ ψῦχος, vers. 44 (45); but the objection is that πάγοι καὶ ψῦχος, 'frosts and cold,' follows as verse 46 (47) in the LXX. To judge by the evidence in Holmes and Parsons' work, verse 46 of the LXX. was struck out, and πῦρ καὶ καῦμα was altered into ψῦχος καὶ καῦμα (others better, καύσων; 147, 233, καῦσος). Whereas then, some good witnesses, like the Old Lat., place the verse after verse 43, others, as the Vatic. LXX., place it after verse 47. Internal probability favours the latter arrangement, as the alteration of ῥίγος καὶ ψῦχος into ψῦχος καὶ καύσων would have been preposterous; and, externally, the fact that some MSS. (e.g. 33) apparently give only πάγος καὶ ψῦχος (after the LXX.), but placed after verse 47. With 'Light and darkness,' verse 47, 'cold and (sun) heat' might undoubtedly be connected."

46. dews and storms of snow.] Gk. δρόσοι καὶ νιφετοί. Theod. omits this verse (so Syr. W.), and also that which follows it in Fritzsche's edition: εὐλογεῖτε πάγοι καὶ ψῦχος τὸν κύριον κ.τ.λ. (vid. last note). Fritzsche remarks: "Theodotion purposely omitted εὐλογεῖτε δρόσοι καὶ νιφετοὶ κ.τ.λ. after verse 43 (44); for the MSS. which give it are evidently interpolated from the LXX. Similarly he passed over εὐλογεῖτε πάγοι καὶ ψῦχος κ.τ.λ., vers. 46

Digitized by Microsoft®

47 O ye nights and days, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

48 O ye light and darkness, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

49 O ye ice and cold, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

50 O ye frost and snow, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

51 O ye lightnings and clouds, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

52 O let the earth bless the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

(47), and then put verse 47 (50) εὐλ. πάχναι καὶ χιόνες κ.τ.λ. after εὐλ. ψῦχος καὶ καύσων κ.τ.λ. (his verse 46)."

For the collocation of "dew and snow-storm," see LXX. Deut. xxxii. 2; Mic. v. 7 (Theod.). The Heb. word rendered νιφετὸς is in both cases רְבִיבִים, "raindrops," "rains." The mention of "dew" twice, first with "shower" (v. 42) and then with "snow-storms," is curious. Perhaps it represents some other Heb. word here, as in Prov. xxvi. 1, where the LXX. renders שֶׁלֶג, "snow," by δρόσος.

47. O ye nights and days.] The order is that observed in the first cosmogony (Gen. i.–ii. 3). The Hebrews, as is well known, reckoned their day from evening to evening.

48. O ye light and darkness.] It is not clear from the Heb. of Gen. i. 2 whether darkness is there regarded as prior to creation or as itself a product of the Divine activity. Yet v. 5, where Elohim gives a name to the darkness, seems to imply much what the great Prophet of the Captivity meant, when he said, "I form the light and create darkness" (Isa. xlv. 7). Light and darkness are often symbolical of the two aspects of God. The former sets forth the Divine as revealing itself to the faith of humanity; the latter, as hiding itself in impenetrable secrecy from all attempts to fathom its transcendent nature.

49, 50. O ye ice and cold . . . ye frost and snow.] See notes on vv. 45, 46. The P.B. has: "O ye frost and cold . . . O ye ice and snow." The Greek is: "O ye frosts (πάγοι) and cold . . . O ye hoar frosts (πάχναι) and snows." Syr. W., "O ye cold and heat"—"summer and winter"; Syr. H. omits.

Dr. Child Chaplin well observes that "the services of frost and snow in Nature's economy are apt to be overlooked," owing to their more familiar associations with physical suffering. Here "they are dwelt upon as illustrations not only of Power, but also of Goodness and Wisdom." The Three Children might be supposed to remember that the great stream of "the Euphrates was still copiously fed from its snowy reservoirs on the Armenian mountains," even amid the parching heats of an Eastern summer. The beauty of ice and snow, as seen in Alpine and in Arctic regions; the utility of that cold which "brings sleep to the vegetable world, and prepares it by a period of rest to burst forth with fresh vigour in the spring,"—of those frosts which crumble the hard clods and mellow the soil and check the exuberance of insect life, and of those deep snows which shelter the tender plants from the cold which would kill them,—is well set forth and expanded in his interesting work. The Book of Job supplies instances of the wonder and admiration excited by the beauty of the phenomena of ice and snow (xxxvii. 6; xxxviii. 29).

51. O ye lightnings and clouds.] In connexion with lightning, we naturally think of thunder-clouds. These grand and awful phenomena of nature have been associated with the idea of Theophanies from time immemorial. The black train of storm-clouds sweeping across the sky appears to have suggested the poetic conception of the cherub as the war-horse or war-chariot of Iahweh: see Ps. xviii. 10; Hab. iii. 8; and esp. Isa. xix. 1, "Behold, Iahweh rideth upon a swift cloud." The lightnings were His arrows, or the shining lance which He hurled at His enemies (Hab. iii. 11; Ps. xviii. 14). The thunder was His terrible voice, striking the world with dismay (Ps. xviii. 13; Ps. xxix. passim). How inveterate this idea was among the Jewish people may be seen from the fact that down to the latest times of Rabbinism, the mysterious Bath Qôl, or voice from heaven, was believed to be final arbiter of disputed questions.

52. O let the earth bless the Lord.] Having appealed to the principal phenomena of the heavens, the Psalmist now turns to the earth, and, after a general appeal, makes successive mention of each of its more obvious features and denizens. In order to realize how fully the earth does evermore witness to the glory of God, we may recall, with Dr. Child Chaplin, that wealth of natural beauty which clothes its varied surface, and constitutes so appropriate a covering for the priceless treasures hidden in its bosom. We may consider the earth as the storehouse

Digitized by Microsoft®

q Ps. 148. 9

53 qO ye mountains and little hills, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

54 O all ye things that grow on the earth, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

55 O ye fountains, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

56 O ye seas and rivers, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

57 O ye whales, and all that move in the waters, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

58 r O all ye fowls of the ‖air, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

r Ps. 148. 10. ‖ Gr. heaven.

whence all our material and many of our mental and spiritual wants are supplied; and as presenting an overwhelming abundance of riches, in which nothing is superfluous, everything precious, when once we have mastered the secret of its application. We may see in the distribution of land and water, the arrangement and dislocation of strata, and other geological characteristics, no ambiguous proofs that long before man's appearance on the scene, his heavenly Father was providing for his well-being in what was to be his earthly home. "God has encompassed us on every side with symbols that recall Him to our thoughts, and it is habitual neglect alone which makes them profitless."

53. O ye mountains and little hills.] Gk. ὄρη καὶ βουνοί. As to the latter word, Liddell and Scott remark that it is probably a Cyrenaic word (see Hdt. iv. 158, 199), adopted by Aeschylos in Sicily, and frequent afterwards. Fritzsche refers to Sturz, 'De Dial. Maced. et Alex.,' p. 153 sq. In LXX. it commonly renders Heb. גִּבְעָה, collis: Exod. xvii. 9, 10. Hills and mountains are natural types of strength and permanence. In the flat plains of Babylonia the Jewish exiles might fondly remember the Hermons and Carmel and "the hills standing about Jerusalem;" and the thought of Him whose "righteousness standeth as the strong mountains" would be their comfort in the hour of despondency. "In sublimity," writes Dr. Child Chaplin, "mountains rank with the ocean and the clouds. . . . On the one hand, their height, their mass, and the deep planting of their roots in the earth,—on the other, the beauty which rests upon their varied outlines, which clothes their sides and precipices, and lies among their valleys and deep glens, —mark them out not only as the most conspicuous, but also as among the most attractive objects in the world." In them, too, beauty and utility coincide. They play an indispensable part in the economy of Nature. "They act as loadstones to the clouds, and draw down from them the fertilising rain."

54. O all ye things that grow on the earth.] So Syr. H.; Syr. W., "all ye herbs of the earth." Theod., "in the earth." In the Prayer-book it is: "O all ye green things upon the earth." "Like the 'voices of the stars,' the green things upon the earth are truly a fair Hymn of Praise written all over the land, not in dull words, but in living characters of beauty." (Dr. Child Chaplin.) Syr. W. adds: "O all ye things that sprout upon the earth," &c. After this follow: "O ye seas and rivers" —"O ye sources and all fountains"—"O ye fishes and all that creep in the waters."

55. O ye fountains.] Prayer-book: "O ye wells." Αἱ πηγαὶ, "fountains" or "springs," is the Heb. מַעְיָן or עַיִן, rather than בְּאֵר "well" (φρέαρ). Cod. Chisian. reads εὐλογεῖτε ὄμβροι καὶ αἱ πηγαὶ, "O ye rains (or rain-storms) and fountains." Syr. H. obelizes the added words as Theodotion's. Fritzsche is wrong in stating that Syr. W. also contains them. Theod. transposes vv. 55, 56.

56. O ye seas and rivers.] Some copies of Theod. have "sea" (θάλασσα). Fritzsche observes that it is unlikely that Theod. changed θάλασσαι into the sing., as the former reading of his text is very well attested by some MSS., and the Old Lat., Vulg., Syr. W., and Arab. versions. Besides, the plur. agrees better with ποταμοί. If not accidental, the variant is due to the comparative rarity of the plural form (cf. Gen. i. 10).

57. O ye whales, and all that move in the waters.] κήτη, Old Lat. and Vulg. cete, denotes the larger denizens of the sea in general: the monsters of the deep. It represents Heb. תַּנִּינִים, Gen. i. 21; דָּג, "fish," Jonah ii. 1, 11; and לִוְיָתָן (μέγα κῆτος), Job iii. 8. Cf. our scientific term Cetacea. For πάντα τὰ κινούμενα, cf. Gen. vii. 14, ix. 2; Lev. xi. 46.

58. O all ye fowls of the air.] πάντα τὰ πετεινὰ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, "all ye birds of the heaven" (Gen. ii. 19, 20). "Air" would be expressed in Heb. by שְׁמַיִם, "heavens." The Rabbinic adopts the Greek ἀήρ, in the form אויר. Πάντα is wanting in Syr. H., 147, and Old Lat. With this verse and the next cf. Ps. cxlviii. 10. The animate creation is now called upon to take its part in the great chorus of praise. It is observable that the order is the same as in Gen. i. 20–26: fish, birds, beasts, men.

Digitized by Microsoft®

59 [s]O all ye beasts and cattle, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

60 O ye children of men, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

61 O Israel, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

62 [t]O ye priests of the Lord, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

63 O ye servants of the Lord, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

64 O ye spirits and souls of the righteous, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

65 O ye ‖holy and humble men of heart, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever.

66 O Ananias, Azarias, and Misael, bless the Lord: praise and

[s] Ps. 148. 10.

[t] Ps. 134. 1.

‖ Or, saints.

59. beasts and cattle.] I.e., wild beasts, τὰ θηρία, the "beasts of the field," חַיַּת הַשָּׂדֶה, Lev. xxvi. 22, and domestic animals, τὰ κτήνη, including both jumenta (Old Lat.) and pecora (Vulg.); Heb. בְּהֵמָה (Gen. i. 25; Ps. cxlviii. 10). So Syr. W.

Some MSS., e.g. 36, 49, read πάντα before τὰ κτήνη instead of τὰ θηρία,—according to Fritzsche, improperly. But Ps. cxlviii. 10 has τὰ θηρία καὶ πάντα τὰ κτήνη. Syr. H. has "quadrupeds and wild beasts of the earth." Syr. W. adds: "O everything that creepeth upon the earth," &c.

60. O ye children of men.] I.e., בְּנֵי אָדָם, "sons of man" (Ps. xxxiii. 13; cvii. 8); the human race, human kind. The Gk. phrase occurs Mark iii. 28; Eph. iii. 5. There is a progress in vv. 60–62 from the lower to the higher rank of being, similar to that of the preceding verses.

62. O ye priests of the Lord.] After Israel, the chosen people, the priests or chosen representatives of that people are mentioned: just as in Pss. cxv. 9, 10; cxviii. 2, 3; cxxxv. 19, 20; in which passages the priests are addressed as the "house of Aaron." The passage Exod. xix. 6, "Ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, an holy nation," is sometimes alleged as if it contradicted the idea of any special priesthood exercised by a particular class of duly appointed persons. But what Israel collectively was to the peoples of the earth, that the Aaronic priesthood was intended to be to Israel. The two spheres of sacerdotal privilege do not clash, and are by no means incompatible with each other.

Fritzsche edits, "O ye priests," and in v. 63, "O ye servants," omitting "of the Lord," which Theod. adds, and which seems necessary to the sense: cf. Ps. cxiii. 1; cxv. 11; cxviii. 4; cxxxiv. 1; cxxxv. 1.

Syr. W. has: "O all ye of the house of Israel," &c.—"O all ye priests of the Lord," &c. Syr. H.: "O Israel, bless the Lord"—"O ye priests, bless the Lord."

63. O ye servants of the Lord.] Not worshippers in general, who are addressed in vv. 64, 65, but, as the priests have just been named, v. 62, the Levites or lower ministers of all classes, including the Nethinim or ἱερόδουλοι. See Ps. cxxxiv. 1, 2; cxxxv. 1, 2; 1 Chron. ix. 33.

64. O ye spirits and souls of the righteous.] Theodoret explained this as an appeal to the spirits in Paradise. But what precedes and follows forbids such a reference as incongruous. The righteous on earth are meant. By the terms "spirit," πνεῦμα, רוּחַ, spiritus, and "soul," ψυχὴ, נֶפֶשׁ, anima, the Bible indicates the higher and lower principles or elements of man's immaterial being. This contrast is presented, e.g., in 1 Thess. v. 23, where man's composite existence is analysed as a Trichotomy of body, soul, and spirit; and in Heb. iv. 12. In Gen. i. 20 we read: "And God said, Let the waters swarm with a swarm of living souls;" and again, v. 24, "Let the earth bring forth living souls after their kind;" cf. also Gen. ix. 10, 12, 15, 16, where "living creature" = Heb. "living soul." This shews that nephesh, ψυχὴ, includes the vegetive and sensitive (τὸ θρεπτικὸν . . . τὸ αἰσθητικόν), but not the reasonable soul (τὸ λογιστικὸν or νοητικόν).

65. O ye holy and humble men of heart.] The Gk. ὅσιοι καὶ ταπεινοὶ (τῇ most MSS. of Theod.) καρδίᾳ may better be rendered: "O ye pious and heart-humbled folk," or "O ye pious ones and broken in heart." The word ὅσιος is the regular LXX. equivalent for Heb. חָסִיד, "good," "pious" (Ps. iv. 3; xii. 1; cxlviii. 14). The חֲסִידִים or ὅσιοι were, as is well known, the patriotic and religious party of the times of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes. Syr. W.: "perfect," i.e. blameless.

Ταπεινοὺς τῷ πνεύματι occurs Ps. xxxiv. 18, as the rendering of Heb. "crushed in spirit," which is parallel to "broken in heart;" and the meaning, both there and here, is "heart-broken by the oppression of enemies." Thus the appeal is to the exiles in Babylonia (Grotius, Judaei deportati). Another sense of ταπεινὸς τῇ καρδίᾳ occurs Matt. xi. 29.

66. O Ananias, Azarias, and Misael.] The

Digitized by Microsoft®

exalt him above all for ever: for he hath delivered us from ‖hell, and saved us from the hand of death, and delivered us out of the midst of the furnace and burning flame: even out of the midst of the fire hath he delivered us.

‖ Or, the grave.

67 "O give thanks unto the Lord, " Ps. 136. because he is gracious: for his 1. mercy endureth for ever.

68 O all ye that worship the Lord, bless the God of gods, praise him, and give him thanks: for his mercy endureth for ever.

appeal to the three youthful martyrs is obviously suggested by the preceding appeal to "the pious and broken in heart," or the Chasîdîm in general, the pious patriots who clung to their ancestral manners and worship in spite of tyrannical persecution. Of such the Three Children were bright examples.

As to their names, the first means "Iah bestoweth;" the second, "Iah helpeth;" and the third, מִישָׁאֵל, Mishael, "Who is what God is?" The Babylonian designations of the three youths have occasioned much perplexity. Perhaps instead of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, they should be (Amil)-Merodach [מרדך for שדרך], Sheshach [see Jer. xxv. 26; li. 41], and Abad-Nebo. In the first two we may suppose that by some accident of transcription מ and ש changed places. The difference between מרדך and שדרך is otherwise trifling. Sheshach (ששך) occurs as a nomen individui in the Talmud, e.g. Abod. Zarah, 65 A, line 20. Perhaps, however, the ending -ak points to Babylonian Âkû, the moon-god. Then Shadrach would mean "command of Aku;" and Meshach might be mê ša Âki, "water (i.e. son) of the moon-god."

for he hath delivered us from hell.] "From Hades," i.e. Sheol, the place of the departed. This clause, together with the rest of the verse, certainly wears the appearance of an interpolation intended to make what is in reality a kind of General Thanksgiving more applicable to the special circumstances of the Three Children. The psalm indeed may have been adapted to its present purpose, much as portions of several psalms are adapted in 1 Chron. xvi.

saved us from the hand of death.] Cf. "God will redeem my soul from the hand of the grave," Ps. xlix. 15; and Ps. lxxxix. 48; Hos. xiii. 14; Dan. vi. 27.

delivered us out of the midst.] Fritzsche edits: "rescued us out of the midst of burning flame." Some copies of Theod. have: "rescued us out of the midst of a furnace of burning flame." But the addition (καμίνου) is wanting in Old Lat., Vulg., Syr. W., XII., 23, Tur., and other versions and MSS.

even out of the midst of the fire.] Rather, "and out of the fire he ransomed us" (ἐλυτρώσατο). Theod. reads: "and out of the midst of fire he rescued us," repeating the word ἐῤῥύσατο from the last clause. Cf. Micah iv. 10. Syr. W.: "he brought us forth."

67. O give thanks.] A common liturgical formula, introduced here, as in 1 Chron. xvi. 34, to form a doxology. See Ps. cvi. 1; cvii. 1; cxviii. 1, 29; cxxxvi. 1. In the latter two psalms, as in 2 Chron. v. 13, it is ἀγαθὸς for χρηστός. The Heb. word is the same in all (טוֹב).

"Give thanks" is ἐξομολογεῖσθε, "confess ye fully;" cf. Matt. xi. 25. The LXX. use the verb to render Heb. הוֹדָה properly "to confess," e.g. sin (Ps. xxxii. 5); then "to acknowledge" God's favours, and "to praise" Him.

68. O all ye that worship the Lord.] Syr. H. marks "the Lord" as added by Theod. On this ground Fritzsche thinks the original text was simply πάντες οἱ σεβόμενοι, "O all ye that worship;" σεβόμενοι being used thus absolutely in later times, e.g. Wisd. xv. 6; and they who are meant are the worshippers of the one God in general; not proselytes in particular, as Theodoret suggests, and as the word is used in Acts xvii. 4, 17. But cf. Ps. cxv. 11; cxviii. 4; cxxxv. 20: "ye that fear the Lord," יראי יהוה. The verb ירא, "to fear," is rendered σέβομαι in Josh. iv. 24, xxii. 25; Job i. 9; Jonah i. 9. Moreover, the Greek verb occurred v. 7 supra with an object. We think, therefore, that τὸν κύριον should be retained.

bless the God of gods.] See Ps. cxxxvi. 2; Deut. x. 17; Dan. ii. 47, xi. 36. At the end of this verse the Vulgate has the note: "Hucusque in Hebraeo non habetur: et quae posuimus, de Theodotionis editione translata sunt."

Syr. W. adds to the last verse "Praise him and exalt him for ever," and concludes thus: "O all ye that fear God, bless the God of gods; praise him and exalt him for ever. O give thanks unto the Lord, because he is gracious, and his mercy endureth for ever." Syr. H. adds, doubtfully, "and unto an age of ages" (so Cod. Chisianus). The innovations on the simple and almost stereotyped formula of the original text are obvious.

Digitized by Microsoft®

ADDITIONS TO DANIEL.

II. THE HISTORY OF SUSANNA.

THIS piece is not so intimately connected with the canonical Book of Daniel as the preceding. In fact, it rather resembles one of the separate narratives which collectively make up the first six chapters of that work, in being a whole complete in itself. It is variously entitled 'Susanna' (Syro-Hex.) or 'History of Susanna' (so Syr. W_1.), or 'Daniel' (Syr. W_2., 'The Book of little Daniel; the History of Susanna'), or 'The Judgment of Daniel,' &c. The last title is certainly that which expresses the clearest insight into the real point of the story. So far as is known, its claims to credibility and consequently to canonicity were first called in question by the historian Julius Africanus, circ. 240 A.D., who expressed his doubts in a letter to Origen. Africanus roundly calls it a spurious portion (κίβδηλον μέρος) of the Book of Daniel; and while admitting its merit as a graceful story, he declares it to be a modern fabrication (χαριὲν μὲν ἄλλως σύγγραμμα, νεωτερικὸν δὲ καὶ πεπλασμένον).[1] Origen, after recourse to some Rabbis of his acquaintance, wrote an elaborate reply to the objections of his correspondent. The first of these was that vv. 45, 46, which represent Daniel as prophesying under direct inspiration (ἐπιπνοίᾳ προφητικῇ), are inconsistent with what is told of him elsewhere. By way of answer to this really pertinent objection, Origen simply refers to Heb. i. 1. Not less cavalierly, as Fritzsche observes, does he set aside the second objection, that the conviction of the Elders in vv. 52 sqq. has an element of the theatrical, by appealing to the Judgment of Solomon as related in 1 Kings iii. 16 sqq. But he is greatly perplexed by the remark that the paronomasiæ of vv. 55, 59, prove that the original text was Greek. He says: "As this passage gave me no rest, and I often dwelt upon it in doubt, I had recourse to not a few Hebrews with the question what was the πρῖνος called in their tongue, and what was the word for πρίζειν, and similarly how they expressed σχῖνος and σχίζειν." Some did not know the Greek terms, but asked to be shewn the trees, which Origen accordingly pointed out, but to no purpose. One said that he could not tell what a tree not mentioned in Scripture would be called in Hebrew. Sometimes a perplexed writer would for despatch use a Syriac instead of a Hebrew term. He too asked Origen to shew him a passage of Scripture where the holm-oak and mastick-tree were certainly mentioned. Origen concludes: "As this was what the Hebrews said with whom I conversed, and so nothing is to be learned about it, I am careful not to express an opinion whether these words are preserved among the Hebrews in such a relationship and in the like significance or not."[1] It does not seem to have occurred to this learned Father that a twofold coincidence of this kind in two languages so remote from each other as Greek and Hebrew was a thing not to be expected. But what is more surprising than an ancient writer's philological perplexity is the fact that modern critics have actually found in these instances of paronomasia the clearest proof that the piece was originally composed

[1] 'Africani ad Orig. Epist.' p. 10, apud Migne, xi. col. 44.

[1] Migne, xi. pp. 61–65.

Digitized by Microsoft®

in Greek. Eichhorn, Bertholdt, Grätz, and Fritzsche do not seem to have remembered how common the figure paronomasia is in Hebrew and Oriental literature, and at the same time the extreme unlikelihood that any given instance could be exactly reproduced in an alien language. Can we successfully imitate in English the prophet Isaiah's "He looked for judgment (משפט), but behold oppression (מישפח); for righteousness (צדקה), but behold a cry (צעקה)"? Whether, as Scholz supposed, the Greek translator of Susanna correctly rendered the Hebrew verbs, and then chose names of trees to match, or whether he found it necessary to give up both the verbs and the nouns of the original text, in order to produce a successful imitation, can hardly perhaps be decided. But the fact that one of Lagarde's Syriac texts (L_2.) gives a fair paronomasia in the first case between ܦܣܛܩܐ, pāstĕqā, "pistachio-tree," and the verb ܦܨܩ, pĕṣaq, "to cut off,"—and in the second, between ܪܡܢܐ, rummānā, "a pomegranate-tree," and ܪܡܚܐ, rumchā, "a sword,"—is enough to relieve us from the perplexities of Africanus and Origen. This Syriac version may, in fact, have preserved the original names of the trees: for, as Jacob of Edessa, cited by Bugati, observes, neither the σχῖνος or mastick-tree, nor the πρῖνος or holm-oak, was native in Babylonia, nor were they planted in gardens; whereas the pistachio and the pomegranate, mentioned in the Syriac version of his day, were both garden trees, although their names did not correspond in sound with the terms נסיסך, nĕsaddĕqāk, "he will rend thee," and נסיזך, nessĕrāk, "he will saw thee," used by Daniel in cursing the Elders. The Greek translator may have been reminded by pastĕqā of the like-sounding Greek term μαστίχη, which means "gum mastick," the resin of the σχῖνος, which last he, therefore, adopted. The Heb. rimmôn (Syr. rummānā) in like manner reminded him of πρῖνος. But what could have been the Heb. paronomasiæ thus imitated in Syriac and in Greek? Perhaps as Brüll thinks, רמון...והרים ראשך and פסתקא...יפסק ראשך: Dan. viii. 11; Ezek. xxi. 26.

But there are plenty of other possibilities, as the following will shew:—

אגוז, "nut-tree," Cant. vi. 11, and often in Bab. Talmud. יגזר, "will cut in two," 1 Kings iii. 25. Or יגז; cf. Nah. i. 12.

תאנה, "fig-tree;" "the angel will multiply thy sorrow," ירבה בך תאניה ואניה, Lam. ii. 5; Isa. xxix. 2. Cf. also Ps. xci. 10. See Sanhedr. 41 A, cited infra.

כפר, "cypress" (a Babylonian tree) לא יכפר לך, "he will not forgive thee."

